LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

HINTS TO LOVERS.—If a youth is woollingly disposed towards any damsel, as he values his happiness, let him follow my advice. Call on the lady when she least expects him, and take note of the appearance of all that is under her control. Observe if the shoe fits neatly—if the gloves are clean, and the hair well polished. And I would forgive a man for breaking off an engagement, if he discovered a greasy novel hid under the cushions of a sofa, or a hole in the garniture of the prettiest foot in the world. Slovenliness will ever be avoided by a well-regulated mind, as would a pestilence. A woman cannot be what is called dressed, particularly one in a middle or humble life, where her duty, and it is consequently to be hoped her pleasure lies, in superintending and assisting in all domestic matters; but she may be always neat-well appointed. And as certainly as a virtuous woman is a crown of glory to her husband, so assuredly is a slovenly woman a crown of thorns.

WELLBESINGS.—"Von more embrace before we part," as the bear said to the boy down east the other day.—"I have taken some pains to come in," as the tutor said to the publican, when he drove his head through the window.—"How irresistibly kissing you are," as the thief said to the hangman when he tied the rope to his neck. "I like your promises better than your conclusion," as the man said when they were taking him to be hanged. "You are more familiar than agreeable," as the debtor said when the constable tapped him on the shoulder.

ADVICE GRATIS.—If you are in law, get out; if you are out, stay on. If you are a bachelor, marry anon—if you cannot marry, drown yourself.

A BOAT IN A BOWL OF PUNCH, AND A BOY IN THE BOAT.—The subjoined account of Admiral Russell's punch-bowl, and of his noble treat at Cadix, in Spain, on Christmas day, in the year 1695, according to the relation of a gentleman who was present at the entertainment, is copied from an old English Almanack. It is enough to make a modern brand-bread-toaster's hair stick right out straight.—There was in the middle of the garden of lemons and oranges (which garden belonged to Don Pedro Velasco, governor of Cadix), a fountain of punch, and Dutch ale in the bottom and sides, and was made as clean as a Japan punch-bowl. In this fountain, on Christmas-day, was poured six butts of water, half a hoghead of strong Malaga wine, two hundred gallons of brandy, six hundred weight of sugar, twelve thousand lemons, and nutmegs and sugar in proportion. The admiral hired the governor's house, belonging to the garden, and resided there all the winter. He invited there all the English and Dutch merchants, and officers belonging to the fleet to dine with him; there was one hundred dishes of fresh meat, besides many other dishes of rarities; but such a death feast was never seen in Spain before. He also roasted an ox for the benefit of the company. Dinner being ended, they marched in order to the fountain, or punch-bowl, where, on the punch, floated a little boat with a boy in it, and cups to serve it out to the company. The admiral began with the allies' health; and having drank what they thought fit, they drew off, and in went the boat, with their shoes and stockings all on, and had like to have turned the boat, with the boy over, and so he might have been drowned in the punch; but, to prevent further danger, they sucked it up, and left the punch-bowl behind." This is a comical, but a true relation, and worth noting.

DEAFNESS OF THE AGED.—Nothing is more common than to hear old people utter querulous complaints of deafness, and of increasing deafness; but those who do so are not perhaps aware that this infirmity is the result of an express and wise arrangement of Providence in constructing the human body. The gradual loss of hearing is effected for the best purposes; it being woman, or child, subjected to the decline of life, when any noises or sounds from without would discompose the enfeebled mind, and prevent peaceful meditation. Indeed, the gradual withdrawal of all the senses, and the perceptible decay of the frame, in old age, have been wisely arranged in order to wear the human mind from the concerns and pleasures of the world, and to induce a longing for a more perfect state of existence.

THEATRICAL FUN.—When the New-Orleans Firemen visited the St. Charles theatre by invitation of Mr. Caldwell, in consequence of their exertions to suppress the burning from fire, Finn added the following to his Fireman's Song.

"But words are too weak for the praises
Of those who the engines then hauled well,
On that day when the firemen like slaves
Went to work for their friend James H. Caldwell.
No theatre but this I will say,
Has been saved from a burning outright, sir;
If the firemen hadn't played on that day,
We shouldn't have been playing to-night, sir."

MISS SHREVEY.—While this lady was singing, at her benefit recently at Baltimore, the hall was full of people who came to see, my lad," a young gentleman in the pit, who was completely entranced, unconsciously whistled loud enough to be heard by the whole house. The audience testified by applause its admiration of the compliment.

SPECIMENS OF JUVENILE EQUIVOCANCE AT UTICA, N. C.—A Yes, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a man, woman, or child, in this house, who have arrived at the age of fifty years and upwards, but what has felt this truth thundering through their brains for centuries.

RANGE THE WINDMILL.—In a tempest, accompanied with a tremendous whirlwind, which swept over a great part of Georgia on the twentieth ult., three persons were taken up from the ground and carried several hundred yards. So, at least, says one of our exchange papers.

WHISKERS.—"I cannot imagine," said an alderman, "why my whiskers should turn gray so much sooner than the hair on my head." "Because," observed a wag, "you have worked much harder with your jaws than your brains."

ON A SUNBEAM PLAYING ON A MASS OF SNOW.

Mark in you beam, the world's destructive guile—
It melts its own way to ruin with a smile.

A SCHOOLMASTER.—Who was as fond of the use of his hog as the globe, was asked the difference between gravity and gravitation. "When I've drove five phrases of Greek, and one pedagogue, my gravity vanishes and my gravitation begins to operate."

POPE'S OATH.—Pope's oath was, God mend me. A link-boy to whom he had refused a penny, looking at his diminutive stature, cried out, "God mend you, indeed! it would be less trouble to make a new one."

AN EDITOR'S ADVICE.—An editor West, very properly advises another who wishes to pick a quarrel with him, to run home to his manly.

A TALK MAN.—They have a map out South so tall, that he lets himself out at camp-meetings for a steeple.

ENGLISH NATIONAL DEBT.—Canning, when speaking of other national debt, said that England was bound to keep the peace in the sum of eight hundred million pounds.

TEA.—The tea plant has been discovered growing indigenously in the mountain country of British India, and a sample has been prepared and sent to England, which is said to be equal to the product of China. It is thought that Great Britain will soon be independent of the Celestial Empire, in regard to that article.

THE DAYS OF CHILDHOOD.—We have nothing in the whole range of poetry, ancient or modern, more beautifully expressed on this subject than the following lines by the late Charles Lamb, the inimitable and excellent Elia.

"In my poor mind it is most sweet to muse
Upon the days gone by—in a act, in thought,
Past seasons o'er, and by again a child.
To sit, in fancy, on the turf-clad slope,
Down which the little boy
* * * * *
* * * * *
To pluck gay flowers.
Make pones in the sun, which the child's hand
(Childhood, offended soon, soon reconciled)
Would throw away, and straight take up again,
Then flung them to the winds; and up the lawn
Bound with so playful, and so light a foot,
That the grass'd daisy square declin'd her head."

THE EVE.—A person may discipline the muscles of the face, and he may control the voice; but there is something in the eye beyond the will; and we frequently find it giving the tongue the lie direct.

MUSIC.—Didymus, an ancient philosopher, was of opinion that the sound of the human voice was music to the human ear. Didy was a bachelor.

TRANQUILITY OF MIND.—A pervading tranquillity is generally the characteristic of the first order of minds, as restlessness is of the second.

EDITORIAL OATH.—"Oh I swear!" is the most appropriate oath for an editor to make use of when news is scarce.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"The reasons why John Smith should not change his name," which will be found in another page, are perfectly satisfactory. The reader will recognize in that essay sketch the well-known pen of the original Major Jack Downing. He is welcome to our columns.—A District Attorney was recently heard to say that rather than send so many poor wretches to prison for stealing, he would prefer stealing himself, if the law were not against it." This is the substance of the entire commendation of Justice. The single grain of wheat from the bushel of chaff he has sent us.—A correspondent says, that "a young lady, on the night previous to her marriage, was performing on the piano-forte with one hand, giving as a reason for the singularity that she had slightly injured the other." Is it not rather because the other is engaged to observe a little fair-haired nymph by her side? This also constitutes the whole material of a novelette of twenty pages, written by a youth who signs himself Fluvio.—"Fair Play" has called our attention to a crime of omission on not setting at an earlier date, two new literary papers recently established in this city. The undertaking was entirely accidental. The New York Literary Gazette, edited by Mr. Adrich, was welcome as a fellow-labourer in the literary vanguard. It is an ably-conducted and beautifully printed periodical, and merits the commendation that has been universally awarded to it. We wish the editor every success. The Examiner we have noticed before, and do so again, at the instance of our correspondent, with much pleasure. No one can read the work without being satisfied that a true gentleman presides over its editorial conduct. It is weekly stored with critical notices, written with fairness and discrimination. We find it as a valuable auxiliary in the course of letters. We agree with Fair Play in his estimate in regard to "The Sun." It is uniformly conducted with courage, urbanity and talent; and it gives us pleasure to know that its circulation is so extensive as its merits deserve. The story entitled the "Breath of Promise," the comments upon "Advertising for Wives," and "Police Reports," are inadmissible.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1839

Mrs. Maclean.—The recent accounts from England confirm the report of the death of Mrs. Maclean, so well known to the literary world under the initials of L. E. L. She died at Cape Town shortly after her arrival. She was found dead on the floor of her room, with a vial of prussic acid, and the jury gave as a verdict that she had probably taken an over-dose for spasms of the stomach, to which she was subject. Letitia Elizabeth Landon was a lady of no ordinary genius, and it is with emotions of regret that we record her melancholy end. For the last ten years her effusions have been the principal staple for the supply of the "poets' corners" of our newspapers. Her versification is remarkably melodious, and many of her lyrical pieces are permanently interwoven with the existence of the language. She wrote, perhaps, too profusely, and did not sufficiently concentrate her powers to produce any work of paramount genius. But there is exquisite grace and beauty in her poems, and the history of the literature of the century would be incomplete without an honorable mention of her contributions. A young female friend of rather a fanciful and superstitious tendency of mind, mentions to us as a "coincidence," that on originally hearing of the lamentable death of L. E. L., she accidentally took up her novel of "Ethel Churchill," when the very first words her eyes lighted on in opening the volume, were the following:

"Strong as the death it masters, is the hope
That onward looks to immortality.
Let the frame perish, so the soul survive,
Pure, spiritual and loving, I believe
The grave exalts, and do the honors of it
That shall in us affection to our kind.
I will look down from yonder pitying sky
Watching and waiting those I love on earth,
Anxious in heaven until they too are there."

The following letter from Mrs. Maclean.—To a female friend in England, we presume—dated on the fifteenth of October, the day of her death, was found in her writing-desk:

"MY DEAREST MARY.—I cannot but write you a brief account how I enact the part of a feminine Robinson Crusoe. I must say, in itself, the place is infinitely superior to all I ever dreamed of. The castle is a fine building—its rooms excellent. I do not suffer from heat; insects there are few or none; and I am in excellent health. The solitude, except an occasional dinner, is absolute; for seven in the morning till seven when we dine. I never see Mr. Maclean and rarely any one else. We were welcomed by a series of dinners, which I am glad are over—for it is very awkward to be the only lady; still, the great kindness with which I have been treated, and the very pleasant manners of many of the gentlemen, made me feel it as little as possible. Last week we had a visit from Captain Castile of the Pyrites. His story is very melancholy. He married, six months before he left England, to one of the beautiful Miss Hills, Sir John Hill's daughter, and she died just as he received orders to return home. We also had a visit from Colonel Bosch, the Dutch governor, a most gentlemanly-like man. But fancy how awkward the next morning! I cannot induce Mr. Maclean to rise; and I have to make breakfast, and do the housework, and then to him and his officers—white plumes, mustaches, and all. I think I never felt more embarrassed. I have not yet felt the want of society the least. I do not wish to form new friends, and never does a day pass without thinking most affectionately of my old ones. On three sides we are surrounded by the sea. I like the perpetual dash on the rocks: one wave comes up after another, and it is for ever dashed in pieces—like human hopes, that only swell to be disappointed. We advance up springs the shining forth of love or hope, a moment white and gone for ever. The land view, with its cocoa and palm trees, is very striking—it is like a scene in the Arabian Nights. Of a night the beauty is very remarkable; the sea is of a silvery purity, and the moon deserves all that has been said in her favour. I have only once been out of the fort by daylight, and then was delighted. The salt lakes were first dyed a deep crimson by the setting sun; and as we returned they seemed a faint violet in the twilight, just broken by a thousand stars, while before us was the red beacon light. The chance of sending this letter to a very sudden one, or I should have ventured to write to General Fagan, to whom I beg the very kindest regards. Dearest, do not forget me.—Mrs. George Maclean. Cape Coast Castle, care of Messrs. Forsier and Smith, 5 New City Chambers, Bishopsgate-street." Write about yourself; nothing else half so much interests L. E. M."

A writer in the London Courier says, in reference to the above—"On reading the above most affecting letter, it will at once be conceived that it must have produced on the minds of the jury an impression as to the tranquil state of mind of the writer, and of her having therefore perished by a most deplorable want of caution on her own part. But we here feel it due to truth and justice to state, that letters previously written by the same hand, a few hours, perhaps a month before, give evidence that that most affectionate and noble spirit was not always so tranquil. It should also be distinctly stated, that she had never been known by her friends in England to have resorted to the use of the deadly medicine in the case of spasmodic attacks."

The evidence also of her husband at the inquest is not quite satisfactory.

George Maclean deposed and said, that deponent saw nothing particular about Mrs. Maclean this morning, except that she complained of weariness; and after having, as usual, given him some tea and arrow root, at six o'clock, went to bed again for about one hour and a half. Deponent attributed her weariness to attendance upon himself while sick, and went of rest for three previous nights; that she was very subject to spasms and hysterical affections, and had been in the custom of using the medicine contained in the small bottle produced, as a remedy or prevention, which she had told him had been prescribed for her by her medical attendant in London (Dr. Thompson); that on seeing her use it, deponent had threatened to throw it away, and had at one time told her that he had actually done so; when she appeared so much alarmed, and said it was so necessary for the preservation of her life, that deponent was prevented from afterward taking it away; that he had been called by Bailey that morning, when he found Mrs. Maclean on the floor near the door, quite senseless; that he immediately sent for the doctor, and assisted to carry her to bed; that the efforts of the doctor to restore life were in vain, and that deponent cannot assign any cause for her death; that the letter in the following words, now produced to the deponent, and stated to have been found in Mrs. Maclean's desk this morning, is in her own handwriting; and that an unkind word had never passed between Mrs. Maclean and deponent."

The untimely death of this lady will be generally lamented. The lovers of elegant literature have long been familiar with her writings, which displayed tenderness and delicacy of feeling, with no inconsiderable powers of observation and poetical genius. In the letter to her friend given above, her affectionate spirit breathes forth with its wonted kindness; at the same time, there are indications of that susceptibility of temperament which shone forth in the literary productions, as it affected the daily existence of L. E. L.

It is noticeable that an account of the death of Mrs. Maclean's uncle, Dr. Landon, Dean of Exeter, was received in London the day before that of his niece transpired.

London chat.—The English correspondent of the Star, furnishes us with the following gossiping intelligence—"Caroline Bowles is said to be the lady whom Robert Southey is about to marry. She is a delightful writer. Her chapters on Churchyards, in Blackwood, are admirable, and she has written some of the best serious poetry I am acquainted with. A portrait of Dickens by Lawrence, is coming out. A wag says he must be popular in Turkey; else why have the Boz-for-us (Bosphorus). Lover, the poet, painter, novelist, dramatist, and musician, is about publishing all his songs and ballads. Lover's "Rory O'More" is known everywhere. H. K. Brown, who illustrates Nicholas Nickleby, is to publish a set of oddities, called "Phiz's Fancies." He is about illustrating a new work, "A Paper-of Tobacco," edited by Joseph Fume! A new monthly periodical, à la Pickwick, is coming out, to be called "Memoirs of Davey Dreamy." Dr. James McHenry's new poem, "The Antediluvian; or, the World Destroyed," has found a London publisher. A new magazine is to start this month, called "Dearden's Miscellany." Bulwer has withdrawn from the proprietorship of the Monthly Chronicle. De Quincy, the celebrated Opium Eater, has begun a series of papers on the Lake Poets. The first is Wordsworth. It is given in Tait's Magazine. Thomas Carlyle's critical and miscellaneous essays are about appearing in four volumes. A new Annual, called The Gift for all Seasons, is in the press. It will be edited by Mr. Anderson, author of Landscape Lyrics, and among its contributors are Ladies Blessington and Stuart Wortley, Sheridan Knowles, R. M. Milnes, Dr. Mackenzie, Archdeacon Whangham, etc. Widas Barnaby, Mrs. Trollope's new work, is one of her very facts.

Published portraits.—It is related of Queen Elizabeth of England, that she was so annoyed by some of the sad doubts which were put forth by the limners and engravers of that day, as royal likenesses, that she issued an ordinance prohibiting "all manner of persons to draw, paint, engrave, or portray her majesty's personage or visage for a time, until by some more perfect pattern and example the same may be by others followed." We should recommend to Victoria to adopt some similar means of preventing herself from being caricatured—for we have not yet had in this country a well engraved and faithful representation of her majesty. This deficiency is, however, likely to be supplied by the enterprising proprietor of the Albion, who gives to his subscribers a very beautiful, and, we believe, faithful picture of England's Queen.

Dexter, the Sculptor.—His bust of Miss Tree.—Mr. Henry Dexter, a self-educated artist, is attracting much attention in Boston, in consequence of his success as a sculptor. His studio, at Broomfield Hall, is daily visited by many lovers of art. Many eminent individuals in Boston have employed him to take their busts and have been highly satisfied with the result. Among these, the mayor of the city, Samuel E. Eliot, Esq., is to be numbered; and much credit is due to him for discovering and encouraging the talent of the artist. Mr. Dexter has out the mayor's bust in a beautiful style, in marble; and he is now employed in cutting that of the mayor's lady, from the same material. The sculptor has also executed a splendid bust of Miss Ellen Tree, a copy of which in plaster may be seen at our office. It is very perfect, and finished with much judgment and taste, while the likeness is remarkably faithful.

WE MAY ROAM THROUGH THIS WORLD.

THE POETRY BY THOMAS MOORE—THE MUSICK ARRANGED BY SIR JOHN STEVENSON.

MERRILY.

We may roam like a child at a feast, Who but slips of a then flies to the rest, And when thro' this world, Who but a sweet, and plea-sure be-gins to dull in the east, We may or-der and be off to the west; But if hearts that feel and eyes that smile, Are the dear-est gift that heav'n sup-plies, We ne-ver need leave our own green isle For sen-si-tive and for sun-bright eyes. Then re-mem-ber, your gob-let is this world whe-ther east-ward or west-ward you roam, When a cup to the smile of dear crown'd, Thro' wo-man Oh! re-mem-ber the smile which a-dorns her at home!

SECOND VERSE.—In England, the garden of beauty is kept
By a dragon of prudery, placed within call;
But so oft this unamiable dragon has slept,
That the garden's but carelessly watch'd after all.
Oh! they want the wild, sweet-briery fence,
Which round the flowers of Erin dwells,
Which warns the touch, while winning the sense,
Nor charms us least when it most repels.
Then remember, etc.

THIRD VERSE.—In France, when the heart of a woman sets sail,
On the ocean of wedlock its fortune to try,
Love seldom goes far in a vessel so frail,
But just pilots her off, and then bids her good-by!
While the daughters of Erin keep the boy
Ever smiling beside his faithful oar,
Through billows of wo and beams of joy,
The same as he look'd when he left the shore.
Then remember, etc.

NEW MUSICK.

"HASTE, boatman, haste," is the title of a new barcarole, the poetry by Miss Costello, the music composed by Manouevner, by whom it is dedicated to Henry Russell. It is published by Hewitt and Jaques, corner of Broadway and Park-Place. The following are the words:

Haste, boatman, haste, there's not to night
Or mist or cloud we may discover,
The air is pure, the moon is bright,
Unmoor thy bark and row me over.
Haste, boatman, haste!
The nightingale at distance calls,
The willows wave amid the gleaming;
Gay lights, like glow-worms gem those walls,
And you fair girl awaits my coming.
Haste, boatman, haste!
Haste, boatman, such a stream and shore,
And such a star to guide a lover,
Should give new vigour to thine oar—
Then take thy bark and row me o'er.
Haste, boatman, haste!
Dost thou not hear her soft guitar,
And softer voice the echoes swelling?
Dost thou not mark yon guiding star,
Whose rays are beaming o'er her dwelling?
Haste, boatman, haste!

Horn has just finished another number of his "National Melodies," and a new song, the words by Mr. Halleck, which may be had of Horn and Davis, 411 Broadway. Russell's last production is, "We met in other years," the words by a favourite lady correspondent of our own—Jons. Published by Hewitt and Jaques.

COMPLIMENTARY ENTERTAINMENT.

MR. BURTON.—Although somewhat late in the day, we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of copying from the Evening Star the following account of one of the most delightful entertainments ever given in this city. The occasion was graced by the presence of many distinguished authors, poets, editors, artists, actors, members of the bar, officers of the army and navy, as well as eminent citizens from other states. Never was a compliment of the kind more worthily bestowed, and it will not easily pass from the memory of those who had the good fortune to partake of Cozzens's sumptuous repast, and to listen to the innumerable capital things said and done by the "goody company."—"The friends of literature and the drama gave Mr. Burton a complimentary dinner on Monday, the eleventh instant, at the American Hotel. He had completed a short and successful engagement at the National, considering the season of the year, and left a most favourable impression of his talents and good personal qualities. Connected also with the literature of the country, at the head of an ably-conducted periodical in Philadelphia, the compliment was in every respect due to him, and passed off in the most agreeable manner. His honour the Mayor was in the chair; and about seventy gentlemen partook of a sumptuous repast, served in the best style of the worthy host of the American. Mr. Burton, in reply to the toast of the Mayor, was exceedingly happy in the expression of thanks for the honour conferred on him. Several gentlemen also spoke, and the whole affair partook of a neat and classic character, such as we desire frequently to see repeated. The charm of the evening, however, was in the delightful songs of Mr. Wilson, Mr. Horn, and Mr. Russell, who, with the aid of the pianoforte in glee, catches, ballads, etc. gave a complete concert. Mr. Wilson's Scotch songs were admirable. Horn has got a new lease, and sings as well as he did twenty years ago; and Russell went over all his gems with the most perfect execution. Williams, of the National, and Burton, sang comic songs. The health of Miss Shirreff was drunk with great enthusiasm, and Mr. Wilson, in returning thanks for a complimentary toast, and referring to the great pleasure he had derived from a visit South, claimed New-York as his home in the new world, where the reception of himself and friends had been so warm and cheering. Mr. Wallace, of the National, Mr. Hamblin, and several gentlemen of the corps dramatique, were present; and the party separated at midnight, having passed a delightful time. These marks of distinction conferred on gentlemen of the profession, have the best general tendency in inducing them to place a proper estimate on the value and importance of private worth and dramatic talent."

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

The Fight.

"Now for a scamper!" cried Miss Julia, getting ready for a start, as the top of the stage appeared swinging this way and that, and slowly working its passage through the cool deep shadow we had left; the horses tossing their heads, and their manes all afloat, in their impatience to be up—"now for a scamper!" leaning forward on one foot—a foot which Victoria herself might have been proud of, all the British newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding—with parted lips and eager eyes, and little straw bonnet, pulled together by the strings, into which had been stuffed, by little and little, after she had left the stage, (and the eye of her mother,) a pocket handkerchief, a pair of soiled gloves, a paper of lemon drops, a sweet pretty scarf, as she called it, of gold and purple gauze, a feather fan, two or three suspicious looking letters folded away, along with ever so many and so-forths; by reason whereof, the little bonnet, of open-work straw, became a very pretty traveling basket, hooped with blue ribands, and crammed till it was ready to burst—"now for a scamper!" catch me if you can, George!" and off she started!—off and away—along the outermost verge of the road, where the turf lay greenest, and adown the steepest part of the hill, where the shadow lay darkest; her mother screaming after her at the top of her voice, and protesting to all of us by turns, and to me in particular, (I never could imagine why,) that she never saw the child in "such a tantrum afore—the most unaccountable thing!" for at home, Charlotte Julia Ma-ri, as she called her, was just as stiddy as a clock, not a bit of a romp, and wouldn't have anything to say to a hoop, nor touch-to, and that, if she ever got to the bottom of that fere plaguy hill, without breakin' her neck, or somethin' wess, it was her belief, she wouldn't have a rag on her fist to be seen!"—poor George eyed his light boots and strapped unimpeachables, with such a piteous look!—now dusting himself with more energy than ever, now throwing his collar back with an air of desperate determination—trying to laugh the while—and now looking after the beautiful romp, with such an expression of utter helplessness—the father laughing and ballooning with all his might, and throwing up his arms to encourage her, and the children running hither and thither, and screaming and clapping their hands, like mad creatures, as they saw poor Julia trying to stop herself a long way below; at one time, by catching at the wild shrubbery, at another, by jumping along on her heels—dropping a thread-paper here, and a glove there—now parting with a pale blue neckerchief, which had kept her shoulders from the sun—literally snatched off by a light-fingered spray, while appearing to hold forth a chaplet of green leaves just ready to drop, as she darted underneath the outstretched arms of the older trees, that were stooping over her path, and trembling to catch her—trembling to the very roots, I dare say—now casting a shoe, and how that gold and purple scarf, her hearts' quick treasure!—flirted off by the rising wind, like so much "sky-unctured!" gossamer, and swept screaming, and glittering, and skimming, all the way into the deepest of the dark foliage that lay heaped up, like huge piles of permanent shadow, in the awful solitude beneath us.

"There now! didn't I tell you so!" cried the mother—"I do wish you would stop laughin' a moment, Mr. Fitch—how can I make the child hear me, if you don't stop? Here am I, all out o' breath, een-a-most ready to cry, and there are you laughin' as if you'd split your throat—there goes another gallus-button!—saved you attention! I'm glad on't—another time, I hope you'll pay some respect to what's said to you—Juliee, I say!—Juliee dear!—Charlotte-Juliee-Ma-ri!—I'll spank her well, when I do catch her, you see if I don't!"—the jade!

"There now! there goes another handkerchief! there goes her new bonnet!—bran new 'other day—not more'n a month old! Test what I told you, Mr. Fitch: a fool an' his money, says I, is soon parted, says I—didn't I, Mr. Fitch!"

Mr. Fitch bowed, and pursing up his mouth, tipped me a wink.

"And then, says Juliee-Ma-ri, says she—why Ma! says she, if I can't have a decent bonnet to wear, I don't want to go, says she: hope you haint forgot that—have you?"

"No, my dear—not a word of it—how should I!—ben a-ringin' in my ears ever sence—"

"You'll never hear the last on't, I promise you, Mr. Fitch."

Mr. Fitch only drew a long breath in reply, and then burst out a laughing again.

"Why, Mr. Fitch!—Mr. Fitch, I say—what will the gentleman think of you! Concern it all, Mr. Fitch, didn't I make you promise before we started?"

"To be sure you did, my love—make me cross my fingers, and wish I might die."

"Oh, you may laugh, Mr. Fitch! There goes another button!—but you'll be sorry for this, afore along; if you don't, I miss my guess, that's all!—Goody gracious!—look o' there, Mr. Fitch!—What's the matter, now?"

We looked, and lo! Miss Julia had actually turned about, and appeared hurrying toward us, stretching out her arms, and calling or screaming, as if pursued. The mother grew very red in the face, and the father himself looked frightened; and the next moment, the four horses and the heavy stage came thundering down the hill after us, at full gallop, the driver shouting, and shaking his whip, and sawing to us to keep together! and not leave the children!—and something else he said which escaped me, though it must have reached my fellow-traveller; for, without saying a word—though I never shall forget his look!—he sprang up behind the stage as it passed, and bidding me not be frightened, began loosening his collar and buttoning up his coat, with one hand, while he steadied himself with the other, by the straps that bound the luggage.

On turning my head to see if either had been better understood by my companions than by me, another and a more distant scream was heard from the deep hollow—other and hoarser voices—the baying of dogs—and cries of mutual encouragement, which appeared to be approaching. The mother turned pale as death—the children huddled together in speechless terror—the collegian sprang for the fence, followed by the father, who wrenching out a stake, and calling upon me to stay by the children, and behave like a man, set off at full speed down the hill.

"What on earth is the matter? Do you know, madam," said I, as the whole company started off down the hill, one after the other, each arming himself as he ran, with whatever happened to be in his way, and the collegian limping behind them all, as if his legs were tied; while the mother, squatting down on the grass, and screaming "Juliee! Juliee!" with one arm round each of the children, who were hiding their faces in her lap, kept screaming to me not to leave her. To all my questioning, no answer could I get for a long while, but, "Murder! murder! Juliee! Juliee!"

At last, however, just as I was beginning to grow weary of her insupportable clamour, and but for the poor frightened children, would have left her to see for myself what the matter was below, her voice changed a little, her breath failed her for a moment, and I thought I could distinguish the words, "O Mr. Fitch! my husband! my husband!—the bear—the bear!"

Merciful heaven!—a bear! The truth flashed on me like lightning! I understood at once what the driver meant by shaking his whip, and screaming so violently to the horses—what he said to us about the children—and what the stranger sprang up behind for, as the stage went lumbering by in a cloud of dust. I had a dirk with me, by the strangest accident in the world, for I never travelled with one before; and having unheathed it, was just on the point of starting off at full speed for the bottom of the hill, when I heard a crashing of the undergrowth near the rocks we had just left, and up started a huge bear—the largest I ever saw. She rose on her hind legs for a moment, looked about her, and then tumbled over the log-fence that separated us, followed by her cubs, and came directly toward me! The children must have heard her growl, though their faces were hid in their mother's lap—for they gave one more scream!—one more! and altogether!—and the bear, lifting herself up, and looking about, as if she hadn't seen us before, and was quite astonished at the outcry, took straight across the road into the bushes, within forty feet of us, followed by both her cubs, and within five minutes, by two great powerful dogs, tearing their way through the underbrush like a pair of stag-hounds, their eyes glowing like live coals, their rough coat bristling, their tongues lolling out of their mouths, and their whole appearance that of the four-footed avenger of blood, on the track of a man-slayer. On they passed! without stopping to look at us; and before we had got a hundred yards further, for we lost no time in taking a new departure, I promise you, we heard voices approaching from below—a tremendous uproar in the woods, followed by such a screaming, and barking, and yelping, and growling, as you never heard in your life, out of Exeter Change at feeding time—and then shot after shot, as if all the country was up, and a whole parish, at least, blazing away at a poor solitary she-bear, the last creature in the world to meddle with human flesh, in this part of the country, so long as the sweet corn, or the wild grape is to be found, or nuts or acorns, or young pigs—which the northern bear greatly prefers to children.

Without stopping to hear the result, and most confoundedly frightened I acknowledge, we hurried on toward the foot of the hill where the stage appeared to be waiting for us—the poor crazed mother tugging one child along by the arm, and I carrying the other till we met some of the party on the way back to our assistance; the driver calling to us afar off, to make haste, and the father shouting on his way toward us, that we needn't hurry at all, that there was no harm done, and the collegian looking as if he could tear his own eyes out, for the stranger had Julia in his arms, and was lifting her into the stage, as a mother would her sick child.

"Thank God!" whispered the father, as he ran past me to help his wife into the stage; "the poor child is not hurt at all—only frightened out of a year's growth or so!" and in we bundled, faster by a deal than we had bundled out, and off we started again at full speed for more than half a mile, I should think, before anybody ventured to speak above his breath.

At last, the driver drew up, and called out to know how the young lady was.

"Better—much better!"—said she, opening her eyes, and lifting up her head from her mother's lap, and looking about, as if to satisfy herself that every dear thing she loved on earth was quite safe; tears of thankfulness running out of her eyes, and sobbing choking her speech, as the children cuddled up to her in the bottom of the coach, and clung to her, chattering and kissing, and laughing and crying, all in a breath.

"Oh Juliee, Juliee! Charlottee Juliee! that ever I should see you in the arms of a—"

"Of a bear—my dear mother!" murmured the poor girl, putting up both arms, and pulling her mother's cheek down to her lips—

The stage stopped, and the driver, leaning over and twisting his head, so as to see for himself how the land lay, sung out—"I say neighbours! may be you'd like to know where they tread the beast, when I fess see her, a-comin' over the top o' the hill there!"; pointing with his whip as he spoke to a large pine tree standing by itself, and overtopping the whole neighbourhood—"I say, marn, that's the tree, aint it, where you see the bear fast!"

Julia shut her eyes with a shudder, and turned away.

"Wal! I know 'twas," continued the driver—"I've ben acquainted with that ere tree ever since I want more a knee high to a bumby-bee—kind o' brought up together, ye see—an' taint the first time I've seen a bear out—no, not by two chulks—and so you see, as I was a comin' over the top o' that ere hill yonder, I happened to be a lookin' at that ere tree—you can see it more'n six miles off one way, an' everybody knows it—well, you see, as I was a lookin' at it, all at once I thought it seemed to look different, somehow, from what it ever did before, close up to the top—and jist then it happened to look down the hill, and then I saw that ere young woman hopping along on one foot, as if she had lost her shoe; and then, what do you think! why, when I looked up at the tree next time, it had altered again, if it hadn't I wish I may be shot! and the top on't seemed to be comin' down—if it didn't, I hope I may never speak another word.—Oh, ho! says I to myself, that's a bear!—and then, all at once, it come into my mind, that only a week or two ago, a great she-bear was seen by a feller, that come up here from Portland a fishin'. He was a whapper, I tell you! an' she was waddlin' along—waddlin' along sideways, with two great unaccountable cubs arter her, when he happened to turn his head that way, and what do ye think! why there she was, sure enough!—within six feet of him!—so he jist giv one screech and cleared out! and Ethan Crawford told me himself, that he hadn't no manner o' doubt o' the truth of the story, for the feller turned as white as a sheet, an' never stopped till he got to Jonas Crawford's, and then he tumbled into the bar-room, head first, singin' out—murder! murder! stop the bear! stop the bear! Wal—and so—I jist thought to myself, what's that ere feller a comin' down the tree arter!—can't be for that young woman there—never heard o' sich thins in these parts; howsoever, thinks I—no harm in givin' her a friendly hint; and so, I gives the team a twitch or two o' the leather, as much as to say, how are you! and puts the string on a little—an' if they didn't smoke it down that are hill there, about the quickest, I think it's a pity. The young woman looked frightened enough, when I met her; but I guess the bear had the worst on't, for she took right off into the woods, without stoppin' to see what ailed us; and when I pulled up for the young woman—glad to see you look so much better, marn—that are dodorin' gentlemen there, he'd got you fast enough—I knew you was safe, though you didn't, and so I did not hurry myself a-turnin'—"

"Oh, sir," said poor Julia, blushing to the very finger-ends, "I am sure, I know not how to thank you for your timely assistance. I had a notion that the bear was close behind me, and that the horses were running away with the carriage; the creature saw me I am sure, when she was in the top of the tree, for my attention was called that way by a sort of low smothered growl, and the first thing I saw, she was coming down the tree, tail first, and tearing off the bark in a terrible rage, while her two cubs were whining at the foot, and trying to get up to her. For a moment, I gave myself up for lost—I hadn't strength enough to run a yard—but on looking about me for a small tree, into which I might clamber, for I hoped she wouldn't leave her cubs, and I happened to recollect that bears cannot climb small trees—I heard the shouting of the driver, and saw the carriage coming down over the top of the hill at a rate which satisfied me the horses were running away with it; I hardly know what happened then—all I remember is, that I thought of the children of my poor mother, and that I tried to scream—

"Tried, hey!" said her father, a tear standing in his eye, and his voice trembling as he spoke to her, though he tried to speak manfully.

"Yes, father, tried with all my heart, I assure you—as the horses and carriage went past—and then—and then—"

"Well, my dear, and what then?" said her father.

"Why, then, sir, I heard the growl of the bear, the whining of the cubs—I felt her breath—I knew she had got me; and in short, sir, looking at the stranger—"

"Well, said the stranger—"

"Well, sir, when I came to myself, I found it wasn't the bear that had got me"—smiling—"not the she-bear at any rate; and so, sir, you know the rest of the story."

We looked at Mr. Ichabod Weare, jun. in astonishment. Not a muscle moved—there was no smile about the mouth—no gentleness of eye—no change of look or attitude. He continued to breathe naturally—even while he held the trembling hands of that child in his own—speaking to her as if his thoughts were far away, and looking at her—nay looking into her very eyes—into her very heart and watching the changes of her lighted-up and wonderful countenance as if he saw her not.

Who was he? what was he? I would have given a little finger to know, (but remember, I don't say whose.) Even the father appeared thoughtful; and as for the poor mother, after staring at him for five minutes or so, she drew a long breath, and turning to me, whispered "that was the strangest man! but there!" she continued, "there's no sayin', and, I s'pose—"

To all which I assented—wondering what George would have to say for himself after we stopped, for he had been mute and sulky—sulky as death, ever since we had returned to our old position.

I grew dark—darker and darker; and we were just making up our minds for a smart shower, when we heard the report of a gun, close alongside; and the next moment somebody bawling to us from little a one-story log-house by the roadside, the door of which stood open and appeared thronged with well-dressed company.

"Come, hurraw there! hurraw! supper's ready!"

"Wall, then, hurraw 'tis!" answered the driver; "What are you got to give?"

"Bear steak and split thunderbolts—that's good enough for you, hey! 'tis, turn out here, and let's have a look at your faces."

No sooner said than done! "We drew up, and in fifteen minutes more found ourselves at Eathan Crawford's, in the worst inn's worst room, that is, in the parlour of the White Mountain House, tired to death, and hungry as tigers, with our host, a man six feet five, in a low-crowned white hat, which he never took off, doing his best to make us comfortable, as he called it.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

NEW YEAR IN THE COUNTRY.

PART I.—THE HONEYMOON.

"Dear Harry, how delightful this is—really quite a picture—the sunny skies of Italy, with its marble palaces and its silver lakes, have nothing that can compare with one of the old ancestral halls of dear, delightful, smiling England."

"And yet you admired Italy, and grew quite eloquent on its ruined fanes, and falling temples, and classic pillars. I think you were guilty of the sin of poetizing."

"Ah! but I had never seen your country seat, with its magnificent range of trees, and its green parks with the tame deer, and the white cottages of your contented peasantry; and, in short, are you not here, and do I not like any place with you, dear husband?"

"My own Laura! and so you are pleased with this our first new year in the country. I wonder if it will be the same this time ten years."

"Can you doubt it?"

"You know it has been our family custom to spend the new year here from time immemorial."

"Ah! how pleasant; and I hope we shall have no intruders on our happiness, no calls from country neighbours to annoy us with congratulations they don't feel, and affect a sympathy with pursuits they can't understand."

There was something pleasant in all this pretty interchange of affection—for Mrs. St. Aubyn was a bride, and felt all the enthusiasm she affected. In a well-assorted union the first few months of marriage form the spring-time of the heart, and Mr. and Mrs. St. Aubyn flattered themselves, that however dull the time and however few the visitors, there would be nothing dull to them in a "new year in the country."

Mrs. St. Aubyn had been the belle of the season. No party was perfect without her. No ball went off with éclat unless her figure enlivened the scene; and, worse than all, no men were to be met where she was not. When chance, or rather the disposition of love, threw her in the way of Harry St. Aubyn, himself one of the best matches of the day, they both fell in love—lived upon chicken and sighs for a considerable time—talked sentimentally like a French milliner—grew most luxuriously pale and very thin—and finished by dashing off to Greece in a coach and six; returning to town in triumph, the hero and heroine of the season—made mistress of Harry St. Aubyn's vast estates, accumulated during his minority, can we wonder at the lavish affection displayed by both bride and bridegroom?

the conversation, when their digression has interrupted, "how beautiful will be the long winter evenings, with your sweet guitar and your sweeter voice—we shall never know a dull hour."

"Yes! and then there will be that hateful season, when all our time must be passed in town in ball-going and Almásy, and fêtes champêtres; and I shall be—"

"So admired, dearest."

"And you will be—"

"Quite jealous, if that pretty face smiles on any one save me."

"Dear Harry, shall I sing to you my last new song?" And then the light-hearted bride, after running carelessly over the strings of her instrument, sang the following—need we say she was rewarded with an affectionate kiss?

SONG.

We part—no, on my word we must—

I really won't allow

That day go by, with Clarence Gray,

You smile, and sigh, and vow!

Of course, I know, to lose your beau,

Will cut you to the core—

But send me all my presents back,—

We part to meet no more!

The days we spent, with Lady Gent,

The mask, the rout, the ball—

Our evening walks, our morning talks,

He's now forgotten all.

I shall be very happy—but

Your happiness is o'er;

Oh! no, I cannot bear any word—

We part to meet no more!

And thus did these two young dreamers while away the time, and in the plenitude of their affection deem that all the succeeding ones would be like—"their first new year in the country."

PART II.—TEN YEARS AFTER MARRIAGE.

Times had dealt gently with our hero and heroine, and as they sat, at the end of the season, in their well-appointed mansion in Belgrave-square, you would scarcely have dreamed that ten years had passed over their heads. The lady's pretty features were peeping from the velvet slippers which enclosed them, but in her countenance there was something which put to flight all the reminiscences of the smiling bride of ten years ago, and as she speaks there is a decision in her tone which then it (fortunately) wanted.

"Really, Mr. St. Aubyn, it's quite absurd. The duke has asked us to spend the new year with him, amid the festivities of W— castle, and instead of going there, I'm to be dragged to your nasty, dull, country seat, because it has been your custom to do so!"

"I tell you, madam, (he never said Laura now,) "that go to Aubyn-hall I will; but you seem quite to have forgotten your penchant for the place during the honeymoon."

"Without any company to enliven us!" put in the lady.

"But shall not I be there?"—and as he spoke he mimicked the tones of her voice.

"Not a prospect worth admiring," continued the incensed lady.

"What! have you forgotten 'the magnificent range of trees,' and its 'green park with its tame deer'?"

"And its hom-drum country neighbours!" retorted Mrs. St. Aubyn.

"Ah! but you forget its 'pretty white cottages' and its 'contented peasantry!'"

"A nasty, dull, foggy place," and Mrs. St. Aubyn's pretty cheek looked prettier under the influence of her rising colour.

"What! in dear, delightful, smiling England!"

"Really, this is too provoking, to have my words thrown in my teeth in this way—but I'm determined I won't go."

"And I'm determined that I will go."

"It's shameful—I, who never crossed you!"

"Excepting about 'new year in the country.'"

"I who brought you a foreign!"

"And spent twice as much in the first year."

"Who made your house the most fashionable in town!"

"Notwithstanding all these numerous obligations," returned Mr. St. Aubyn, leisurely rising, and muttering with the most provoking calmness—

"Pray, Goody, please to moderate."

"Notwithstanding all these obligations, you will find that you will spend the next, as you have spent all the last here, new year's days, in the country."

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.

The following remarkable instance of a constant attachment, is taken from a late English paper. Such a piece of eccentricity in the present day, is indeed remarkable.—Died, on Tuesday, at his residence, Willow Cottage, near Elham, Mr. Jonathan Walton, aged sixty-two years. In early life he formed an attachment to the daughter of a small farmer at Crayford, but his friends being averse to their union, he was sent to the East Indies, where, by perseverance, he accumulated a considerable property. During twenty-two years which he was absent, he regularly corresponded with her; but on his arrival in England, he was informed in time to pay the last tribute of affection to his beloved, she having expired two days previous. Ever after her death he secluded himself, avowing all society except her brothers, to whom he left the bulk of his fortune, amounting to upwards of eighty thousand pounds, subject to the payment of two annuities of seventy-five pounds each, to a male and female servant who were his only domestics for nearly twenty years. His house was built in the cottage style, situated at the extremity of a small grove of willows and poplars, and furnished in the most simple manner. The window-shutters in front were never suffered to be open. His meals were temperate, consisting of bread and milk for breakfast, one dish of boiled meat and soup for dinner, with which he allowed himself a glass of ale, but far from being penurious, he was a great benefactor of many poor persons in the neighbourhood, whom he supplied with fuel and warm clothing in the winter months. He allowed his beard to grow, except on the upper lip; and his hair, which was light auburn, and very long, hung in ringlets over his shoulders. His usual dress was a loose dark gown, and when seen, which was but seldom, he had so much the appearance of a hermit, that he was known to many persons in the vicinity by no other appellation.

THE POLAR STAR.

BY THE LATE MRS. MACLEAN.

This star sinks below the horizon in certain latitudes. I watched it sink lower and lower every night, till at last it disappeared.

A star has left the kindling sky—

A lovely northern light—

How many planets are on high—

But that has left the night.

I miss its bright familiar face,

It was a friend to me,

Associate with my native place,

And those beyond the sea.

It rose upon our English sky,

Shone o'er our English land,

And brought back many a loving eye,

And many a gentle hand.

It seemed to answer to my thought,

It called the past to mind,

And with its welcome presence brought

All I had left behind.

The voyage it lights no longer ends

Soon on a foreign shore;

How can I but recall the friends

Who I may see no more?

Fresh from the pain it was to part—

How could I bear the pain?

Yet strong the omen in my heart

That says we meet again.

Meet with a deeper, dearer love,

For absence shows the worth

Of all from which we then remove—

Friends, home, and native earth.

Thou, lovely polar star, mine eyes

Still turned the first on thee;

Till I have felt a sad surprise

That none looked up with me.

But thou hast sunk below the wave—

Thy radiant place unknown;

I seem to stand beside a grave,

And stand by it alone.

Parwell!—Ah, would to me were given

A power upon thy light to shine—

What words upon our English heaven

Thy loving rays should write.

Kind messages of love and hope

Upon thy rays should be;

Thy shining orbit would have scope

Sorely enough for me.

Oh, fancy vain as it is fond,

And how needed too,

My friends! I need not look beyond

My heart to look for you!

EXTRAORDINARY DUEL.

The following account of a determined single combat is given in the "Life of Thomas Reynolds," notorious in history as a government informer in the Irish rebellion, just published by his son.—"The Count de Rochefort called on Fitzgerald on the part of Warren, and a meeting was arranged for eight o'clock in the morning of Sunday, the twentieth, on the Plain of Grenelle, each party to bring day, friends, and the weapons to be pistols only. Fitzgerald, with two friends, and de Germain, and attended by M. du Halley's servant, was on the ground about a quarter of an hour when Warren arrived accompanied by Captain de Toqueville of the guards, the Count de Rochefort, and an Irishman, whose name we could never learn. Fitzgerald had a case of plain duelling pistols, made by Wogden, of London; Warren had a French case, rifle barrels, hair triggers, and detonating locks, which unquestionably was an aim of much more certain destruction, and in every respect more formidable than the other, and one which would be incomparably more dangerous than if the barrel was not rifled. Fitzgerald, however, declared himself satisfied that each should use his own weapon, but the seconds would not permit it, their own honour being at stake in allowing such a disparity of weapons; they therefore arranged that the combatants should toss up for choice of weapons, and that both parties should use the same case. Warren won the toss, and chose his own pistols, one of which was given to Fitzgerald, who had never before handled or seen one of the kind. Forty paces were measured, and, in the centre of this distance, an inner space of ten paces was measured, at each end of which a hat was placed. The parties were to be placed at the two extremities of the greater distance, and, on the word 'advance' being given, they were at liberty to advance as they pleased, or to remain at the extremity, but in no case to pass the bats; so that each had fifteen paces on his side; but the combatants could never retreat a foot, each might fire when, where, or how he pleased; whoever fired first should remain on the spot from which he fired, and there receive the fire of his adversary, who might still continue to advance up to the bat on his own side. Being placed, Warren ran forward up to the hat on his own side, presented at Fitzgerald, and remained in that attitude. Fitzgerald deliberately walked forward, and having advanced to within five paces of his bat, he, for the first time, raised his pistol to take aim, as it was evident Warren kept him covered in order to fire the moment Fitzgerald should arrive at his bat, and before he could have had time to raise his arm; but, unacquainted with the nicety of the hair trigger, Fitzgerald by some means touched it, his pistol went off while he was raising it. Thus alarmed, at only fifteen paces before his most inveterate enemy, a noted and practised shot, he stood, like a mark, while Warren several times corrected his aim during a space of time greatly exceeding a minute, as marked by the watch of M. du Halley's man, until at length M. de Poinsbue called out to him, 'Fire, Mr. Warren: act honourably.' Warren directly lowered his aim, took off his hat, and replied—'Sir, I am at liberty to aim and fire when and how I please, and I will exercise my right.' He then put on his hat, and gradually raised his arm until he had adjusted his aim to his satisfaction: he fired, and missed. He looked for a few moments, as if in expectation of seeing the effect of his ball, and when convinced that he had failed, he stamped, raged, swore, flung his arms about, cursed his pistol and acted, in fine, like a madman."

WOMAN.

BY ISAAC APPLETON JEWETT.

In every country, from Turkey upwards, woman has her certain place. In Italy, in Switzerland, in Germany, in England, in Scotland, and more than all in civilized and woman-adoring France, I have seen her, in instances without number, performing offices of hardship and notoriety, with which her heaven-given womanly nature seemed to me totally incompatible.

That the age of chivalry has passed from Europe needs not the meagre evidence that no thousand swordsmen leaped from their scabbards to save the beautiful Marie Antoinette. Travel over Europe, the proofs shall stare you in the face wherever you go. In Munich a woman does the work of a printer's devil. In Vienna I have seen her making mortar, carrying hods, digging cellars, and wheeling forth the clay; and there have I also seen females barbed with a man, nay, with a dog, and once even with a jackass, to a cart, dragging the same through the most public streets of the metropolis. In Dresden she saws and splits wood, drags coal about the city in a little wagon, and wheels estates for miles through the highways to the markets, in a huge harrow. In all these places, in France and Italy, may you note her with basket and scraper, hastening to monopolize the filth just fallen upon the public roads.

In France females do vastly more degrading and out of door work than in England, and in Paris they are in as great request as the mirrors themselves. A woman harnesses diligence horses. A woman cleans your boots, as you rest them on her little stand at the Pont Neuf. At the theatres it is a woman who sells you your ticket, and other women who take charge of the boxes. At many mere business offices it is a woman who does the business. Would you bargain at a Chateau for a load of wood, you bargain with a woman. Would you be conveyed publicly to the south of France, you reserve your right to a place in the coupee from a woman. There is no shop, of whatever description, in which a woman is not concerned. There is indeed no department in which she does not appear to be chief manager. The greatest hotel in Paris is kept by a woman. You see women superintending everywhere;—in the reading-rooms, in the restaurants, in the estaminets, in the cafes; selling tobacco in the thronged Tabacs; tending cabinets inodores on the Boulevard Montmartre; lending newspapers in the Palais Royal, and writing out accounts in the Rue de la Paix; and when, alas! her vocation must needs render her form invisible, you shall still on canvases see her image, large as life, in fifty streets of Paris.

One might infer from most of these instances that woman had changed occupation with the other sex. So far as cooking is concerned this is the fact. But I know not if the remark can be extended farther. While the women are thus active, the men are too generally lounging. Ten thousand brilliant shops in Paris are each day and evening presided over by ten thousand brilliant women. Here is certainly no unattractive spectacle. Therein is revealed the ingenuity of the French: since many a green one, and many a knowing one, is thus beguiled into jewelry and kid-gloves to say no worse, merely because it is pleasant to higgles about their price with such gentle cheaters. As to the beauty of these divinites, you shall hear many a sigh from ancient veterans of the consulate and the empire. They will tell you that the young loveliness of those times has vanished. The present is an old and ugly generation. So far as specimens in cafes are concerned, the remark may be true. I have been surprised to find with so much grace, and so much courtesies, and so much gentleness, so little personal beauty combined. I hardly know an example that may be safely recommended, and yet he who should often walk through the Palais Royal, without ever looking into the Cafe Corazza, might be justly charged, in traveller's phrase, with "having seen nothing."

THE MERCENARY LOVER.

Whoever has been in the habit of promiscuous High-street, Cheltenham, in any portion of the year comprised between April and October, must necessarily have observed a certain walking gentleman. We say, advisedly, a walking gentleman. No one ever saw him enter any carriage of greater dignity than a "fly." No one ever saw him on horseback. Yet he is a gentleman; he frequents the best society the place affords; he dresses well, he pays his debts of honour; nay, even his tradesmen's bills. He is of a certain age—that is, he confesses to thirty-six, and may be ten years more. In order clearly to point him out, without mentioning names, we must direct the attention of the reader to a curious fact. His walks in the High-street never extend beyond two hundred yards of the Plough Hotel. Now this circumstance has long been the theme of discussion among his acquaintance. To say the least, it indicates a certain degree of eccentricity in so young a man. It is a very curious thing, that when a person exhibits any degree of eccentricity in his conduct, he is invariably accounted wealthy. It matters not in the least that he has all the external signs of narrow means; his coat may be threadbare, his hat a gossamer, only he must wear an eye-glass suspended round his neck by a broad black ribbon, and be the possessor of a fine clouded cane, and an antiquated watch; yet, if his actions be a little out of the usual course, he will always be set down as a wealthy miser.

Thus it was with our walking gentleman; he was universally considered a second Croesus. Now it so happened, that among the visitors was a certain widow lady, a very pretty woman, of certainly not more than the apparent age of our walking gentleman; the widow had horses, carriages and servants; nothing was known of her more than this. In the course of casual visits the walker and the widow became acquainted. The gentleman was not without sense, and he made a decided impression on the heart of the lady. Our walking gentleman was a thriving wooer, he offered his hand, and was accepted; all so far was well. The matters in discussion between our hero and his widow were, the when, the where, the how the union should take place. The gentleman stated the amount of his property; it was just four hundred pounds per year, and no expectations. The widow expressed no surprise at the smallness of the amount, and appeared perfectly satisfied. The day was fixed, all preparations were completed, when the widow expressed an inclination to see the house of her lover. The walking gentleman informed her, that as soon as the happy event had been determined on he had given it up, and sold his furniture.

"And where are we to live?" said the widow.

"Here, unless you have a dislike to the place!"

"Here!" screamed the widow. "Here!"

"Why not?" said the bachelor.

"It isn't my house," said the widow.

"Not yours! Nor the horses! Nor the carriages! Nor the servants!"

"No, nothing is mine."

"In the name of the—what are ye, madam?"

"When Sir R. T. arrived from India, I was to have been governess to his daughters—this house is his!"

The gentleman fainted.

The lady has commenced a suit at law against the walking gentleman for breach of promise of marriage.

PANATICISM IN BRAZIL.

From the following story published in the Rio Janeiro Journal, O Despertador, our readers will be enabled to judge of the slight advance by civilization in the interior of Brazil. An individual named Joao Antonio, residing in the environs of the village of Pedra Bonita, near Piau, in the district of Flores, had been for some time in the habit of amusing the villagers with the tale of an enchanted kingdom, at the distance of two hundred leagues, and had told them that the moment for breaking the charm was at hand. In the month of November, 1837, this individual proceeded to the forest of Inhama, whence he sent one of his confederates, named Joao Perreito, to Pedra Bonita, where the latter arrived in May last. He immediately announced himself as the sovereign of the enchanted kingdom, promised to break the spell in favour of such as would declare allegiance to him, and assured them that immediately after the operation, the king, Don Sebastian, the long-lost king of Portugal, would arrive with a numerous army, wash their sable complexions white, and render them all rich, happy and immortal. As the condition, however, on which the spell was to be broken, he declared that it was indispensable to massacre a certain number of men, women and children, whom he promised almost immediately afterwards to resuscitate. Perreito's absurd predictions obtained belief from a number of credulous fanatics, who became his devoted adherents. The impostor then, of his own authority, married each of his partisans to two, three, and even four wives, and took eight help-mates to his own share. He next commenced the sacrifices, and, at the expiration of four days, his victims amounted to twenty-one adults, and an equal number of children, who had been given up to him by their infatuated parents. This wholesale butchery was at last suspended by the assassination of the impostor himself by his own brother, Pedro Antonio Perreito, who proclaimed himself his successor. Fortunately the imperial commissary of the district of Flores, M. Manoel de Silva e Souza, was at length informed of the sanguinary scenes enacted in the village of Pedro Bonita, whither he lost no time in proceeding, with twenty-six national guards and about thirty militia troops, to attack Pedro and his adherents, who, on the approach of the armed force, barricaded themselves in a barn. After a desperate struggle, twenty-nine of the fanatics and their leader were killed, and twenty-four others, including four women, taken prisoners and placed in the hands of justice. The imperial commissary had five men killed and four wounded. The Pedroites fought like lions, being encouraged by their leader, in the expectation of the arrival of Don Sebastian's supernatural army to their relief!

WOMAN AT THE FIRESIDE.

BY MRS. ELLIS.

I have said of English women that they are the best fireside companions; but I am afraid that my remark must apply to a very small portion of the community at large. The number of those who are wholly destitute of the highest charm belonging to social companionship is lamentably great; and these remarks would never have been obtruded upon the notice of the public, if there were not strong symptoms of the number becoming greater still.

Women have the choice of many means of bringing their principles into exercise, and of obtaining influence, both in their own domestic sphere and in society at large. Among the most important of these is conversation—an engine so powerful upon the minds and characters of mankind in general, that beauty fades before it, and wealth in comparison is but leading coin. If matchmaking were indeed the great object of human life, I should scarcely dare to make this assertion, since few men choose women for their conversation where wealth or beauty are to be had. I must, however, think more nobly of the female sex, and believe them more solicitous to maintain affection after the match is made than simply to be led to the altar, as wives whose influence will that day be laid aside with their wreaths of white roses, and laid aside for ever.

If beauty or wealth have been the bait in this connexion, the bride may gather up the wreath of roses, and place them again upon her polished brow; nay, she may bestow the treasury of her wealth without reserve, and permit the husband of her choice to "spoil her goodly lands to gild his waste," she may do what she will—dress, bloom or descend from affluence to poverty—but if she has no intellectual hold upon her husband's heart, she must inevitably become that most helpless and pitiable of earthly objects—a slighted wife.

How pleasantly the evening hours may be made to pass when a woman who can converse will thus beguile the time. But, on the other hand, how wretched is the portion of that man who dreads the dullness of his own fireside! who sees the clog of his existence ever seated there—the same, in the deadening influence she has upon his spirits—to-day, as yesterday, to-morrow, and the next day, and the next! Welcome, thrice welcome, the often invited visitor who breaks the dismal dullness of the scene.

THE SPIRIT'S COMMUNINGS.

Original.

I FEEL them with their rustling pinions sweeping,
The damp dew gathering on my brow;
I see them in their lonely vigils keeping
Their midnight watch beside me now:
I know that the freed spirit in its love
Is gazing on me from its home above.
I feel upon my cheek their gentle breathing,
When I at midnight stand alone;
And know that from their pure brows they are wreathing
A chaplet to adorn my own:
The world is present, but 'tis naught to me—
Though earth may clog, my spirit will be free.
Angelick spirits with my soul communing,
Lifting me far above the earth,
Where seraphim their golden harps are tuning
To melodies of heavenly birth;
These—these are round me and to cheer my soul,
Should waves of sorrow darkly o'er me roll.
Earth, earth, away! my sympathies are leaving
The sickly things of thy estate:
Angelick spirits, come! my soul is cleaving
To thee as to the dove its mate.
Heaven-born attendants! to thy company
Admit a spirit struggling to be free.
Then shall I rove where summer winds are dwelling,
Gathering rich fragrance on my way;
Then my freed spirit, holy rapture swelling,
Shall back in one unending day:
Then shall I gaze with unobscured eye
On regions of eternal purity.
Then from the dark earth's shadowy dominion
Shall my freed spirit chainless rove;
Yet will I wander on my viewless pinion
Back unto those whom still I love—
(Oft in the midnight hour, when slumber binds
The weary body)—unto kindred minds.
Then to the old oak with its branches waving,
Where I have sat with her I love;
Or to the streamlet, the rich greensward lying,
Where we have watched the worlds above;
I will return and wander, though unseen,
Whispering to her the things that once have been.
And then, when resting sweetly on her pillow,
Amid the dreamy hours of night,
I'll have the old oak and the murmuring billow,
And guided by the moonbeam's light,
Haste to her couch, and in the dream of bliss
Upon her brow imprint an unfaint kiss.
Yet shall she know me, and, in visions smiling,
Struggle to clasp me to her breast;
Then will I watch her, and with words beguiling,
Mind her of an eternal rest:
And then, when death shall set her spirit free,
Will guard her home to glory and to me.
Earth, earth, away! my spirit upwards soaring,
Gladly would leave thy low estate:—
Angelick spirits in my breast are pouring
Rich streams of joy—and now they wait
To bear me upward to the blue-dyed sky,
Where I may dwell in endless purity.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We have had divers debates with ourselves as to the propriety of allowing the following letter to appear in the Mirror. Modesty is the first of virtues; but we are afraid we sometimes carry it too far, and so stand in our own light. If we are so popular in Europe, as our correspondent assures us we are, why should it not be made known in America? Why should we not overwhelm, at once, those who have seen fit to make merry with our effusions? We will publish the letter. We merely wish to say to our readers, that it is from a young American, one of our most faithful correspondents, who is pursuing his studies

"At the University of Göttingen, as Canning once sung.

My DEAR — I avail myself of the first leisure which the present occasion affords me, to renew our long-neglected correspondence, and to give you some account of the news of the day with us. Be not alarmed. I will not avail myself of this opportunity to inflict on you any dull political novelties. You can find out, in your newspapers, all about the disputes between our good king and his good people, without any aid from me. I am going to write to you on a far more interesting subject, but one which you are generally rather disposed to shun, your own good self. My dear — do you know that you are fast losing the character in which you have so long appeared to such advantage—that of an American citizen? You are becoming European—universal—cosmopolite. That little lyric, "Woodman, spare that tree," which you first showed me in manuscript just before I left busy New-York for quiet Göttingen, has done the business. It has been translated into every language in Europe—incorporated into the literature of every civilized country. I took a run up to Paris last month, to brush the learned cobwebs off me; and in every music-shop the most conspicuous thing I saw was,

"Bücherlein spargue mon arbre!"
Chanson nouvelle par M. le général de brigade G. P. MORRIS, traduit par A. de Lemaitre. Musique de S. A. R. le duc de Orléans

And, in every salon I entered, some sweet voice was singing,

"Preis de sa modeste chaumière
La main de mon père le planta;
Richardson, écoutez ma prière,
A mon vœu s'en va le trépas!"

I wish I had kept a copy of it, to enclose to you: it is true, I have it by heart, and might transcribe it; but I have little room to spare. Then, in our vernacular, (I beg pardon, I should have said my vernacular at present), German, what do you think of this for a flourish of trumpets:

"Nun nicht die alte Fische nieder."
Lyrisches Gedicht, des Herrn General Georg P. MORRIS. Aus Deutsche übersetzt von Dr. C. J. A. C. H. W. Lautschke, ordentl. Professor der Sing- und Kunst in der Universität zu Tübingen. Wien. In der k. k. Schulbuch-handlung. 1838.

This is a most explicit and beautiful version. Take a verse as a specimen:

Willst du ihn so reichlich doch fressmettern,
Den brauns'ten, wackern, alten Baum,
Der mit rauschenden, belebten Blättern
Weist und brecht unschattete den Baum:
Fechter, here auf, und lass' ihn stehen,
Lass' ihn ruhen in der Erde Schoos,
Jene Feste, die aus Himmel wehen,
Reisse nicht von ihrer Mutter los.

The song is published in the true German style, with a preface, by the translator—an essay on the genius and character of the author and his influence on his contemporaries, ("Elder Morris' Entwicklung, Denken und Wirken"), with copious notes, historical, antiquarian, critical, æsthetic and exegetical. The whole forms a handsome duodecimo volume. You may look for a copy by the next Havre packet.

But this is not all. I have now lying on my table a Spanish version of the Woodman. Its title is,

"Leñador, consérvese aquel árbol!"
Cancion nueva y popularísima. La compuso el sacello. Señor JORGE P. MORRIS, General del ejército Americano. Se vende en Madrid, en casa de D. Francisco Ramirez, calle de Alcalá No. 30.

Fay has promised to attend to forwarding you, from Florence, a copy of

"Boscovale, conservale questo arbole!"
Per il Cavaliere MORRIS. Firenze. 1838; or I would send you mine. You have no idea how sweet and soft your verses sound in the bella favella.

But I have not done with you yet. Your song, after travelling through all the living languages, has at last been incorporated into the dead ones, which ensure its living forever. I have just been favoured with a peep at

"Parce, arboriste, o grece, parca, arbor!"
Cancion nueva scriptura Ultramarina GEORGE P. MORRIS, Tübingen, etc. Versus laudis reddidit A. B. Candidatus Theologiae Romae. Cum permissu superiorum.

Not only this; but last evening I paid a visit to our learned Greek professor, Doctor Worterbuch, and had much talk on classical matters. After we had discussed the Eolic-digamma and the genuineness of the Orphic poems, at great length, beside a dozen pipes and four bottles of beer à la vice, there was a pause in the conversation, which was interrupted by the doctor's suddenly exclaiming, "I have a treat for you, which will delight you equally as a Grecian and an American. It is a translation of your illustrious countryman's beautiful ode of the Woodman, into classic Greek, a copy of which has been forwarded me by a learned friend, who fills the lucrative post of Professor of Pædagogik Antiquities in the new Athenian University, founded by the liberality of our king, Otho." So saying, he handed me a very pretty specimen of Greek typography, which I at once recognised as a version of your ballad. I must unfortunately, as before, content myself with transcribing the title. Here it is:

"Σωτήρ, δεινότητος, αὐτὴν δεινὸν ἔργον"
Ὄλη, ἡν ἐποίησεν ὁ παῖς ΜΟΡΡΙΣΙΟΣ ἡ Διοσκουρὸς τῆς Ἀλφειας.
Ἀθήναι ἐν τῇ τυπογραφίᾳ Βασιλικῇ. 1838.

Doctor W.'s correspondent assures him that this ballad is sung with equal delight by Hydriote and Albanian, and that it will do more to introduce harmony into long-distressed Greece, than all the measures of King Otho and his ministers.

Farewell, dear — I fear you are almost smothered by the laurels I have heaped upon you; but you must learn to bear them as well as you can, for I have more in store for you. In my next, I will say something about my own studies and prospects; but, just now, I am too full of the great subject to introduce anything else. Yours truly,

H. V. W.
So says our too-partial correspondent and friend. It is a singular coincidence, that, on the same day with the above letter, we received, by the politeness of our representative at the court of the Netherlands, a beautiful and spirited translation of our song into classic Low Dutch, beginning

"Mouthatker, spart dresen Boom!"—published, as the title-page tells us—"Te Amsterdam. By Karelis Vanderschlagen."

We have not had time to examine the Portuguese version, just published in Lisbon—"Mateira, conserva aquella arvore!"—but, from the known poetical talents of its distinguished author, we have no doubt it is both close and elegant.

A SLIGHT TOUCH ON
THE OTHER SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

Smithville, Down East, latter part of February, 1839.

MUCH RESPECTED SIR—Excuse my not datin' my letter correct, which is a great trial to me—for if I pride myself on anything, 'tis in being correct; and I've had the name of it ever since I've kept school in Smithville—but our almanack isn't to home; it's up to uncle John Smith's, not uncle John the blacksmith, but uncle John Smith on my mother's side. My mother was a Smith—not that I'd have you think my father married his relations—the people in Smithville are more correct and think more of the Bible than that—but there's two stocks of Smiths here that go so far back that folks can't tell where they begun. Though grandfather always made it out and stood to it, that they all come from one in the first place, and said it made my father and mother fifth cousins. The old lady is very curis about these things, and she has it all marked out in the shape of a great large tree, and keeps it hung up in the fore room, and when there is anything said about it, or any dispute takes place about the Smiths bein' related, she takes it down and goes over the whole clear from the root to the top branch; and always brings it out that my father and mother was fifth cousins. Whenever she has these reckonings, grandfather is as uneasy as a fish out of water, for he thinks if it should go as grandmother fixes it, 't would make him and grandmother fourth cousins; and he's so correct, that if he should really think it was true, although he's now eighty-five years old, I do believe he'd try to get divorced. So grandfather is always against grandmother in her reckonings, and whenever she sets down to go over the tree, for she always hauls the table up and sets down to it, so as to 'make no mistake, then grandfather he'll put on his spectacles and take his staff and hobble along and stand and look over grandmother's shoulder, and foller her along up among the branches. But generally in about a quarter of an hour he gets so tangled up, and the branches run together and crossways and get mixed up so, that he breaks off short, and says "Poh, mother, there's no head nor tail to it. We all come from Adam, accordin' as 'tis in the Bible, and that's all the relation there is about it."

So grandfather 'll hobble back to his chair again and set and wink and look as uneasy as can be, all the time till grandmother gets through. And grandmother will always stick to it till she gets clear out to the end of every branch; and winds up by saying, "Well, father, it must be so; if they ain't fifth cousins, I don't know what makes fifth cousins."

But, dear me, where am I running to? I haven't said a word about what I was going to when I begun. But when I happened to mention that my mother was a Smith, I was afraid you might take a notion the Smithville folks wasn't quite so correct in their ideas about matrimony as they ought to be. So I felt it my duty to stop and explain how it was.

To go back to uncle John Smith agin on my mother's side—the horrid our almanack day before yesterday, and hasn't brought it home yet. He's a clear trial about borrying. Now grandfather is always prompt about everything. He always has a new almanack in the house the first day of January, and has had every year since I can remember, though to be sure that isn't a great many years, but I mean he always does. But uncle John on my mother's side never gets an almanack for the first six months of the year; so he has to come clear down to our house, about three quarters of a mile, once or twice a week to borry ourn, though the shoes he wears out and the time he spends is worth more than forty almanacks. He's always saying every week he's going to get one; but I never knew him to get one yet till about haying time, and once I knew him to lose a ton of hay that got wet in a shower, while, instead of getting it into the barn, he come down to our house to get the almanack to see when the moon was to change. But there, I'm running before my story agin.

The reason, then, that I wouldn't give the correct date to my letter is, that my uncle John Smith, on my mother's side, has got our almanack, and it's too far for me to go up after it to-night; and the truth is I must write to-night—I'm in such a takin' I can't help it; for I've just got your last Mirror, and been reading over cousin John's letter, and it's put me all in a flutter. It's too bad, I declare—such insinuations as he's made against me in that letter is too bad to think of. I didn't think that cousin John, who I've always treated as a brother, though he's a good deal older than me, would a done so, and then to have it printed in your paper and read by everybody in New-York and every where else: dear me, I feel as if I should fly; what will the New-York folks think of me? I was intending to come to New-York next summer and see the place, and I've been saving up something out of my school money a year past to pay my expenses. I think I've lived long enough in the world to go about a little now and see some other place besides Smithville; not that I've lived very long in the world neither. But I mean, now I've got to be a grown-up young woman. Dear me, it's so lonesome here in Smithville sometimes, for the want of more young society. I've heard there is a good deal of young society in New-York, and I've been almost in fidgets for a year past to go there. But that pesky letter of cousin John's has throwed all the fat in the fire. If I should go there now, everybody that I should see would be thinking of the insinuations in cousin John's letter, and I should not feel as if I could hold my head up as I walked the streets.

Now, dear General Morris, are you a single man or a married man? for I'm afraid I may be speaking rather too familiar. I do hope you'll get this letter before your next paper comes out, and have them insinuations about me correct; for they are not correct now, and cousin John knows it. He must a done it jest to tease me. It's true, I have kept school in Smithville fifteen years—I don't deny that—but then I begun when I was quite young; very young indeed. You know sometimes smart girls, that get their education very young, begin to keep school when they are mere children. And when I begun to keep school, I was so young, that I felt every day as if I wanted to go out and play with the children every time they was dismissed.

It's true, too, that I've took your paper most as long as cousin John said, for it's ten years the first of last January since I begun, and I've sent the money for it every year regular. But what if I have took your paper ten years—what does that argu? Why, that I was a good skoller and took to reading very young. And if cousin John was as fond of larning as I was, he would a took it five years ago too, and not waited till now, and took it jest because there was a piece put in about him: Cousin John knows I've got more larning than he, and knows that's how I come to take the Mirror so young; for when we used to go to school together, I always kept ahead of him in all the branches, though he was so much older than me; yes, a great deal older than me.

And then cousin John is no writer—you see by his letter he's no grammarian. Now, I teach grammar in my school, and have com position besides. And I shouldn't care a pin, if you should publish this whole letter of mine, jest to let cousin John know that there's other folks in the world that can write besides him.

What he said about aunt Ruth's apes, he must a done jest to tease me, and for nothing else in the world. My eyes are as good as hisn any day—that is, I can see as well; it's true I read and study so much, they are rather weak, and sometimes plague me about reading. Don't you think, General, your types is a little too small? not that I speak on my own account, for my eyes ain't weak all the time, but on account of elderly people, who find it rather trying to read such small print.

And as to what cousin John said uncle John, the blacksmith, said about borrying my teeth for a vice, as though I was mad and getting my teeth, the idea he conveyed by that was not correct, and it's a plaguy shame he should say it. I'll tell you just how 'twas. I was setting by the table, and was nipping an apple seed between my teeth, and uncle John, the blacksmith, he got looking at me, and he see my fill round set of large white teeth, for I show my teeth considerable, and though I say it myself, I've got as good a set of teeth as there is in the city of New-York—well, uncle John sot looking at me, seeing me nip the apple seed, and he's a coarse kind of man, you know; so, says he, jest for a joke—

"Debby, I want a new vice in my shop; what will you take for your teeth? I think they'd hold a pretty good grip."

As for my being mad, it was no such thing, for I have the name of being one of the best tempered people in Smithville. And I trust I shall always keep it. But if there is anything in the world that would sour my temper, it would be the want of young society; and that's one thing makes me so anxious to go to some such place as New-York, where I can have plenty of young society. And if them insinuations in cousin John's letter don't operate too much against me, I mean to come to New-York yet. I should like to keep a school there; and, perhaps, you'll be so kind, ben I've took your paper so long, and always paid you regular and in advance for it, perhaps you'll be so kind as to look round a little for me, and see if there's a good chance for me to keep school anywhere there. I should like to have it in some part of the city where there is a good deal of young society, you know.

I don't know but I ought to say a word or two about the Smith name, that's made such a fuss in your paper lately. I think cousin John is very set in his way. To be sure, the Smith name round here, is a name that everybody likes, and although there is a great many of 'em, yet we never get mixed up so, but that everybody can tell who is who and which is which. So, perhaps, the name may not be liked so well in New-York; and, I think, it is about as well always to try to do what will suit the folks best where we live. So it isn't so much to be wondered at, that cousin John should be a little riled at anybody's wanting him to change his name, and that he should make up his mind, as he says, so "decidedly, that he shan't do it." But cousin John is very set in his way. Thank fortune I ain't so set in mine. And as I said afore, if the name isn't forked so well in New-York, and I was living in New-York. I shouldn't be so very set about not changing it.

Now, my dear General Morris, (you see I can't help speaking in that gentle kind of way—good tempered folks are always apt to speak so,) now, this is the first letter I ever wrote to an editor, and it makes me feel rather delicate, though I've no doubt it is as good as one as cousin John's; and if you should print this, I want to ask one favour about it. I want you to send a copy of your paper that has it in it, to young Mr. Ichabod Smith, the school-master, at Smithville, upper Post-office. But not let him know that I said anything about it, for that's a secret between you and me. He's a very respectable young man indeed, and he's been at our house a good deal; but sometimes I think he is more like my uncle John Smith on my mother's side, than he is like my grandfather. I want he should see this letter, and when he finds I'm resolute about going to New-York, I guess he'll—I guess he'll—there General, I declare, my ideas are so confused, I don't know what I was going to say.

So I remain your sincere friend and old subscriber—no, I mean your young reader,

MISS DEBBY SMITH.

SKETCHES OF EASTERN LIFE.

THE COBBLER OF BRUSA.—A TURKISH LEGEND.

BY EPES SARGENT.

In the reign of Bajazet the First, there lived in Brusa, that city being then the capital of the Turkish Empire, a poor cobbler, whose name was Eskigi Meimet Effendi. This worthy artisan inhabited a small hut containing but one apartment, situated at the foot of Mount Olympus. The chestnut and plane trees, with which the sides of that snow-capped mountain are covered, overshadowed his humble dwelling, and offered a cool retreat during the sultry summer days. Numerous streams and mineral springs reflected, in their translucent bosoms, the lofty scenery by which they were surrounded, and gave sustenance to plants and flowers of brilliant hue and aromatic odour. The shepherd, as if fearful of disturbing the crystal surface of these waters, drives his flock to some distant summit, from which he looks down at his ease upon the prospect beneath him; and the birds, whose nests are among the neighbouring trees, hardly ruffle the mirror-like currents with the light dip of their wings.

It was in the midst of scenery like this that Eskigi Meimet Effendi had fixed his habitation. The routine of his life was simple and regular. Early in the morning he would go one or two miles into the city, and bring home all the old shoes that he could collect from his customers. He would then take his bench, with his awl and lap-stone, beneath some large tree, and there work merrily at his trade. In this way, he managed daily to earn a few paras, which were barely sufficient to support himself and his family, consisting of a wife and child. But, being accustomed during the day to the beautiful scenery of Mount Olympus, he could not remain content in his humble domicile at night, without having a splendid illumination, and keeping a great number of lights burning in his presence. Consequently, after devoting the greater part of his earnings to the purchase of oil and candles, he appropriated the remainder to buying the fragrant necessities of life.

After the prayer of sunset, which the Turks call azam namas, the honest cobbler would prepare his illuminations. Then, having taken his supper, he would chat with his wife, smoke his chibouque and thrum on his guitar, while his child danced to the sound. Sometimes he would sing to the full stretch of his lungs, according to the Turkish fashion. At the tahzi, or fifth prayer, which took place two hours after sunset, he would retire to bed.

In those times, the Turkish emperors, accompanied by some officer of distinction, were often in the habit of walking the streets in disguise; sometimes by day, and sometimes by night, so that seeing with their own eyes, and hearing with their own ears, they might truly know the wants and dispositions of their subjects, and take their measures accordingly. Now it happened that Bajazet the First, in passing the domicile of Eskigi Meimet Effendi had often been amazed by the brilliant illuminations and the very loud songs of that patriotic cobbler. Consequently, one evening, the sultan and his vizier, having assumed the costume of dervishes, stopped before the house, in which many lights seemed to be burning, and knocked at the door. A voice from within asked, "who is there?" The two illustrious personages of the empire replied, that they were dervishes, who, in the name of God, requested entertainment for the night. Eskigi Meimet Effendi answered, by telling them to wait a few minutes till he had found means of concealing his wife, it being, as every one knows, contrary to the custom of the Turks, to admit a man into the presence of their wives unless he be a near relation. The cobbler having but one room, was puzzled how he should dispose of his better half. But, being unwilling to refuse hospitality to his visitors, he thought it best to fix up the counterpane in one corner of the apartment, as a sort of screen, behind which his wife might retire. Having done this in the nearest manner he could, he opened the door to his two guests.

After the selam ahkam, or customary salute of the Turks, he placed before them a piece of bread and cheese, the remnants of his scanty supper, and a bowl of pure water. Then succeeded the nargile or bubble-bubble, a pipe of serpentine form and dimensions. The grand seignor, after partaking lightly of the proffered civilities of his host, asked him, among other inquiries, the nature of his vocation. Eskigi Meimet Effendi replied fully to all his questions, adding, that the pleasure of his life, after the labour of the day was over, was at night to have his house brilliantly illuminated, and to talk, dance, and sing, with his wife and child, thanking the Almighty for all his bounties, and more particularly for having placed at the head of the nation so wise, and good, and great a sultan, for whose life, continued the cobbler, "My wife and myself constantly pray, and under whose reign we hope to die."

After some farther conversation, Eskigi Meimet Effendi retired into his harem, or, more literally speaking, behind the counterpane, and left the sofa (for so we will call it by courtesy) for his two guests. At sunrise, after the sabah namas, or prayer of the morning, the grand seignor and his vizier, quitted the humble tenement, where they had laughed away the night, for the palace. On their way home, the sultan conversed freely upon what they had seen, and said: "With how little, O vizier, may a man of a contented spirit make himself happy in this world of probation! Here is this poor cobbler, who, by hard labor, can hardly scrape together paras enough to purchase necessary food, who yet manages to have his illuminations, his music and his dances, and to enjoy himself like a sovereign lord."

"God is just, O sultan," replied the vizier, "and the goods of this life are impartially distributed among his children. What is heaven, what is the world, but what every man shapes it in his own imagination? In the eye of reason is not this poor, ragged cobbler richer, say, and nobler, than the miser who covets over his hoards of incalculable wealth?"

"It is true," said the sultan, musingly; "in our own hearts, our own expanded souls, lie the genuine source of happiness, of power, of greatness, and of wealth. External circumstances may modify but cannot create it. Without this inward reliance, this blessed alchemy of the imagination and the heart, converting all that it touches to gold, the monarch is but a beggar. But with it, the beggar is more than a monarch."

"But," replied the vizier, "would not a reverse in the humble fortunes of this merry-hearted cobbler produce a change in his disposition, and turn his singing to lamentation?"

"If my estimate of the man is correct," said the sultan, "no external vicissitude could check his buoyant spirits. Dammed up in one place, they would soon work a free vent in another direction."

"I wish," continued the grand vizier, "that your highness would try an experiment. Let orders be immediately issued forbidding all the cobblers of the place to open their stalls or to work at their trade until farther notice, under the penalty of death. By this means we can ascertain whether the happiness of Eskigi Meimet Effendi is really dependent upon circumstances, or whether it is innate and not to be affected by the accidents of fortune."

"The suggestion is a good one," replied the grand seignor, "and the result may not be without its lesson."

In conformity with this project, the tatals or publick criers were immediately sent through all the streets of Brusa to proclaim, that "By order of the sublime porte, all cobblers' shops must be closed, and no cobbler must work at his trade, until farther notice, under the penalty of death."

Eskigi Meimet Effendi was in the great bazaar of the city, collecting old shoes, when he heard this remarkable proclamation. Quitting his customers, he returned home hastily to his wife, and told her the order of the day, exclaiming, "Alas, dear wife, what are we to do at night for our illumination?"

The good woman remarked that it was a more proper subject of inquiry what they were to do for bread; for, unlike her husband, she considered that the prospect of starvation was worse than that of being without lights during the evening.

After a brief consultation with the good woman, the poor cobbler concluded, that the best thing he could do to obtain a little money, would be to take a spade on his shoulder, and seek employment in setting out trees and plants in the gardens and court-yards of the rich. In this occupation he succeeded beyond his hopes, making twice as much money as he could by cobbling old shoes; and he returned home with more oil than usual for his illumination, together with a leg of mutton, which had been roasted in a kiabapsi, or cook-shop. After lighting up his house in quite a brilliant manner, he took supper with his family, and then began to sing more lustily than ever.

The grand seignor, wishing to see what effect his proclamation would have upon the cobbler, that evening again assumed the disguise of a dervish, and with his vizier, appeared at the door of Eskigi Meimet Effendi, and requested hospitality. As soon as he had taken the same precaution with respect to his wife, that he had deemed necessary the night before, the cobbler admitted his visitors into the house. The usual salutations passed between them, and the host set before them his remaining piece of mutton and bread. On being asked the news of the day, he told them of the proclamation of the publick criers, his own new employment, his increased profits, and the astonishing splendour of his illumination. The honest cobbler frankly owned that he could not exactly comprehend the object of the proclamation—perhaps it would soon be known—but he conjectured that his highness, the sultan, had issued the order for some great political end. Hereupon the two dervishes laughed immoderately, and the cobbler, without knowing why, laughed louder than either of them. At a late hour, the party separated and retired to rest.

The next morning the grand seignor and his vizier returned to the palace, much amused with their visit. They immediately caused it to be proclaimed throughout the city, "that no person or persons should follow the occupation of a gardener or planter of trees and shrubs until farther notice, under penalty of death."

Eskigi Meimet Effendi, who was at that moment entering the city with his basket and spade, as soon as he heard the criers proclaiming this new decree, ran home very much amazed, and imparted the news to his wife, exclaiming as before: "What, in the name of the prophet, shall we do now for our illumination?"

"Say, rather what shall we do for our bread?" was the reply.

At last the poor man bethought himself that he would take a basket and go up to Mount Olympus to catch singing-birds. The idea was a good one, and that day he made four times as much as he used to when working at his cobbler's trade. He now bought thrice the usual quantity of oil, together with a number of tallow candles for his illumination. He also procured a bunch of onions, and a little fresh butter and rice to make a pillau. With these he returned home more contented than a king with his sceptre.

He made, that night, the most splendid illumination ever exhibited in his house, and not having candlesticks, he placed the candles in a row over the fire-place, or fixed them in the fissures in the walls. He clapped his hands with delight, when he had completed these arrangements, and sang more vociferously than ever before. He had hardly finished his supper, and commenced dancing with his wife and child, when the two dervishes again rapped at his door. As it is the custom of the Turks to grant hospitality to strangers for three days, he thought it his duty to admit his two important visitors once more. Accordingly, having again arranged the counterpane so as to form a retreat for his wife, he opened the door and his guests entered. During the conversation which now took place, Eskigi Meimet Effendi related how he had managed, by the assistance of God, to provide for his family a good supper, much of which still remained for his friends. But his chief delight was in the magnificent illumination, which he had found means of exhibiting. He thought that even the sultan himself had never had so many lights burning at one time in his palace; and, finally, he considered it pretty evident that he was the happiest mortal alive.

The grand seignor was much amused at the cobbler's pertinacious good humour. On arriving at his palace, the next morning, he remarked to his vizier, that some other method must be adopted, in order to effect their object, for that a man who was really determined to work, could always find employment. The vizier replied, that he had thought of a plan for effecting their experiment. This was to give the cobbler an office, and having detained him all day in the palace, to send him home at night without any money. The sultan approved of the plan, and immediately ordered one of his ministers to send for Eskigi Meimet Effendi, and on his arrival to invest him with the office and dignities of high sheriff, or gelen bahsi. Messengers were accordingly despatched to fulfil this imperial mandate.

On being summoned to appear at the palace, the astonished cobbler expressed his belief that he was about to be strangled or drowned in a sack, for some unconscious crime. "However," said he, "the sultan knows best whether I am a dangerous person to the state." He kissed his child, and took leave of his wife, who threw herself in wild dismay upon the sofa. As soon as he arrived at the palace, he was told that he had been appointed to the office of high sheriff. His joy and astonishment were beyond all bounds. "Allah is great!" he exclaimed. "What illuminations I will have!" He was sent to the bath, and habited in a new and costly uniform, and furnished with a Damascus sword.

Having remained in the palace during the day, he rode home in the evening, on an Arabian horse, accompanied by a train of attendants. They left him at the door of his house, which he entered alone. He found his wife in the position in which he had seen her last, the poor woman having lost all hopes of again beholding her husband. She started up in amazement, on seeing him standing over her, habited in a rich and beautiful dress. He soon satisfied her curiosity with respect to his visit to the palace, and consoled her for all her apprehensions. But after he had finished the account of his adventures, he began to look puzzled, and said to his wife—"Alas! what shall we do to-night for our illumination? I have no money, and we have neither oil nor candles to burn." "Nor bread to eat," added his spouse.

Eskigi Meimet Effendi sat musing for some time upon the sofa. At last, striking his hand upon his knee, he exclaimed, "I have it!" and leaving the room, he hastened to a neighbouring carpenter, to whom he sold the blade of his Damascus sword for a considerable sum of money, on condition that he would make for him a blade of wood, to be fitted to the handle, and delivered early in the morning. He accordingly left the sword with the carpenter, and quitted the shop with his money. The worthy high sheriff now purchased a preposterous quantity of oil and candles, and then turned his attention towards buying some food for supper. Returning home he made a most brilliant illumination, while his wife performed the office of cook.

In a short time the sultan and his vizier in their customary disguise, again knocked at the door. Eskigi Meimet Effendi hesitated for some time about admitting them. He considered that he was now a high officer of the empire, and a man of rank, and ought not to receive persons of low degree into his house. But they renewed their entreaties so pressingly, that he consented to grant them hospitality for the last time. On entering, they expressed their astonishment at his new dress, and asked him how he had come by it. His reply was, that "the Distributor of thrones, and the Shadow of God upon earth, his majesty, the sultan, had raised him to the office of high sheriff;" and thereupon he described to them his several adventures during the day, confessing, however, that he had not yet derived any profit from his new dignity. He begged his visitors never again to take the liberty of knocking at his door, as he was no longer a cobbler, neither a digger of the soil, nor a hunter of singing-birds, but an important officer of the empire, and that he must be treated accordingly.

In the midst of these hostings, the grand seignor inquired, how he had managed, without money, to still keep up the illuminations. The ex-cobbler, notwithstanding his lofty pretensions and his determination to stand upon his dignity, chuckled at the recollection of his ingenuity, and could not forbear telling his friends how he had contrived to raise money, by selling the blade of the Damascus sword. The grand seignor laughed heartily at the circumstance, and the three soon after separated for the night.

The sultan and his vizier reached the palace at an early hour the next morning. The malla, or chief judge, was immediately ordered into the imperial presence and asked if there were any person to be executed that day. It was ascertained that there was one individual who was awaiting the sentence of death, in consequence of having indulged in some strictures upon the government. The grand seignor intimated his will that the new high sheriff should make his maiden attempt at decapitation on the head of the prisoner. Preparations for the execution were accordingly commenced in a large square near the palace. A vast multitude assembled to witness the spectacle.

The sentence of death was read in the presence of the people who, on time, awaited the result. The high sheriff was ordered to come forward and perform his duty. That respectable officer, without the least embarrassment of manner, approached the trembling victim, and ordered him to kneel and lay his head upon the block. Then grasping the hilt of his sword, Eskigî Meimet Effendi uttered the following prayer in the hearing of the crowd around the platform:—"Allah! who art above all human wisdom and all human judgment, if the convict whose head I am here ordered to sever from his body be innocent, turn, I pray thee, the steel of my sword into wood, so that I may commit no injustice!" He immediately unsheathed his blade, and to the inexpressible amazement of the spectators, it was, indeed, turned to wood. The people shouted with one acclaim, "a miracle!" They looked with awe and admiration upon the man, whose faith, they believed, had brought it to pass. The prisoner was rescued amid cheers and congratulations. The high sheriff was borne along upon the shoulders of the multitude into the imperial presence.

As soon as that exemplary executioner laid eyes upon his sovereign, he at once recognized him for one of the devishes, who had so often visited his house of late. He immediately prostrated himself before the throne, for he knew that the grand seignor was well aware of the process by which his sword-blade had been converted from steel to wood. But the sultan reassured him, and said: "We pardon and reward thee, Eskigî Meimet Effendi, not because thou art a man fertile in expedients, but because thou hast received the blessings of Allah with thankfulness, and his chastenings with un murmuring resignation, believing that everything that happeneth is for the best, and that the great God is just. In this thou hast reached the summit of human wisdom; and what availeth human knowledge where human wisdom is not? Rise, we promote thee to the office of aga of the village of thy birth, with a salary suited to thy new dignity."

It is superfluous to describe the extravagance of the joy of Eskigî Meimet Effendi. He prostrated himself before the Distributor of thrones and the Shadow of God upon earth, in speechless gratitude. On his return home, he cut so many capers, and sang so vociferously, that his wife at first apprehended that his intellect was unimpaired. She received the intelligence of his good fortune with astonishment and delight. The next day, with his family, he removed to the seat of his government; and tradition assures us, that the village over which he ruled was nearly as luminous by night as by day, and that oil and candles were the principal commodities to be found in the place.

Say not, O reader, that Eskigî Meimet Effendi was either a profligate or a fool; but receive this truth as the moral of his story: that there is no human lot so humble or so dark, that it may not be illumined by the lamp of faith and the benign radiance of a grateful and contented spirit.

ORIGINAL NAUTICAL SKETCHES.

ADVENTURE IN THE LIFE OF ROBERT LESLIE.

In the year 18—, before the eastern section of South America had been designated by the name of the Banda Oriental, the republics of Uruguay and the Argentine were engaged in a close and bloody war. Distracted by intestine commotions, and menaced by fierce and sanguinary enemies from without, it seemed as if, from the river La Plata to the Mexican Gulf, the whole country would become convulsed in the throes of a mighty revolution. All the ports on the La Plata were under a strict and continual blockade, to prevent supplies from being thrown into the different towns then vested, and to put a more effectual stop to smuggling, which had been very extensively carried on.

At this period a company of our adventurous and enterprising merchants despatched a fast-sailing and armed brigantine, commanded by an old and experienced seaman, to cruise up and down the La Plata, and force the valuable goods received from other vessels, met at the mouth of the river, into the different ports then under blockade. The duty, not only an arduous but dangerous one, still brought streams of gold into the coffers of all engaged in it. Among the officers attached to the gallant little Spitfire, (for the smuggler was so named,) was one whose adventures I now more particularly intend relating. He was next in command to his venerable captain, who had seen more years of service on the deep than years of life had passed over the youth. And, judging from the young officer's appearance, he had himself run no sluggish career, for a life passed amid all the vicissitudes of peril and adventure had given a cast of graveness, I might almost say sternness, to features which might have rivalled a female's in sweetness and delicacy of expression. His dark blue eye, when in repose, was of a dove-like softness, but in action flashing a thousand fires; and there were but few, very few, who cared to look into those eyes when in anger. His hair hung in wavy curls from a forehead of snowy whiteness. The lower part of his face, having been browned by the fierce action of a tropical sun, joined to a slight-budding mustache, redeemed his almost feminine appearance. He was of the ordinary height; and his form, slight but muscular, denoted to the practised eye great activity and strength in action. His age was twenty; his name Robert Leslie.

Although the great disparity in years of service between the two officers was so great, still the old seaman respected and trusted to the utmost extent the skill of his young coadjutor; for they had been some time together; and the judicious but daring courage of young Leslie when an attack was unavoidable, joined with his frank and generous demeanour, had bound him to the old man's heart with bands of steel.

It was a beautiful afternoon in the month of June. The breeze was gently wafting the little Spitfire onward to the haven where the agent would be ready to unload the very valuable cargo with which the brigantine was freighted. Her anxious commander anticipated that soon, very soon, he would be freed from the cares and perils of his hazardous mode of life, and, returning home to his wife and numerous family, resign the Spitfire to young Leslie, and pass the remainder of his days in peace and affluence. But alas! old Captain Coffin was destined to a different fate. The breeze which had heretofore been steady, was now dying away, and the flapping of the canvass would have foretold the commencement of a long calm, had not a white curling mist rising, as it appeared, from the bosom of the deep, been a sure prognostication of the quick approach of the dangerous pampara. Leslie, who at this time was officer of the deck, seeing it make its rapid advance towards the vessel, summoned the ready crew to the necessary duty of reducing the sails. His orders were obeyed with alacrity. The helm was shifted so as to bring the head of the brigantine nearly in the direction of the expected storm, and in that position she met the hurricane. Upon her first feeling the force of the blast, the beautiful vessel bent low, as if paying involuntary homage to the spirit of the winds. Then rising gracefully and dashing the fierce waves aside, she came to the wind and steadily lay to. And well did the gallant brigantine prove the qualities of her build and rig and the skill of her officers, for in that situation she lay five days unimpaired, and scarcely shipping a drop of water, while the tremendous storm whistling and sighing through her cordage, chilled with melancholy every heart. On the afternoon of the fifth day the storm broke, and the wind was becoming comparatively gentle, except when it came in fitful, growling puffs, like the wantonings of a tiger-cat driven from its prey. At length the look-out on the forecabin reported land! Immediately fold after fold of canvass was displayed on the slender but firm spars. The land was soon made out to be the island of Achaens, uninhabited, but having a fine harbour and well supplied with wood and water. The vessel being in want of these indispensable necessities, Captain Coffin steered for the bay of Aranzuas. They were proceeding to round the headland forming one side of the bay, when an unexpected and unwelcome sight met their view; for, within a quarter of a mile of them was seen a large Spanish guarda costa, of superior armament, under sail coming out of the bay.

"Hard up the helm! Square away the yards! Off sheets!" broke from the lips of Captain Coffin. "We must run from her, Leslie. Our cargo is too valuable to be lightly risked. Pack on to her everything, sir; the wind has become steady, and the brigantine will soon run her out of sight. She has seen us, however, for they are making more sail."

Leslie proceeded to obey the orders, and soon the gallant brigantine was again dashing through the foam. Leslie walked aft and examined the enemy with a spyglass.

"Do you know her, Mr. Leslie? Can you make her out?" asked Captain Coffin.

"I think, sir, she's the St. Jago, a heavy vessel, mounting ten carronades and a long gun. She has a numerous crew, and is a fast sailer. I think we'll scarcely get off without a brush. Shall I beat to quarters, sir?"

"Ay, ay, sir," answered the captain.

The drum beat to arms; and the listless air of inactivity which had pervaded the crew of the brigantine, was displaced by movements of quick intelligence and animation.

The brigantine mounted six short guns and a long brass eighteen, and manned fifty men, all told. But these were men with frames of iron and hearts of steel, and they had been engaged in many desperate adventures.

The deck and guns were speedily cleared for action. Leslie, after examining all with an attentive eye, resumed his examination of the frigate through the spyglass. The change of position of the brigantine, had brought the stranger off her quarter, and both vessels were at their utmost speed.

"We shall soon hear from her," said Leslie, addressing the captain. "He is about speaking us with his long gun."

"Well, let him try," replied the old man, smiling. "I am sorry we have not time to return his politeness."

At this moment the gorgeous flag of Spain opened its folds to the gaze of all. "Show him the stars and stripes," said the captain, and it was done. Leslie was at this moment within a few feet of the captain. The stranger was observed to diverge from her course. A smoke, and a twelve pound shot crashed through the bulwarks, striking the captain of the Spitfire full in the chest, dashing him to the deck and nearly severing him in two. A slight quivering of the limbs, and all was still. Leslie cast one look upon the good old man, who had been to him as a father, signed to the men nearest him to bear the remains to the cabin, and drew his cutlass. The sweet and delicate expression, which characterised his features, had vanished, and a fierce smile of savage determination had taken possession of them, almost terrific to look upon. There was a death-like silence throughout the vessel. The men looked upon him, awe-struck. He exclaimed, in a low deep voice, "We will avenge him!" The words were nothing of themselves, but the tone thrilled through the frames of all who heard him. Again he spoke: "Down helm and brace up." The command was obeyed with alacrity, and the brigantine was soon running directly towards the Spaniard. The suddenness of the movement appeared to startle the stranger, for a confusion was observed on board her, which Leslie perceiving, sprang to the long gun, which was heavily loaded with grape and canister. By a wave of his hand, which the helmsman understood and obeyed, the brigantine flew from her course. He applied the match—the gun was discharged, sending havoc and death among those against whom it was directed. The Spitfire immediately bounded back again, on her course, towards the devoted vessel. The aim had been unerring; the slaughter, from the crowded state of the stranger's decks, immense. The brigantine was now nearing the Spaniard rapidly, and gun after gun from the latter was of no avail in making the gallant little brigantine swerve from her course.

Leslie again spoke: "Boatswain, have two men provided with axes. Stand by with the grappling irons. Quartermaster, run the brigantine direct astward her hawse."

The brigantine dashed upon her prey. "Follow me, every man!" shouted Leslie as he mounted her forecabin. His crew gave a loud cheer and followed their daring commander, who was now engaged, hand to hand, with two of the Spaniards. He cut them both down, for nothing could withstand his desperate bravery. His men nobly seconded him. They drove the Spaniards into the waist. "Cut away her foremast!" was now the quick order of Leslie to the two axe-men. A few strokes and the spar totters. "Charge them again, my hearts of oak!" shouted Leslie. "Remember your good old commander!" And again they charged the close-wedged mass. Many a Spaniard fell, cloven by the irresistible clutch of Leslie. The Spaniard had been, for some time, trying to get one of his quarter-deck guns pointed forward, which would have swept most of the smugglers into eternity. But they were too late. A voice was heard—"All ready with the mast. Take off the wounded. Let fall then, let fall!" shouted Leslie. "Bear back, men, bear back," and he retreated with his men to the forecabin. One stroke more and the mast falls with a terrific crash, crushing many of the enemy in its descent.

"Aboard! aboard with ye all!" again spoke Leslie, firing his pistols in the very faces of the advancing Spaniards. He was the last man to spring aboard the brigantine. "Off grapplings!" The brigantine swung clear, and away again flew the gallant bark unimpaired, and with the loss of only three men killed and five wounded.

The Spitfire had proceeded about a mile. Leslie, who had been pacing the deck, wrapped in thought, occasionally casting an eye to his crippled adversary, suddenly gave the orders: "In light sail! heave her head yards aback!" The men looked upon each other with astonishment, but immediately obeyed. "Man the long gun. I'll have ample vengeance for that shot. Bring up the remains of Captain Coffin."

The long gun was beautifully served. Every shot told upon her unmanageable adversary with terrific precision, tearing her to pieces and spreading slaughter among her crew. And now was manifested the policy of Leslie, to avenge the fall of his commander. He could not have fought successfully with the Spaniard at a distance, from the superiority of her armament. He could not have carried her entirely by boarding, from her immense number of men. And by this singularly daring, and I believe solitary instance of crippling an antagonist, he completed successfully with a superior force. But he had not yet finished with her; Captain Coffin's remains were brought on deck, to be prepared for a burial at sea—sewed up in his hammock, and the flag of his country wrapped round him.

"You are gone," said Leslie, looking upon the mutilated remains, and his voice unconsciously acquired a feminine softness. "You are gone, my good, kind old commander. But," and his voice became stern—"you are avenged, and you shall be more than avenged." All this while the gun had been playing on the enemy, whose fire ceased entirely after a few ineffectual shots. She was a complete wreck—every spar gone. Her flag had fallen when her mainmast went, and as that fell, the remains of honest old Captain Coffin were consigned to a seaman's grave. For three hours and a half, Leslie kept up a continual fire upon the unfortunate vessel. At last the shades of night darkened around. The gun had become heated, and Leslie, casting one last look upon his sinking enemy, gave the orders to bear away for his destined port.

BUSINESS STAND.—A Frenchman being about to remove his shop, his landlord inquired the reason; stating, at the same time, that it was considered a very good stand for business. The Frenchman replied, with a shrug of the shoulder, "Oh yes, but's very good stand for de business; by gar, me stand il day, for nobody come to make me more!"

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

FREE ADMISSIONS.—The late celebrated composer Boieldieu was on the free list of several of the Paris theatres, though some of them he seldom visited. Availing himself of his absence from the Vaudeville, an unscrupulous lover of the drama contrived to obtain admission to that theatre for six years together under the name of Boieldieu. One evening the composer of the Norman Seigneur and so many other successful operas went to the Vaudeville, but on giving his name, was told by the controller that he knew M. Boieldieu, that he came every night, and that he was at that very hour in the house. Boieldieu remonstrated not, but paying for his place, calmly desired his compliments to the user of his name and privilege. At the same theatre, a M. Vaillard had his free entrée. On his death, another ingenious amateur contrived to enjoy his privilege by impudently introducing himself to the door-keeper as "Jeu Vaillard"—the late Vaillard. One day the controller begged leave to observe that M. Vaillard was dead. "I have," replied his successor, "been telling you so for six months past."

PERSIAN SATIRE.—Many owners of gardens near cities in Persia are accustomed to charge a certain sum to visitors, who are allowed to eat as much as they please. The Persians, who must invent a joke upon everything, state that at Cabool the eaters of fruit are weighed on entering and on coming out of the gardens, and charged for the difference; and they tell how that a certain wag put stones in his pocket, which he threw away in the garden, so that when he had eaten his fill of fruit, and was weighed on coming out, he was found lighter than when he had gone in—a problem which had long puzzled the wise men of "the city of the hundred thousand gardens."

PEARLS AND DIAMONDS.—We read more of pearls than of diamonds in ancient authors. The ancients had not skill enough to make the most of diamonds; and the art of engraving on them is not older than the sixteenth century. The most remarkable of modern pearls is that in the Spanish treasury, called the Pilgrim. It was in the possession of a merchant, who had paid for it one hundred thousand crowns. When he went to offer it for sale to Philip IV., the king said, "How could you venture to give so much for a pearl?" the merchant replied, "I knew there was a king of Spain in the world." Philip, pleased with the flattery, ordered him his own price.

BALANCE OF EUROPE.—Two worthy, but not very particular M. P. were one evening down to the House of Commons, discussing politics as well as their cups and biceps would permit them—one said, solemnly, Europe's true balance must not be o'erthrown.

To which the other replied:

Hang Europe's balance—try to keep your own.

NAUTICAL PHRASEOLOGY.—Seamen are not only indebted to the fair sex for many of their "terms of art," but also to the "moderates" of the land for much of the knowledge essential in seamanship. For example, no man can pass for a thorough seaman unless he can "handle his needle," and execute with precision every possible "stitch," from the "herring-bone," to the "double seam." He must also be able to "gore," "cut upon the bias," "taughten his stays," "pass an earling," and "clap a bonnet on his jib." In the last particular, Jack, who often reverses matters, differs with the ladies of the sea, who "clap" his bonnet on the "foot," instead of on the head of his jib.

STAMP DUTY.—The stamp duty on receipts was first imposed during the celebrated Coalition Administration, which gave occasion for the following jeu d'esprit, at the time generally attributed to Sheridan.

"I would," says Fox, "A tax devise,
That shall not fall on me."
"Then tax receipts," Lord North replies,
For those you never see."

MARSHAL THE DUKES BE RESCUE.—Last week a fellow entered a tobacco-shop on the place de la Bourse, at Paris, and was leaving it with a dozen bundles of best cigars, saying, "I am Marshal Oudinot—send me your bill to-morrow;" when the shopman roared out, "I know Marshal Oudinot, and you certainly are not he." "Well," retorted the thief, "since such unpleasant mistakes are committed in the city, I shall never have my custom again." Upon this he dropped the cigars, and took to his heels.

AN IRISH DUEL.—Mr. O'Connor relates an instance where the parties in "an affair of honour," had actually agreed to put the muzzles of their pistols (so invertebrate were they) into each other's mouths; "and yet, would you believe it!" and be, "one of them escaped." . . . Just as one second was about to give the signal, the other said to his principal, "Jack, look hither!" Jack turned his head, and just in time, for the ball passed out through his left cheek, doing him little hurt, while his opponent was killed.

LAWYERS.—The Emperor of China seems to be of the same opinion as Peter the Great in reference to lawyers. The Czar said that he had but two in his dominions, and that it was his intention to hang one of them in order to secure concord among his subjects. The Chinese Autocrat has issued an edict to suppress "the multiplying of such people," whom he is pleased to designate "villanous and perverse vagabonds, fond of creating disturbance." There is something exceedingly complimentary in this description.

JOHN KEMBLE.—"Pray, sir," said a greenroom loungee to Mr. John Kemble during the run of the elephant at Covent Garden theatre, "is not the man very new to you, who is riding the real elephant?" "Nervous, sir," replied Kemble, in that deep, hollow tone, which was the particular characteristic of his voice, "what must I have been when, riding on the same elephant, I heard the hind-legs say to the fore-legs, 'Get on, or—your eyes, I shall be down!'"

GRAVITY AND GRAVITATION.—A schoolmaster who was as fond of his gag as the use of his globes, was asked the difference between gravity and gravitation. "Well, when I've drunk five glasses of grog," replied the pedagogue, "my gravity vanishes, and my gravitation begins to operate."

A GOOD RESOLVE.—"I resolve," said a pious English bishop, "never to speak of a man's virtues before his face, nor of his faults behind his back." If every one would not only adopt such a resolution but carry it into effect, the dawn of millennial glory would soon illumine the "whole broad earth."

JUNIOR.—Is the word "Junior" any part of a man's name? The Legislature of New Hampshire has decided that it is, and the Legislature of Massachusetts that it is not. Which is right!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The contributions of our Detroit correspondent, * * *, are quite acceptable. His letters shall appear next week, and we shall be glad to hear from him again. We must devote the proposition of P. Q. to the next week. We have received several poems on the death of Mrs. Nicolson—one of them very beautiful. The subject in her fate appears to be as deep and general in this country as in England.—The epigrams by Squibb are clever and caustic, but we have no taste for such personalities, even where they are not understood. The Mirror has never been, and shall never be made the vehicle either for personal attacks or personal retorts. The remarks of Phillips on the exhibition of paintings at Liberty-street are judicious. We agree with him that the picture of the "Fall of Jerusalem" is one of the most remarkable paintings of the day.—"Elise" shall appear, if possible, next week.—The "Lines to a friend departing for Europe," are in type, but are unavoidably deferred.—"Cibber" talks well upon "matters theatrical," but his structure upon the Park theatre do not strike us as just.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1839.

Female housebreakers.—A correspondent, who, from the tone of his communication, we should judge to be a testy old bachelor, writes us a long epistle in relation to the house-hunting propensities of the ladies of New-York. He says that he has the misfortune to occupy apartments in a house, which is advertised "for sale, or to be let." The consequence is, that the bell is kept ringing every other minute in the day by people, who come on the pretence of wishing to examine the premises; "but I believe," our correspondent amably adds, "that the object of nine-tenths is plunder, or to pry into the concerns of their neighbours. Why, sir, the audacity of these female house-hunters is truly appalling. As I was at my toilet the other morning, in the act of shaving, with half my face white as a snow-bank with lather, what was my consternation, on hearing the door open, to behold two females, dressed in the extreme of fashion, enter as unconcerned as if they were stepping over their own threshold. One was young and pretty, the other ancient and ugly. "What a nice room," says Miss. "Quite snug," replies mamma; "for people in moderate circumstances, it is really a good house; but I fear, your papa, my dear, would never consent to take up with such a situation." "Oh, what beautiful colouring!" exclaimed the sylph; "Ma, let me put some on your handkerchief—what a pretty vest! What a sweet pattern for a gown, Ma. Do look at it! (Upon my word, Mr. Editor, I missed a five dollar bill from my waistcoat-pocket that day. I accuse nobody—but such is the fact.) "My love," said the old procuress; "the gentleman looks impatient for us to go. May I ask, sir, if the furniture of the room is for sale? I should like the wardrobe and the glass very well!" and the unblushing housebreaker actually opened my clothes-press, and very coolly examined the drawers. "What little hands, he must have," said Angelina, tossing over my last importation of kid gloves from Paris. "Ah, ha, a three-cornered note, and a faded japonica—come now—that looks suspicious—doesn't it, Ma?" "Very, my dear, perhaps the gentleman is engaged." (No, I will be hanged if I am.) While this interesting conversation was going on between the old lady and her daughter, I stood petrified with astonishment, with one hand holding an extended razor, and the forefinger and thumb of the other clasp the bridge of my nose. I was a study for a sculptor. I stood hesitating whether I should cut my own throat, or that of the impudent mix, who was prying into my letters, or best of all, sever the wind-pipe of the monstrous old woman, who was insolently intruding herself into my apartment. At one time I seriously contemplated making a general massacre of it for the benefit of all female housebreakers. Perhaps, the two daughters of Eve saw the rising purpose in my glaring eyes, for they began retreating toward the door. I started abruptly from my statue-like posture, and flourished my razor with a very truculent air; whereupon they ran shrieking down stairs, and I was happily rid of them. The very next day, I had a similar visitation. A middle-aged lady, with a whiskered attendant, entered my room, while I was writing, and with a sang froid peculiar to housebreakers, commenced an investigation, which was anything but soothing to my feelings. The lady turned over my books and papers, and would, I believe, have opened my desk, if I had not locked it with a very significant "ahem." The dandy went to the looking-glass, and to my inexpressible horror, took up my hair-brush, to arrange his hyperion curls. This was too much for human endurance—and I threw a bottle of ink at his head. It lodged in his whiskers, and emptied itself with delightful accuracy down his shirt bosom. Mr. Editor, I have two duels on hand, and have strong hopes of ridding the city of two aiders and abettors of female house-breaking. I wish that the conventional laws of society did not prevent my making war upon the principal aggressors themselves. But the press can certainly do something to alleviate the evil. If I am shot, I am determined to leave a fund to be appropriated to the suppression of female house-breaking." We would only say to our ruthless correspondent, that he deserves to be winged for his want of gallantry, and absurd intolerance of temper. We hope he will either be shot or married.

"How do you like our country, or an autumn in America," is the flippant title of a work by Mr. Charles Matthews, and shortly to be issued from the London press. It is said by the papers; that it is to contain a general showing-up of the Americans; their character, manners, institutions, etc. The competency of this itinerant play-actor to the task he has undertaken, is questioned by a London journal; which says, "we are, no doubt, again to be told that the Americans have no taste, that they eat with knives instead of forks, and devour their eggs out of wine-glasses instead of egg-cups!" The book will unquestionably be filled with stuff of this sort, joined with lamentations upon the failure of an antiquated actress, who in her bloom was unquestionably clever and attractive, but is now among the has beens. We have no objection ourselves to Mr. Flibbertigibbet's writing a book about us. He is as well qualified as the Trollopes, Fiddlers, Martineaus, and other mendicant travelers, who, after soliciting our hospitality, have treacherously made the Americans the subject of their abuse. Look at it for a moment. Mr. Price, the American manager, engages Madame Vestris to visit the United States, and endeavours to do away all objections on the score of character by her marriage with a popular actor, whose youth and inexperience are the only apologies that can be offered in extenuation of his folly. The happy pair, ("sure such a pair was never seen!") jump aboard the Great Western, and are safely landed in a couple of weeks at the Battery. They go into the country to pass the summer months. An ugly story is circulated as to their conduct at Saratoga, but it is quite forgotten, or generally disbelieved before they make their debut at the Park. At length that momentous occasion arrives. The house is filled. Vestris appears in a tawdry piece, called the "Drama's Levee," as unfitted for the meridian of New-York as for that of Canton. The lady is dressed after the fashion of a French opera-dancer, except that her chemise is a little more concise. A few hisses mingle with the very loud applause, with which she is welcomed. The first piece is over, and the first impression is decidedly unfavourable. The second piece, "One Hour, or the Carnival Ball," goes off with more eclat. Charles Matthews makes a decided hit, and is set down as a dashing, sprightly, agreeable actor. But they do not prove to the town. The audiences, every night, grow thinner and more thin. Vestris looks haggard and disappointed. Their visit to New-York proves a failure—and why? Because in vulgar but expressive parlance, they do not prove what they "had been cracked up to be." And for this, the Yankees are to be visited with the denunciations of Mr. Charles Matthews! Painful anticipation! How shall we avert the terrible, calamitous infliction? Spare us, most forcible Feeble! Enter not, after thy "Roarish of trumpets," magnanimous Tom Thumb!

American actors in England.—At the last accounts from London, Hall, the celebrated personator of Yankee character, was performing with much success at the Haymarket. Van Amburgh, at Drury-lane, had been complimented by a visit from the Queen, who, after the performances, went behind the scenes, and conversed for some minutes with the renowned lion tamer. Mr. Jim Crow Rice, at the Adelphi, had been received with an enthusiasm unparalleled, as will be seen by the following account of his reception from the London Times: "Spring Rice made his appearance last night in the first piece, entitled A Flight to America, and 'Jim Crow' was again jumped at the Adelphi. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of Mr. Rice's reception; he was greeted by a burst of applause of full two minutes' duration. His song of 'Such a gettin up stairs' was vociferously ecrued, and when he came to his second and crack achievement of Jim Crow, he was made to sing it no less than five times. At the fall of the curtain, too, he was loudly called for; but did not appear. There were two or three changes in the cast of the burlesque. Mr. Beverley, for the first time, played Blenkinsop, the original part allotted to poor John Reeve. He did not run away with the Adelphi audience like absolute and unparalleled John; but he yet acted very well, and was a good deal applauded. Mr. Wright sustained the part of Pawks, once filled by Buckstone. He gave the character a reading of his own, which indicated with sufficient spirit to make us 'not miss' his predecessor, thus succeeding in a double sense. The scene with the steamers was omitted; but the burlesque went off without it, as if there was still plenty of steam. The audience were crowded, and seemed quite at home in their joy and admiration, which they made known in applauses hilarious enough."

Origin of the Washington name.—We learn from Mr. Sparks's new life of Washington, that Hertburn was the original name of the Washington family; that the latter name was probably assumed by William de Hertburn, between the years 1261 and 1274, and that the manor was held in the male line till about the year 1400, or one hundred and thirty years. During this period the name seems to have been usually written Wessington, though it is sometimes found Wessington. In its subsequent changes it was probably written variously at different times, and by different branches of the family. At the Herald's College, in the "Visitation Book," (so Mr. Sparks called it), of Northamptonshire, for the year 1618, I found the autographs of Abbas Washington and Robert Washington. These persons were uncles to John and Lawrence Washington, who emigrated to Virginia.

"Who reads an American book?"—In the list of announcements of new works in press by Bentley, the well-known London publisher, we see "Wild Scenes in the Forest and Prairie, by C. F. Hoffman." By the way, Mrs. Jameson, in her new work, pays a high compliment to our former conditor, for his "Winter in the Far West." Hoffman is one of the most vigorous writers of the day, and we are glad to see that he confines himself to American subjects.

"Woodman, spare that tree."—For the publication of the paper respecting "Woodman, spare that tree," on another page, the author of that popular ballad is in no way accountable, it being inserted in his absence, and by the editor of this journal. It was shown to the author, who put a positive veto on its publication; but we trust, after he has recovered from the surprise of seeing it in print, that he will agree with us it is too good a thing to be lost.

Epigrams, etc.—The reader will know what value to set upon the lampoons published weekly in the New-Yorker, when he is informed that they emanate from the pen of Park Benjamin. Comment is unnecessary.

DO YOU REMEMBER, MARY.

A ballad—The words by Miss Farrar—The music by Charles Horn, jun

Do you remember, Mary,
Our childhood's happy years;
The buoyant laugh that chased away
Our few and fleeting tears!
It was a life of joy unmarked,
By sorrow or distress,
The time that I regret
Was a time of happiness.

Do you remember still, the love
I felt yet feared to tell;
Till the words, "I love you," from my lips,
In trembling accents fell!
Our bright plans for the future,
The happy dreams we wove,
The time that I regret
Was a time of hope and love.

As I recall those hours, thine eyes
Upon the ground are cast;
They shun my glance, they fear to say
"Those happy hours are past."
In vain I mourn the banished joys,
Which nought can e'er restore,
The time that I regret
Is the time that is no more.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Geraldine, Athenia of Damascus, and lyrical pieces, by Rufus Dawes."—Mr. Samuel Coleman has published in one beautiful volume the poetical writings of Rufus Dawes, including his noble tragedy of "Athenia of Damascus." We cannot doubt that a work so truly honourable to American literature, will command a ready and extensive sale; and we trust that a second edition will soon be called for by the public. An extended notice of these poems is unavoidably deferred.

"Captain Kyd, or the Wizard of the Seas, by the author of La Fite. Harper and Brothers.—We consider this by far the best fiction that has yet proceeded from the pen of Professor Ingraham. The plot is admirably worked out—the characters are well defined—and the varied, bustling scenes are presented with remarkable vividness to the imagination of the reader. The nautical sketches are evidently by one who has seen what he describes, while the legendary pictures of "New-Amsterdam," as it was in the days of the bold buccanier, are faithful and amusing. We should think that a most effective drama might be founded on this deeply interesting romance.

"Winter Studies and Summer Rambles, by Mrs. Jameson."—Messrs. Wiley and Putnam are the American publishers of this very entertaining work. Mrs. Jameson is a delightful writer, and in beauty of style and force and originality of thought, is infinitely superior to Miss Martineau. Although the subjects discussed in these volumes are of a very desultory character, yet there is a unity in the work and a sort of dramatic interest, which carries on the reader's attention with unflagging and increasing power to the end. The descriptions of American scenery are executed with masterly skill—while the winter studies are of a character at once entertaining and instructive.

"Gurney Married, by Theodore Hook."—This work is totally unworthy of the author of "Sayings and Doings," and "The Parson's Daughter." It is ineffably tedious. The jokes are very ancient, and dragged in without any regard to their appropriateness. There is nothing to redeem the inanity of these volumes. There is neither plot nor interest in the narrative, and the characters are vague, feeble and pointless. We are surprised that a man of Hook's powers should have perpetrated such an infiction upon the "reading public."

LITERARY PERIODICALS.

There appears to be quite a stir among the periodicals. New competitors are crowding to the field, while those journals already established seem determined not to be excelled in any respect. For instance:

"The Albion," our old and respected contemporary, will, in the course of a few weeks, publish a beautiful portrait of Victoria, as she appeared at the opera on a recent occasion. This is a magnificent engraving on a large imperial sheet, and well worth the entire subscription of the Albion to all loyal subjects of her majesty.

The "Spirit of the Times" is also coming out in a new dress, with enlarged views and enlarged dimensions. A superb engraving of Augusta, the popular danseuse, will adorn the first number of the next volume. This journal, as every one knows, is devoted principally to sporting and dramatic intelligence, and holds the first station in that class of periodicals. William T. Porter, the editor, is the very Nimrod of the country, and, although we occasionally differ with him on subjects in which both journals take an interest, we esteem him as an original, forcible and pungent writer, and wish his paper all imaginable success, being well persuaded that it deserves it.

"The 'Expositor' is gradually winning its share of public favour, and meets, we are pleased to perceive, with universal commendation. Count Tasistiro, the editor, evinces much industry and classical research, in the conduct of his handsome journal, and his English style is unexceptionably pure and sparkling.

"The 'New-York Literary Gazette' is another candidate for the suffrages of the literary public. It is managed with tact, taste and ability; and will, no doubt, run a prosperous career. It cannot fail to meet with a liberal reception at the hands of the press from its courteous and gentlemanly tone.

"The 'Corsair' will shortly hoist its black flag, and put out to sea, under the command of Captains Willis and Porter—two able and experienced 'buccaniers.' We wish her favouring gales and a prosperous voyage, and hope she may glide over the uncertain billows of public favour without touching upon the shoals and quicksands, which have wrecked many a similar craft, however trimly rigged and tightly built.

"Life in New-York" is the title of a new periodical, to be published, in the language of the prospectus, "every now and then," but whether daily, weekly or monthly, remains among the contingencies of futurity. The editor is a sprightly writer, and we have no doubt that this metropolis will furnish him material sufficient for his racy pen. We perceive that he meditates an intended fling at ourselves. Well, we have no objections. "Lay on, Macdoff."

Having thus noticed all the papers and prospectuses upon our table this morning, perhaps the reader will excuse us for saying in this place, that, notwithstanding the exertions of our neighbours and friends, and the promises of their various advertisements, we do not intend that the "New-York Mirror" shall be surpassed by any of them, either in literary interest, or in pictorial embellishments, music and fair typography. We are resolved to make it as attractive a journal as possible, if unwearied exertions, the employment of prominent and varied talent, and a total disregard of expense can effect our object.

OH, NO! THEY SHALL NOT SEE ME WEEP.

BY T. H. LISTER, AUTHOR OF GRAMBS, ETC.

Oh, no! they shall not see me weep,
They shall not hear my moan,
My sorrow shall be buried deep,
And I will grieve alone.
My face shall wear its wonted glee,
Although my heart is sore,
As verdant ivy decks the tree,
While withered at its core.
I will not quit this festive scene,
Nor shun the eyes of men,
To muse o'er all that I have been,
And ne'er can be again.

A heavier pence shall be mine,
To join the festive crowd,
Nor let them see that I repine,
Nor breath one sigh aloud.
Oh, no! I will not seem to feel
What none can ever know;
And reckless laughter shall conceal
The fire that burns below.
In halls of jocund revelry
The mask of joy I'll wear,
And Pleasure's self shall envy me
The mirth of my despair!

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

The Catastrophe.

It was a calm, beautiful evening, so calm and beautiful, "you scarce would start to meet a spirit there." A heavy thunder-shower had just gone over, like a whirlwind in swiftness and power, darkening the whole sky, and literally deluging the earth for a few minutes; and all the host of heaven—the sons of God—were out with a new glory; the triple-crowned stars rejoicing in their courses, and glittering as if refreshed and strengthened by the abundant rain. It was the first plentiful and hearty shower there had been for nearly a month at the Mountain-House, though showers had swept by on every side, as often at least as every other day, "dropping fatness" in the valley below, and pouring out their treasures almost within hearing, and for the last week or two yet oftener, "like twanging pearls," over all the neighbourhood, without so much as laying the dust, or wetting a leaf at poor Ethan's.

We had been out with him to hear what he called his two-and-forty pounder, his bugle, and his echo; the first a mounted horse-pistol, the second, a sort of tin pipe with a funnel-sloped mouth, and the third, a magnificent reverberation among the mountains. You'd thought a whole park of artillery, with half a hundred bugles, were all sounding and playing together! But we were driven back to the house, at a hard gallop, within five minutes after Ethan had "let 'em off," as he called it, by a tremendous crash of thunder, followed by a shower so instantaneous, that both appeared to come together, as if we had ruptured a passing cloud by the discharge of Ethan's pocket-piece; or, according to his notion, frightened a waterspout and broke the charm. There was "a dreadful pother" over head for about half an hour, and then it cleared off all at once, and forth came the stars by thousands and tens of thousands, to look at the issue of those "high-endered battles."

Two or three of us had been to the door to see a pair of stag's horns, a snowy owl, and a large bat, the largest I ever saw in this part of the world, which Ethan had mailed up there, to keep the witches off and scare the elves; and when we got back, we found all the company gathered together in the largest room of the house, and our "unaccountable friend" Wear, Ichabod Wear, jun., if you please, holding forth in the midst of them—Julia with her head in her mother's lap, the mother staring at him with her mouth open, and all the rest of the women-folk wondering and whispering together. Everybody appeared to know him, or at least to have heard of him, though I observed that by some he was called Squire, to his head, by others Judge, by one or two the Master, by Ethan himself the Doctor, and by most of the party, since the collegian would have it so, the Professor.

"You appear to know that gentleman," said I, to a very grave personage, whom I had seen talking with him but a few moments before, and listening with extraordinary deference to a somewhat lengthily reply touching the geology of that neighbourhood.

"No, sir, can't say I do; but I have my suspicions, and having heard you in conversation with him at supper on the properties of our native grape, I was on the point of asking you if I was right."

"He is a perfect stranger to me, sir; I never saw him till yesterday. But you have your suspicions; and are they?"

"Why, sir,—whispering in my ear—'why, sir, between ourselves—but you won't allow it to go any further!'—I shook my head in reply—'a well, sir, I have satisfied myself that he is a judge of the United States district court; maybe you've heard of Judge Wear? he lives at Portsmouth, I believe, or Newburyport.'"

"No such thing," said I; "that gentleman is a friend of mine; his name is Asher—he lives in Portland."

"Why, how you talk! But there's a gentleman that must know him—he knows everybody. Allow me to make you acquainted. Mr. Pray, this is my friend Mr. ————"

"Pshaw!" said I, rather impatiently, I fear.

"My friend Mr. Shaw. And now, Mr. Pray, as you know everybody, I want you should tell my friend Mr. Shaw, who that gentleman is, where he lives, what he dooz for a livin', whether married or single, how many children he's got," etc. etc. etc.

"None to speak of, I believe," said Mr. Pray, puckering up his mouth and tapping his nose, with an expression not to be mistaken.

"Well, well, who is he?"

"Who is he? why, President Wear of Cambridge, to be sure; thought everybody knew President Wear of Cambridge, old Harvard, you know."

"President Wear!" said I, not a little astonished at the fellow's coolness. "President Wear of Cambridge—why, sir, there is no such person—there never was."

"Are you quite sure—quite?" said Mr. Pray, without being at all disconcerted.

"But perhaps you mean Doctor Wear?" said I.

"To be sure I do: Doctor Wear of Cambridge—the celebrated physician—greatly obliged to you, Mr. Shaw."

"But Doctor Wear is a theologian, I believe," said I, "not a physician; he writes D.D. after his name, at any rate."

"Well, well, never mind what he is, a doctor's a doctor, you know, all the world over; and that's the celebrated Doctor Wear of Cambridge."

"Are you sure of it?" said a bystander.

"Sure of it! To be sure I am! that's the man, I tell you, and that's enough; don't you say so, Mr. Shaw?"

"Pray, sir, is your name Shaw?" said the collegian, who had been listening at my elbow, with unspeakable gravity and amazement.

"Oh fudge!" said I, turning to go; and the next moment I heard Mr. Pray speaking of me, myself, as the celebrated Mr. O'Fudge; and before I had time to correct the error, a young woman darted by me with a glove in her hand, which I instantly recognised—I had the fellow in my pocket—pursued by half a dozen other females in full cry—up one flight of stairs and down another, door after door flapping to, as they passed, and Ethan shouting after them, "at boy! at boy!" the dogs barking, and the children screaming with delight.

"Come, hurraw here! hurraw! what's the matter now!" cried the driver, bursting into the room with his jacket off.

I turned for explanation to the professor—let us call him the professor, till we know something more of him. "Pray, sir," said I, "what is all this uproar about? I can tell me!"

"Yes. The women are pulling caps for that very glove, and trying to find the owner, just as I told you they would."

"Are you serious?"

"Never ask me if I am serious, I beseech you—you never saw me otherwise, and yet you have asked that very question four or five times to-day."

"I beg your pardon—but I have lent the glove to our young friend here, Mr. Carey, I believe"—bowing to the collegian.

"Yes, sir, that's my name, Cary, George Dilworth Cary, at your service."

"Having lent him the glove, I was rather curious to know what he had done with it," said I.

"I have put it into the hands of a beautiful woman, sir—with a written promise of marriage to the owner, sir—if she corresponds with your description of her." He glanced at Julia, as he spoke, and she put up her lip at him, in reply.

"And what if I should tell you," whispered a roguish-looking girl, "that the glove belonged to me!"

The professor shook his head.

"Or to my grandmother!—or a maiden sister!—and that, instead of being torn, as you have supposed, it was torn by over-stretching!"

"Why," said the professor, "I should merely say in reply, that you were altogether mistaken. You might as well try to persuade me that it was a man's glove; but I see they are laying their heads together, and mean to put a trick upon me."

"And have you no fears—no misgivings—hey?"

"None at all, I assure you. They are welcome to deceive me, if they can."

"If they can, hey!" said another—a fine showy girl—who had been listening and looking at him for a long while, through a pair of green spectacles, borrowed for the purpose, I believe; "and so, you really do pretend to judge of a woman's character by her glove!"

The professor bowed.

"Of anybody and everybody you happen to meet with, hey?"

Another bow.

"The strangest man, I declare! Would you undertake to judge of me by my glove?"

"Certainly, if you desire it."

"Indeed! Well, now, you almost frighten me out of the notion I had of trying you; but there's my glove—upon my word, it's like sitting down to have a tooth out—no flattery now, I beg of you—don't spare me."

The professor took the glove—it was a delicate buff—touched it, smiled, and immediately handed it back to her.

She coloured and bit her lip.

"Well, sir," said I, "and what say you of the lady's character?"

"I must refer you to the lady herself," was the reply.

I was about to ask her what he meant, when I saw Julia lift her little forefinger; and before five minutes were over, I heard the lady herself declare in a whisper that, for her part, she really began to believe there was something in it: for he had no sooner touched the glove, than he knew it didn't belong to me, and I dare say, if I had asked him, he would have told me to whom it did belong—how very strange! I declare the man has almost frightened me with his great black eyes and glittering teeth!

"Not black," said Julia—"Dilworth's eyes are black; are not they, Dilworth? But his are nothing but hazel."

"Nothing but hazel, thought I—how very strange!"

"Not stranger than most of the unexplained nothings, upon which our minds are made up, every hour in the day," continued the professor; "judgment of death has been heretofore entered upon, on evidence lighter than that which I am able to perceive in a lady's glove; companions for life chosen; friendships for life entered into; voyages undertaken; duels fought, and battles; and empires put in jeopardy, for a glove. You think it strange that character should so betray itself. Let me tell you, it would be stranger by far, if character, genuine character, did not betray itself in everything. Perhaps you may have heard the story of a man, who being offered the choice of three beautiful and accomplished women, sisters, took it into his head to try them with a bit of cheese! The first pared away the whole rind, you know; the next ate hers without scraping or paring it: the third scraped hers well, and which did he take! Which did he take!"

"The woman that scraped her cheese."

"And why?"

"Because he wanted—I give it in the words of the story, ladies—he wanted neither a spendthrift nor a slut for a wife."

Luddy! tuddy! Such a giggling and whispering you never heard in your life. You'd have thought every woman there had been eating cheese, and nothing but cheese, for the last three months.

"Why, sir," continued Miss Farrier—Helen Farrier—the tall showy girl I spoke of—"according to this, it would seem that all things are witnesses—whatever we do or say—whatever we touch or take."

"Certainly."

"And pray, sir, are you a believer in the reputed sagacity of the wild man? Do you believe that he can pursue his way, with undeviating certainty by the moss on the weather-side of the tree! or track his prey for miles over the shifting leaves and the trampled herbage of the densest wilderness?"

"To be sure, I do—and why not! Every white man you meet with, is an example, in his own way, of a like power. How does the shop-boy distinguish a counterfeit-bill at a glance, though he may never have seen the original! or one quality of cloth from another, varying but a trifle in the cost—not more than sixpence sterling, perhaps? By the touch only—a brief hasty touch! How does the hatter distinguish one quality of fur from another! By blowing upon it. Or the shepherd all the countenances of a thousand sheep! Or the botanist a leaf or a flower, a seed or a fibre, see it where he may! Or the naturalist—drawing his breath through his shut teeth: I know he meant me—a moth or a butterfly! And every judge of painting, the labour of this or that old master, who may have been dead for two or three hundred years—detecting a copy at a glance though he may never have seen the original!"

"But can he?"
 "To be sure he can."
 "And how do you account for such a miraculous power?"
 "It cannot be accounted for. It is man's distinguishing characteristic—an essential prerogative; one of those holy and ever active instincts of his nature which will not stay to be questioned. It is ex necessitate rei, incapable of explanation."
 "Ex necessitate rei! My mind is made up! said I, on hearing this. The man's a lawyer."
 "A lawyer! Poh," said Ethan—"that's all you know about it, mister—what may I call your name?"
 "Mr. Shaw," said the collegian.
 "Mr. O. Fudge—the celebrated Mr. O. Fudge," whispered Julia.
 "Well, Mr. O'Fudge, or Mr. Shaw, or whatever your name is—that are feller's no more of a lawyer than you air; he's a preacher, I tell you—don't I know I heard him afore to say?"
 Julia shook her head.
 "Well, marm, who do you say 'tis?"
 "I—O, I say 'tis the wandering Jew."
 "Well, if you aint a snorter!" and off he bolted, head first, into the kitchen, to tell the story there, and have another blow out, as he called it, with Josh the driver.
 "Now," continued the professor, "when you ask me how I am able to distinguish a Vandyke from a Rubens, or a Claude from a Wilson, or a Correggio from a Carracci—my answer is, how are you able to distinguish the handwriting of your friends, or the style of authors you are familiar with? It is a faculty common to every living creature—and always at work—always! Of the men about us here in this very room, there are not more than two or three able to distinguish linen from cotton—yet a woman would tell you, by the touch, if there was even a mixture of the two, in warp or woof. So with silks, laces, and French shoes—yet a woman is no judge of broadcloth or furs; and not one of a hundred can perceive the difference between morocco and sheepskin; or stranger still in our eyes, calf from cordovan."

Query! whispered some person at her elbow—I felt quite sure it was Julia, without looking up.

"And now," continued the professor, with still more seriousness of manner, "people who cannot see the difference between a broadcloth and a cassimere, between wrought and cast-iron cutlery, between beaver and musquash, or a counterfeit and the original, wonder at the sagacity of others, who pretend to judge of men and women, as the shop-boy judges of all these—by their appearance—their gloves—and their actions. And after all, what are gloves but actions? Let me prevail upon you to believe," he added, "all of you, that your gloves do speak a language, and a language too, more to be depended upon, oftentimes, than that of your lips: and what is more, that you all understand it, and put faith in it among yourselves; and are governed by it, in all the great business of life—I mean just what I say—though I will do you the justice to acknowledge that I believe you do so, without knowing it."

"Nay, my dear sir—how can that be! surely, if we have any such power, and are in the continual exercise of it, we must be conscious of it," said another of the party.

"Indeed! Pray tell me, if you can, how it is that you distinguish people by their shadows—by profiles cut in paper—by their walk—or voice—or tread—or cough—or by the carriage of their bodies in turning a corner? You know the step of your whole household. You know a stranger to be a stranger, as far as you can see him. And all these things you know, without knowing how you know them—and without being able to make another understand you, when you do your best by way of explanation. Look at the most carefully-prepared handbill, where a horse-thief, or a murderer, is portrayed to the life—and then, be astonished if you can, that so many guiltless persons are hunted to death, and so many guilty ones left unpunished. Give the best description you are able of your own brother: let him but change his coat, or his hat, and he might go forth into the crowded thoroughfare, crying a reward for his own arrest, until doomsday, with perfect safety—if he were surrounded by strangers."

"Well, sir—and what does that prove?"

"It proves, young man, that we are provided and fortified with astonishing faculties; faculties that few of us ever thought of acknowledging, even to ourselves; faculties that continue to be exercised all their lives long, by the great multitude, without being perceived by them; and that, however astonishing it may appear to us, that a wild man should be able to pursue his foe, or track his prey, by signs that we cannot see, even after they have been pointed out to us, yet are we all in the hourly exercise of a sagacity quite as wonderful—and to the savage, perhaps, yet more so, and more incomprehensible."

"Now, what do you think?" said Ethan—"if that are feller aint a preacher, an' clear grit too, then my name aint Ethan Crawford, that's all!"

"Sir," said Mr. George Dilworth Carey, with a compassionate smile, "such notions are not likely to find favour now."

"The more the pity!" quoth the professor.

"But," rejoined the collegian, with a look of subdued triumph, "the schoolmaster's abroad now."

"That's true enough," retorted the professor; "and if the schoolmaster were at home—it would be all the better for himself, and for most of our youth too."

"That's into him!" shouted Ethan, rubbing his hands, cutting a caper, and fetching the collegian a smack over the shoulder, that set him spinning like a top, to the infinite satisfaction of Julia and her mother.

(To be concluded in our next)

MY NATIVE LAND.

Original.

THINE lies my loved, my native land—

A land with every gift replete—
 All perfect from its Maker's hand,
 An empire's glorious seat!
 And far removed from thrones and slaves,
 There Freedom's banner proudly waves.

The frigid and the torrid clime,
 The temperate and the genial beam;
 The vale, the mountain-top sublime,
 The arid plain, the swelling stream,
 There linked in union's golden chain,
 Bear witness to her vast domain.

Her mountains look o'er realms serene,
 O'er waving fields and cities free;
 And mightiest rivers roll between,
 And bear her wealth from sea to sea.
 While o'er old Ocean's farthest deep,
 Her banner'd navies proudly sweep.

On Plymouth's rock the pilgrim lands,
 His comrades few and faint with toil;
 While warning tribes in countless bands,
 Room lawless o'er the uncultured soil.
 A few brief years have rolled away,
 And those dark warriors—where are they?

And where are those, th' heroic few,
 That landed on that rocky shore?
 Their voice still rings—their spirit too
 Still breathes, and will for evermore!
 For in their sons still burn those fires
 That freedom kindled in their sires.

'Tis something, though it be not fame,
 To know we spring from noble race;
 To feel no secret blush of shame,
 For those we love suffice our face—
 Then let us to our sons transmit
 A land and name unsullied yet.

To us was left in deathless trust,
 A realm redeemed, a glorious name,
 The ashes of the brave and just,
 Fair freedom and immortal fame!
 And in our hearts the courage dwells,
 Which human power with scorn repels.

We're not to weep o'er glory dead,
 We're not to brood o'er servile woe;
 We call not on the illustrious dead,
 To shield us from a living foe.
 And should our pride be e'er o'erthrown,
 'Twill be by native swords alone.

The standard which our sires unfurled,
 And which through perils' path they bore,
 Now floats o'er half the western world,
 And waves on many a distant shore!
 And long shall wave, triumphant, free,
 O'er dome and tower, o'er land and sea!

For me—whatever be my fate,

Wherever cast—my country still
 Shall o'er each thought predominate,
 And through each pulse unceasing thrill.
 My prayer, with life's last ebbing sand,
 Shall be for thee, my native land!

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

THE "ABSURDITIES" OF A YOUNGER SON.

THE Hon. Wilmot Harlington was a younger son—a fact which his spirited habits, or, as others call it, his pecuniary extravagance, compelled him at times most cordially to regret. To tell the son of a peer of the realm, who was handsome, twenty-four, witty, five feet ten, elegantly educated, admired by the ladies, and an admirer of them—to tell him that a solitary cab was sufficient equipage, "would be absurd"—that an opera-box was a thing with which he ought to have nothing to do, "would be absurd"—that five hundred a-year for his tailor's bill was enough, "would be absurd"—that he had no business to give jewelry to opera-dancers, "would be absurd"—and that he should stick all day long studying Coke and Littleton, and explore Chitty all night, this also "would be absurd." At least, so thought the Hon. Wilmot Harlington, and the consequence was that his proficiency in the art of getting into debt much exceeded his skill in the art of getting out of it, which is generally looked upon, perhaps, as the least pleasant, and decidedly the most difficult one of the two—a man being born an over, but being a payer only by education. Now Lord Copperson was a rigid economist, although a wealthy man, and inclined to allow young men in the station in life that his sons were in a yearly income sufficient for all elegant wants. His son Wilmot's spirit quite knocked him down, however; but made him resolved, notwithstanding, to make a stand against it. For a long time, and very frequently, he sent him checks to an amount exceeding, by ten times, his permanent allowance, and Wilmot felt convinced, such was the paternal love, that he could make his father put his hand in his pocket with more ease, and much more effect, than his creditors could make him. Of this, we say, Wilmot was convinced. Precedent, he argued, was in favour of the rationality of such conviction, and his remorse was therefore made conveniently less when he ran into a tradesman's debt, with no perfectly certain means of being able to pay him! So, when he found himself, the other day, decidedly in want of one thousand pounds, he wrote a hasty note to his noble father, requesting the essential, and signing himself, "In haste—Your dutiful son, W. H."—jerked it into the two-penny post-letter-box, as he went to purchase a bay mare, and thought no more of the matter for the day—for to feel anxious on a certainty, as he himself might have remarked, "would be absurd." Several creditors were waiting for him when he returned home—having made his purchase for the "feebite of five hundred"—and one or two of them looked grave, some more ferocious, while half-a-dozen gave vent to a little indignant eloquence and loud expressions of want of faith in promises which to the son of a peer who had asked his father for a thousand pounds immediately, "was absurd." "Gentlemen," cried Wilmot, having assembled the money-hunters in his study; "Gentlemen, my father is a man characterised by an immense love of his offspring. I've not the least doubt if I told him that I wanted to buy an umbrella that had been dug out of the ruins of Pompeii, valued at one thousand pounds, rather than endure the painful reflection that I had not got the umbrella, that he'd pay the money down. Gentlemen, you see the man. Benevolence run to seed, gentlemen—a giant of charity. Now, when I tell you I've made a pathetic and filial appeal to him, to doubt (here the speaker smiled ironically) to doubt that you will be paid, "would be absurd." Pray, gentlemen, call again to-morrow—don't be apprehensive, pray don't—I've written to him." Not a murmur of disapprobation ensued, but the body went out bowing and smiling with gratitude.

The aggregate amount of the claims of these praiseworthy individuals exceeding seven hundred pounds—a debt, to a susceptible younger son with but three hundred per annum, likely to prove unpleasant. Wilmot, however, never gave it a thought, since, as "he had written to his father" to do so, "would be absurd." So, in the evening of the day on which he had received this visit, he went to club, lost "a mouse-kick" of a nine hundred odd, besides "a little fifty," and went home to bed as happy as a bee, for it "would have been absurd," as he had written to his father, had he done otherwise.

The morning arrived with the morning's usual punctuality, and to his utter surprise Wilmot found, when he came down to breakfast at eleven, that the post had not yet brought him his father's reply to his letter.

To feel anxious on the point at so early an hour, he felt "would be absurd"—so it would at twelve o'clock, at one, at two, at three, at four, at five, but at five, Wilmot acknowledged that apprehensions were not absurd. It struck him that his father might be tired out, that it was just barely possible that he might not care one fig for his distresses, and that absolutely the one thousand pounds might not make its appearance at all—Stunning notion!—

"What was to be done?" So inquired Wilmot of himself as the clock struck six—At seven his creditors were to make their appearances. Chiefly, of course for his father's sake, it was that he hoped his lordship would send him the thousand pounds, for, after the flourishing speech in which he had addressed them, he feared that his creditors might regard the peer much in the same light in which they felt that they were justified in regarding him. "Filial affection forbid!" exclaimed Wilmot. "Bang, bang," emphatically observed the knocker. "Twopence," remarked the postman. "Thank God!" exclaimed our hero. Our hero was about to shut the door, which, in his intense anxiety, he had saved the servant the trouble of opening, when he was arrested by the sudden appearance of his smiling bookmaker, who, followed by about a dozen of his creditor brethren, observed, "that he had done himself the honour of waiting upon him, agreeably to order." "Gentlemen," cried Wilmot, "words will but ill express the gratification I experience at seeing you. Have the kindness to walk up stairs," and he ran up stairs before them, elated by being able to keep his word, even to the very letter of his promise.

"There are moments in a man's life," continued our hero, having closed the door, and begged them to be seated, "particularly sunny; but, as far as I am concerned, none more so than such moments as these when a man feels, providently feels, that he can pay the just demands of his honest and patient creditors. Your respective bills—your bills, if you please, gentlemen." Each creditor placed his account before their mutual debtor. "You see, gentlemen, what kind of a man my father is—that what I said of him was, every bit of it, true. His liberal hand and open heart are ever ready to assist his beloved offspring!" "Excellent parent," murmured the auditors—"A man with a mint of money and a mint of feeling." "That's it, gentlemen," and Wilmot, tearing open the letter, the seal of which filial affection had hitherto decayed by his breaking. Opening the letter, our hero took out a check and perused the letter before he intimated the amount. "Hark ye, gentlemen, how my father writes!—Dear boy, I do not send you a check for the amount you requested, because I conceive that, as a good and fond father, I must have no scruples impede my desire to assist you and recover you from your difficulties. The enclosed will be, I trust, of singular service to you." Ten thousand, at least, gentlemen!—and our hero opened the check, and read, "Pay the bearer the sum of One Shilling."—Wilmot fainted. In the morning he awoke, and found himself in the Queen's Bench.

THE SONG OF THE SELFISH MAN.

I'm not a marrying man—in vain
 You try to tempt me—
 I'm very sure I can't endure
 That they should thus beset me;
 There's Lady Jane may try in vain,
 And o'er my rent-roll scan—
 I'm very sure I'm much too poor
 To be a marrying man!
 In vain they try to smile and sigh—
 Their soft white hands, I prize;
 But oh for me 'twould really be
 Too great a happiness;
 I dance and dine—I drink my wine—
 I flirt with Lady Ann;
 But still I'm sure I'm much too poor
 To be a marrying man!
 I laugh and talk, I smile and walk,
 I sing, I dance, I play;
 I'm fated day by day,
 I smile at others, I laugh with brothers,
 None can my heart trepan;
 For really I—whose'er may try—
 I'm not a marrying man!

SONG.

Here's to thee, my Scottish lassie!
Here's a hearty health to thee,
For thine eye so bright, thy form so light,
And thy step so firm and free;
For all thine artless elegance,
And all thy native grace,
For the music of thy mirthful voice,
And the sunshine of thy face,
For thy guileless look and speech sincere,
Yet sweet as speech can be,
Here's a health, my Scottish lassie!
Here's a hearty health to thee!

Here's to thee, my Scottish lassie!
When I meet thee in the throng
Of merry youths and maidens,
Dancing lightsofely along,
I'll dream away an hour or twain,
Still gazing on thy form,
As it flashes through the baser crowd,
Like lightning through a storm;
And I, perhaps, shall touch thy hand,
And share thy looks of glee,
And for once, my Scottish lassie!
Dance a giddy dance with thee.

Here's to thee, my Scottish lassie!
I shall think of thee at even,
When I see its first and fairest star
Come smiling up through heaven;
I shall hear thy sweet and touching voice,
In every wind that grieves,
As it whirls from the abandoned oak
Its withered autumn leaves;
In the gloom of the wild forest,
In the stillness of the sea,
I shall think, my Scottish lassie,
I shall often think of thee.

Here's to thee, my Scottish lassie!
In my sad and lonely hours,
The thought of thee comes o'er me,
Like the breath of distant flowers;
Like the music that enchants mine ear,
The sighs that bless mine eye,
Like the verdure of the meadow,
Like the azure of the sky,
Like the rainbow in the evening,
Like the blossoms on the tree,
Is the thought, my Scottish lassie!
Is the lonely thought of thee.

Here's a health, my Scottish lassie!
Here's a parting health to thee—
May thine be still a cloudless lot,
Though it be far from me;
May still thy laughing eye be bright,
And open still thy brow,
Thy thoughts as pure, thy speech as free,
Thy heart as light as now!
And whatso'er my fate after,
My dearest toast shall be—
Still a health, my Scottish lassie!
Still a hearty health to thee!

A COUPLE OF STRAY LEAVES.

LEAF THE FIRST.—SIX MONTHS AFTER MARRIAGE.

"Well, my dear, will you go to the party to-night? I know you have a very polite invitation."

"Why, my love, just as you please; I know I always wish to consult your pleasure."

"Well then, Harriet, suppose we go; that is if you are perfectly willing; now don't say yes, because I do, for you know that where you are, there I am perfectly happy."

"Why, my love, you would enjoy yourself there I am sure, and whenever you are happy, I shall be, of course. What dress shall I wear, William?"—my white satin with blonde, or my ashes of roses, or my levantine, or my white lace, you always know better than I about such things."

"Harriet, dearest, you look beautiful in anything, now take your own choice to-night—but I think you look very well in the white satin."

"There, William dear, I knew you would think just as I did—oh! how happy we shall be to-night; and you must promise not to leave me for a moment, for I shall be so glad if you do."

"Leave then, dearest, leave then!"
No; 'yonder star is sweet."

"Oh William, dearest William, how beautiful that is, you are always learning poetry to make me happy."

"And Harriet, my own prized Harriet, would I not do anything in the world to give you one moment's happiness? Oh, you are so very, very dear to me, it seems at times almost too much happiness to last."

"Oh, do not say so, dear William, it will last—and we shall see many years even happier than this, for will not our love be stronger, and deeper every year; and now, dearest, I will be back in one moment, and then we will go."

"There she has gone, bright and beautiful creature she is—Oh! how miserable I should be without her; she has indeed cast a strong spell around my heart, and one that never, no never can be broken; she is the only star of my existence, guiding on to virtue and happiness, and can I ever love her less than now?—can I ever desert her?—can I speak of her in less than terms of praise? Oh, no, it is impossible—she is too good, too pure—happy, happy man that I am."

LEAF THE SECOND.—SIX YEARS AFTER MARRIAGE.

"My dear, I will thank you to pass the sugar, you didn't give me but one lump."

"Well, Mr. Snooks, I declare you use sugar enough in your tea to sweeten a boghead of vinegar. James, keep your fingers out of the sweetmeats; Susan, keep still bawling! I declare it is enough to set one distracted,—there, take that, you little wretch!"

"Why, Harriet, what has the child done? I declare you are too hasty!"

"I wish, Mr. Snooks, you'd mind your own business, you're always meddling with what don't concern you."

"Well, Mrs. Snooks, I want to know who has a better right if I have not—you're always fretting and fuming about nothing."

"Pa, Thomas is tearing your newspapers all up!"

"Thomas, come here—how dare you abuse my papers!—I'll teach you to tear it again—there, sir, how does that feel—now go to bed!"

"Mr. Snooks, you horrid wretch, how can you strike a child of mine in that way! Come here, Thomas, poor fellow—did he get hurt—never mind—here's a lump of sugar—there, that's a good boy."

"Mrs. Snooks, let me tell you, you will spoil the children; you know I never interfere when you see fit to punish a child—it's strange that a woman can never do anything right."

"Never do anything right? faith, Mr. Snooks, if nobody did anything right in this house but yourself, I wonder what would become of us."

"Let me tell you, ma'am, and I'll bear it no longer, you are as snappish and surly as—a dog—and if there is a divorce to be had in the land, I'll have it; you would wear out the patience of a Job."

"O dear, how mad the poor man is; well, good night, my dear—pleasant dreams."

"There, she's gone. Thank heaven, I'm alone once more. Oh! unhappy man that I am, to be chained down to such a creature—she is the very essence of ugliness, cross and peevish. Oh! that I could once more be a bachelor, curse the day that I ever saw the likeness of her. Yes, I will get a divorce, I can't live with her any longer, it is utterly impossible."

CHINESE MARKETING.

It is very revolting, says the author of the Pan Qui in China, to the feelings of the European, upon his first visit to China, to observe the natives preparing to make their meals upon those domestic animals which he has always been accustomed to look upon with a degree of fondness and affection. The dog, especially, has always been considered the friend and companion of man; the only friend, sometimes, that is left him, after he has been deserted by the rest of the world. But the craving appetite and calls of hunger will generally overthrow the strongest ties of affection and gratitude. It was thus at the siege of Jerusalem, when the starving mother fed upon the flesh of her own murdered child; and a still more appropriate illustration is given, in that true and faithful sketch from nature Lord Byron has drawn of the shipwreck of Don Juan, and which is founded on an actual occurrence. The Chinese of the upper ranks are as fastidious and expensive in their food as any other people, while the lower orders are altogether as filthy. This evidently arises from the great scarcity of provisions among so many millions of people, and the necessity, therefore, of sustaining nature by whatever can possibly afford any nourishment. This naturally leads, in time, to a total loss of discrimination as to the quality of food eaten, and an animal in the market would, therefore, be valued only in proportion to the quantity of flesh upon the bones, without any reference to its flavour or state of preservation. A gentleman walking through the market one day, at Canton, observed that a pheasant and a cat were put up for sale at the same price; and you will frequently observe, at the same place, dogs, cats, and rats sold indiscriminately, according to their weight.

GENEROSITY OF CATALINI.

In 1818, Madame Catalini played an engagement at the Dublin theatre—then under the management of Mr. Jones, not him of "the blood of Warren" memory—by which she extended her fame and increased her fortune. Sometime afterwards the great cantatrice appeared on the boards of the same theatre, where she found a new manager. Mr. Jones, owing to a losing business, had been compelled to go into a state of "reticence," and was probably ruminating on the honours and perplexities that surrounded the managerial office, when he received a very polite note from Catalini, inviting him to breakfast with her. But as the poor ex-manager might as well have undertaken a flight to the moon as to have attempted to perambulate the streets of Dublin at the time in broad daylight. Catchpoles and tipstaffs, in almost countless numbers, were prepared to pounce upon him, like hawks upon a chicken, the moment he sallied forth from his hiding-place. He addressed a note to the fair songstress, acquainting her with his unpleasant "situation as I am" condition, when she, in answer, immediately waited upon and consoled him in his affliction, by insisting on his accepting the sum of five hundred pounds from her! No noble gift from so fair a hand could not, of course, be refused by an "ex-manager in distress."

THE WAY THEY COURT DOWN EAST.

Sally the housemaid, paring apples in the corner. Enter Obadiah, who seats himself in the corner opposite to Sally, without saying a word for fifteen minutes, but finally scratching his head, breaks silence with—

Obadiah. There's a considerable imperceptible alterin' in the weather since last week.

Sally. 'Taint so injudicious and so indubitable cold as 'twas; the thermometer has lowered up to four hundred degrees higher than zenth.

Obadiah. I think 't likely, for birds of that specie fly a great quantity higher in warmer days than cold ones.

Both parties assume a grave and improving look, and a long pause ensues. Finally Obadiah gives his pate another harrowing scratch and again breaks silence with—

Obadiah. Well, Sally, we chaps are going to raise a sleigh ride, it's sitch minicible good sleidin to-morrow. I 'pose they'll have instigate times on't. I should be supermatra happy if you would disgrace me with your company. I should take it as a derogatory honour; besides, we're calculatin' to treat the gals copious well with raisins and black strap.

Sally. I should be supermatra glad to disgrace you, but our folks respect company; I can't go.

Obadiah sits awhile, and at length starts up as though a new idea had come upon him.

Obadiah. Well, now, I know what I'll do; I'll go home and thrash them are beans what have been lying down in the barn sitch a darned long while. Exit Obadiah.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

ON THE DEATH OF MY LITTLE SISTER.

BY ROBERT MACNISH.

TAV MEMORY as a spell

Of love, comes o'er my mind—

As dew upon the purple bell—

As perfume on the wind—

As musk on the sea—

As sunshine on the river—

So hath it always been to me,

So shall it be for ever.

I hear thy voice in dreams

Upon me softly call

Like echo of the mountain streams

In sportive waterfall

I see thy form as when

Thou wert a living thing,

And blossom'd in the eyes of men,

Like any flower of spring.

Thy soul to heaven hath fled,

From earthly thralldom free;

Yet 'tis not as the dead

That thou appear'st to me.

In slumber I behold

Thy form, as when on earth—

Thy locks of waving gold,

Thy sapphire eye of mirth.

I hear, in solitude,

The gratie kind and free,

Thou utter'dst in joyful mood,

While seated on my knee.

So strong each vision seems,

My spirit that doth fill,

I think not they are dreams,

But that thou livest still.

CALM THOUGHT

There is nothing which makes so great a difference between one man and another, as the practice of calm and serious thinking. To those who have been unaccustomed to it, there is required at first an effort; but it is entirely in their own power to repeat this effort if they will, and when they will. It becomes every day easier by perseverance and habit—and the habit so acquired exerts a maternal influence upon their condition as responsible and immortal beings. In that great process, therefore, in which consists the healthy condition of any man as a moral being, there is a most important step, of which he must be conscious as an exercise of his own mind. You feel that you have here a power, however little you may attend to the exercise of it. You can direct your thoughts to any subject you please; you can confine them to objects which are before you at the time, or occurrences which have passed during the day—or you can send them back to events which took place many years ago. You can direct them to persons whom you are in the habit of meeting from day to day, or to those who are separated from you by thousands of miles. You can place before you persons who lived, and events which occurred long before you came into existence, and you can anticipate and realize events which are not likely to occur until you have ceased to exist. Study these wondrous processes of your mind; observe what power you have over them, and what consequences of eternal importance must arise from exercising them aright. If you can thus think of any subject you please, why cannot you think of God—of his power, his wisdom, his holiness, his justice—of his law which he has written in your heart, and in his revealed word? Why cannot you think of, and realize the period when you shall lie down in the grave; and that tremendous moment when all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live, and shall arise to judgment? Such truths as these, duly considered, or thought of, cannot fail, under divine influence, to exercise a powerful effect upon all our habits of thinking and acting in this life.

ARGUMENT FOR A FUTURE STATE.

Dr. Nicholas concludes his remarkable work on the "Architecture of the Heavens," with the following sublime and cheering reflection: "This at least is established on grounds not to be removed. In the vast heavens, as well as among phenomena around us, all things are in a state of change and progress; there too—on the sky—in splendid hieroglyphics, the truth is inscribed, that the grandest forms of present being are only germs swelling and bursting with a life to come. And if the universal fabric is thus fixed and constituted, can we imagine that aught which it contains is unphelid by the same preserving law, that amihilation is a possibility, real or virtual—the stoppage of the career of any advancing being while hospitable infinitude remains! No! let night fall; it prepares a dawn when man's weariness will have ceased, and his soul be refreshed and restored. To some! To every creature these are words of hope spoken in an organ-tone; our hearts suggest them, and the stars repeat them, and through the infinite, aspiration wings its way rejoicing as an eagle follows the sun."

THE PASSIONS.

As light was the eldest-born principle of the universe, so love was the eldest-born passion of humanity, though people quote Milton to prove that vanity was so—in our own sex at least; and many are the witty sayings on the favourite text; but they are wrong, and their text misinterpreted. Eve, when she looked in passionate delight on her own lovely face reflected in the stream, knew not it was her own and had nothing else to love; the moment she found an Adam to lavish the awakened sympathies, she turned from the shadow to the reality, even though "less winning soft, less amiably fair;" she did not sit upon the bank and pine to death for her own fair face,

"Like that too beauteous boy,
That lost himself by loving of himself."

while the voice of love wooed her in vain. Vanity in this instance was but the shadow of love. But, oh me! How many women, since the days of Echo and Narcissus, have pined themselves into air for the love of men who were in love only with themselves!

the colonel, marching with stately port, and in double common time up to Paul, and planting himself bolt upright before his face.

"At your service, entirely," said Paul, with meek and measured civility.

"And Mr. Plant, I presume," continued the colonel, making half a bow, and screwing up his martial features into an apology for a civil smile—"is to marry the widow Wilful?"

"Oh yes, certainly—that is—so they say."

"Then, sir, I have only to say," said the colonel, lifting himself up as high as possible, and twisting his fore-finger into one of his formidable black whiskers, that considering myself supplanted, beguiled, and circumvented by you, I apprehend you are ready to give me such satisfaction as the laws of honour require!"

"Certainly, sir, with great pleasure," replied Paul.

"Then, sir, I shall desire the pleasure of your company on the other side of the state line," returned the colonel, in the civillest tone possible—"Pistols, I suppose, would be your preference."

"Pistols!" said Paul, in a tone which he meant for an ejaculation of surprise.

"Very well," said the colonel, without giving time for any further explanation. "Here are the terms of the meeting, which I trust you will find perfectly agreeable." So saying, he handed a paper to Paul, who received it, and ran it over with his eyes, without having self-possession enough to gather the meaning of a particle of its contents.

"Perfectly agreeable, certainly," said Paul, in his usual assenting way. The colonel turned upon his heel, and stalked off.

Paul's good friend, Tom, snatched up the document, and read—"Pistols—ten a.m.—thirty paces—seconds to mark out the ground—no interference till third shot—surgeons for two—mortally wounded," etc. etc. etc.

"Why, Paul, do you know you are to fight a duel?"

"Am I!" said Paul—"then heaven be praised! there is still a hope left; for if I am shot to death, I shall escape marrying the widow!"

When Paul arrived at the field of action on the eventful day, he found his spirits a great deal firmer than he had expected. In fact, he felt inspired by the greatness of the occasion, and very naturally, for when a man knows he must be either shot or married, he must be aware that the crisis requires all his fortitude. Paul took his station, with the most bloodless intention that ever prompted a man to battle. "I had much rather be killed, than kill," thought he.

"One—two—three," said the seconds, as Paul raised his pistol to about forty-seven degrees of elevation. "Fire! bang!" The colonel's bullet whistled by Paul's left ear, and Paul's hit the steeple of a martin-barn on the top of an adjoining barn.

Twice more were the pistols fired, when the seconds interfered; the colonel declared he was satisfied, and they shook hands, thereby showing that Paul Plant, by shooting three times in the face of the blessed sun, had proved that he "never supplanted, beguiled, and circumvented," the aforesaid Colonel Strut; for so it is laid down in the "code of honour."

It seemed now to be all over with Paul. "I must be married then," said he to himself—"Killing won't save me." The day was fixed, and his fate appeared inevitable. The nearer it approached, the less he felt resigned to it. The day before the wedding, Paul met Doctor Bindemight, the worthy parson who was to join him in his bonny bride.

"Doctor," said Paul, "how shall I escape it?"

"Marriage," said the doctor, in his most solemn, argumentative way, "is considered by all authorities, ecclesiastical, political, ethical, legal, and judicial, as a bond or covenant, entered into by the mutual consent and agreement of the two parties." Therefore, I am decidedly of opinion, that when the ceremony is to take place, and I propound the regular question, "Will you take this woman for your wife?"—You reply, "No"—it is not a marriage by no manner of means.

"I can't do it," said Paul, mournfully, "I have tried it a hundred times, but the word always sticks in my throat. There is a spell upon me in matters of denying; I must assent to everything. I was born without the capacity to do otherwise. Ask me if I have got three heads, I believe I should say 'yes.'"

"Then you always say 'yes!'"

"Yes, always, certainly."

"Good by, friend Paul," said the doctor, civilly, touching his hat.

"Mercy on me!" exclaimed Paul Plant.

There was such a turn out among the belles the next day! I wish I had been there to see it. Trinity church was thronged, for everybody knew Paul Plant, and the acquaintance of widow Wilful comprised pretty nearly the whole of that circle which calls itself "good society." I wish, moreover, I had the talent of the immortal author of Clarissa Harlowe at describing fevers and luteating; then would I tell how magnificently the widow was decked out. But this cannot be done. Everything was as it should be—in the judgment of the world. The "happy pair" drove to church, a long string of coaches followed them; the widow blushed and "smiled, and all the world was gay." Was ever a bridegroom in a state of more inexplicable awkwardness? He debased with himself for a moment, whether he should not make a desperate effort, take to his heels and run—but it was too late.

Paul cast a longing, lingering look behind him as he entered the church door. "Farewell! blessed light of heaven!" said he to himself, "tis the last time I shall ever see you a free man!" The widow held him fast by the arm.

"My dear Paul," said she, "here we are at last."

"Yes," replied Paul, with a groan.

"We are all ready," said the bridesmaids.

"Dearly beloved," began Doctor Bindemight; Paul felt his heart beat terribly. "One minute more and there will be no remedy!" thought he. He looked most importunately at the doctor, as much as to say, "can you be so cruel!" The doctor made an awful pause before the great question. Paul's heart beat faster than ever. "Now for the catastrophe!" said he. The doctor gave Paul a keen look; everybody was breathless. At length he spoke.

"Do you refuse this woman for your wife?"

"Yes!" exclaimed Paul, in the loudest tone he was ever known to utter.

In an instant the idea flashed upon his mind that he was free. He sprang into the broad aisle with the quickness of lightning, knocked down an old gentleman in spectacles, burst through the crowd and bolted into the street. He ran home without stopping, and it was not till he had locked himself within his own chamber, that he felt certain he was not married to widow Wilful.

There was a terrible scene at the church, with fainting and so forth; but the widow is alive to this day, and when she finds another man who can't say "no," she may play again the game which had nearly entrapped poor Paul Plant.

INFELICITOUS NAMES.

BY WILLIAM COX.

"Oh Amos Cottle—Phobus! what a name
To fill the speaking trumpet of future Fame!" —Byron.

I AM a young man in the prime and vigour of life, easy in my circumstances, respectfully connected, and of unspotted character. Many unthinking persons envy me; yet am I very miserable. And it is no evanescent, fanciful, poetical, half-greasy misery that has fallen to my lot. No—it is real, substantial, perpetual, unpleasant—very.

It has embittered many an hour that would otherwise have been happy—darkened many a day that, but for it, would have been marked with a white stone. It has been my rock ahead—fatal, unshunnable.

But I hate mystery—I wish not to trifle with the feelings of the public—I may as well disclose it at once.

My name is Swipes!

This is the incubus that has "grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength," and hung about me for twenty years. I felt it not, it is true, in the sunny hours of childhood—it harmed me not in the happy days of cake and confectionary adolescence—it touched me but little even in my schoolboy years; but since then it has weighed fearfully upon me, and now it presses me to the earth. I cannot change it—I cannot escape from it. It sticks by me—it follows me—it haunts me—it meets me at every turn. Talk of an evil conscience—what is an evil conscience to such a name?

It completely and thoroughly neutralizes and renders of none effect all the good gifts of nature and fortune.

My personal appearance (though I say it myself), is not inelegant, my complexion is clear and healthy, my features have been even termed classical, and my manner, I flatter myself, is the opposite of boorish or disagreeable. Yet what avail these advantages? They call me Swipes! As long as I remain untroubled, the ladies regard me with looks of anything but aversion; but as soon as that ceremony takes place, and that fatal name is pronounced, I undergo a metamorphosis more sudden than any in Ovid. The classical cut of my features assume a pot-house expression—my whiskers (that would not disgrace an Italian bandit) have a vile, blackguard effect, and my whole appearance—to the eye of prejudice—is low, vulgar, and common-place. The "belle of a ball-room" on one occasion, was pleased to inquire the name of the genteel young man (meaning me) in the claret-coloured coat. They told her, upon which she requested the loan of a smelling-bottle; and when I begged the honour of her hand for the next quadrille, she drew herself up, curled her pretty lips, and assured me she was "really too fatigued."

Ten minutes after she was dancing most vigorously with an ugly-looking fellow, but a Mordant Melville!

Mordant Melville! Ah! had such a name fallen to my lot, how different might have been my fate. But I have been branded as a Swipes.

Even that was not enough. What does the world suppose my mother did?

She christened me Simon!

Simon Swipes!

"Apt alliteration's awful aid!"

I record the melancholy fact more in sorrow than in anger. I bear my reverent parent no ill-will on that score. She did it unthinkingly. She was a plain matter-of-fact woman. Her father's name was Simon, and so she would have her son a Simon also. She never dreamed of the consequences to me. I was taken smilingly to the baptismal font, the act was consummated, and I was carried forth by my nurse into a sneering and unfeeling world as little Simon Swipes! What a name for a soft, meek-looking unconscious babe to carry about with it!

And yet Juliet asks—"What's in a name?" But she was a young, inexperienced, love-sick girl, and her lover's name was both chivalrous and euphonious. Had it been otherwise—had Romeo been a Swipes instead of a Montague, it might have made a difference. Perchance there would not have been such a row in Verona.

Should the reader be a Delville or a Melville—a Beaumont or a Beauchamp—a Sedley or a Sidney—he can have little idea of the misery arising from being a Swipes. Nothing but bitter experience could bring home to him what a fruitful source of annoyance is such a name: He knows not—he never can know—what it is, as that name is announced as you enter a room, to endure the ill-squashed titter of the ladies and the impudent broad grins of the gentlemen, and to hear "Swipes! Swipes! Did they say Swipes?" circulating around the circle in that most provoking of all tones—an audible whisper.

Ah! it is a fearful thing to be irrevocably associated with small-beer.

I said it haunted me at every step, and in every shape, and I said it not unthinkingly. In society, in solitude, in the quiet chamber and the pensive walk, that horrible recollection is ever present to my mind, blighting all hopes of fame and honourable distinction, and crushing and dissipating all lofty thoughts, all ardent aspirations, all heroic dreams. Do I contemplate becoming a soldier, of serving my country, of seeking reputation "in the cannon's mouth," and of attaining the proud title of colonel or even general, still there is the Swipes to be attached to my colonelship or generalship whenever it comes, turning at once the sublime into the ridiculous, the lofty into the ludicrous. Do I think of the law, the prospect of the impudent puns of my brother barristers annihilates all hopes of legal distinction. Do I contemplate giving myself up to the delightful pursuits of literature—"entwining my name"—my name!—"with my land's language," the thought of the sound of "Swipes sonnets" or "Swipes Minor Poems," quite overpowers me, and I throw down my pen in despondency and despair.

Yet am I of a poetical, and what is worse, of a sensitive temperament. I am, besides, romantic, and very susceptible. Of course I have my visions and my imaginings like other inflammatory young people of either sex. In my day-dreams I picture to myself some lonely, love-sick, guileless, soft, seraphic being, who would be my pride in prosperity, my solace in adversity, and so on—my treasure, my joy—in short, who might be all the world to me, and to whom I could be all the world. But then the unpalatable thought occurs—how could I conscientiously ask such a being to share my destiny—how could I, with any decency, request an angel to become Mrs. Swipes? What would avail the prettiest of cottages, embowered in the most verdant and picturesque of woods, with the brightest and clearest of streamlets murmuring and meandering through the green-sward at the door—the briery rose, the jasmine, and the eglantine twining their tendrils around the rustic porch, and creeping lovingly into the window-sill—the swallow twittering from the eaves, and the nightingale's gush of music at night-fall from the adjacent grove—what would avail it all, if it was at once the home of love and Swipes!

It is too much!
Had I only been of the feminine gender, there might, there would have been hope.

I have three lovely cousins—my father's brother's daughters—Sabina, Selma, and Celestine Swipes. Fair are they as the morning—lively, spirited, intelligent, and accomplished. They feel the indignation of their name, poor dears, and are anxiously endeavouring to get it changed. And they have hopes. They may yet be the mothers of Mowbrays and Mortimers!

But I am a man, and therefore of hope bereft. Swipes came I into the world—Swipes must I go out of it! Even the monumental stone that records my virtues as a son, a husband, and a parent, will record them as appertaining to Simon Swipes!

A husband and a father, did I say? Dare I take upon myself the responsibility of assuming those characters? What will it be but disseminating suffering—perpetuating misery? They will call the children—the children's children—that also! Dear, unborn innocents! It must not be.

My feelings get the better of me.

(To be concluded in our next.)

DOMESTICK CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM DETROIT.

The city of Detroit, though occasionally honoured by the temporary presence of a few novelty-hunters from the great metropolis, flying to the prairies, which may thank Miss Marneau for having brought them into fashion, or now and then a delegation from the extensive and heavy firm of "Greenhorn, Flat and Co.," on their way to Chicago or Jumpoff river, is after all, I dare say, but slightly known to most of your readers. It is a place, however, of some little interest, on account of the past, the present, and the future.

To me, the very first aspect of the city was striking, in no ordinary degree. Whoever shall stand in Jefferson Avenue, near the venerable old arsenal, (the mute witness of the disgraceful surrender of 1812,) looking eastward and upward toward Bloody Run, will see one of the finest streets that his eye ever rested on. Not that the buildings which line it can be commended without manifold exceptions, (not a few of them look as if they had survived the three destructions,) but the uncommon beauty of the site, the noble width of its area, and the gentle and regular slope which is one of its great advantages, are on the whole unequalled by any street I have yet seen in America. One catches, too, at every crossing street, a full view of the broad and rapid river, and the green Canadian shore beyond it, in charming contrast with the thronging rush of the populous city. You New-Yorkers look unutterable things when we speak of Broadway being rather narrow and crooked, after all; and as you have not seen Jefferson Avenue, we can pardon you.

Detroit is one of the few towns in our country which can tell of "Breaches, ambuscades, foreign blades,"

and it might be added that "health's five fathom deep" are not entirely unknown there even at the present day. "No place in the United States," says Mr. Cass, "presents such a series of events, interesting in themselves, and five times its flag has changed—three different sovereigns have claimed its allegiance, and since it has been held by the United States, its government has been three times transferred—twice it has been besieged by the Indians, once captured in war, and once burned to the ground." For a brief sketch of the early history of Detroit, I shall avail myself of a discourse delivered before the Historical Society of Michigan by Mr. Cass, to whose warm interest and paternal care the people of this state are much indebted.

The nucleus of our goody city, a small stockaded fort, known as "Fort Pontchartrain on the Straits of Lake Erie," dates from July, 1701, when Monsieur de la Motte Cadillac, "with one hundred men and a jesuit," (gr. what sort of animal!) planted the French flag on the right bank of the beautiful strait now called Detroit river. The natives, at first friendly enough, soon became inimical to the new comers, and suspected them of a secret design of ultimate conquest. In this spirit they attempted at one time to fire the town, and again, soon after, to attack its defences, but both these dangers were eluded by the spirit and bravery of the French commander. The Indians appear to have been kept quiet for some years by the recollection of these repulses, but in 1712, the Outagamies or Foxes, in conjunction with the Iroquois, determined to destroy the town. Their machinations were, however, disclosed to the commandant, and Du Roncier was found so well prepared, that the mischief was in a great measure prevented. Many of the straw-thatched houses were, however, burned by means of arrows with lighted matches attached to them, which the wily savages discharged into the fort, and others were preserved only by the primitive device of covering the combustible roofs with wet skins. The Outagamies are said to have lost more than a thousand warriors in this expedition, and their power met its final overthrow not long after, at a point on Fox river, since called "Butte des Morts," or Hill of the Dead.

In 1760 Detroit came into the possession of the British, by the capitulation of Montreal. But though nominally masters, they failed in inspiring the Indians with those friendly feelings with which they had long before that period learned to regard the French. Indeed it has often been observed, "there is in the French character a peculiar adaptation to the habits and feelings of the Indians, and to this day, the period of French domination is the era of all that is happy in Indian reminiscence."

The celebrated chief Pontiac, a man who possessed more truly heroic traits than could be claimed by many of his civilized contemporaries, stood at this time at the height of his power and honour and influence. This untutored savage, surrounded by procrustes, a warrior by habit, proved himself in many exigencies, a statesman also—an Indian Wellington. In his transactions with his British allies, he issued a currency—"bills of credit, drawn upon bark, representing the article which had been delivered to him, and authenticated by the figure of an otter, the totem (arms) of his tribe." And this currency, far from being "Wild Cat!" "was faithfully redeemed by him."

It is unfortunate that we lack materials for a minute history of this striking person. A history there is, a manuscript journal in French, (now in process of literal translation by a gentleman of the Historical Society of Michigan), recording some of the more prominent facts of the time, but it is unfortunately mutilated, and breaks off in the very midst of the battle of Bloody Bridge. In it we find a lengthened recital of the Indian dream by means of which, Pontiac contrived to arouse the superstitious feelings of his tribe, and to awaken their latent desire of vengeance on the intruders, against whom both they and their chief had conceived a violent dislike. The plan of Pontiac embraced a range no less extensive than the entire chain of British posts on the upper lakes, which were to be attacked simultaneously with those of Niagara, Presque Isle, Le Boeuf, Venango and Pittsburgh. That he made such an attempt—that he actually succeeded in surprising nine of these forts—almost exceeds the limits of belief. The secrecy with which the plot was organized, had been such that the British were entirely unsuspecting.

The capture of Detroit was considered a point of too much importance to be attempted by proxy, and Pontiac therefore undertook it in person. The only savage tactics, deception and treachery, were relied on this occasion. Pontiac and his party had saved off their rifles so short, that they could conceal them under their blankets, and the intention was to appear before the fort, request a council with the British commander, Major Gladwyn, and, at a given signal, to massacre the officers, and open the gates to the warriors who should be ready on the outside. How Major Gladwyn had the good fortune to receive intimation of the meditated treachery, has never been distinctly known; but once aware of the plot, it was easy to counteract it. Pontiac and his braves were received with such ceremony—so much so that the chief could not forbear inquiring why the guard was doubled, and the officers armed with swords and pistols. The British commander replied that it was proper to keep the young men to their duty lest they should become idle and ignorant. The council proceeded; Pontiac declined with great boldness and vehement gesticulation, still heightened as the critical moment approached—the belt of wampum was about to be presented, (the signal for attack,) when the drums suddenly drew the charge—the guards levelled their pieces, the officers drew their swords—and there we must leave them, like the characters in the Critick in Mr. Puff's "most effective scene," until my next letter." c. p.

THE VALENTINE.

Original.

Now, by St. Valentine, mine eyes be bold
To tell thee, maid, I love thee: for thy smile
Bids courage rise, yet bids but to beguile.
As yonder crocus, peeping to unfold
Its leaves of emerald, and its cloth of gold
To February's short though shining day,
Doubtful of cloudy chill and coming cold,
Timidly opens to the sunny ray—
So much I, maid, endure with lo'ing heart
Dark low'ring March, and April's changeable sky,
Ere May, mild beaming in the heav'n-blue eye,
To my heart's blossoms shall its warmth impart!
Sweet maid! I'll meet, nor murmur at my doom,
If but at last thou'lt bid love's heav'nly summer bloom.

Lady, upon yon mountain as you gaze,
The melting snow-fall on its side behold,
Sweetly on which the sun of April plays;
Think on my heart, and how its life is cold;
For there my heart's sad history is told:
Melting beneath the sunbeams of those eyes,
Sparkling and chaste, a little while it lies,
Then to oblivion's common sea is roll'd!
Yet will thy smiles be lovely as before,
Though I must ever weep, my love, no more!
Ah cruel maid! what though my lowly cot
Be not the hall of state, the glittering throng?
Yet there unite to compensate my lot,
The liberal breast of love, the heaven-born soul of song!

Fair maid! for thy Bechar's diamond spines,
Sparkles for thee the wine in cups of gold,
While round my brow the humble ivy twines,
And the free rocks my only nectar hold.

Yet once admitted to thy blissful hall,
Where splendour reigns upon a glittering throne,
Where beauty smiles as music weaves her thrall,
Who could thy bondage scorn, thy sway disown?
O maid! in this conjoined we see
Worth, wisdom, wit, to charm thy subject train;
Oh! had the sycamore, in her features and demeanour,
Ulysses self had own'd thy captive chain;
Though Circe and Calypso could not win,
He would have knelt to thee, nor thought such homage sin. J. T. B.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

PARIS, JANUARY, 1839.—The Theatre de la Renaissance was crowded in all parts, on Saturday night, by the most fashionable company in Paris, for the grand concert in which the sister of the lamented Malibran was to make her debut. The theatre were an unusually elegant aspect. "The debutante," says an able Parisian critic, "has something of her sister in her features and demeanour; her voice reminds us still more of our loss. She has one of those extraordinary voices, partaking of the soprano and contralto; but what is more valuable still, she possesses to a rare degree the genius of song, soul, and inspiration. Madlle. Garcia sang three pieces—grand scena of Calisto, Malibran, an aria composed by M. de Beriot, and introduced by Malibran into the Elizaire d'Amore, and, lastly, the Trille du Diable, arranged by Panzeron from "Tartini's Dream," for the voice and violin. In the latter fantasia she was accompanied by M. de Beriot; Madlle. Pauline had scarcely given the strange melodies which the Italian violinist fancied he had performed by the devil, seated at the foot of his bed, when her brother-in-law had already executed them upon his instrument. Their marvellous ensemble drew forth shouts of applause, though it was, perhaps, in the allegro of the grand scena that the acclamations elicited by poor Maria's sister seemed loudest and most unanimous. An innovation of rather an agreeable character has been tried at the Renaissance with great success. It consists in distributing exquisitely executed vignettes and engravings, in the first and second boxes, during the entr'actes of Ruy Blas. These afford a pleasing relaxation from the serious business of the stage, and are taken away by the occupiers of the boxes at the termination of the piece. The expense of this piece of liberality is said not to amount to very much. Madlle. Senouard, the great fortune-teller, is about to publish her memoirs. If she recounts faithfully and accurately, they cannot but prove amusing, nay, even important, as an explanatory addition to the history of Napoleon's time. It is well known that the emperor consulted her on many critical points of his career, particularly on the fatal campaign to Russia. She dared to predict the said catastrophe to that rash attempt. She also foretold to Josephine, when no person could think such an event credible, that she was to be divorced. The oracle of the Rue de Tournon is now silent. She has broken her staff, and is employing the remaining part of her life in compiling her memoirs. She declares that though many have assumed her mantle, and declared themselves her pupils and successors, she has given instructions to none; and that if they attempt to predict the future, they must be looked on as exhibiting the contortions of the sybil, but not her inspiration.

A new piece, by Donizetti, is said to be in rehearsal, but I cannot find that the report is well-founded. Albertazzi has lately appeared as Malcolmo, in the Donna del Lago, but not with much success. The remembrance of Madame Pavaroni in this character is still fresh in the minds of the Parisians, and it will be long ere the part will be performed as she was accustomed to represent it. Madame Albertazzi was more happy in Il Barbiere di Siviglia. The Musical Society, which has been lately founded by Bertini, Döhler, Brod, Franchomme, and a host of others of the first performers here, gave their first concert this week. The crowd of literary, scientific, and musical men was immense. The second concert was even more successful than the first. It was given at Brand's rooms the day before yesterday (Sunday). The music was well chosen, and admirably executed, and the applause was most encouraging.

Our madistes are in all their glory, "inventing, creating, executing." Madlle. Lamdrin has made a reputation by bringing out a shawl of surprising elegance. It is, as a young lady said of it, an evidence of real genius, and in order that such a child of genius should have a name worthy of it, it has been christened Ruy Blas, after Mons. Victor Hugo's successful drama. This invention is a cachemire, white, grey, or blue—white prevailing, with a satin doubleure, and bordered with fringes of gold, silver, or fur, and corded heres glands to match.

The court is in mourning for the death of the accomplished Duchess of Wirtemberg. Louis Philippe has done away with the violet-coloured mourning, and adopted black; there seems to be reason for the change. Our royal mourning is purple, I think; but it signifies nothing what the colour may be, as long as the adoption of one be a sign of respect. But, to leave this sombre subject, a statistical account of the drama has appeared; the number of new pieces produced during the last year is two hundred and eighty-five, I can discover no indomestic to the flesh of the latter was good to eat; while their bodies were worthless after death. An inhabitant of Patagonia would have denied the soundness of this corollary.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

"He is a bad citizen," said Napoleon, "who undermines the religious faith of his country. All may not, perhaps, be substantially good, but certain it is, that all come in aid of the government power, and are essential to the basis of morality. In the absence of religion, I can discover no indomestic to the flesh of the latter was good to eat; while their bodies were worthless after death. An inhabitant of Patagonia would have denied the soundness of this corollary.

It must be plain that what is true in one country is not true in another. Monsieur Soucheur, a late French teacher in New-York, used to tell his pupils that unless they cultivated their minds they were not so good as swine—for the flesh of the latter was good to eat; while their bodies were worthless after death. An inhabitant of Patagonia would have denied the soundness of this corollary.

Mankind are not like grains of wheat, all to be ground down by the same pressure. Some will be hardened by the force which others yield to, and some spirits will be broken by what is only a wholesome corrective to others.

It is stated that Teuxis, who lived three hundred and ninety-five years before Christ, and who was famous for being the most excellent colourist of all the ancients, could have used only four colours.

The first shock of grief carries along with it a kind mysterious support to the stricken soul, subdued only by the quiet certainty of its succeeding gloom.

Some men seem most severe when they are in reality most affected, as snow turns to ice when on the point of melting.

Time tries the character of men, as the furnace assays the quality of metals, by disengaging the impurities, dissipating the superficial glitter, and leaving the gold sterling and pure.

It is a practice entirely too prevalent in this queer world that we imitate, to condemn the performances of others, when we know that the task could not be better accomplished by ourselves.

A wise man's kingdom is his own breast: or if he ever looks farther, it will only be to the judgment of a select few who are free from prejudices, and capable of giving him solid and substantial advice.

I consider every human mind to be a pendulum, oscillating in its natural state between human activity and divine, but never finding rest but in the centre, in which centre is nothing also but the total, yet free, submission of the human to the divine.

A correspondent of the Ledger asks the difference between sensation and emotion, to which the editor replies—"If you turn your fingers in snuffing a candle with them, you will have a sensation; if you are a young man or woman, and look at your sweetheart, you will have an emotion."

We have frequently observed that young men take more pains to cultivate the affectations of the day, than the good will of ill-tempered damsels, than to reciprocate and cherish the kind feelings of those who are frank and amiable. We suppose that this must be accounted for on the same principle that people are willing to pay a higher price for vinegar than for sweet cider.

Northcote, the painter, once said that the devil tempted everybody but the idle; the idle tempted the devil; and that the inside of the skull was the devil's workshop.

It was Sir Walter Scott, I think, who told the following story—"A poor man in Scotland was about to be executed, and when the procession reached the gallows, those about him said, 'now we will sing any hymn or psalm that you may have a fancy to.' Upon which he replied, 'sing what you please. I shall not meddle in these matters.'"

Madame de Stael lived, and may say to have died, in the belief that revolutions were effected, and countries governed, by a succession of clever pamphlets. This is very near the truth. The powerful newspapers of the day, with what is called the leading article, are nothing more than a succession of clever pamphlets. It is said that three newspapers in France effected the revolution of July, 1830.

There is a large oak in Lord V.'s park, which has, it is said, this remarkable feature: whenever one of family is about to die, a large limb falls, without any apparent reason. I was told that the late Lord V. went to visit this tree, and whilst he was near it a large limb suddenly fell; soon after this his lordship died.

At a picture sale in London in 1832, Wilkie's Rent-day fetched seven hundred and fifty guineas, (about three thousand three hundred dollars), and all his sketches in proportion. When his picture was put up, the room was quite full, and the company simultaneously cheered the picture by clapping their hands.

Scurrility is the corruption of wit, as knavery is of wisdom.

AN AMERICAN SKETCH.—"Steward!" "Sar!" "Whose overcoat is this in my berth?" "Judge Johnson, sar." "Then take it away directly; but stop, whose cloak is that on the top of my portmanteau?" "Judge Johnson, sar." "Then put it with the coat." "Yas, sar." "And see here, whose umbrella is this under my pillow?" "Judge Johnson, sar." "And who owns this clothes-basket, and the walking-stick, and a Welch wig, and a nightcap?" "All Judge Johnson, sar." "Then clear 'em all out before I have time to throw 'em overboard; and, tell me, steward, who has the berth above mine?" "Judge Johnson, sar." "Well, I'm glad of that, for he'll have the benefit of hearing that fellow who paced up and down the deck all night, stamping like a nigger's double-shuffle over my head; do you know who it was?" "Yes, sar; Judge Johnson, sar." "D—n Judge Johnson; why it seems that there is nobody but Judge Johnson on board, eh?" "Oh! yes, sar, great many odder gentlemen else." "However, take—Oh! bless me! there's somebody tumbled down the cabin stairs; what a fall, he must have broken his neck; who is it?" "Oh, only Judge Johnson, sar." "Then, thank heaven, there's an end of Judge Johnson at last."

TAGLIONI.—This actress took her benefit at St. Petersburg on the fifth ult., in a new ballet, La Gitana, composed by her father. The ballet obtained immense success. The splendour displayed in this chorographic production is extraordinary. It cost the imperial civil list two hundred thousand roubles. Not less than three hundred persons dance or figure in it. In the first act there is a fair at Frankfurt, with a menagerie of living lions, bears, apes, and other animals. In the second, a forest of the Pyrenees, with a gipsy camp at the foot of a cascade of hot water, twelve feet high and twenty-four broad. The ballet ends with a masquerade of five hundred persons in every sort of disguise. The ball-room is lighted by one hundred and twenty chandeliers, bearing five thousand wax-lights. Taglioni, whose execution of a Bohemian dance drew forth deafening acclamations, derived from this benefit fifty thousand roubles. The day after, the emperor and empress, who had honoured the performance with their presence, sent the faux benéficiaire a diamond and emerald chain, worth twenty-five thousand roubles.

SAVING TIME.—A clergyman, who had considerable of a farm, as was generally the case in our forefathers' days, went out to see one of his labourers, who was ploughing in the field, and he found him sitting upon his plough, resting his team. "John," said he, "would it not be a good plan for you to have a stub tree here and there, being a few bushes while the oven are resting?" John, with acoustance which might have well become the divine himself, instantly returned—"Would it be well, sir, for you to have a swing-board in the pulpit, and when they are singing, to swing a little flask?" The reverend gentleman turned on his heel, laughed heartily, and said no more about building bushes.

SEWING.—If Shakespeare were stripped of all the bombast in his passions, and dressed in the most vulgar words, we should find the beauties of his thoughts remaining; if his embroideries were burnt down, there would still be silver at the bottom of the melting pot: but I fear, (at least let me fear it for myself), that we who are his sounding words have nothing of his thought, but are all outside; there is not so much as a dwarf in our gaudy clothes.

GARDEN THEATRE. Report speaks highly of it as a dramatic production; it is called Rickhiet; or, The Proud Brother. Macready will personate Rickhiet, and the part of Proud Brother will be sustained by Miss H. Faucit. It is of great length, finely drawn, and could not have fallen into better hands. The second week of February is fixed for its representation.

PALESTINE PHYSICIAN.—In Barmah when a young woman is taken very ill, her parents agree with the physician: that if he cures the patient he may have her for his trouble, but if she dies under his medicines, he is to pay them her value. It is stated that successful physicians have very large families of females, who have become their property in this manner.

PRECOCIOUS GENIUS.—"Marm, mayn't I go and play horse to-day?" "No, child, it's impossible; stay in the house." "Now look here, marm, if you don't let me, I'll go and catch the measles—I know a big boy that's got 'em prime."

FROM GRAVE TO DAY.—A young man residing in Bury St. Edmunds was married on the morning of Friday week, acted as a bearer at a funeral in the afternoon, and played the violin for a quadrille party on the evening of the same day.

ROBESPIERRE.—A biography of Robespierre, which appeared in an Irish paper, concludes in the following manner: "This extraordinary man left no children behind him except his brother, who was killed at the same time."

MRS. CRUSE.—The lady who, in her day, was rather a celebrated actor in the provinces, applied for pecuniary assistance to an actor, more famed for his wit than his charity. His reply was a cross one, simply saying he was not a Cruse-ador.

BILLINGS-GATE.—The Chinese have a Billingsgate of their own. A traveller says that on hearing a terrible altercation, he asked his interpreter what was the cause of it. "They wantee too muche dollare for the fishes," was the reply.

FRENCH LITERATURE.—An opulent and spirited bookseller at Paris has just contracted with Victor Hugo for the privilege of publishing his works during a term of ten years; the price paid for his literary labors being twelve thousand pounds.

PUX.—"Sir," said a man defending rather a notorious character, "I assure you it is pure innocence." "I quite agree with you," replied the other, "it is pure no-sense."

IRISH-LATIN PUN.—A gentleman in company asked his friend for a potato, and on its being sent, his friend said, "I have sent you a nice mealie ope." "Thank you," said the other, "you could not have sent me a melior!"

AN ECCEBENTIC PHYSICIAN.—A poor woman went to an eminent but eccebentic surgeon, to inquire what was the proper treatment for some bodily wound.—"Put on a cataplasm," was the answer. "But, doctor, is for a child." Then put on a kittenplasm."

BALSAH'S ASS.—Bishop Burnet, who stammered, directed his chaplain to examine a young man. The first question was, "why did Balsah's ass speak?" "Because his master had an impediment in his speech," replied the young candidate.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.—When George the First or Second got into a heat with his minister, and insisted on being shown the document relating to a certain subject.—"Put on a cataplasm," the minister obeyed, and when the king rose he saw three large wagons full of papers neatly tied with red tapes, packed beneath his window.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

C. L. B. is informed that we have been unable to discover among our numerous manuscripts the paper to which he alludes.—"The Fromme" is very pretty, and we do not see how the "Merry" is when it is addressed could result such an appeal.—"The Land of my Dreams" is quite beautiful. We hope to find a place for it soon.—Dramaticus is once more informed that we are not in the records of the press-room; but we have heard that Mr. Will's play is to be produced soon after the close of the opera performance.—We have never seen the work alluded to by B. K.—We cannot give Scrutator any information with regard to the Signora A. V., but believe that his intimations are entirely gratuitous.—A friend in London writes us, that he caused the plate number of the Mirror containing the story of the "Favourite Maid of Honour" to be presented to the queen, and that she expressed herself very much amused and gratified by the same. Her majesty is now among our "constant readers: Let us hear no more slanders upon her good taste or good sense.—"Tag!" must be again.—We cannot make use of the communications of L. Y. T., & O. P., and Lulu.—Many other articles on hand shall receive the earliest attention.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1839.

New-York and its prospects.—No better proof need be required of the renewed prosperity of our noble city than to be seen in the innumerable improvements now going on in every direction—in the laying out of new streets—the erection of new blocks of houses—the contemplated formation of spacious squares—the enlargement of wharves and piers—and the general appearance of business and activity, which pervades the entire metropolis. Around Union-Place new blocks of houses, capacious and stately, are springing up with surprising celerity. At the corner of Broadway and Eighth-street, a beautiful square, extending to the Bowery, and occupying some acres of ground, is soon to be enclosed. On the East River, the wharves from Coffee-House Ship to Corlar's Hook are to be enlarged and improved in a manner that will much enhance the value of property in that direction. It is proposed to extend Broadway some miles beyond Union-Place—a proposition, which must convey an imposing idea of the rapid filling-up of the gigantic outline of New-York. As the business of the city creeps (we should rather say strides) farther up Broadway, the fashion and wealth of the city is retreating nearer to the centre of the island, and Fourteenth-street will doubtless be considered the heart rather than the extremity of the town in the course of a few years. Indeed but few of our own citizens are aware of the innumerable improvements now going on—and no one can make the circuit of the city without astonishment at the rapidity of its growth, and the increasing development of its unrivalled advantages and inestimable resources.

International Copyright.—We are glad to see that an intelligent portion of the press in this country is directing public attention, more and more, to the importance of establishing an international system of copyright between this country and England. Among the able auxiliaries in behalf of the cause, of American and British authors, we perceive, with pleasure, that the "Corsair" has promised to show, both by argument and example, the absurdity and unfairness of the present system of plunder and rapine. The advantages of the establishment of an international copyright between the United States would be mutual. Riherto American authors have been enabled to sell their manuscripts in England as well as here, but the retaliatory and just legislation of the mother country, recently adopted, has shut the door upon our writers, unless our government may consent to make the benefit of copyright reciprocal. The works of Messrs. Cooper, and Irving, and Willis, and Bird, may now be preyed upon and mutilated by every penny publisher in the Strand, and the authors can obtain neither sympathy nor redress for the injury to their reputations and their pockets. "Do as you would be done by, before you raise a murmur of complaint," the British authors will say with unanswerable truth. "Protect us against the republishing 'corsairs' of New-York and Philadelphia, and we will see that no one infringes on your interests here." Surely, as things now exist, an American author could not muster the assurance to utter a complaint, if, after an expensive edition of his work had been published by Mr. Bentley or Mr. Murray, he should learn that Mr. Cleave, of Shoe-lane, had put forth an edition at a shilling a volume. This subject is daily becoming one of more importance. American authors, notwithstanding the depressing competition of an army of unpaid English writers, are growing in stature and in strength. In looking over a late number of the London Athenaeum, we were struck by the fact, that in an advertisement of ten works in the press by Mr. Bentley, six were by American authors! We are glad to see that Mr. Clay perseveres manfully to carry through this important measure of an international copyright. His very able report on the subject shows that he is a perfect master of its details, and we really trust that his appeals to the justice and good sense of congress will not be without their effect. The honour of the country, and the interests of our infant literature, demand that the system of browbeating all native productions, by a flood of trashy novels, and biographies of English manufacture, propagating English prejudices and English opinions, should be done away with, and that native authors should be admitted to equal privileges with those of foreign countries. "A fair field and no favour," is all that is claimed for both parties.

Speedy travelling.—An instance was mentioned to us the other day strongly illustrative of the wonderful rapidity of communication produced by the establishment of steam navigation. A gentleman was in Calais, London, Javerpool, New-York, Washington, and Cincinnati in the course of the same month of February—a period of twenty-eight days! We shall not be surprised soon to hear that Puck's achievement of putting "a girle round about the earth in twenty minutes" has actually been accomplished by Mrs. Trollope, Miss Martineau or some other old woman with a propensity for travelling and for writing books.

Shakspeare's will.—From Charles Knight's new and beautiful edition of Shakspeare, we learn the will of the immortal bard is still preserved in Doctors' Commons. The fervent admirer of the bard must needs behold the last stroke of his inspired pen with a feeling of respect approaching to awe. His name is signed in three places; his hand trembled at the first, when he came to the second, the pause occasioned by lassitude or anguish would appear to be perceptible, from the tremulous breaks in the writing; when his name was to be signed for the last time, his energies appear to have been subdued—the name is almost indistinct, and the eye which guided the hand in its melancholy office seems to have been filmed. The orthography used by Shakspeare in this instance, of course, prescribes the mode in which his name is to be spelt; yet many learned commentators have erroneously used the e final with regard to the first syllable of the word. The way in which his name was pronounced during his life may be learned from an inspection of this will. The notary (who had been called hastily to the performance of his duty) had no opportunity of correction, and he spelt the name of his immortal client from the recollection of accustomed orthography alone, Shakspeare.

New Opera by Mozart.—Quite a sensation has been produced in the musical world by the announcement of the discovery of a new opera by Mozart. The Gazette Musicale gives a full account of it. It seems that Mozart invariably wrote a rapid sketch of his work, inserting the voice-parts nearly entire, with only an outline of the accompaniment, upon two staves, with a few initial letters here and there, indicating for what instruments particular parts were intended. In 1799, Mozart's widow sold all her late husband's manuscripts to M. Andre, auctioneer and chapel-master to Prince Esterhazy. He has recently found among them the sketch, nearly complete, of an Italian opera called Zeide. He has made it out, and from it completed a full score of the opera. It will be immediately published at Offenbach, the instrumental parts being arranged for the pianoforte. Of course the internal testimony will be sufficient to decide whether the piece is actually by Mozart.

Language without oaths.—It is a singular fact that the North American Indians cannot swear in their vernacular tongue. Their language furnishes no oaths. It is oppositely asked—are the Indians so prone to truth, so averse from falsehood, that the invention of oaths was unnecessary or impossible? Probably this was the case until they became corrupted by our example. Their simple promises must have been to them as sacred and inviolable as the most solemn abjurations are to us. Never resorting to serious appeals to heaven or the Great Spirit for the confirmation of their statements, profane oaths, as a matter of course, did not follow.

Mademoiselle Rachel.—This young lady, who has not yet attained her eighteenth year, is boldly pronounced by the Parisian critics the first tragic actress of the age. She attracts immense audiences every night she performs, and has been especially distinguished by the patronage of the royal family. Two years ago Mademoiselle Rachel was a poor, half-frozen child, who sang in the streets for the miserable pittance which the charity or kindness of passing strangers might throw to her. Now she is all the rage, and all the new patterns, shawls and fashions, for the coming season, are to be à la Rachel.

Living in the West.—It has been a rare season for sportsmen in the West. Wild turkeys, partridges, venison, and all the varieties of wild game have been so abundant in the Wisconsin, that they have ceased to be a luxury. Pickered, pike, and perch, are also caught in great abundance in the rivers. The peltries brought in by the Indians and hunters exceed in quantity that of any former winter for some years past.

Musick in New-York.—The taste for musick was never so satisfactorily exemplified in this city as it has been during the present season. Not to speak of the brilliant success which has attended the opera at the National, the numerous concerts which have taken place have been remarkably successful and well attended. This speaks volumes in behalf of our population.

Life of Matthews.—We must admit that the life of Charles Matthews by his widow, is one of the most entertaining biographies we have ever read. But it is most singular that no mention is made throughout of the comedian's visit to the United States! Had young Matthews's failure anything to do with this remarkable omission? Matthews's trip to America certainly constituted no insignificant part of his histrionic career.

Theatrical.—The opera at the National continues to prove attractive. It is rumoured that Wallack is to appear in several new parts before the close of the season. The public are anxious to see him. At the Park Mr. Hamblin has been very successful in Rienzi; and other show pieces. Miss Clifton and Miss Tree are to appear early in the spring. We learn there is no truth in the report that Charles Kean has been engaged to appear at the National.

Original communications.—We commend to the attention of our readers the very amusing sketch on our fourth page, by the author of "Yankee Notions"—a work of great original merit and exquisite humor. We are promised a series of sketches from the same pen. The beautiful poem on our first page by Mr. Lister, the distinguished novelist, has never before appeared in print. Mr. John Neal's graphic and characteristic story of "Animal Magnetism" will be concluded in our next.

Life in New-York.—We were in error last week in stating, that this work, which gives promise of an abundant harvest of fun, was, in the language of the prospectus, to appear "now and then." It is to be issued regularly on the fifteenth of every month.

THEY CHIDE ME FOR MY GRIEF.

THE POETRY BY T. HAYNES BAYLY, ESQ.—MUSICK ARRANGED BY HENRY RUSSELL, BY WHOM THIS SONG IS MOST RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED TO WILLIAM V. ROYLE, ESQ. OF PHILADELPHIA.

MODERATE TIME, AND WITH EXPRESSION.

They chide me for my grief, but none suspect the cause of my regret; They know not that I mourn for one, whom they so easily forget. When they off the of wo, Their spirits again set free; A-las! such little know The grief of one who mourns like me.

Ritard.

grief of one like me, who mourns

SECOND VERSE.

They breathe her name mid lighter themes,
With loud expressions of regret,
Because I name her not, it seems
To their cold hearts that I forget.
But though my tears in secret flow,
Still none shall hear me speak of thee;
Alas! such mourners little know
The grief of one, who mourns like me.

LINES

Accompanying a trifle to a friend on the point of sailing for Europe.
BY A. ALLAN.

In days of yore—if legends truly tell—
When earth was subject to the genii's spell,
Man oft was gifted with some potent charm
To conquer fate, and demon pow'r disarm:
Some wondrous talisman, whose virtues rare
Could sway the rulers of the earth and air;
Could bend all nature to his sov'reign will,
Uprouse the tempest, or its raging still.
Would I might such a gift on thee bestow!
To lay the winds when they too fiercely blow;
To smoothe the roughness of thy ocean path
When foam-crowned billows lift their heads in wrath,
And th' insatiate storm-fiend sweeping by
Enwraps in awful flames the frowning sky.
When with poised dart, impatient at delay,
Death seems to hover o'er his trembling prey.
But science now may seek such gifts in vain,
Their virtue lost when ceased the genii reign.
Through fain to shield thee from each treach'rous gale,
No charm have I to guide a prosp'rous sail;
Yet may this trifle with a wizard pow'r
Awaken morn'ry in each lonely hour,
Recalling thought to dwell again with me
While bounds thy bark upon a distant sea,
For 'twill remind thee—when old ocean raves,
Or moonbeams smile upon the sleeping waves—
In joy or grief, in sunshine or in storm,
The heart thou leavest, still beats true and warm:
Or else resolved to the insensate clay,
Has sent its spirit forth to cheer thy way.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Life of the Cardinal de Cheverus, archbishop of Bordeaux. By the Rev. J. Huen Doubourg, ex-professor of theology. Translated from the French by Robert M. Walsh. Philadelphia: Hooker and Claxton."—In presenting this volume to the public, the translator says, he "would flatter himself with the belief that he is conferring upon them no inconsiderable benefit." "What is the most useful study?" was the question once asked of a sage—"The life of a good man," he replied:—"What is the next?"—"The life of a bad man." This is the life of a good man in the purest and loftiest sense of the word." Mr. Walsh has executed his task with commendable fidelity, and his additions are interesting and valuable. The translation is at the same time elegant and literal—it being rather a transference into pure English, than an idiomatic translation.

"The Dribbles of Canada, by the author of Sam Slick, The Clock-maker, etc. Lea and Blanchard.—The reputation of Judge Haliburton will secure to this work a large sale, though it seems calculated rather for the meridian of England than the United States. The author here drops his Yankee dialect, and shows himself master of a pure and vigorous English style.

THE MONTHLY PERIODICALS.

The "Knickerbocker."—We are gratified to learn that the proprietors of this excellent magazine have secured the services of Mr. Washington Irving, who will henceforth contribute regularly to its pages. He is unquestionably the most valuable auxiliary in the United States, and we congratulate our worthy neighbour on his good fortune. Mr. Irving is unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries as a writer of English undefiled, and he is perhaps the only one whose productions, during the existing prevalence of the "Boz mania," could command a degree of attention, and enhance the already extended reputation of the Knickerbocker, which magazine we wish abundant success.

The "Southern Literary Messenger" for March has appeared with its usual punctuality. It is, like its predecessors, excellent. Mr. White is indefatigable in his efforts to elevate the character of our national periodical literature, and his work always comes to us stored with contributions from many of the best writers in the country. Its typographical appearance is superior, and altogether this magazine is an honour to the country.

The "Hesperian, or Western Monthly Magazine," edited by W. C. Gallagher, one of the most gifted minstrels of the West, is a journal worthy of a more intimate introduction to the readers of the Atlantic cities. It is conducted with extraordinary ability and care, and the tone of its criticisms is generous and discriminating. The original papers are distinguished for the manliness, vigour and independence, which characterize the inhabitants of the Great Valley of the Mississippi, where, within a few years, a number of "bright particular stars" have appeared in the literary firmament. We hope that the people of the west will not permit this excellent work to languish for want of an adequate support.

"The Museum, and Monthly Magazine." This work is under the management of Mr. N. C. Brooks, the accomplished author of "Scriptural Anthology," and many popular poems. An excellent corps of contributors supply the literary papers of the Museum; and the engraved portraits of distinguished authors, with which it is occasionally embellished, add much to its sterling attractions.

"The United States Magazine and Democratic Review" continues to be sustained with its customary spirit. Bryant and Nathaniel Hawthorne are constant contributors to this work, and we are glad to learn that it enjoys a widely extended and rapidly increasing circulation. This journal, in its politics, is enlisted under the banners of the present administration, and it labours with unrivalled ability in the cause.

"The National Magazine and Republican Review" is the title of a new monthly magazine, which has just reached its third number, published in Washington by Messrs. Fulton and Smith, and edited by Henry J. Brent. It is partly devoted to politics, in which it is professedly whig and democratic: Its original papers are very able, and we perceive that Mr. Caleb Cushing (a host in himself) is one of the principal contributors. Mr. Brent, the editor, is well known to us as an experienced and forcible writer, and we heartily commend his work to public attention.

The "Ladies' Companion" of this city, conducted by Mr. Snowden and Mrs. Stephens, bids fair to eclipse all its competitors in the extent of its circulation. It is beautifully printed, and every number is enriched with a fine engraving on steel. It has an excellent list of contributors.

The "Lady's Book," published in Philadelphia by our friend E. L. Godey, is one of the most attractive miscellanies of the day. It is edited by Mrs. S. J. Hale and Miss Leslie, and filled with contributions from many of the most distinguished writers of this country and Great Britain. Mr. Israel Post is the agent for this city.

"The Baltimore Movement."—One of the best conducted magazines in the country. We learn that its circulation is increasing.

Published every Saturday, at No. 1 Barclay-street, next to the corner of Broadway. Terms, five dollars per annum, payable, in all cases, in advance. All letters must be post-paid, and directed to the editor.

EGO.

I HAVE heard that while Jove was preparing my clay,
In his mansion of ether above,
On an errand of mischief there happened that way
That frolicsome elf, little Love.

Old Zeus had mixed up, with a good deal of pains,
Whatsoever he'd picked up by chance;
There was some commensurate, and a trifle of brains,
And a wonderful deal of romance.

He had not yet finished when Love, with a bowl
Of poison he'd made for his darts,
Which was seasoned with sighs of a passionate soul,
And distilled from the blood of warm hearts,

Comes tripping along, with a glee-dimpled face,
And mischievous, mirth-beaming eyes,
And swinging his goblet, draws nigh to the place
Where my bardship in embryo lies.

Now Jove, be it known, had but rough-cast the form,
When Cupid came by with his bowl;
And had, just before polishing, put in a warm
And quite a respectable soul.

When Love, finding out what the god was about,
Stole silently up to the clay,
And poured every drop of his goblet clean out,
Ere Jove could command him to stay!

Like the flash of the levin, the bright ruby tide
Darted quick through each quivering vein,
And the soul, which the current of passion had dyed,
Hath never recovered the stain!

ORIGINAL TALES.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.—CONCLUDED.

The Catastrophe.

"Who did that? who was it?—Oh, it was you, was it, sir!—you are the per-petrator, hey!" drawled Mr. George Dilworth Carey.

"Ethan Crawford! will you bear that," said Josh the driver.

"Bear what—hey? Tell you what 'tis, youngster—a joke's a joke—but I am a leetle apt to be ryled, if anybody goes too far—what was that he called me, hey?" addressing himself to Josh.

Josh, whispered something to him in reply; and up he marched to the young collegian, who threw himself into a boxing attitude, and hunted to him to keep off, or the presence of the ladies should be no further protection for him!

Ethan stopped, just as he had put forth his mighty hand to clutch him by the shoulder, and stood staring at him, as a huge mastiff might be supposed to stare at a lap-dog, for showing his teeth behind a lady's pocket-handkerchief.

"I say though, mister—if it 'twant for the ladies now, I'd jest turn you inside out, in less than two snaps of a rattlesnake's tail—if there's anything I can't bear, it's bein' called names."

"Names!—who called you names?"

"Who called me names!—why you, to be sure—didn't he Josh! I names too that's agin the law for one gentleman to use to another—ain't it squire?"

"What names have I called you, hey?"

"Why you called me a traitor."

"A traitor!"

"Yes, and a puppy—didn't he Josh?"

Josh nodded, and the collegian stared, and so did we—but, as for Julia, who appeared greatly alarmed but a moment before, she burst out a laughing.

"No, no, Mr. Crawford—no, no, cousin George—it's all a mistake!" and then she laughed again, louder than before—"he called you the per-petrator—pronouncing it very slowly and emphatically, as you did—not puppy-traitor."

"Well, what's the difference, I should like to know!—I never learnt much o' grammar, ar' don't pretend to know much about pronoun-cases—hurray there! hurray! what are ye laughin' at, now?"

The laugh stopped—the misunderstanding was explained—the collegian got himself into a perpendicular once more—they shook hands together; and the overgrown mastiff left the room with a good-natured growl, just as the racket stopped overhead, and Miss Helen appeared at the door with the captured glove in her hand, saying, "the owner was found!"

All eyes were turned upon her; and I looked at the professor, to see how he would bear so complete a refutation of his theory; he must have understood me, for he shook his head, and smiled.

"So, then, Miss Farrier—it was your glove," said I.

"No, sir—but the lady is here."

"Not here!" rejoined the professor, taking a survey of the whole room, as he spoke so.

"Why no—not exactly here; but she has been here a good while, and is now in the next room."

"Would you have me to understand, Miss Farrier, that the owner of that glove has been here—in this very room—since we have been here. Allow me to say that I am sure she has not."

"Perhaps you know the lady, sir?"

"No, I do not; nor have I any reason to believe that I ever saw her in my life."

"Upon my word, sir—if what I have been told is true—if there is no joke in the story, I mean—it is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary coincidence—would you like to see the lady, sir, and judge for yourself?"

Before the professor could reply, up started Julia; and all the women rushed together, crying "yes! yes! by all means! we are dying to see her!"

"Hush! hush!—the lady has been greatly fatigued this afternoon, by a long ride on horseback; and if I can persuade her to come, you must pledge your faith, not to let her know that she has been the subject of our conversation. She has heard nothing of the story yet—she only knows that one glove has been picked up, and that the finder is here, waiting for his reward."

To this, we plighted our faith, bethinking ourselves to different parts of the room, and pretending to be very busy, when the door opened slowly and quietly, and Miss Farrier appeared, with a—what shall I say!—with an apparition at her elbow!—the living original of the portraiture, drawn by the professor!—the very spirit of the glove!

I was thunderstruck—Julia and Mr. George Dilworth Carey, appeared overwhelmed with amazement—and the professor himself, astonished, though he tried to conceal it. Wonderful!—even to the very shape! the stature! the large blue eyes, the abundant hair, of brown in the shadow, and gold in the sun!

Still apprehending there must be some trick, or collusion, or mistake, I went up to the lady, and begging to be presented, offered her the glove.

She took it, with a sweet smile, just as I heard her name, and saw Miss Farrier puzzled and trying to recollect mine.

"Shaw," whispered somebody at my back.

"Fiddle-de-dee! no such thing—the celebrated Mr. O'Fudge, ain't it, sir?" said Miss Julia. I bowed, and tried to laugh, just as the professor walked up, and was introduced to Miss Farnsworth. I saw in a moment they were strangers, perfect strangers. "Pray," said he, "will you permit me to ask you, Miss Farnsworth, how it happened that you lost both your gloves, and both so near together, yet on different parts of the road?"

The very question I was about to ask! but he did it with such a courtly air—with such a gentlemanly self-possession—that I felt no surprise at the readiness and gentleness of her reply.

"Why, sir, to tell you the truth," said she, colouring to the eyes, "we were on our return from the Notch to Littleton. Being on horseback, I had put on a pair of old gloves, which did very well at the time; but my brother having intimated to me that we should probably have to stop here to escape the shower, I began looking for these, which I had put into the pocket of my saddle, when we started. One was not to be found—yet, I had seen it, on pulling out my handkerchief, just before we entered the Notch—and so, and so—I declare I am half-ashamed to acknowledge the truth."

"Never mind, Harriet; you see now, if you'd taken my advice, you'd 'a' been the mistress of both gloves now," said a young man at the window, who had entered the room with her. It was evidently the brother, she had mentioned.

"It might be silly, Edward—but I am not quite sure that I shouldn't do the very same thing again under similar circumstances."

"Oh, I dare say! that's just like you, Harriet!"

"And pray," said I, "what was the reason?"

"Why, sir, the glove was no longer of any use to me—not would the one I had lost be of any use to the finder: so, looking about me, I found a good place to drop it, where it could not fail to be seen—hoping, the same person who found the first, might be lucky enough to find the other."—I saw a smile settling about the professor's mouth here.

"One question more, if you please—I wish to satisfy two or three unbelievers, who are not far off," said I.

"Unbelievers!"

The professor interfered, greatly to my relief, and explained, by saying, "will you permit us to ask you, Miss Farnsworth, if you mended that glove yourself? and whether, looking earnestly into her eyes, whether you are in the habit of wearing always the same colour, and of buying more than one pair at a time?"

"Why, sir—colouring and smiling—your questions are odd enough perhaps, to justify a refusal, but"—her brother joined us here, as if anxious to know what all this meant—"but, they shall be answered. Yes, I did mend that glove myself"—the professor nodded at me—"but I do not always wear the same colour, nor do I often buy more than one pair at a time." I nodded to the professor, and Julia turned away with a disappointed look, and the collegian drew a very long breath. But the professor himself did not appear at all disconcerted—not even when the mother interrupted us, by saying, that she "never heard of anybody so foolish, as to lay in more than one pair o' gloves at a time."

"Law, ma!" said Julia.

"Not if she hadn't more'n one pair o' hands," added Ethan; looking over my shoulder.

"But," continued Miss Farnsworth, "I always do wear gloves as near that colour as I can get them; and, so does my sister, and we always buy them together!"

"Enough!" said the professor—"enough! and now, ladies and gentlemen, I hope you are satisfied!" and off he marched to the window.

"Why, the man is a witch, I declare," said Julia. "Upon my word, mother, I shouldn't feel safe to sleep under the same roof with him!—goodly gracious!—look! look! what's that!"

All eyes were turned toward him, and then by Jupiter! you never heard such a screaming in all your very life! nor ever such a scampering! There sat Julia, terror-struck, speechless, and motionless! and there sat the professor, looking at her, with a little green snake, showing its wicked eyes, just over his velvet collar, and among his hair!

In less than half a minute, there wasn't such a thing as a woman to be seen or heard of in all the lower part of the house!

Confoundedly vexed at the man's thoughtlessness, I left the room also, and went up stairs to my chamber, and had been there at least an hour, I should think, watching the new moon at the window, driving her chariot of pearl over the mountain top, and—

"Aftward the starry wilderness of heaven!"

watching and wondering at the difference between her pale passionless fire, and that of the overshadowed sky, when the long mothered glories of the storm broke forth, and the waters flashed—

"Like sheets of fire, in their descent
Through midnight's parting firmament!"

I had forgotten where I was, and what I was, when a tap at my door, startled me, broad awake. On opening it, I found Mr. Fitch there, so agitated, he could hardly speak. "Pray, sir," said he, "are you a doctor?" "No, sir—but step in, if you please, and tell me what's the matter."

"Poor Julia!—haven't you heard her scream?—the poor child 'll go distracted, if something ain't done for her—what can be done, sir?—do tell me—there! there!—didn't you hear that, sir?"

I thought I did hear a far-off a strange sort of a cry—but was not quite sure, and begged him to be calm—proposing to call up the professor.

"Hang the professor! the fellow's bewitched her, I believe—she can talk of nothin' else but him, and see nothin' else, but the bear and the snake—the dirty beast!"

"Nevertheless, my dear, sir—nevertheless, I am satisfied, that he is the only creature about us worth consulting; and you'd better let me call him up."

"Mr. Fitch! Mr. Fitch! where are you?" cried the wife.

"Here, my love!" answered Mr. Fitch, who hurried away on tip-toe, signing to me not to betray him. The doors being open now, I heard a scream, that thrilled through and through me—people were hurrying to and fro all over the house—and while I was trying to find the professor's room, he joined me at the top of the stairs.

"What's all this uproar?" said he—"is the house afire?"

I told him what the matter was, and asked him if he was a physician. "No sir," was the reply—"not by profession—that is, I am not a regular practitioner; but if you will do me the favour to see the father and mother of that poor child—how could I be so forgetful!—I don't wonder the poor thing was half-frightened to death. I never shall forgive myself!"—for the first time he showed a little emotion—"but go to the father and mother, I entreat you, and say to them, that if they will permit me to be with her, for half an hour at furthest, I will undertake to relieve the sufferer. There, there!—go—go—and I will be ready for you in three minutes."

I went, and after a short consultation together, it was agreed that he should be permitted to see her. Julia was lifted up in the bed—supported by pillows—and sustained by her mother. It was evident that her head was disturbed—she was a little wandering, at times—and I withdrew to the furthest part of the room, though requested by the mother not to leave her.

The professor entered softly—made a motion to have the lights removed further off—went up to the bed—breathed upon his hands—looked at her a moment, and I saw her tremble, though her eyes were shut—seated himself on the side of the bed—took both of her hands into his—I thought I saw a shudder pass over her pale, beautiful face, at the touch—placing his two thumbs, so that the balls touched hers; held them in that position for five minutes or so; then withdrew them, to my unspeakable relief I admit, for I watched every motion, with intense anxiety, and was really alarmed at the expression of her face, when he touched her. Having done this, he placed the tips of his fingers upon her forehead, all the fingers of both hands, as if setting so many seals there; and having remained motionless and breathless for a minute or two, drew them away slowly and gracefully—ay, gracefully!—and without touching her, except once or twice upon her shoulders, and then followed the outline of her body, down to the very extremity of her feet, always, however, at a distance of three or four inches from the bed-clothes. This he continued, till I saw the countenance of the poor sufferer change; and, after a few minutes, the colour came to her lips, and she breathed more freely. The father looked at me, as if hardly knowing what to think; and the mother never took her eyes off the fingers of the operator; and as for myself, I hardly know what I thought, or believed, or saw, till poor Julia opened her eyes, and smiling faintly, though she saw the professor, shut them again, declaring as she did so, that she was very sleepy; upon which the professor, signified to the parents, that she might be indulged, and making a sign to me, to follow, crept out of the room as he had crept in, without being heard.

I followed—but not to sleep, and as I shut my door, I heard the following conversation, which appeared to be carried on just below, and within half-a-dozen feet of me:

"Why that are Injun's no more to be compared to him, I tell you, than a toad wants a tail—every bit an' grain, as the nigger said."

"What Injun are you talkin' about?"

"Why that are feller that met old Major Nye in the woods once, an' axed him if he'd seen a leete, old, lame, white man, with a long gun, an' a dog with a bob-tail: an' when the major said yes, an' axed him what 's to pay, the Injun up an' told him, how 't somebody 'd ben a stalin his venison. 'Did you see him?' says the major, says he. 'No,' says the Injun. 'How was you able to describe him then, as you did, hey?' 'Why,' says the Injun, 'I knowed he was leete, 'cause he couldn't reach the venison, without rolling up a stone to stand on—I knowed he was old, 'cause his tracks wasn't reg'lar—I knowed he was lame, 'cause he always stepped short with one foot—I knowed he was a white man, 'cause he turned up his toes—I knowed his gun was long, 'cause he rested it agin a tree, and scratched the bark a leete—and I knowed the dog had a bob-tail, 'cause he squat down in the dust.'"

"Well, if that don't beat all nater, Josh! do you believe it, hey?"

"Believe it! why that aint nothin' to what this chap can do—I tell you what I seed myself, and what I see, I know—he jest looked into a woman's glove then, an' he up an' told what her name was—where she lived—how old she was—how much she was worth—and how many children she was goin' to have—read it right off to her like a book—an' when they came to ask her, she said, 'twas all true."

"What do ye think o' that?"

"Think o' that—I think she ought to ben ashamed of herself."

"Haw, haw, haw! That 's jes like you, wife!"

"Well now, it's my opinion, that you are ben made a fool of, Josh. Don't you remember the story we had in last year's almanack?"

"What story?"

"About a doctor that went to sees sick man. 'Open your mouth,' says he—'let's see your tongue—what are you ben eatin' of?' 'Nothin', says the man. 'Nothin!' don't tell me—you're ben eatin' oysters.' And sure enough—so he had. And when he got home, the young chap that steddied with him, axed him how he knew he'd ben eatin' oysters, 'why,' says he, 'you fool you! didn't I see the shells under the bed?' Now, that's my way of accountin' for what this chap's done—he knows the gal, as well as you do."

"And better too, I hope," said the husband.

"Ah! but you're forgotten the best part o' the story," said another voice—(I would take my bible oath, 'twas the professor's.) "The young chap that steddied with the doctor, went round next day to see the patient himself. 'Open your mouth,' says he: 'let's see your tongue!—What are you ben eatin' of to-day?' 'Nothin', says the man. 'Nothin!' don't tell me! you've ben eatin' a boss! 'A boss? 'To be sure you have; don't I see the saddle an' bridle under the bed!'"

A short hurried whispering followed this, and I heard a woman's voice vowing she wouldn't sleep under that roof another night while he was there, for all the world. "To tell you the truth, Josh, I believe that are gal there that he's ben bewitchin', (I heard her father say so,) I believe she's morn half-right—in what she said about him."

"And who does she say he is?"

"The wandering Jew!" answered the voice of the professor close at her elbow.

"Waugh!" screamed the woman; "waugh, waugh, waugh! let's be off, Josh!"

Not being able to sleep, I lay awake wondering half the night if the mysterious operation I had been a witness to, where pain had literally been rebuked in my very presence, and great suffering relieved by a touch, was not, in fact, a case of animal magnetism; and if so, who was the extraordinary man! and what was he! and how had he managed to overcome the loathing and abhorrence of that beautiful child after having so frightened and shocked her! Was it sympathy? was it a strange and awful power vouchsafed to the few and the faithful! or was it only an effect of the imagination! What I saw I believe—account for it as I may. And therefore, * * * when I awoke, as I did, very early, having determined to proceed forthwith to Lytleton, and go down by the Connecticut river, through the most beautiful parts of New-Hampshire, the first thing I saw on looking out of my window, was poor Julia and the professor whispering together at the door! It was very strange! and before I had recovered from my surprise, I saw him stoop down and kiss her forehead, put a paper into her hands, not unlike those I had seen stuffed away in her bonnet the day before, and vanish. I held my breath for a moment and then began rubbing my eyes. At this instant she looked up, and just as if nothing unusual had happened, call out—"Ah, George, is that you! Good morning to you, and good morning to you, Mr. O'Fudge!" I haven't another word to say. The clearest case of animal magnetism, was it not?

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

THE ATELIER OF DANTAN.

From a Parisian Journal.

MORE than once, doubtless, on one of those tiresome days when the whole of Paris is enveloped in a thick fog, which pitilessly forbids entrance to the feeblest ray of the sun—more than once, rendered melancholy by the dullness of the sky, and loathing alike labour and pleasure, you have thrown far from you the book, whose pages you have no longer the force to turn, or the pen that burdened your fingers; after which, to avoid the spleen which began to crash your heart between its leaden hands, you have plunged into the midst of the streets of Paris, that the noise and uproar might stupify you, and distract your reflection from your disease, the saddest of all—ennui. But unluckily, on these foggy days, the streets of Paris present distraction but slightly agreeable. Elbowed by the crowd, blinded by the umbrellas, and splashed by the cabriolets, the poor lonelier's only resource is the passages—and yet hardly do the passages offer even a slight attraction, unless you happen to be a determined smoker; for in the year of grace and tobacco, 1837, some time elapses before you can recognise yourself in the midst of this cloudy atmosphere formed by the cigars. Happy are you should your steps have guided you towards the passage Choiseul, or passage des Panoramas; for, when you have at length pierced the curious group who are constantly stationed before the windows of Sasse's shop or Jeanne's, when you have at last acquired a little room among the ranks of the loungers, spleen, rain and tobacco combined, soon disappear from your memory! At the sight of all these little plaster puppets who grin before you in every manner—at the view of this grotesque museum—you at first begin to smile, then as your memory gradually recalls the names of these personages, your grin augments, and when you at last discover the head of a friend who presents himself to you in such a ludicrous manner, with his pale visage behind the panes of the shopman, you burst into a fit of laughter, without fear of losing your reputation for sanity, for none of the bystanders are more seriously inclined. Is there that person, even the most splendid Englishman of the three kingdoms, who has not found his brow unwrinkle when regarding the casts of Dantan? The appearance of a new caricature by Dantan causes a real revolution in the passage des Panoramas, and on that day, provided you are on an affair of importance, it will be more expedient to take the rue Neuve Verraine or rue Montmartre than to endeavour to force a passage through the curious who block up the entrance to Sasse's shop.

Moreover, Dantan is at present the sole provider of the Parisian loungers. The display of the lithograph sellers consists of drawings discoloured by time. Ballang's sharpen no longer his lively crayon, Granville is becoming idle; those old troopers of Charlet that were wont to be so agreeable, speak no more. The caricature is dead, it has been buried with poor Mayeux, of jovial memory.

The name of Dantan has become, in the space of a few months, as popular as that of Charlet, the Béranger of lithography. The casts of Dantan are the delight of all Paris. There is not a single person who has not stopped, at least once, before those figures so full of buffoonery; and when you have had one look, you are not satisfied with the twentieth.

The broker who sets out from the Bourse, the little clerk who retakes the path to his office, the actor who is coming from rehearsal—all, in fine, station themselves before this museum of grotesque figures, and more than one rendezvous has been let slip because you had the imprudence to take the passage des Panoramas, and the still greater imprudence of stopping there a single moment. No matter at what hour of the day or evening, one is sure to find an assemblage of Cockneys (swindellige, Parisian), before the casts of Dantan. From the moment that the milkwomen arrive with their white merchandise, so that when the keeper of the passage comes to extinguish the gas burners, and makes the grate creak on its hinges, the shop of Sasse is besieged by the curious in triple ranks. In this group one is always sure to find some benevolent interpreter who explains the riddles engraved on the base of the little busts, and who names the personages to the provincials who take Arnal for Rossini and Lepointre for Horace Vernet. While the spectators give all their attention, and open their eyes without taking care to close their pockets, the indus rious, who operate in the handkerchief or snuffbox line, select their victims, and pluck the ducks without making them quack. Godly, the inspector of police, is also a great amateur of the busts of Dantan; he comes to view them many hours every day, and rarely returns to the prefecture unaccompanied by one of those curious gentlemen who have such a strong desire to acquaint themselves with the contents of their neighbour's pockets.

It is inconceivable how many complaints at the chamber of correctional police commence in these words: "As I was looking at Dantan's caricatures this gentleman here stole my purse." They ought to establish a line of omnibuses between the passage des Panoramas and the Palais de Justice, for these two points of Paris are in constant relation. Dantan is, unwittingly, the accomplice of the greater part of the Parisian thieves, and should they at any time steal his purse, he may well complain of so black an ingratitude.

If a few little statues placed behind the shop-keeper's window are sufficient to excite the hilarity of the public—judge what would be the effect of the view of Dantan's atelier, that is, a hall in which all these grotesque figures have given each other rendezvous, a hall which is the congress general of all the most comick heads that the spirit of Callot himself could ever have conceived. If you desire it, I will introduce you into Dantan's atelier, and you shall pass in review, before you, the curious society that partake his dwelling. The tenants are numerous, but live without difficulty, and have but one defect, that of being rather frail; but we must not expect too much from great men in plaster.

In the upper part of the Faubourg Montmartre, there exists an imitation of those constructions, that adorn the most elegant quarters of the principal cities of England; several houses built with luxury, decorated with taste, surround a kind of place with trees and different ornaments in the middle. The name of the little isolated quarter, if one can so call it, situated as it is in the midst of houses that surround it on all sides—is the cité d'Orléans.

This charming abode of the Faubourg Montmartre yields in no respect, as to elegance, to the most celebrated squares of London. The cité d'Orléans, whose tranquillity is troubled by nothing except the murmuring of a little jet d'eau, as it suffers its drops to fall sparkling in the sun, seems as if there were the oasis of the desert thrown into the midst of the noisy streets of Paris. The cité d'Orléans is inhabited by two very dissimilar aristocracies; by the aristocracy of wealth, and that of talent; by the millionaire and by the artist. The first has fled there that he may sleep in peace, and the second that he may watch in silence.

It is in the cité d'Orléans that Dantan has established that sprightly atelier, which every week beholds the production of one of those busts that all Paris welcomes with a burst of laughter. Behold us at number six; let us take this little staircase, mount a few steps, and stop at the second floor, for here, on our right, is Dantan's atelier.

We have rung, it is needless to name to you this young man who appears before us in his artist's costume; in a very plain dressing-gown, with the indispensable Greek cap, short, thin, pale, and slightly marked with the smallpox, you have immediately recognised Dantan, who has placed himself among the first in his grotesque gallery, and who has modelled himself in plaster, preserving an astonishing resemblance, yet with a singular exaggeration of the defects of his countenance. Dantan, who caricatures all his friends, has set the example of stoicism, in executing himself with the best possible grace; his bust is even modelled in different sizes, and, but a short time ago, he allowed his face to be used for those little toys that serve for pin cushions.

Let us begin our visit with the workshop. A little clay and a morsel of wood constitute the entire apparatus of Dantan's atelier. All the faces in the world, yours as well as the others, are enclosed in this little ball of clay; in an instant, with the aid of a few touches of his wand, the Prometheus of the caricature causes a human figure to issue from this shapeless clay, and what a figure! Jupiter could never have had the courage to fix Dantan on a rock. That monarch of the gods, usually in such ill humour, would have felt his dark eyebrow unwrinkle on beholding the work of the sculptor; the dwellers in Olympus, who were in truth very dull courtiers, would have shaken with unextinguishable laughter; and Aphrodite, of mirthful memory, would have requested Dantan to undertake the execution of her beloved spouse Vulcan, adorned with his peculiar attributes.

Besides his workshop, whose walls are decorated with all the objects of art that are usually met with in the ateliers of painters and sculptors, Dantan possesses a large hall, which truly deserves the name of museum of grotesque figures. It is there that are assembled all the products of the artist's capricious and wanton imagination. Fancy a hall entirely garnished with all the works that have been produced by Dantan for the last six years. Before you, on right and left, appear the grimacing faces of all those who have a name either in literature or the arts; and as the shelves by which the atelier is surrounded have no more room for the new-comers, a table has been placed in the middle of the apartment, and this table is already invaded by a new army of grotesque figures. It would require another Homer to enumerate the battalions, who, ranged in three ranks, completely surround the hall, and seem as numerous as the soldiers of the haughty Agamemnon. In the fantastical assemblage in which these various heads are united, you discover a peer of England by the side of Alcide Tousez; the fiery Daniel O'Connell displays his fist to Frederick Robert Macaire, who regards him with a stoical air, coolly leaning upon his cane; and the singer, Martin, whose head issues from a bearskin, dances to the harmony of Figaro Leblanche, who can hardly reach his mandoline, such an obstacle does his tumulous abdomen present!

Nothing can be more amusing than to see Danton take his interpreter's wand to indicate to us the different personages who compose his Salon de Carthus. This forest of hair, which falls wavering before to the floor, and which hardly allows you to perceive the pianist, to whom the musician is seated, represents a celebrated pianist. It is unnecessary to name to you this bug who wears the cross of honour, and who struggles in a lamp; you have recognized the celebrated prefect who, in his youth, played such capital tricks on the Parisian grocers, and who, as a sign of divine punishment, was afterwards devoured by bugs. By the side of the prefect is Tutu le Talochneur, who appears to us under the guise of Achard of the Palais Royal, and Passeron the composer; this one seems to have been weeping to obtain a nose, his own not being perceptible to the naked eye, while that, on the other side, has been gratified by the Creator and Danton, with a mouth which permits him to bite both his ears at once; this gentleman, who opens his stomach so courageously, is the doctor who has lately invented a new process for embalming the body, and, as you perceive, is making the first essay upon himself; here are the two celebrated rivals of the contre danse, Musard, decorated with his grotesque hat; and Julien, perched upon a heap of bells and cannons. M. Comte has been conjuring himself, and his head appears to us out of the goblet. These Siamese twins are the directors of the théâtre Italien. There is a celebrated restaurateur, who has placed himself in a sauceman, and is cooking himself together with turnips and carrots; and at last, in this enormous stomach, supported by diminutive legs, and crowned with that large face, you have recognized the inseparable companion of Arnel, the fat Lepentier jeune, the papa Damoche, who presents us with his civilities!

As to the rest, you may judge of the variety of Danton's collection, when you reflect that for the last six years, no fortnight has elapsed without a new original coming to place himself among his colleagues, who would laughingly shout him welcome, were they not of plaster.

It was towards the close of the year 1830 that Danton commenced his sprightly career. He was already among our most distinguished young sculptors, when the whim seized him of making the caricature of the painter Lépaule, so often ridiculed by his comrades on account of his short stature and enormous mustaches. The frizzled head of Lépaule was joined to the body of a little mouse, and you are aware what a singular figure this coalition has produced. The cast had the greatest success, and a few days after, in the saloons of the Duchesse D'O—, Danton was requested to undertake that of Cicero, two hundred copies of which were subscribed for in advance by those present. A week had not elapsed before the long visage of Cicero, supported by a brush, made its appearance greeted by a tremendous shout of laughter. From that day, fifty artists requested Danton to execute them, and in a short time Lesse's windows were garnished with all these droll faces, with whom you are acquainted. At this time, Danton could not refrain from executing in plaster the profile of Bouguier, which for some months was traced on all the walls of Paris. Thanks to Danton, Bouguier's nose was known even in Italy; the artist was then in company with other artists making an excursion to Rome, and whenever any stragglers remained behind, Danton traced the face of Bouguier on the monuments of all the cities that he had traversed, in order to indicate to them the road to be taken to rejoin the main party. By the aid of this indication, those in retard recognized the road taken by their friends, and Bouguier served as a guide-post the whole of the route from Paris to Rome.

No numerous at present is Danton's collection, that the shortest method would be to name those that are not, than those who are included in it. And yet it is necessary to mention, in order that Danton's character be well understood, that he never has made the caricature of any person to whom it would have afforded pain, and above all, never has he felt inclined to humour the passions of the day by caricaturing political personages, who might physically afford opportunity, but whose character and position should shield them from the pleasantries of the atelier.

This discretion is the more laudable in Danton, as his caricatures would not fail to be highly profitable to him, for he has proved in his voyage to England, that he is as capable of executing political men as artists. Several members of the Houses of Lords and Commons have been produced by him in the most original manner, and, perhaps, the most remarkable casts in the whole of his gallery.

Danton is well aware of the chagrin that may be afterwards experienced by those who are thus caricatured, that it is frequently with great reluctance that he yields to the demands made upon him. He refused the repeated solicitations of M. Veron, ex-director of the Opera, unless he would authorize him in writing. The first once completed, that which Danton foresaw occurred; the director repented his request, and desired that he might not be exposed behind the panes of Saras. The cunning Danton had wonderfully fulfilled the request of the demander, and, although nothing appeared but a cravat surmounted by a hat, every one recognized M. Veron.

It is especially towards the female artists that Danton displays the greatest gallantry, and the fear of their future regret causes his resistance to all their solicitations. But once only, and after many months besieging, he yielded and made the bust of a celebrated cantatrice; but, even in this instance, it was plain that Danton yielded with great regret, and he disfigured as slightly as possible the charming features of Madame Malibran. And when the sad news from Manchester announced to Paris the loss suffered by the arts, on that day, Danton, for perhaps the first time in his life, entered his atelier without reciprocating the smile of all these casts, and then, having with great difficulty found the bust he sought, so full of tears were his eyes, having at last discerned it, he shivered it as his feet. Afterwards, to replace the cast in which the charming features graced, he chiselled a marble bust which revived the beautiful and melancholy features of Madame Malibran, a bust which deserves a place above her tomb.

Danton, whose caricatures have rendered him so quickly celebrated, would undoubtedly have become so by his more serious works. A large number of busts in marble, of great merit and well appreciated, have already issued from his atelier. The exhibitions of the Louvre have frequently borne testimony to the genius of Danton, and given him an enviable rank among the most distinguished of our young sculptors.

VARIETIES.

A CHAPTER ON EYES, LIPS, CHEEKS, ETC.—Lips are delicious things, certainly—says an English writer—blessings of many agreeable concomitants, such as smiles, sweet words, and those never-to-be-sufficiently-appreciated intensities denominated kisses. They are emotion's dwelling-place, and passion's; their breathing gives vitality to affections of all sorts, a friend's, a parent's, a sister's, a brother's, a lover's, a mistress's. Eternal praise to lips, therefore, to lips in general, and especially to the couple we hold dearest! Cheeks are equally divine—be they the unsophisticated ruddy ones of the early-walking milkmaid, or the more soft and sweeter-hued cheeks of one of Beauty's more fanciful hand-maidens. Excessively to be wished-to-be-kissed are cheeks. Chins, which lovers in novels, by the way, very seldom appear to think about, chins are beautiful things, and generally have more expression in them than we are inclined to give them credit for possessing. If our readers are inclined to differ with us, we beg them to remember Lady —'s chin, with the dimple on one side of it—that warm little cradle in which Cupid seems smiling and reposing, or frolicking in all the merriment of his little godship's quicksilver fancy. It is a very curious thing, we beg leave to observe, that chins are the only things which Love pinches. Cheeks, lips, foreheads, and eyes, Love kisses—but, if he takes a fancy to a chin, it is very remarkable that he evinces his regard for it by taking it between his fingers, pinching it, and thus shaking it up and down. This, however, is strictly disreputable. Foreheads are glorious things—Intellect's tilepales. Written on them are the name and nature of the human being which lie within them. They are, of themselves, most beautiful, in form god-like. Of noses it is impossible to speak so definitely, seeing that they differ. The word nose, indeed, conjures up no abstract image. What nose, is the mind's instant inquiry. Aquiline? Snub? Roman? Heavens, what a host of names! Large, or small European Cupid appears to hold a nose in very little estimation; entertaining the opinion, as he perhaps does, that it was only given us to make up the face—just as an artist, when he perceives that his design wants something or another, and yet cannot definitely decide what it is—he puts a temple or a large tree in the middle of it to make up the picture. Teeth, especially when the lips that cover them often smile, are beautiful things—and ears, most especially when it is not denied us to whisper into them, are meritorious; but, reader, are not eyes the finest things Nature ever devised. Eyes! we believe everybody knows and feels that they are so. They are the only things which always talk to us. Lips are often silent, but among other agreeable characteristics, are perpetually social. Neither is their companionship with us to be impeded with facility. The most watchful of petite comédie guardians or fathers cannot disturb the ocular communion but by the most unjustifiable means. There we sat, at the theatre the other night, in the dress circle, O. P. with the Lady C. D. on the P. S.—the whole pit was between us, we were in the company of some thousands, and yet, by the assistance of our opera-glasses, notwithstanding she was supported by her father and mother, we managed to carry on as pretty and pleasant conversation, as though we were within half a yard of each other. If all tutors had as much command over their pupils as lovers have, what a learned and worthy nation we should be. The latter, however, as never from under the lash, which, perhaps, accounts for their obedience. And so with this piece of wilful jocularity let us end this most brief ebullition of innocent volatility.

CONTENTMENT.—In Vienna, a magnificent house was built by a nobleman, on the front of which is a stone with this inscription:—"This house was erected by Count D. to be given to the first man who can prove that he is really contented." One day a stranger knocked at the gate, and desired to speak with the master. "I am come," said he, to take possession of this house, as I find you have built it in order to bestow it upon the man who is really contented. Now, I am in that state, of which I am willing to make oath; you will, therefore please, sir, to give me immediate possession." The count did not interrupt him till he had finished his speech, when he replied, "You are quite right, sir, with respect to my intentions; but, as I do not discover the least pretension you have to the character of a contented man, I beg you will retire. If you were quite contented, you would not want my house!"

FRENCH AND ENGLISH TRAVELLING.—A recent French writer, describing the state of travelling in France and in England, says:—"In France the postillions are frequently drunk, always dirty, and the most coarse intractable people in the world. In England the contrast is most striking: both men and cattle are always well dressed; the drivers with white cravats, good rockets, and well-napped great-coats; their horses harnessed as if for some grand ceremony. In France, a postillion takes care, first of his own safety, and then that of his horses: to him the safety of the traveller is a matter of supererogation. In England the traveller commands the driver, in France he obeys him."

OVER-ATTENTION FOR ANIMALS.—The attachment of some French ladies to their lap-dogs amounts, in some instances, to infatuation. I have heard of a lap-dog biting a piece out of a male visitor's leg; her mistress thus expressed her compassion—"Poor little dear creature! I hope it will not make him sick!"

RETORT.—A known coward boasted of a wound he had received in front. One present observed, "You were more fortunate than Lot's wife; she was killed for looking behind her, when she fled!"

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

A CORRESPONDENT writes us:—"The following lines were written as a penance for admiring too much the beautiful stanzas commencing, 'Pour not the voice of grief,' by Robert Morris, published some time since in the New-York Mirror."

STANZAS.

When sadness wakes the chords
Oblivion soothed to rest,
When hopeless thoughts and bitter words
Content within the breast,
And lips desponding say,
"Would we had died when young!"
The trusted god, the worship'd clay,
"Ere left us!" Spirit stung,
We prove as plain as murmuring may,
A broken reed has been our stay!"

An envied lot is theirs,
The early called away—
Bright scraps, freed from pain and cares,
"Ere sin had wrought decay."

But do we well to pine,
Because we linger on?
Oh teach us, Source of light divine!
To say, "Thy will be done!"
When years and griefs around us cling,
Thy power disarms the tyrant's sting!
Oh train the rified flower!
Its petals are of gold!
Through ceaseless time, with brightening power,
Its beauties will unfold.
What gain we if we prove,
The truth of that sad thought,
That youth and joy and hope and love,
Earth's glories! all are naught!
If man seek not his heavenly goal,
The blissful haven of the soul!

Time holds his blighting way
O'er all the things of earth!
Bright visions which we frame to-day
Have faded in their birth!
Yet shed no fruitless tears,
But on, sad spirit, on!
Unfading joy, through endless years,
By living faith is won!
Oh! wake no more the withering strain,
That tells us life and hope are vain!

ELLIS.

TASTE NOT CONFINED TO THE WEALTHY.

Taste, if it mean anything but a paltry connoisseurship, must mean a general susceptibility to truth and nobleness; a sense to discern, and a love to love and reverence all beauty, order, and goodness, wheresoever or in whatsoever forms or accompaniments they are to be seen. This surely implies, as its chief condition, not any given external rank or situation, but a finely-gifted mind, purified into harmony with itself, into keenness and justness of vision; above all, kindled into love and generous admiration. Is culture of this sort found exclusively among the higher ranks? We believe it proceeds less from without than within, in every rank. The charms of nature, the majesty of man, the infinite loveliness of truth and virtue, are not hidden from the eyes of the poor; but from the eye of the vain, the corrupted, the self-seeking, be poor or rich. In old ages, the humble minstrel, a mendicant, and lord of nothing but his harp and his own free soul, had animations of these glories; while to the proud baron in his barbaric halls they were unknown.

THE FOUNDERS OF SCHOOLS AND THEIR FOLLOWERS.

If we go on to review the many volumes which have been, as Southey expresses it, "cast upon the waters," we shall find that, with a very few exceptions, the founders of an original style only have lived. The "Imitatorum servum precus" have either leaked and festered after a time, or else have been so crumb and top-heavy, that they capsize before they were well launched. There is Milton sailing about like a gorgeous Spanish galleon, deep in the water, and leaving a luminous track as he ploughs the waves of oblivion, which vainly ripples about his huge sides. What English blank-verse epic of those that have followed in his wake, is now sea-worthy? There is Butler, like a contraband cutter, dashing dashing over the billows; there is Prior, an elegant yacht; and Dryden, a very fine ship; and Young, like Rowland Hill's floating Methodist-Chapel. As for Snakespeare, to whom can we compare him but to the celebrated "Vanderdecken, the Flying Dutchman," who sails when he pleases miraculously against the wind! Now these names are all founders of schools, of which their country had not before seen their like; in fact, sufficient in itself to unsettle one's notions of the mechanical nature of poetry.

ENVY.

Envy is a displeasure for some supposed advantage in another. The object of this passion is something more desirable; and although excellently, precisely considered, cannot occasion dislike, yet excellency misplaced may. The envious believes himself eclipsed by the lustre of his neighbour; that which is good in itself becomes an evil to him, and makes him wish it either removed or extinguished. Envy, like a cold poison, benumbs and stupefies; and thus, as if conscious of its own impotence, it folds its arms in despair, and sits cursing in a corner. When it conquers, it is commonly in the dark, by treachery and undermining, by calumny and detraction. Envy is no less foolish than detestable; it is a vice which they say keeps no holiday, but is always working upon its own disgust.

CONSTANCY.

The constant man looks up to heaven in full hope, even when it is darkened; as flowers, that open with the sun, close not, though he be hid by clouds.

EXTRACTS FROM ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPTS.

DING FOR HIM.

FOURTH NOTICE OF N. P. WILLIS'S COMEDY.

The following is the last part of the first scene in the fourth Act. Lords and others are assembled to witness the marriage of Tortosa with the noble daughter of Count Falcone. Enter Tortosa.

Tortosa. Good-day, my lords!

First Lord. We're happy, sir, to have you one of us.

Second Lord. Good-day! The sun smiles on you, signor! 'Tis a happy omen, they say, to wed in sunshine.

Tortosa. Why, I think the sun's not displeased that I should wed.

First Lord. What have I been till now? I was a man before I saw your faces. Where's the change?

Tortosa. Have I a tail since? Am I grown a monkey?

(Lords whisper together and walk from him.)

On for a mint to coin the world again, And melt the mark of gentlemen from clowns.

It puts me out of patience. Here's a fellow, That by much rubbing against better men,

Has, like a penny in a Jew's close pocket, Stolen the colour of a worthier coin.

And thinks he rings like sterling currency! Yet look! He cannot phrase you a good-morrow,

Or say he's sad or glad at anything But close beneath it, rank as verdigris,

Lies an insulting readiness! He was 'happy' That I should now be one of them. Now!—now!—

As if, till now, I'd been a dunghill grub, And was but just turned butterfly!

(A lady advances to him.)

Lady. Fair sir! I must take leave to say, were you my brother,

You've made the choice that would have pleased me best. Your bride's as good as fair!

Tortosa. I thank you, madam! To be your friend, she should be "good and fair."

(Lady bows and passes on.)

How like a drop of oil upon the sea Falls the apt word of woman! So! her "brother!"

Why, there could be no continuity there! I might, for all I look, have been her brother, Else her first thought had never coupled us! I'll pluck some self-contentment out of that!

The assembled guests are thrown into consternation with the sudden intelligence that the bride is dead. The bearer of the news relates the particulars, and states that the monk who was to have married them, is preparing to bear her, in her bridal dress, to lie in state in the Falcone chapel. The guests prepare to go to the chapel, when Tortosa confronts them at the door.

Tortosa. Hold!

Let no one try to pass!

First Lord. What mean you, sir?

Tortosa. To keep you here till you have got your story Pat to the tongue—the truth on't, and no more!

Lady. Have you a doubt the bride is dead, good signor!

Tortosa. A palace, see you, has a tricky air!

When I am told a tradesman's daughter's dead,

I know the coffin holds an honest corpse,

Sped in sad earnest, to eternity!

But were I stranger in the streets to-day,

And heard that an ambitious usurer,

With lands and money having bought a lady,

High-born and free, she died before the bridal,

I would lay odds with him that told me of it,

She'd rise again—before the resurrection!

So stand back all! If I'm to fill to-day

The pricking ears of Florence with a lie,

The bridal guests shall tell the tale so truly,

And mournfully, from eyesight of the corpse,

That e'en the slowest listener shall believe,

And I myself have no misgiving of it.

Look where they come!

(Monk enters followed by bearers with the body, Count Falcone and others following. Tortosa advances.)

Tortosa. What's this you bear away!

Monk. Follow our steps, my son, but stay us not!

Tortosa. If thereon be the lady Isabella,

I ask to see her face before she pass!

Monk. Stand from the path, I say—it cannot be!

Tortosa. What right have you to take me for a stone?

See what you do! I stand, a bridegroom, here!

A minute since the joyous music playing

That promised me a fair and dashing bride.

The flow'rs are fragrant and the guests made welcome;

And while my heart beats at the op'ning door,

And eagerly I look to see her come—

There enters, in her stead, a cover'd corpse!

And when I ask to look upon her face—

One look—before my bride's gone for ever—

You find it in your hearts to say me nay!

Shame! Shame!

Count Falcone. (Sternly.) Lead on!

Tortosa. My lord, by covenant—

By contract writ and seal'd—by value tender'd—

By her own promise—nay, by all save taking,

This body's mine! I'll have it set down here,

And wait my pleasure! See it done, my lord!

Or I will, for you!

Monk. (To the bearers.) Set the body down!

Tortosa. Come hither all! Nay, father, look not black!

If o'er the azure tapers of this blade

There come no mist, when laid upon her lips,

I'll do a penance for interference.

And fill your sack with penitential gold!

Look well!

(He holds his sword blade to Isabella's lips, and after reaching it breathlessly for a moment, drops on his knee beside the bier.)

She's dead indeed! Lead on!

Without betraying too much of the plot, we may give part of a scene in the fifth act. Isabella, the morning after her supposed death, is in the house of her lover, the poor painter Angelo. Her portrait (during the painting of which they had become enamoured) nearly finished, stands on the easel, and he is near it with his pencil and palette.

Angelo. Hear me, sweet!

Isabella. No! I'll keep a holiday,

And waste the hours in love and idleness!

You shall not paint to-day, dear Angelo!

Angelo. But listen!

Isabella. No! I'm jealous of my picture—

For all you give to that, is stol'n from me!

I like not half a look, that turns away

Without an answer from the eyes it met!

I care not you should see my lips' bright colour,

Yet wait not for the breath that floats between!

Angelo. With listen!

Isabella. Listen! Yes, a thousand years!

But there's a pencil in those restless fingers

That you've a trick of touching to your lips,

And while you talk,—my hand would go as well!

And if it's the same tale you told before,

Of certain viles you forgot to keep,

Look deep into my eyes till it is done—

For like the children's lady-in-the-well,

I only hark because you're looking in!

Will you talk thus to me?

Angelo. Come, night, I will!

But close upon thy voice, sweet Isabella!

There sinks a boding whisper in mine ear

That tells of sudden parting. If 'tis false,

We shall have still a life-time for our love,

But if 'tis true, oh think, that in my picture,

Will lie the footprint of an angel gone!

Let me not make it clearer

Isabella. Now, by heaven!

I think thou lov'st the picture, and not me!

So different am I, that, did I think

To lose thee presently by death or parting,

For thy least look, or word, or slightest motion—

Nay—for so little breath as makes a sigh—

I would not take, to have it pass untraced,

The empire of a star!

Angelo, who while she was speaking, has made some rapid touches upon the canvass, dashes his pencil to the ground.

Angelo. My picture's finished!

Break, oh enchanted pencil! thou wilt never

On earth again, do miracle so fair!

On Isabella! as the dusky ore

Waits for the lightning's flash to turn to gold,

As the dull vapour waits for Hesperus,

Then falls in dew-drops and reflects a star,

So waited I that fire upon thy lips

To make my masterpiece complete in beauty!

Isabella. This is ambition where I looked for love!

The fancy flattering where the heart should murmur!

I think you have no heart!

Angelo. Your feet are on it!

The heart is ever lowly with the fortunes,

While the proud mind sits level with a king!

I gave you long ago both heart and soul!

But only one has dared to speak to you!

Yet, if astonishment will cure the dumb,

Give it a kiss.

Isabella. (Smiling.) Lo! where it speaks at last!

DOMESTICK CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

Smithville, Down East, in the state of Maine,
March last, 1899.

DEAR GENERAL MORRIS—I got your very perite letter last night. The same post brought it that brought your last Mirror, that had cousin Debby's letter in it. About cousin Debby's letter, where she hinges so hard against me in it, I shouldn't troubled you to take any notice on't, for I don't think she's worth a minding, hadn't it been for the very perite request in your letter to me, that I should write some more letters to you and let you print 'em in your Mirror. But I feel it my duty now to clear up my character to you a little in respect of truth and veracity, because some parts of Debby's letter seems to go almost head-foremost right against some parts of mine. So to set this matter to rights in short meter, general, I must say that cousin Debby, although she's in the main a very good sort of a gal, yet when anything nettles her considerable, she will stretch the stockin' a little, that's a fact. And that isn't her worst failin'; for a few years past she's been a good deal given to breaking up matches. So that the young folks, when they take a notion to have any courtin' gonn on, just about as lives die as to have Debby get hold on't, for they know she won't rest day or night till she's turn'd the whole business topsy-turvy, and poured all the fat in the fire.

But that's neither here nor there. I ain't agoin' to talk to you about Debby, nor no such nonsense, but come right down to matters of more importance, that you spoke about in your letter.

I was a good deal struck up to find that you and the New-York

folks didn't know any more about Smithville; and couldn't even tell what state it was in. It is a very noted place, and has been a good many years. It turned out more soldiers to go down to Portland in the last war, than any town of its size in the state. And didn't you never hear how high politix run in our town when Adams and Crawford was up for president, and I and Ichabod Smith was run for the legislature, and how we voted till ten o'clock at night, tie and tie, and no choice, and then had a knock down and put the candles out, and adjourned till next day! You must have heard about it, and had it in the papers there us, for it was all the talk about here for months. Not know anything about Smithville! Seems to me 'tain't possible. Why, we've been represented in the legislature ever since our state was separated from old Massachusetts. I've been there two winters myself; and though I say it myself, I suppose I held as good a rank as most any of 'em there, unless it was a few that was called leading members. I was appointed on the committee on accounts and on the committee on dividing towns, and the speaker used to most always stop and speak to me as he was going out of the house after we was adjourned. I can't see how it is possible that New-York shouldn't know a good deal about Smithville; more especially as it jines Downingville, and Downingville is known by everybody in New-York and all over the country. And moreover, Downingville is only a child, as it were, of Smithville; for they was both one town at first, and Smithville was the mother town, and Downingville was set off from Smithville in the year 1811, the year before the last war broke out. I don't mean this new war that's going on down here to the north-eastern boundary, but what's always been called the last war.

It seems strange that Downingville should be known more than Smithville—that the child should get ahead of the mother—though I know it seems to be a kind of a law of nature, that children should out-do their parents, and make more noise in the world than their parents ever did. I'm considerable ahead of what my father ever was; he never had a squire's commission, nor never was a representative to the legislature. And then here's our state of Maine—you know she's the daughter of old Massachusetts—well, she's getting up in the world faster than ever her mother did, and is running ahead of her like smoke. She's got so big she won't take an insult from the biggest nation in the world. If Great Britain plays her a little about cutting down some of her pine logs, by the gracious! she don't stop to ask no questions, but flies right in her face, tooth and nail, and tells Great Britain if she wants to fight, she's the boy for her. Now old Massachusetts never would be dared to done that in the world. She would a looked over her shoulder and hollered to Uncle Sam to come and help her, as hard as she could scream, before she would strike a blow. But somehow or other I believe children do have more spunk than their parents after all. Their dander seems to start quicker. There's my son John—you let anybody insult him or me or any of the family, and he's into 'em in a minute. A regiment wouldn't stop him. I should like to give you an account of some of his tantrums if I had time, although he isn't seventeen years old till the fifth of next May.

I was glad to find you and the New-York folks thought so much of my 'tother letter, and wants me to write again; though I feel a little kind of streaked about writin' letters for you to print in your Mirror along side of them are fine pieces that you have from men of great lurnin'. Though I don't know as I have any more to be ashamed of my lurnin', for all Debby hinges as though 'twasn't as good as hern. She may know more than I do about needle-work and grammar and these fine arts; but when you come down to the solid branches, such as ciphering, suing folks, doing town business, and working politix, she's no more than a baby to me. I can wind her round my finger in every one of 'em in two minutes.

You say you want me to tell you all about Smithville and Smithville folks, where our ancestors come from, and how long they've lived here, and how we've got along and built our town up and made such a smart place of it, and give you my views about matters and things in general. Now that, according to my notion, general, is pretty considerable of a broad question, especially the matters and things in general; for I find there is a good many things in this world; and I guess there's some that your New-Yorkers hain't thought of yet. But I'm kind of puzzled to know whereabouts I better begin. I don't know whether I better begin at the root of the matter and trace it all out in rotation, as grandmother does when she goes over the Smith tree, that Debby told you about in her letter, or whether I better begin at the top and so work down along, as they say the freemasons do when they build their chimblies. Sometimes I've a good mind to begin right in amongst the matters and things in general, which, I take it, means animal magnetism. But I see Mr. John Neal is writing for you on that subject, and has got along as far as the "Notch of the White Hills" and "the gloves." But I don't know as there would be any harm in having two hands at the same job, and as there's matters and things enough in the world to last two of us considerable time, I don't know but I might as well, and I believe I will, write a little about animal magnetism to. I think I should like to write about some of John Neal, he goes ahead so much like a steam-engine.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

Smithfield Burying-ground—The Apparition.

It was a bright moonshiny night, as you will see one in a hundred—'twas in the latter part of September, and the weather was just about warm enough to be comfortable. 'Twas a Sunday night—I had my go-to-meeting clothes on, and had been over to see Sally Newbegin, she that's now my dear wife, at this very blessed moment—I didn't marry a Smith, but a Newbegin—I took a fancy to that name, because grandmother used to say, when one got married they always had to begin the world anew; and I thought if I could marry a Newbegin, my world would be already pretty well begun. And Sally was a fine gal, though I say it. And I had to get up pretty early and set up pretty late to gether, for most all the young fellows in Smithville and near about a score from Downingville was after her, one while. But Sally never said with any of 'em but me, for she always took a liking to me ever since we went to school together.

Well, this night we set talking in the fore-room till the old brass clock struck twelve, and then I told Sally that I must go. She said she didn't believe but what the clock was too fast. So I sat down again a minute, or I didn't think it was a bit more than ten minutes, when the plaguy old clock struck one. I sprang and caught my hat, and bid Sally good night, and started for home as fast as I could go. I had to go nearly two miles; and about half a mile before I got home I had to go by the burying-ground, that was close by the road. 'Twas a very lonesome sort of a place. There was thick woods on 'other side of the road, and 'twas nearly half a mile to any house. When I got along in sight of the burying-ground, I naturally began to think over who was buried there; and about one that was always supposed to be murdered—for a good many folks have always thought there's been one murder committed in Smithville—and then I thought how aunt Jane was once frightened most out of her senses coming along by the burying-ground between daylight and dark, and always stood to it she saw an apparition. I always used to laugh at her about it, and have made her as mad as fire a hundred times whenever she set out to tell the story; for I didn't believe nought about ghosts and apparitions; and aunt Jane would always turn round to me when she got through the story, and say, "well there, John, I hope if you live you'll see an apparition."

I felt as if I'd done wrong in hurting aunt Jane's feelings so many times, for she's a clever creatur as ever lived; and then the thought come over me as I got along within about twenty rods of the corner of the burying-ground, "what if aunt Jane's wish should come true?" My flesh kind of crawled a little, but I wouldn't mind it—apparitions wasn't nought but old women's whims—climbed my hands a little tighter and walked along—and began to whistle a little; not very loud, but a low tune, just to show that I wasn't afraid. The dark shadows of the woods begun to fall across the road, for the moon had got down some ways behind the trees. It seemed as if the place was dreadful still; and I felt my flesh crawl again. I stopped whistling—the place was so still I couldn't whistle—when all at once I heard a most terrible groan. My hair ris right up, and I thought my heart would be jumped out of my mouth. It wasn't so loud a groan as some, but a low, disressed, awful sound, such as I never heard before in my life. I stopped short, for I couldn't move a step one way nor 'tother; my feet seemed to grow to the ground. The groan come again, and the shoulders run over me like a streak of lightning. The sound seemed to be a little ways ahead of me, and as I looked along, about a half dozen rods, I see a white thing, about as long as a coffin, laying across the road. I couldn't feel no skender than I was before, but the sweat began to pour off of me like rain. The groan come again, and I was sure it come from the white thing across the road. It looked about as large as a man, and white enough to be a winding-sheet wrappd round it.

I begun to feel it was possible there might be sich things as apparitions, and I felt like death to think I had hurt aunt Jane's feelings so much about it. It didn't move any, but laid still and groaned. I thought at first I would speak to it; but I couldn't muster courage enough. What could I do? My courage never failed before—I went back a few steps, keeping my face all the time towards the apparition; for I couldn't help feeling convinced now, that 'twas an apparition. I could go home another way, by going round nearly three miles—but what good would that do? apparitions could go faster than I could. I went back a few steps farther, without taking my eyes off of it—it didn't follow me, but laid still in the same place. I begun to feel my courage come a little—I never was a coward. But I didn't know what to do—I couldn't go forward, and I wouldn't go back. I picked up a little round stone, about as large as a hen's egg, and threw it towards the apparition—not hard, but rolled it along on the ground, just far enough to hit it easy. In a moment it sprung up on end and fell down again, twice; and groaned louder than ever. But I minded, both times it fell, it didn't fall towards me, but from me. After a minute or two, I thought I'd try that motion again. I threw another stone. The apparition sprang up on its feet just as it did before, and fell down again, with its head from me. At this my courage begun to come a little more, and I ventured to go along a few steps nearer, once in a while throwing a stone. The apparition seemed to be afraid of me, and every time I threw a stone, it would seem to jump about its length from me. At last it got along to a place where the moonshine come down between the trees on to it, and I got up within about two rods of it, and all at once my heart was as light as a feather—I was nothing but uncle John Smith's old hog, that had got his fore feet both up through his yoke, and was half-choked to death, and could only sprang up on his hind feet and groan. A fiddle-stick take your apparitions, said I, and I went whistling half the way home, determined to beater aunt Jane about her apparitions harder than ever.

In respect of your invitation, general, for me to come to New-York and make a visit, there's nothing would suit me better, for I've always wanted to see that place, and if I can bring my business about so as to make it convenient, I think I shall do it. I remain your sincere friend,

JOHN SMITH, SQUIRE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

INFELICITOUS NAMES.

BY WILLIAM COX.

(Concluded from our last number.)

Yet am I sensible that I am the victim of a wide-spread and deeply-rooted injustice. My reason tells me that this feeling against and in favour of particular names and sounds is nothing more than the effects of whim, fancy, prejudice, habit, association.

Had there come over to England five hundred years ago, some marauding Norman baron, y'clept Sir Reginald de Swipes, probably at this time Swipes might have been a gallant, high-sounding title, and they would have substituted some other abbreviation for small-ale.

Would that it had been so!

But it is principally the poets, romance writers, and other fictionists that have created and kept alive this delusion concerning names. In their works they have annexed certain virtues and certain vices; certain graces and certain vulgarities, to certain classes of names, and these names have in consequence, and by long continuance in such courses, become habitually and conventionally either virtuous or vicious; graceful or vulgar. Other sort of writers retain a few intermediate ones, of an equivocal character, to suit the half-and-half folks and the repentant sinner; but there is no mistaking the two extremes. Take up ten novels, and in nine out of the ten, if your eye lights on a Beverley, a Mortimer, or a Stanley, be sure that all sorts of brave, noble, generous, and high-spirited qualities and properties appertain to these gentlemen. If you see mention made of a Ruthven or a Markham, ten to one but the former is the dark, designing, diabolical villain of the piece. And the latter his confederate, agent, or tool; and if there is a Potts or a Snubbs, the inference to be drawn is obvious.

There is even an arbitrary classification, though not so marked, of the pretty names of the heroines. If you see any Fannies, Marias, Elens, or Jessies, reckon with confidence on their being soft, sensitive, pensive, meek, mild, engaging, blue-eyed damsels—victims or intended victims. And if there be an Augusta, an Eleanor, a Caroline, or a Lady Jane, you may safely predict that they are high-souled, high-principled, proud, lofty, black-eyed, black-haired, high-born dames—amiable or otherwise, as it may chance to suit. Indeed, so well understood has this sort of thing become, that any one tolerably conversant with such matters, glancing through a novel or reading the characters of a new play, can, without hesitation, pick out the hero and heroine, the doating father, the avareicious guardian, the fop, the scoundrel, the lawyer, merely by the name. Should my unfortunate one appear in any new piece, it would signify, as plainly as if there were a stage direction appended to it, "a low fellow," or "waiter at a pot-house."

It is too bad. Much unhappiness has been caused in the actual world by such absurd distinctions.

What, let me ask, is the use of any man possessing the habits, manners, feelings, and education of a gentleman, should he unfortunately happen to be called Muggs or Suggs?

Our elder and more vigorous novelists did not countenance this unfairness, but called their heroes Jones, and Pickle, and Random—Andrews, and Adams, and Humphrey Clinker; but their puny successors fairly swamped them. They never thought of human nature or actual life; but were all for nobility, gentility, and noble or villainous-looking impersonations of the virtues and the vices.

Much preferable was the open and direct system of the dramatists of the olden time. They plainly by the name intended to shadow forth the habits, disposition, and employment of the man. When they called a fellow "Swash-buckler," you knew what you had to expect from him. The very name of Sir Epicure Mammon is the character half-sketchd; and when Wart, Fribble, Mouldy, and Bulbalf appear upon the stage, their titles give force and significance to replies which the business of the scene necessarily renders too brief to give a clear idea of their characters. But those names did no harm in common every-day life. They were attached to individuals, not to classes. They appertained to a particular character in a particular play, and there the matter began and ended. There was not two Sir Epicure Mammons, or two Sir Frivolous Fashions; nor any settled rule which marked out Howard as being synonymous with gallantry and good-looks, or affixed the stigma of baseness and vulgarity upon Dawson and Scout.

It was very unhandsome in my Lord Byron, because he happened to be blessed with a noble and chivalrous name himself, to sneer at those less fortunately circumstanced—

"Oh Cottle! Amos Cottle! What a name!"

Suppose it had so happened that he had himself been called Cottle, instead of Byron, as the saying is—"how could he have helped it?" Would he, on that account, have shut up all the woes and misanthropy, real and imaginary, in the breast of a Cottle, which found such ready vent from the bosom of a Byron? Would the "Fare thee well; and if for ever!"

not have been written; and would Childe Harold have travelled through Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor without saying anything about it!

If so, let us be thankful he was a Byron, and not a Cottle. Still it was unfair to attack poor Amos on that ground. He might have abused his poetry, but ought to have spared his name. It was not the man's fault; it was like lampooning a personal deformity.

But it was not Byron alone; Canning, who was a statesman and a legislator; and ought to have known better, has a fling both at him and his relative—

"It was not the Cottle who Alfred made famous,
But Joseph of Bristol, the brother of Amos."

Shame—shame!

But Amos and myself are alike the victims of an absurd prejudice. I will put one more case, in order to show its manifest injustice. What can be finer than those lines in Childe Harold, Canto III, Stanza twenty-nine, on the Field of Waterloo.

"Their praise is hymn'd by loftier harps than mine;
Yet one I would select from that proud throng,
Farly because they blend me with his line,
And partly that I did his sure some wrong,
And partly that bright names will hallow long
And his was of the bravest, and when shower'd
The death-bolts dashed them'd flies along.
Even where the thickest of war's tempest lower'd,
They reached no nobler breast than mine, young, gallant Howard!"

But suppose the young man had been called Muggins? He would have fought and fallen just as bravely, just as nobly—but what in that case would have become of his lordship's love, admiration, and sense of retributive justice. The poor fellow would have died if not "unhonoured," at least "unsung;" for Muggins rhymes not to anything I know of except Huggins, and both are peculiarly inapplicable for poetical purposes, according to our present ideas. His lordship would not have run the risk of setting the critics a sneering and the public a laughing, and Muggins would have died unknown.

On what slight causes does our chance of immortality depend.

Now Swipes rhymes to many things, but they are all of the same low and ignoble character—"wipes," "snipes," "pipes," and so on. No, it is—I feel it is impossible to raise or dignify it.

But my feelings again get the better of me.

It is much to be wondered how such names, together with hosts of everyday occurrence, ever get a footing in the world. We can account for many very easily.

The Robsons and the Hobsons, the Tomsons and the Bensons, the Harisons and the Collinsons, the Johnsons and the Jacksons, are all plainly enough the sons of Rob, Hob, Tom, Ben, Harry, Colin, John and Jack. Of these there is an infinite variety.

So also the Smiths, the Glovers, the Dyers, the Carpenters, the Taylors, the Masons, clearly originate with persons following mechanical and laborious occupations and handicrafts in the olden time.

The Clerks and the Penmens are equally obvious. So are the Archers and the Bowmens. Likewise the Cooks.

Neither would it puzzle a conjurer to account for the numerous family of the colours—the Blacks, Whites, Browns, Greens, Scarlets, etc.

The Blackbirds, Nightingales, Goldfinches, Swans, Peacocks, Ducks, Drakes, Hawks, etc., might have arisen from their being attached before there was any regular forms of baptism, to individuals on account of their tuneful, ostentatious, cleanly, or rapacious habits, and have descended to their offspring.

The Bulls, Calfs, Hogs, Pigs, and other bestial titles for christian men, may have had their origin in the real or fancied resemblances, in qualities or disposition of the remote progenitors of the present race of Bulls, Calfs, Hogs, and Pigs, to the qualities and dispositions of those several animals.

The Bacons must have been a collateral branch of the Hogs.

The numerous families of the Lions and the Lambs, which are the occasion of so many beautiful newspaper jokes when one of each kind lie down together, must have appertained to the meek and warlike in past ages.

The Fishes must anciently have been a maritime tribe—good swimmers.

The Fishers were probably a rapacious and cunning set, who used the Hooks and Hookers to plunder and destroy the Fishes.

The Norths, Wests, Souths, and Easts must have emigrated from those points, and the Snows, Hails, and Rains, have been in some way connected with the elements, whose names they bear.

The Hills, the Dales, the Rocks, the Cliffs, the Lakes, the Woods, the Greenwoods, the Forests, and the Mountains, must formerly have been Hal-o'-th-Hill, Dan-o'-th-Dale, Rob-o'-th-Rock, Clem-o'-th-Cliff, and so on, to distinguish them from other Halls, Dens, Robs, or Clems, and the distinction has settled upon their descendants.

The Towers, Hill-houses, Harcastles, were doubtless very formidable and impregnable gentlemen formerly.

The Graces and Well-beloveds smack of a recent and puritanical derivation. They do not much abound. Neither are there many Saints.

Without much difficulty also may such autre titles as Sheepshanks, Longfellow, Heavysides, Rambottom, etc., be accounted for.

I abstain from any observations on the origin of such names as the Cravens and the Cowards. Their present possessors may be as brave as lions. Besides, it does not become any one circumstanced as I am to make illiberal or unpleasant reflections.

All these and many others are obvious or probable, but what I want to know is, how such unaccountable and unseemly titles as Muggs, Wiggins, Jobb, Clutterbuck, Sniggs, Snooks, Higginbottom, and a host of others, too numerous to mention, first found their way into the world? Who invented them? Who propagated them? Above all—who was the first Swipes? Are such titles Teutonic, Scanlonick, or Celuck? Had they their origin in the Scandinavian forests, or among the fogs of Jutland? Do they belong to the aboriginal Britons, or did any of them come from Saxony with Hengist and Horsa? Had Tegen Pomerania to do with them? Did the Romans find them on the British islands? Does Caesar in his Commentaries make any mention of a person of the name of Clutterbuck; or, to go farther back, did the Phœnicians on their landing find any painted savage rejoicing in the name of Swipes; or did they import the perpetrator of that abomination?

*He wrote a scollish epic, of which Alfred the Great was the hero.

Riddles: mysteries: now are ye to be solved? In the words of Ossian—"dark clouds roll before my sight." Presumably speaking, I cannot tell anything about the matter. But nothing is more certain than that they (the names) must have had a beginning.

Some of them seem to have been created for the express purpose of leading people into the sin of punning. The old clerical name of Goodenough, for instance, handed down to posterity by the epigram committed on the occasion of the celebrated doctor of that name, preaching before the House of Lords—

"'Twas well enough that Goodenough
Before the House should preach,
For sure enough right had enough
Were those he's got to teach."

What a temptation for witlings of an inferior description, more especially as the poor gentleman happened to be a clergyman. He often would be annoyed in his day by his friends wishing they were Goodenough like him, or his enemies calling at once his goodness and his identity in question by insinuating that Goodenough was not Goodenough.

Small, Stout, Long, and Short have been of infinite comfort from time immemorial, to those who could not muster the skeleton of a joke in any other way.

Some names, such as Shrimp, Snipe, Chicken, have a henpecked sound. But the most obnoxious I know of in this respect, is Goto-bed. Think of the effect of a lady addressing her spouse by this title in anything but the mildest of tones, especially before company. Yet there was a Mr. Goto-bed, a party in a duel, which "came off" in England lately and which terminated fatally. What had such a man to do with sanguinary proceedings? Nothing could make him appear heroic in the public eye. The valiant Goto-bed!

It is an old adage that "Company in distress Makes the trouble the less,"

and I sometimes find a melancholy pleasure and a sad relief in perusing the Directory and noting down the large proportion of incongruous and infelicitous names which it contains, and I at times succeed in reasoning myself into a state of comparative resignation with my lot. But no sooner do I dress myself and go back among my fellow-creatures, than some incident occurs which shakes my nerves, suffuses me with blushes, and perfectly drives me to despair.

For instance, I meet my friend Tom Dashwood. Tom is a rattling, vivacious, good-hearted fellow, but he has a most unpleasant way of speaking intolerably loud in the street.

"Well, Swipes!" he bawls, "how are you?"

People look

"Pretty well, Tom," I reply, in a mild undertone, in the hope that he may pitch his note by mine. In vain!

The world may think very little of my name, but Tom seems to have a particular fancy for it, and interlards his conversation with—

"Well, Swipes!" "I tell you what, Swipes!" "Swipes, my boy! what do you think?" etc.

At last I shake him by the hand, bid him good morning, and fancy myself clear of him. Vain hopes. I have not proceeded ten yards when there comes upon my ear the horrid sound—

"Swipes!"

Some young ladies are passing. I pretend not to hear.

"Swipes! Swipes! I say!"

The young ladies look.

An officious urchin pulls me by the coat—"Gentleman calling of you, sir."

I gape round, and Tom bawls out, at the top of his voice—

"Swipes, will you go to the fancy-hall to-night?"

Swipes and a fancy-hall! What a combination!

The ladies look at me and then at each other. A succession of oblique glances ensue—a whisper—a titter—a visible effort not to laugh.

Torture! Such things are of perpetual occurrence.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE CITY OF FIRES.

New-York may be appropriately termed, par excellence, the "City of Fires." No other metropolis can exhibit so imposing an array of conflagrations—not can any compete with it in the rapidity with which they are extinguished. To one unaccustomed to such displays, the speed with which a sea of flame is annihilated is little less than miraculous. You are horror-struck at viewing erections of the most combustible description exposed to the combined action of vast sheets of flame, and a raging wind, and before you have time to reflect on the property likely to be destroyed, the exposure to be endured, and the lives placed in jeopardy—behold! the destructive element is conquered: its crimson tongues, which seemed defiance, are silenced, and the languid struggles of the painted flames, exhibit the impotence of the dying Gladiator. Although I have become so far identified with the city by a residence from childhood, that its sights and sounds are incorporated with my earliest recollections; yet even in me the occurrence of an imposing fire at night creates no little excitement and interest. First, the slow-measured chiming of the great bell on the City-Hall come booming over the roofs of the houses, insinuating themselves into your ear in the dark watches of the night, when your senses are locked in oblivion; and if you are a heavy sleeper, and the mammoth sentinel fails to arouse you, there are brazen tongues of lesser note which, one by one, swell the nocturnal chorus until the most deeply magnetized slumberer is startled by their rude summons. But if fatigue and lassitude cause you to turn sluggishly on your side, and endeavour, by burying yourself under the coverlets, to shut out the discordant notes; lay not the flattening unctuous to your soul that success has crowned your exertions. Lo! from beneath your casement the cry of Fire! Fire! Fire! is screamed with sufficient force and energy to frighten you from your propriety—and, as if that was not enough, the ponderous engine rattles along the pavement with such vehemence, that your very bed trembles beneath you—the relentless chief strikes through his trumpet with appalling vigour—the watchman strikes the side-walk with his well-seasoned club, the echo from which reverberates with fearful distinctness; the ragged followers of the camp, hammer at your window until you are doubtful whether your own house is not on fire; and at length, what with alarm and vexation, you are fain to submit to your fate by leaping on the floor, and raising the sash to take an observation.

If the night is dark, that optical illusion which has led many a poor wight to follow the light of a city fire, until it seemed, like the fountains of Tausole, to recede from his approach, causes you to hastily array yourself in suitable apparel to encounter the night air; and a moment finds you among the moving mass—shouting rick! at the top of your voice, determined if compelled to the encounter to demean yourself like a well-bred citizen, by extending to your neighbours the same interesting information, which the amiable rabble lavished on you. And now the scene really becomes exciting—the rolling engines have imparted to you a portion of the ardour which animates their leather-capped propellers; you forget that street after street has been passed, since you emerged from your door; you walk insensibly increases to a trot, your trot to a gallop —until nearly exhausted, you are confronted by the curling flames. If you are deeply interested in the stock of a Fire Insurance Company, your first reflection leads you to ponder on the risks taken in that locality—if in the jobbing trade, your memory reverts, with surprising facility, to the debtor side of your ledger, to ascertain whether the names of the sufferers are therein recorded; and, if exempt from the calamities incident to either position, you look, with that placid candour, on the scene, which nautical and modern philosophers have ever exhibited when dwelling on the mishaps of their particular friends! But soon the enthusiasm of the less sober portion of the crowd communicates itself to your inner man; you view, with thrilling interest, the movements of yonder fireman, who has ascended to the peak of the roof of an elevated building, the interior of which is in flames; you holly your breath, as he quits the falling rafters to perch, like an eagle, on the brick or stone abutment which trembles beneath his weight, and are dizzy with gazing on his form, now blackened with smoke, now crimson with flame; until your alarm is converted into admiration as you see him grasp the pipe and shout, with perfect self-possession, "play away, number eight!"—soon the sound rapidly increases in breadth and volume. Engine after engine rolls along until scores are stationed around the scene of action; the foremen and assistant foremen direct the course of their machines from point to point; the junior members of the brotherhood fly with the speed of thought from front to rear, and rear to front, displaying all the impetuosity of youth, with all the equality of experience. The well-disciplined senior with anxious, but collected countenance directs his efforts with precision and force. The more timid of the untried suffers rush along in wild alarm, while the self-possessed gather up the fragments, snatched from the devouring element, and are occupied in transporting them to a place of safety. But a huge column of flame and smoke now pierces the heavens, and the crash of falling timbers, and masses of brick and stone, is heard high above the din. The well-trained fireman has just quitted his perilous station on the wall, and covered with cinders, ashes, and mortar, appears unhurt among his comrades.

And now look about you, if a lover of the picturesque, and view a scene worthy of the delineation of a Hogarth. Stretch far as the eye can reach on either hand, the motley crowd is illuminated by the ocean of flame which rolls and darts from side to side, as if lashing itself into fury, preparatory to a final struggle. Here may be seen standing out in bold relief the haggard lineaments of Vice—the bloated face and distended eye-balls of Dissipation—the fierce glance of Passion—the clouded visage of Anxiety—the wrinkled brow of Care—the furrowed cheek of Grief—the withered form of Disease—the tattered garb of Penury. Yonder stands the pampered favourite of Wealth jostled by the beggar who was but now spurned from his door; virtue and vice, male and female—all conditions, sexes, colours and ranks, are here mingled in temporary fellowship—every feature exposed, and every form distinct in the glare of this artificial day.

But the scene appears not alone to the eye. Every emotion which agitates the human breast here finds a voice. The wild cry of terror, the boisterous shout of merriment, the reckless glee of boyhood, the feeble wail of infancy, the agonizing shriek of suffering, the rude rebuke of a laughing crowd, the solemnity of death, the stern mandates of authority, are all blended in strange discord. The wily courtisan is playing her insinuating tale into the charmed ear of some country dupe; the curious searcher after hidden secrets accost each by stander, in turn, to ascertain the cause of the conflagration, the names of the sufferers, and the amount of loss; the mechanic whispers to his fellow that it's an ill wind that blows nobody any good; the thirsty wine-bibber seeks a convenient tavern; the lark out at a "sperre" jeers and elbows every one he meets, until some "ugly customer" lays him sprawling in the gutter: the engineer issues his orders through his speaking-trumpet—the crackling flames chronicle the progress of events; the sufferer laments his fate, and all the opposite and varied feeling of the throng of burst audibly on the ear of the listener.

But ere long the raging element waxes before the powerful efforts of the firemen; the gaping crowd, one by one, steal away to their several places of residence; the successful pick-pocket bears off his ill-gotten wealth to enjoy a night of debauchery, and on the morrow becomes the tenant of a prison; and, because you are aware, the multitude have vanished, and you are comparatively alone.

Such is the New-York fire. That there is a certain wild excitement connected with the discharge of the duties of a fireman cannot be doubted. It arouses the energies of the enthusiast, and appeals to the pride of the dashing. A New-York fireman is indeed a study. The class to which it belongs is unique. Every true fireman becomes the tenant of a prison; and, because you are aware, the multitude have vanished, and you are comparatively alone.

He is a joyful volunteer, rescuing life and property from destruction for the love he bears the human race. A utilitarian in precept and practice, the drone receives no countenance from him. He seems timidly, but sluggishness is his abhorrence. A phalanx throust in its most enlarged sense; neither friends nor enemy quickens or retards his movements. Oncard! is his motto, and he lives up to its exactions.

Like a true patriot, he has enlisted for the campaign, and will not pause till the enemy is routed. View you ancient relic of the department. He is an expert fireman. Unable to compete with his youthful successors, his soul is, nevertheless, in the contest. Hovering around the scene, he cheers the active and rebukes the sluggish. He remembers the days of his glory, and sighs to think they will never return. The heart of the true fireman is open as the day to melting charity.

For the widow or orphan of a deceased brother, his purse is ever ready. Like all brave men, he is courteous to the fair, and the Adonis of a ball-room will not hand a lady to her station in the cotillion with more genuine grace than that with which he escorts the alarmed female sufferer to a place of security. Personal hazard is with him a plaything. He sports with danger and laughs at peril. Although, occasionally, the hero of his own tale, yet he is no egotist. He attracts your attention to the scenes in which his own prowess is conspicuous; yet the whole is related as a matter of course, and not events to excite either wonder or admiration. The victor is in an hundred fights, yet, like the throne-dispenser of Europe, he met his Waterloo at the great fire of December 1835.

Deported by his natural ally, and assailed by adverse elements, he was fain to resign his watery sceptre to the powers of the sea king. But, unlike the Corsican conqueror, no St. Helena claims his energies, and the defeat of the hour has been amply avenged. Obedience to orders is his cardinal duty; but attachment, not fear, prompts the ready compliance. He serves his chief with the fidelity due a trusty comrade rather than a haughty superior.

The rallying cry of the leader is "come!" and he follows—for the dangers he braves have been encountered by his chief. Rocked as it were in the cradle of excitement, his feelings are proverbially ardent, but the hostility of the moment finds no lodgment in the heart, with due repartition ceases all remembrance of wrong. The romantic attachment to his machine may be observed in the beauty of its decorations. The elaborate polish of the brass work, and the elegant painting on the barrel are tokens of his regard. To sum up all, the New-York fireman is a generous friend, a good citizen, and a disinterested philanthropist. May the fountain of his happiness be exhaustless as his benevolence.—Madsman.

THE KING AND THE TROUBADOUR.

EVERY reader of history knows that King René was fonder of music and poetry than of the arts of war and politics. In the early part of his reign, before he had become utterly helpless and contemptible by his neglect of state, his majesty, while listening to the musical voice of his daughter Margaret, was informed by an officer of his court that a wandering minstrel desired access to his royal presence, in order that he might exhibit his skill in the joyous science. King René, at all times too much interested in love and music, repulsed that another novelty would regale his ears with some romantic ditty of chivalry and love: he commanded that the wanderer should be welcomed, and his wants provided for, and that in the evening he should be permitted to exercise his skill in the presence of the royal musician and his court. The king's commands were obeyed, and the stranger was hospitably attended to by the officers of the royal household.

Evening came, and King René took his seat in his hall, with his daughter by his side: Margaret was not more than seventeen, yet her appearance exhibited more marks of thought than is common to females of that tender age. The fact was that there was a dormant spirit of ambition in the lady which only wanted bringing out. The frivolousness of her father's court were as distasteful to her as her own indifference to his favourite parasite was to the king. She would occasionally, to please the king, exhibit her own skill, which was by no means small, in his favourite pursuits; but she delighted more in listening to the histories of actual war and politics, than to stories of wandering knights and faithful damsels, which were the joy of her father's heart. The minstrel entered the hall, and was welcomed to the footstool of the king. He was a fair-haired youth, twenty, with light blue eyes, and a mild expression of countenance. To King René's inquiries he answered that he was of England, and that, attracted by the fame of the sovereign before whom he stood, he had wandered thus far in the hope of obtaining the highest reward to which a minstrel could aspire—the approbation of King René.

The king bade him exhibit his skill in his profession, and promised favour and promotion if he proved worthy. The youthful wanderer obeyed, and sung one of those interminable ditties to us moderns unknown, and which, if attempted, would not be listened to; but, at the time of which we speak, nothing was more common than for the lovers of music to listen with patience to a lay of eight hours! King René was delighted with the youth's performance, and, for a wonder, his youthful daughter exhibited the same pleasure. The theme of his song was, that a youthful king, disinclined to marry as mere policy or chance directed, wandered from his native kingdom, through various realms, to seek a wife such as his youthful fancy had pictured: how he had at length found a princess of such rare and excellent beauty, that his heart was captivated—how, in his capacity of minstrel, this wandering king had wooed and won the daughter of the king of France.

The English minstrel was taken into high favour by King René; he remained for weeks at his castle, and, during that time, had gained favour in the eyes of René's household by his disinterestedness—the king's profuse gifts to himself he distributed among his officers.

One evening the king was seated in his hall, expecting the appearance of his favourite, but he appeared not! The king was in terror lest some harm had befallen the young Englishman. The castle was searched; at least a chamberlain returned in breathless haste, and communicated something to the king, who immediately arose and accompanied the chamberlain to the gardens of the palace. In a bow was found the minstrel fast asleep; on a seat by his side was the Princess Margaret, anxiously watching him! King René was romantic, but not quite such a fool as to reject that a daughter of his should love a wandering minstrel. He awoke the youth, and bitterly reproached his daughter with her unworthy attachment. The youth, after a while, at last spoke at last in a calm and, in the most dignified manner, requested an audience of the king. There was something so noble in his manner that he king complied.

Reader, the wandering minstrel was Henry of England! And the romance of their love may account for the intensity of devotion with which the high-souled Margaret regarded her layro and unfortunate husband, notwithstanding his weaknesses and follies.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

EFFECTS OF GAMBLING.—A letter from Beraun, in Bohemia, addressed to the Droit, mentions the melancholy fate of the victims of a passion for gambling. The Count de Gravellysky, descended from one of the richest families in Bohemia, about two years ago came into possession, in his twenty-fifth year, of his fortune, amounting to fifteen millions of francs. He soon afterwards lost at play, in Milan, one million two hundred and fifty thousand francs, and subsequently at Vienna, two millions of francs, and at Prague seven hundred and fifty thousand francs. These severe reverses did not check his career. He became deeply in debt, and at length sold not only his alienable domains, but the life-interest in those settled on his descendants. He was at length reduced to the most distress; but so strong did his infatuated reliance upon the goddess of chance remain, that, in the hope of recovering her favours, he issued several forged bills of exchange, and raised money on them. Among these were some on the house of Messrs. Klauenheim and Co., of Beraun, which he discounted at Gratz. By a chance, one of the partners came to Gratz, and hearing of these acceptances, informed the holders of the fraud. The count was arrested and imprisoned, but made his escape, and reached Beraun under a false name, and in the assumed character of a journeyman cabinet-maker. He was, however, soon discovered, and confined in the dungeon of the prison, where, on going the following morning to conduct him back to Gratz, the officers of justice found him dead, the unfortunate count having strangled himself with his cravat.

STRANGE TALK.—Lord T—being out of town, his house was left in charge of a female servant. The plate was lodged at his bankers'. A letter came to say that his lordship would be in town on such a day, and desiring that the plate might be got ready the evening before. The servant took the letter to my lord's brother, who said there was no doubt of the hand-writing. The banker expressed the same certainty, and immediately delivered the plate. The servant being apprehensive of thieves, spoke to their butler, who lent her a stout dog, which was shut up in the room with the plate. Next morning a man was found dead in the room, his throat being torn out by the dog; and upon examination, it proved to be my lord's brother. The matter was carefully hushed, and a report spread that he was gone abroad.

VEGETABLE ORIGINS.—Turnips and carrots are thought indigenous roots of France. Our cultivators came from Cyprus; our artichokes from Sicily; lettuce from Cos, a name corrupted into Clare; shallots, or eschallots, from Ascalon. I have been reading on the subject, and was struck with the numerous ideas on commerce and civilization which may arise from a dinner. Will you have a dessert from memory! The cherry and filbert are from Pontus, the citron from Media, the chestnut from Castana, in Asia Minor, the peach and the walnut from Persia, the plum from Syria, the pomegranate from Cyprus, the quince from Cydon, the olive and fig from Greece, as are the best apples and pears, though also found wild in France, and even here. The apricot is from Armenia.

FONTENELLE.—Wit, or even what the French term esprit, seems little compatible with feeling. Fontenelle was a great egotist, and thought of nothing but himself. One of his old acquaintances went one day to see him at his country house, and said he had come to eat a bit of dinner. "What shall we have? Do you like 'sparagus' said Fontenelle. "If you please; but with oil." "On! I prefer them with sauce." "But sauce disagrees with me," replied the guest. "Well, well, we shall have them with oil." Fontenelle then went out to give his orders; but on his return found his poor acquaintance dead of an apoplexy. Running to the head of the stairs, he called out, "Cook! dress the 'sparagus with sauce'."

FISH IN FASHION.—When fashions are worn out at Paris, the milliners send the antiquated articles to the north, that is, to Sweden or Russia. A vessel deeply laden with such merchandise was run down in the channel of St. Petersburg. Next day a salmon was caught in the Neva, dressed in a white satin petticoat; and in the same net were found two large cod, with muslin handkerchiefs around their necks, and two sharks whose gills were observed in gowns of the latest taste; and hardly was there a fish that did not display some of the freshest Parisian fashions that had never visited the North.

SENTIMENT.—What is called sentimental writing, though it be understood to appeal solely to the heart, may be the product of a bad one. One would imagine that Stearn had been a man of a very tender heart—yet I know, from indubitable authority, that his mother, who kept a school, having run in debt, on account of an extravagant daughter, would have rotted in jail, if the parents or her scholars had not raised a subscription for her. Her son had too much sentiment to have any feeling. A dead ass was more important to him than a living mother.

THE BIRTH-RIT.—A noble lord a short time ago applied to a pawnbroker to lend him one thousand guineas on his wife's jewels, for which he had paid four thousand. "Take the articles to pieces," said his lordship, "number the stones, and put false ones in their place, my lady will not distinguish them." "You are too late, my lord," said the pawnbroker; "your lady has stolen a march upon you; these stones are false, I bought the diamonds of her ladyship a twelvemonth since."

MR. JAMES W. WALLACE.—The company of the National theatre has united in a subscription for the presentation of a Calistrion to the man, to the two, to the talented and estimable lessee, James W. Wallace. The whole affair was conducted by Messrs. Mitchell and Williams, with consummate tact and great delicacy—so much so, that the gift itself was considerably enhanced by the manner of representation.

LONDON NOVELTIES.—A barber in Fenchurch-street has manufactured some wigs who have been the means of a Calistrion to the man, to the two, to the talented and estimable lessee, James W. Wallace. A baker up in a narrow street in Fleet-street has prepared some vivacious biscuits; and a hatter in Leicester-square has invented a nightcap which he designates by the classical name of a caputereudormitor.

A GOOD IDEA.—In Connecticut they find a use for almost everything. An old lady in that state is collecting all the political papers she can lay her hands on, to make soap of. She says they are a "desp't gift better than ashes—they are most as good as clear tie."

ADVANTAGE OF POVERTY IN EARLY LIFE.—An English judge being asked what contributed most to his wisdom, he said, "poverty, I believe, 'So success by great talent, some by high connexions, some by a miracle, but the majority by commencing without a shilling."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Uncon-Green," not "Uncon-Square," is the name of the enclosure at the head of Dreadnought—Fifty new houses are to be erected at New-Brighton this spring.—"Omnibuses," not "horses," and "stamboules," not "stewers." Our correspondent is wrong. We are gratified to learn that Placide will not leave the Park theatre at the close of the present season. He is the Corinthian columns of the Park, and his place could not be supplied—"Nautilus" informs us that the India-rubber life-preserver, used by Mr. Thompson, on leaving the wreck of the packet ship Pennsylvania, was purchased of Mr. Smith, in Chatham-street. Everybody, going to sea, should possess one of these "invaluable contrivances," as a down east editor terms them.—"We conclude in this number the admirable sketch by John Neal; one of the most original, peculiar and racy productions ever published in this or any other periodical."—"The firmens of New-York," are in error as to the authorship of the graphic and beautiful paper copied from the Madisonian into the Mirror of to-day. It is from the pen of one of the most intelligent and estimable of our own citizens. It must be apparent to the most casual reader that it emanated from the pen of a New-Yorker. Our acknowledgments are due to the author of the admirable translations from the Spanish of Yriarte. They shall appear.—We make one selection from the numerous songs of "Frank." The following is very neatly turned:

Oh this love, this love!
I once the passion slighted—
But hearts that truly love,
Must break or be united!
Oh this love, this love!
When first he came to woo,
I little cared about him;
But soon I felt as though
I could not live without him!
Oh this love, this love!
He brought to me a ring—
My hand asked of my mother:
I could not have the thought
That he should wed another!
Oh this love, this love!
And now I'm all his own!
In all his joys I mingle!
I envy not the queen,
For she, poor thing, is single!
Oh this love, this love!

Rights of authors and publishers.—A memorable instance of the oppressive operation of the existing copyright system upon the interests of American authors has recently occurred in London. An edition of the writings of Washington, with a Life by Jared Sparks, was published by Mr. Campbell of Regent-street—Mr. Sparks enjoying an interest in the profits. No sooner was the edition given to the public than Mr. Colburn, the well-known publisher, issued a smaller and cheaper edition, embracing the "life" and notes by Mr. Sparks, but omitting the documents of inferior interest. Hereupon Campbell came out with an appeal to the public, complaining of Colburn's attempt to deprive Mr. Sparks "of that pecuniary return to which his labours so justly entitled him!" The reply of Colburn is a complete justification of himself and a severe but just rebuke upon the predatory practice of American booksellers and re-publishers, whose piratical example he had merely followed: "The most amusing part of Mr. Campbell's exposition is the difficulty he is in 'to decide upon what code of honour Mr. Sparks' name has been so unceremoniously appropriated by Mr. Colburn to his own private benefit,' forgetting, or seeming to forget, that Mr. Colburn is merely following the 'code of honour' established, and set upon for so many years by the American booksellers, who reprint almost all his new publications the moment they cross the Atlantic." What American, who is in the habit of purchasing the unauthorized reprints of the works of British authors, can be so inconsistent as to find fault with Mr. Colburn's retaliatory course! We are sure that Mr. Sparks will admit that, by the law of reciprocity, Mr. Colburn is fully justified. This case we look upon but as the commencement of a system of depredation by London publishers, which must either lead to the overthrow of the interests of American authors, or to the speedy adoption of an international copy-right law. We trust that Mr. Colburn and the London publishers will be consistent in their course of retaliation. Let them not make fish of one author and flesh of another. They have the same right to pirate the works of Messrs. Irving and Cooper, that they have those of Mr. Sparks—and they undoubtedly will do it, now that all legal restrictions are removed by parliamentary legislation. We hope that they will do so that American authors may be forced into a championship and defence of their peculiar interests in this question, to which they have hitherto manifested a strange and suicidal indifference.

The season.—A milder and more genial winter than that which is just closing upon us has rarely been experienced in "these latitudes." There have been few days when the weather has not been sufficiently alluring to bring out in Broadway the beauty of the city. The snow that has fallen has been trifling compared with that of former seasons, and the atmosphere, with trifling exceptions, has been "froxy but kindly." Whether these "gentle winter days" have been but the precursors of a severe and chilly spring, time will show. But thus far the season has been remarkable, both for its mildness and its salubrity. May its promise be fulfilled.

Portrait of Charles Dickens.—A fine lithographic portrait of the far-famed Bob has been executed and published by Mr. E. Brown, jun. of this city. It is from the excellent design by Lawrence, and is equal in every respect to the London engraving. We cannot speak as to the fidelity of the likeness.

Original letter of Franklin.—The Boston Transcript gives the following characteristic letter of Benjamin Franklin, which it believes to have never before been published. The original is in the possession of a venerable gentleman of Boston, who numbers fourscore and four years. It is conclusively against the often-asserted declaration that Franklin was inclined to infidelity. We should be glad to know if the town of Franklin ever received the books, and if they were the foundation of a parochial library:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—My nephew, Mr. Williams, will have the honour of delivering you this line. It is to request from you a list of a few good books, to the value of about twenty-five pounds, such as are most proper to inculcate principles of sound religion, and just government. A new town in the state of Massachusetts having done me the honour of naming itself after me, and proposing to build a steeple to their meeting-house if I would give them a bell, I have advised the sparing themselves the expense of a steeple at present, and they would accept books instead of a bell, sense being preferable to sound. These are, therefore, intended as the commencement of a little parochial library for the use of a society of intelligent respectable farmers such as our country people generally consist of. Besides your own works, I would only mention, on recommendation of my sister, 'Steinet's Discourses on Personal Religion,' which may be one book of the number, if you know it, and approve of it. With the highest esteem and respect, I am ever, my dear friend, yours most affectionately,
B. FRANKLIN.
"Rev. Dr. Prince."

Poetry and Steam.—In an interesting paper in the Musical World, entitled "Words for Composers," Leigh Hunt says:—"Beautiful, truly, it is to see what noble poets we have had in these latter days, and with what abundant glory they have refuted the idle fears of an extinction of imagination in consequence of the progress of science! Fancy steam putting out the stars! or the wheels of the very printing-press running over and crushing all the hearts, doves, and loves in Christendom! for till you did that, how were you to put out poetry! Why the printing-press and the steam-carriage are themselves poetry—forms, made visible, of the aspirations of the mind of men; and they shake accordingly the souls of those who behold them. See the rotatory mystery working in the printing-room—the unaccountable and intangible god, Fire, giving its force against the old negative deity, Time. See the huge, black, many-wheeled giant, the steam-carriage, smoking over the country like some mammoth of a centipede, and swallowing up that other ancient obstacle, Space—and Time with him! and then suppose, if you can, those very thoughts of human good, and eternity, and the might and beauty of the universe, which it is the most poetical office of poetry to keep alive and burning."

A Parisian club-house.—The French are becoming as much attached to the domesticity of clubs as the English—a new one under the name of Le Cercle des Deux Mondes, has just been opened. The Court Journal says, if Crookford saw it he would die with jealousy. It is really a splendid affair, being the Hotel Parina, Rue Richelieu, formerly in the occupation of Louleur, the restaurateur. It is furnished in a manner worthy the palace of a mighty sovereign—it is positively gorgeous in its magnificence; silk, velvet, marble, gold, and silver, in every imaginable shape, and for every conceivable purpose, are scattered through some twenty salons with unexampled profusion. There is a splendid library of three thousand volumes, a glorious cellar of wine, and the department of the cuisine absolutely perfection—the stoves, etc., having been fitted up under the direction of an English engineer. Verily our friends here are progressing in the knowledge of the comfortable as well as the magnificent.

French dramatists.—The Paris correspondent of the American gives the following account of Victor Hugo and Scribe:—"Hugo is a man of the middle size, in height and frame; of regular features and pensive aspect; his manners are not marked, otherwise than by a degree of reserve and taciturnity; he appears to be about forty years of age; he goes little into general society. Scribe, the most prolific of the comic authors, (called the greatest of the capucines, from his love of gain), resembles him in stature, but has a stronger countenance and the air of fifty; he frequents clubs and committees more than the saloons, and laments or affects to lament his single and solitary state in his dwelling. Both are bachelors. Scribe's self-complacency betrays itself more in his seat at the Academie Francaise, where he has been pointed out to me, than anywhere else."

Coincidence.—A correspondent points out a resemblance between a story in a late number of the Mirror, entitled "The Cobbler of Brusa," and the tale of the "Water Carrier" in Captain Maryatt's "Pasha of Many Tales." As the "Cobbler of Brusa" was originally published in the "Token and Atlantic Souvenir" a year before the publication of the "Pasha of Many Tales," our correspondent will at once perceive that the American author cannot be held responsible for the coincidence, if any exist. Neither is it probable that Captain Maryatt was indebted to any other source than oral tradition for his story. The author of the "Cobbler of Brusa" has never perused a line of the "Pasha of Many Tales," from which our correspondent somewhat ungraciously accuses him of borrowing.

Rumours of war.—Theatricals have already begun to feel the effect of the agitation of the question of war with Great Britain. It will be time enough when the blast of war "blows in our ears" to imitate "the action of the tiger." In the meanwhile would not a conciliatory though firm tone and demeanour be more appropriate than the Bobadil flourishes, which are cut by a portion of our press? It is not probable that the "sober second thought" either of England or the United States will be much in favour of hostilities.

NIGHT CLOSED AROUND THE CONQUEROR'S WAY.

THE POETRY BY THOMAS MOORE—THE MUSICK ARRANGED BY SIR JOHN STEVENSON.

WITH SOLEMNITY.

Night closed a-round the con-quer-or's way, And light-n'g show'd the distant hill, Where those who lost that dread-ful day, Stood few and faint, but fear-less still: The sol-dier's hope, the pa-triot's zeal, For ever dimun'd, for e-ver cross'd—Oh! who shall say what he-ros feel, When all but life and ho-nour's lost!

SECOND VERSE.—The last and hour of freedom's dream,
 And valour's task, moved slowly by;
 While mute they watch'd, till morning's beam
 Should rise, and give them light to die!

There is a world, where souls are free,
 Where tyrants taint not nature's bliss;
 If death that world's bright opening be,
 Oh! who would live a slave in this?

TO AN ABSENT FRIEND.
Original.

I MIND me of the happy hours,
 We pass'd in friendship's holy tie,
 As fleet, as summer flowers
 That blossom but to fade and die.
 Yet like the flowers, those happy days
 Leave incense on my memory yet,
 As perfume lingers round the vase,
 In which the fragrant blossoms set.
 And will thy soul respond to mine,
 The spirit-breathings thither sent,
 In language mute though all divine,
 With heavenly magic seeming blent;
 As in the forest's deepest shade
 Is heard the murmuring of the dove,
 At nature's holy altar made
 For sympathy and holy love.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Riches without Wings; or, the Cleveland Family."—This is the rich title of a rich little book, recently published by Mr. Light, at No. 136 Fulton-street, in this city, and at No. 1 Cornhill, Boston. The first edition was exhausted in three or four weeks, and the second is now having a rapid sale. It must be set down, therefore, as a decided favorite with the public. We think, too, the instance affords another proof of the correctness of public taste; for we regard this little book as one of the most interesting and valuable of the class to which it belongs, that have appeared for a long time. Its leading title indicates in some degree the character of the book, its object being to show what sort of riches may be attained in this world, that are not wont to take to themselves wings and fly away. It accordingly contrasts riches of character, combining physical, moral, and mental culture, with riches of which mere money is the measure. The author has woven a very interesting story as the medium of her illustrations, in which characters are delineated with graphic distinctness, and true personal worth exhibited in so pleasing a dress as to command the interest and win the esteem of the reader. The book belongs to that class which we always welcome with pleasure, and wish we had more of them—that class which brings the powerful aid of imaginative writing of the simple but elevated taste of meliorating the character and condition of society.

The author is Mrs. Seba Smith, the wife of the former editor of the Portland Courier, who, perhaps, many of our readers and of New-England need yet to be told, is the original author of the genuine Downing Letters, which appeared a few years since in the Portland Courier.

"My Niece; or, the Stranger's Grave." New-York. Edward Walker, No. 112 Fulton-street.—This is a reprint of one of the most interesting and beautiful works for the young to be found. The publisher deserves much praise for the admirable style in which the volume is put forth. Its typography is unexceptionably neat, and the embossed muslin binding is very elegant. We cheerfully commend this work to the attention of parents.

"The Gentle Boy."—An edition of this beautiful "thrice-told tale," by Nathaniel Hawthorne, with an illustrative outline engraving, after the style of Rafsch, has been published by Messrs. Wiley and Putnam, of this city. The design is worthy of all the commendation so gracefully bestowed on it by the author, in his preface.

"La France Littéraire."—This is the title of an excellent periodical in the French language published twice a month in this city. The selections are made in good taste, being by the most distinguished writers of Paris.

NEW MUSICK.

Hewitt and Jaques, No. 239 Broadway, have just published the following ballads, waltzes, etc.:—"Gather ye Rose-buds," a beautiful ballad, by Herne—Musick by Phillips. "Beauty, Wit, and Gold," by T. H. Bayly—Musick by Knight. "Charter Oak, ancient and fair!" words by Mrs. Sigourney—Musick by Henry Russell. "My beautiful Pierre," the words by Ione—Musick by John H. Hewitt. This is a delightful little ballad, of surpassing sweetness, and we have no doubt will become a great favourite with all lovers of musick. We give the first verse:

"My mother doth bid me forget thee,—
 Ah! mother is aged and cold;
 She sayeth I ne'er should regret thee;
 But time maketh worldly the old.
 Ah! what though she urge me to leave thee,
 To wed with the frosty and serene,
 This heart tells me ne'er to deceive thee,
 My beautiful, beautiful Pierre!"

He has, also, published several very excellent Waltzes, by Strauss, which were performed by his band, at the ball given in honour of Victoria's coronation.

MISCELLANY.

RIDDLE.—The French delight to try the esprit of children by a kind of riddles. For example: A man has a little boat, in which he must carry, from one side of a river to the other, a wolf, a goat, and a cabbage, and must not carry more than one of these at once. Which shall he take first, without the risk that, during one of his navigations, the wolf may devour the goat, or the goat the cabbage? Suppose he carry the wolf, the cabbage is lost—if the cabbage, the goat is devoured—if the goat, the embarrassment is equal; for he must risk his goat, or his cabbage, on the other side of the river. The answer is:—He must take the goat first, the wolf will not touch the cabbage; in the second passage he carries the cabbage, and brings back the goat; in the third he transports the wolf, which may again be safely left with the cabbage. He concludes with returning for the goat.

OLD OBLIGATION.—The duke of Roquelaure was one of those who, as Madame Sevigne says, "abuse the privilege that the men have to be ugly." Accidentally finding at court a very ugly country gentleman, who had a suit to offer, the duke presented him to the king, and urged his request, saying he was under the highest obligations to the gentleman. The king granted the request; then asked Roquelaure what were those great obligations. "Ah! sir, if it were not for him, I should be the very ugliest man in your dominions." This sally excited the royal smile, while the gentleman, with plain good sense, affected not to hear it.

THE CASE OF STAMMERING.—It must now, I apprehend, be granted, that stammering does not depend on malformation or deficiency of structure in either the larynx or the mouth, but that it is produced by a modification of the influence transmitted from the brain; and it is on this principle that the rational and only correct method of curing a difficulty of speech can rest."

ROAD TO THE RED SEA.—We learn by letters from Alexandria, that eight hundred Europeans crossed the isthmus of Suez last year, on their passage to and from India; and that a regular coach conveyance will be soon established between the shores of the Levant and the nearest points for embarkation on the borders of the Red Sea.

RATHER PREMATURE.—A peasant being at confession, accused himself of having stolen some hay. The father confessor asked him how many bundles he had taken from the stack. "That is of no consequence," replied the peasant; "you may set it down a wagon load, for my wife and I are going to fetch the remainder very soon."

VALUE OF AN OATH.—A Norman was telling another a great absurdity as a matter of fact. "You are jesting," said the hearer. "Not I, on the faith of a christian." "Will you wager?" "No, I won't wager; but I am ready to swear it."

ORIGINAL FAIRY TALES.

GOODY GRACIOUS! AND THE FORGET-ME-NOT.

BY JOHN NEAL.

Once there was a little bit of a thing—not more than so high—and her name was Ruth Page; but they called her Teenty Tawnty, for she was the daintiest little creature you ever saw, with the smoothest hair and the brightest face; and then she was always playing about and always happy; and so the people that lived in that part of the country, when they heard her laughing and singing al. by herself, at peep of day, like little birds after a shower, and saw her running about in the edge of the wood after tulips and butterflies; or tumbling head-over-heels in the long rich grass by the river-side, with her little pet lamb, or her two white pigeons, always under her feet; or listening to the wild-bees in the apple-blossoms, with her sweet mouth "all in a tremble," and her happy eyes brimful of sunshine—they used to say that she was no child at all, or no child of earth, but a Fairy-gift, and that she must have been dropped into her mother's lap, like a handful of flowers, when she was half asleep; and so they wouldn't call her Ruth Page—no indeed, that they wouldn't! but they called her little Teenty Tawnty, or the Little Fairy, and they used to bring her Fairy Tales to read, till she couldn't bear to read anything else, and wanted to be a Fairy herself.

Well and so—one day, when she was out in the sweet-smelling woods, all alone by herself, singing "where are you going, my pretty maid! I'm going a-milking, sir," and watching the gold-jackets and the blue dragon-flies, and the sweet pond lilies, and the bright-eyed glossy eels, and the little crimson-spotted fish, as they "coiled and swam," and darted hither and thither, like "flashes of golden fire," and then huddled together, all of a sudden, just underneath the green turf where she sat, as if they saw something, and were half frightened to death, and were trying to hide in the shadow: well and so—as she sat there, with her little naked feet hanging over and almost touching the water, singing to herself, "my face is my fortune, sir," she said: "sir, she said!" and looking down into a deep sunny spot, and holding the soft smooth hair away from her face with both hands, and trying to count the dear little fish, before they got over their fright, all at once she began to think of the Water-Fairies, and how cool and pleasant it must be to live in these deep sunny hollows, with green turf all about you, the blossoming trees and the blue skies overhead, the bright gravel underneath your feet, like powdered stars, and thousands of beautiful fish for playfellows! All spotted with gold and crimson, or winged with rose-leaves, and striped with faint purple and burnished silver, like the shells and flowers of the deep sea, where the moonlight buds and blossoms for ever and ever; and then she thought if she could only just reach over, and dip one of her little fat rosy feet into the smooth shining water—just once—only once—it would be so pleasant! and she should be so happy! and then, if she could but manage to scare the fishes a little—a very little—that would be such glorious fun, too—wouldn't it, you?

Well and so—she kept stooping and stooping, and stretching and stretching, and going to herself all the while "sir, she said! sir, she said! I'm going a-milking, sir," she said!" till just as she was ready to tumble in, head-first, something jumped out of the bushes behind her, almost touching her as it passed, and went plump into the deepest part of the pool! saying, once! once! with a heavy booming sound, like the tolling of a great bell under water, and afar off.

"Goody gracious! what's that!" screamed little Ruth Page, and then, the very next moment she began to laugh and jump, and clap her hands, to see what a scampering there was among the poor silly fish, and all for nothing! said Ruth, for out came a great good-natured bull-frog, with an eye like a bird, and a big bell-mouth, and a back all frosted over with precious stones, and dripping with sunshine, and there he sat looking at her awhile, as if he wanted to frighten her away, and then he opened his great lubberly mouth at her, and bellowed out, once! once! and vanished.

"Luddy tiddy! who cares for you!" said little Ruth; and so, having got over her fright, she began to creep to the edge of the bank once more, and look down into the deep water, to see what had become of the little fish that were so plentiful there, and so happy but a few minutes before. But they were all gone, and the water was as still as death; and while she sat looking into it, and waiting for them to come back, and wondering why they should be so frightened at nothing but a bull-frog, which they must have seen a thousand times, the poor little simpletons! and thinking she should like to catch one of the smallest, and carry it home to her little baby brother, all at once a soft shadow fell upon the water, and the scented wind blew her smooth hair all into her eyes, and as she put up both hands in a hurry to pull it away, she heard something like a whisper close to her ear, saying, twice! twice!—and just then, the trailing branch of a tree swept over the turf, and filled the whole air with a storm of blossoms, and she heard the same low whisper repeated close at her ear, saying, twice! twice! and then she happened to look down into the water—and what do you think she saw there!

"Goody gracious! mamma!—is that you!" said poor little Ruth, and up she jumped, screaming louder than ever, and looking all about her, and calling, "mamma! mamma! I see you, mamma! you needn't hide, mamma!" But no mamma was to be found.

"Well! if that isn't the strangest thing!" said little Ruth, at last, after listening a few minutes, on looking all round everywhere, and up into the trees, and away off down the river path and then toward the house—"If I didn't think I saw my dear good mamma's face in the water, as plain as day, and if I didn't hear something whisper in my ear and say, twice! twice!—and then she stopped and held her breath and listened again—"If I didn't hear it, as plain as I ever heard anything in my life, then my name isn't Ruth Page, that's all, nor Teenty Tawnty neither!" and then she stopped, and began to feel very unhappy and sorrowful, for she remembered how her mother had cautioned her never to go near the river, nor into the woods alone, and how she had promised her mother many and many a time never to do so, never, never! And then the tears came into her eyes, and she began to wish herself away from the haunted spot, where she could kneel down and say her prayers; and then she looked up to the sky, and then down into the still water, and then she thought she would just go and take one more peep, only one, just to see if the dear little fishes had got over their fright, and then she would run home to her mother, and tell her how forgetful she had been, and how naughty, and ask her to give her something that would make her remember her promises. Poor thing! little did she know how deep the water was, nor how wonderfully she had escaped! once, once! twice, twice! and still she ventured a third time!

Well and so—don't you think, she crept along, crept along to the very edge of the green slippery turf, on her hands and knees, half trembling with fear, and half laughing to think of that droll-looking fat fellow, with the big bell-mouth, and the yellow breeches, and the grass-green military jacket, turned up with buff and embroidered with gems, and the bright golden eye, that had so frightened her before, and wondering in her little heart if he would show himself again; and singing all the while, as she crept nearer and nearer, "nobody asked you, sir, she said! sir, she said! nobody asked you, sir, she said!" till at last she had got near enough to look over, and see the little fishes there tumbling about by dozens, and playing Lo-peep among the flowers that grew underneath the bank, and were multiplied by thousands in the clear water—when, all at once, she felt the turf giving way, and she put out her arms and screamed for her mother!—"Goody gracious! how she did scream! and then something answered from the flowing waters underneath, and from the flowering trees overhead, with a mournful sweet sound, like wailing afar off, thrice! thrice! and the flashing waters swelled up, saying, thrice! thrice! and the flowering branch of the tree swept over the turf, and the sound was the same, thrice! thrice! and in she went, headlong into the deepest part of the pool! screaming with terror, and calling on her mother to the last—poor mother!

Well and so—when she came to herself, where do you think she was? why, she was lying out in the warm summer air, on a green bank, all tufted with cowslips, and violets, and clover blossoms, with a plenty of strawberries, underneath her feet, and the bluest water you ever saw all round her, murmuring like the rose-lipped sea-shells; and the air was full of singing birds, and there was a little old woman looking at her, with the funniest cap, and a withered face, not bigger than you may see when you look at the baby through the big end of a spy-glass—the cap was a morning-glory, and it was tied underneath the chin, with bleached cobweb, and the streamers and bows were just like the colours you see in a soap-bubble.

"Goody gracious! where am I now!" said little Ruth.

"Yes, my dear, that's my name," said the little old woman, dropping a low courtesy, and then spinning round two or three times, and squatting down suddenly, so as to make what you call a chere.

"Why, you don't mean to say that's your real name!" whispered little Ruth.

"To be sure it is! just as much as—and pray my little creature, what's your name?"

"Mine! oh, my name is Ruth Page, only Ruth Page," and up she jumped, and spun round among the strawberries and flowers, and tried to make a courtesy like the little old woman, and then they both burst out a-lavishing together.

"Well!" said Goody Gracious, "you're a nice, good-natured, funny little thing, I'll say that for you, as ever I happened to meet with! but haven't you another and a prettier name, hey?"

"Why sometimes they call me Little Teenty-Tawnty," said Ruth.

"Fiddle-de-dee, I don't like that name any better than the other; we must give you a new name," said the little old woman; "but first tell me—and she grew very serious, and her little sharp eyes changed colour—first, tell me how you happen to be here, in the very heart of Fairy-land, with nobody to take care of you, and not so much as a wasp, or a bumble-bee, to watch over you, when you sleep!"

"Indeed, and indeed, ma'm, I don't know," said little Ruth; "all I do know is, that I have been very naughty, and that I am drowned, and that I shall never see my poor dear mamma any more!" And then she up and told the whole story to the little old woman, crying bitterly all the while.

"Don't take on so, my little dear, don't, don't!" said Goody Gracious, and out she whipped, what appeared to Ruth, nothing but a rumpled leaf of the tiger-lily, and wiped her eyes with it. "Be a good child, and after a trial of three days in Fairy-land, if you want to go back to your mother, you shall go, and you may carry with you a token to her, that you have told the truth."

"Oh! bless your dear little old-fashioned face!" cried Ruth—"oh, bless you! bless you! only give me a token, that will make me always remember what I have promised my poor dear mother, and I shall be so happy! and I won't ask for anything else."

"What, neither for humming-birds, nor gold-fish, nor butterfies, nor diamonds, nor pearls, nor anything you have been wishing for so long, ever since you were able to read about Fairy-land?"

"No, ma'm—just give me a ring of wheat straw, or a brooch from the ruby beetle, if you like, and I shall be satisfied."

"Be it so—but before I change you to a fairy, you must make choice of what you want to see in Fairy-land for three days running; for at the end of that time, I shall change you back again, so that if you are of the same mind then, you may go back to your mother, and if not, you will stay with us for ever and ever."

"For ever and ever!" said Ruth—and she trembled—please ma'm, I should like to go now, if it's all the same to you."

"No!"—she took the flower—"and as she spoke, she stooped down, and pulled up a forget-me-not by the roots, and breathed upon it, and it blossomed all over; "take this root," said she, "and plant it somewhere, and tend it well, and at any time after three days, if you get tired of being here, all you have to do, will be just to pull it up out of the earth, and wish yourself at home, and you will find yourself there in a moment, in your own little bed!"

"Goody gracious! you don't say so!"

"But I do say so."

"I declare, I've a good mind to try!"

"What, pull it up before you have planted it! No, no, my dear. It must be left out three-score and twelve hours, and be watered with the dew and the starlight of the South Sea, where you are now, thousands and thousands of miles from your own dear country; but there is one thing I would have you know, before you plant the flower."

"If you please, ma'm," said little Ruth.

"It is given to you, my dear, to help you correct your faults—you mean to do right, and you try pretty hard, but you are so forgetful, you say!"

"Yes, ma'm."

"Well, now, but so long as you tend this plant with care, and water it every day at the same hour—every day, mind you, and at the same hour—you will be growing better."

Ruth was overjoyed.

"But," continued the fairy, "if you neglect it for a single day, it will begin to drop and wither, the leaves will change, and some of the blossoms will drop off, and your mother will begin to feel unhappy and low-spirited."

"Oh, yes, but I never shall, ma'm!—never, never!"

"Don't be too sure! if you neglect it for two whole days running, all the flowers will drop off but one, and your mother will take to her bed, and nobody but you will know what ails her."

Poor Ruth began to tremble, and the tears came in her eyes. "But," continued the fairy, "but, if you should neglect it for three days running, my poor child, but for three days running, the last flower will drop off, and your mother will die of a broken heart."

"Oh, mercy! mercy!" cried poor little Ruth. "Oh, take it! take it! I wouldn't have it for the world!" and she flung it down upon the loose earth, and shook her little fingers, just as if something had stung her.

"It is too late now. See, my dear! it has already taken root, and now there is no help for it. Remember! your mother's health, happiness, and life, depend upon that flower. Watch it well! And now—daughter of earth!"—and as she spoke, she stooped, and pulled up a whole handful of violets, dripping with summer rain, and repeating the words—Daughter of earth, away!—Rosebud appear!" shook the moisture all over her; and instantly the dear child found herself aloft in the air, with pinions of purple gauze, bedropped with gold, with millions of little fairies all about her, swarming like butterflies and blossoms, after a pleasant rain, and welcoming their sister Rosebud to Fairy-land.

"Well," thought Rosebud—we must call her Rosebud now—"well! if this being a little fairy isn't one of the pleasantest things! and then she recollected that she had only three days to stay there, and she looked round her to ask if there was anybody near to help her, and take charge of her, and tell her what to do, and where to go."

"Daughter!" said a sweet voice that she knew, though it appeared to come out and steal up from the leaves of another morning-glory. "Daughter!"

"Mother!" said Rosebud.

"You may have your choice to-day of these three things—a butterfly-hunt, a wedding, or a play."

"Oh, a wedding! a wedding!" said Rosebud. "Oh, I have always wanted to see a wedding!"

"Be it so," said the voice, and instantly a sweet wind arose, and lifted her up, and swept her, and thousands more like her, over the blue deep, so swiftly, that nothing could be seen but a mist of sparkles here and there, till they all found themselves on the sea-shore, at the mouth of a deep sunny cove, all hung about with the richest moss, and lighted with pearls in clusters, and with little patches of glow-worms, and carpeted with the wings of butterflies. In the midst, were a multitude of little fairies, hovering and floating over a throne of spider-net ivory, on which lay the bride, with a veil of starlight, interwoven with the breath of roses, covering her from head to foot, and falling over the coach, like sunshine playing on clear water.

By-and-by, a faint, strange murmuring, was heard afar off, like the ringing of lily-bells, to the touch of the honey-bees, growing louder and louder, and coming nearer and nearer every moment. Rosebud turned toward the sea, with all the other fairies, and held her breath; and after a few moments, a fleet of little ships, with the most delicate purple and azure sails, so thin you could see the sky through them, came lipping along, over the sea, as if they were alive—and so they were—and drew up as if in order of battle, just before the mouth of the cove; and then a silver trumpet sounded on the shore, and a swarm of hornets appeared, whizzing and whirling all about the cove; and then there was another trumpet, and another, about as loud as you may hear from a caged blue-bottle—and compliments were interchanged, and a salute fired, which frightened the little lady-fairies into all sorts of shapes, and made the little bride-fairy jump up, and ask if her time had come, though to tell you the truth, the noise didn't appear much more terrible to Rosebud, than her little brother's pop gun; and then, a sort of barge, not unlike the blossom of a sweet-pea in shape, was manned from the largest of the fleet, and when it touched the bright sparkling sand, out leaped a little prince of a fellow, with a bunch of white feathers in his hat, plucked from the moth-millar, a sword like the finest cambric-needle, belted about his waist, and the most unimpeachable small clothes. This turned out to be the bridegroom, and after a few more flourishes, and not a little pulling and hauling among the bridesmaids, the bride and the bridegroom stood up together, and looked silly and sheepish, as if better wouldn't melt in their mouths, and after listening awhile to an old droning beetle without hearing a word, he said—they bowed and curtsied, and made some sort of a reply, nobody could guess what—and then forth stepped the master of ceremonies, a grizzled looking grass-hopper, with straw-coloured tights, and a fashionable coat, single-breasted, and so quakerish, it set poor little Rosebud a laughing, in spite of all she could do, every time she looked at his legs—and then! out ran the ten thousand trumpeting bumble-bees—and the katydid grew noisier than ever, and the cricket chirped for joy, and the bridegroom touched the bride's cheek, and pointed shyly toward a little heap of newly-gathered roses and violets, piled up afar off, in a shadowy part of the cave, just underneath a trailing canopy of changeable moss; the bride blushed, and the fairies tittered, and little Rosebud turned away, and wished herself at home, and instantly the bride and the bridegroom vanished! and the ships and the fairies! and the lights and the music! and Rosebud found herself standing face to face with the little withered old woman, who was looking mournfully at the drooping forget-me-not. The tears came into her eyes, and for the first time, since the flower took root, for the very first time, she began to think of her mother, and of her promise to the fairy, and she stooped down in an agony of terror, and shame, and self-reproach, to see how it fared with her forgetfulness. Alas! it had already begun to droop and wither, and the leaves were changing colour, and the blossoms were dropping off, and she knew that her mother was beginning to suffer.

"Oh that I had never seen the hateful flower!" cried Rosebud; and then instantly recollecting herself, she dropped upon her knees and kissed it, and wept upon it, and the flower seemed refreshed by her tears, and when she stood up and looked into the face of the good little fairy, and saw her lips tremble and the colour change in her sweet mournful eyes, she felt as if she never should be happy again.

"Daughter of earth! child of the air!" said the Fairy, "two more days remain to thee. What wouldst thou have?"

"Oh nothing! nothing! Let me but go back to my dear, dear mother, and I shall be so happy!"

"That cannot be. These trials are to prepare thee for thy return to her. Be patient, and take thy choice of these three things, a battle, a coronation, or a ball."

"Goody gracious! how I should like to see a coronation!" cried

Rosebud, and then she recollected herself, and blushed and curtsied, and said, "if you please, m'am."

"Call me mother, my dear—in Fairy-land. I am your mother."

"Well, mother," said Rosebud, the tears starting into her eyes, and her heart swelling, as she determined never to call her mamma, no, never! "Well, mother, if you please, I would rather stay here and watch the flower—I don't want to see anything more in Fairy-land; I've had enough o' such things to last me as long as I live. But oh, if I should happen to fall asleep!"

"If you should, my dear, you will wake in season; but take your choice."

"Thank you, mother, but I choose to stay here."

At these words the Fairy vanished, and Rosebud was left alone, looking at the dear little flower, which seemed to grow fresher and fresher, and more and more beautiful every minute, and wondering whether it would be so with her dear mamma; and then she fell to thinking about her home, and how much trouble she had given her mother, and how much better she would always be after she had got back to her once more—and then she fell asleep, and slept so soundly, that she did not wake till the sun was up, and it was time to water the flower. At first she was terribly frightened; but when she remembered what the Fairy told her, she began to feel comfortable, and lest something might happen, she took a little sea-shell that lay there, and running down to the water, dipped it up full, and was on her way back, thinking how happy her poor dear mamma would feel if she could only know what it was, and who it was that made her so much better, when she heard the strangest and sweetest noises all about her in the air, as if the whole sky was full of the happiest and merriest creatures! and when she looked up, lo! there was a broad glitter to be seen, as if the whole population of Fairy-land were passing right over her head, making a sort of path like that you see at sunrise along the blue deep when the waters are motionless and smooth and clear.

"Well," said she, looking up, "I do wonder where they are going so fast!"—and then she stopped—"and I do think they might be civil enough just to let a body know: I dare say 'tis the coronation, or the butterfly hunt, or the battle, or the—oh, how I should like to be there!"

No sooner was the wish uttered, than she found herself seated in a high gallery, as delicately carved as the ivory fans of the east; with diamonds and ostrich-feathers all about and below her, and a prodigious crowd assembled in the open air—with the lists, opened—a trumpet sounding—and scores of knights armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on dragonflies, waiting for the charge. All eyes were upon her, and everybody about was whispering her name, and she never felt half so happy in her life, and she was just beginning to compare the delicate embroidery of her wings with that of her next neighbour, a sweet little fairy who sat looking through her fingers at a youthful champion below, and pouting and pouting, as if she wanted everybody to know that he had jilted her, when she happened to see a little forget-me-not embroidered on his beaver: and she instantly recollected her promise, and cried out, "Oh, mamma! mamma!" and wished herself back again, where she might sit by the flower and watch over it, and never leave it, never! till her three days of trial were ended.

In a moment, before she could speak a word, or even make a bow to the nice little boy-fairy who had just handed her up her glove on the point of a lance like a sunbeam, she found herself seated by the flower. Poor little thing! It was too late! Every blossom had fallen off but one, and that looked unhealthy, and trembled when she breathed upon it. She thought of her mamma, and fancied she could see them carrying her up to bed, and all the doctors there, and nobody able to tell what ailed her; and she threw herself all along upon the grass, and wished all the fairies at the bottom of the Red Sea, and herself with them! And when she looked up, what do you think she saw! and where do you think she was! why, she was at the bottom of the Red Sea, and all the wonders of the Red Sea were about her—chariots and chariot-wheels and the skeletons of war-horses, and mounted warriors, with heaps of glittering armour, and jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and banner and shield and spear, with millions and millions of little sea fairies, and Robin Goodfellow, and giants and dwarfs, and the funniest-looking monsters you ever heard of; and the waters were all bright with fairy lamps that were alive, and with ribands that were alive, and with changeable flowers that swam about and whispered to each other in a language of their own; and there were great heaps of pearl washed up into drifts and ridges, and a pile of the strangest-looking old-fashioned furniture, of gold and ivory, and little mermaids, with their dolls not longer than your finger, with live fishes for tails, jumping about and playing hide-and-seek with the sun-spots and star-flashes, and the striped water-snakes of the Indian seas, the most brilliant and beautiful of all the creatures that live there.

And while she was looking about her and wondering at all she saw, she happened to think once more of the forget-me-not, and to wish herself back again! At that instant she heard a great heavy bell booming and tolling—she knew it was tolling—and she knew she was too late—and she knew that her mother was dead of a broken heart—and she fell upon her face, and stretched forth her hands with a shriek, and prayed God to forgive her! and allow her to see her mother once more—only once more!

"Why, what ails the child!" whispered somebody that seemed to be stooping over her.

It was her mother's voice! and poor Ruth was afraid to look up lest it should all vanish for ever.

"Upon my word, Sarah," said another voice—it was her father's!

"Upon my word, Sarah, I do not know but the poor little creature's thoughts appear to have undergone another change. I have heard nothing to-day of the forget-me-not which troubled her so the first week, have you?"

"She has mentioned it but once to-day, and then she shuddered; but perhaps we had better keep it in the glass till we see whether it will bear to be transplanted, for she seems to have set her little heart upon having that flower live; I wish I knew why?"

"Do you indeed, mamma?" whispered poor Ruth, still without looking up; well, then, I will tell you. That flower was given me by a Fairy to make me remember my promises to you, my poor dear mamma, and so long as I water that every day at the same hour, so long I shall be growing better and better, and my poor dear mamma—boo-hoo! boo-hoo!" and the little thing began to cry as if she would break her heart.

"Why, this is stranger than all," said the father. "I can't help thinking the poor child would be rational enough now, if she hadn't read so many fairy books; but what a mercy it was, my dear Sarah, and how shall we ever be thankful enough, that you happened to be down there when she fell into the water."

"Ah!" Ruth Page began to hold her breath and listen with the strangest feelings.

"Yes, Robert, but I declare to you I am frightened, whenever I think of the risk I ran by letting her fall in, head first, as I did."

Poor Ruth began to lift her head by little and little, and to feel about, and pinch herself to see if she was really awake, or only dreaming.

"And then, too, just think of this terrible fever, and the strange, wild poetry she has been talking, day after day, about Fairy-land."

"Poetry! Fudge, Robert, fudge!"

Ruth looked up, full of amazement and joy, and whispered—"Fudge, father, fudge!" and the very next words that fell from her trembling lips as she sat looking at her mother, and pointing at a little bunch of forget-me-nots in full flower, that her mother had kept for her in a glass by the window, were these—"Oh, mother! dearest mother! what a terrible dream I have had!"

"Hush, my love, hush! and go to sleep, and we will talk this matter over when you are able to bear it."

"Goody gracious, mamma!"

"There she goes again!" cried the father; "now we shall have another fit!"

"Hush, hush, my love! you must go to sleep now, and not talk any more."

"Well, kias me, mamma, and let me have your hand to go to sleep with, and I'll try."

Her mother kissed the dear little thing, and took her hand in hers and laid her cheek upon the pillow, and in less than five minutes she was sound asleep, and breathing as she hadn't breathed before, since she had been fished out of the water, nearly three weeks before, on her way to Fairy-land.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES.

SEMINOLE ANECDOTE.

THE intrepid bravery and tender affections of one of these Indians are strikingly verified in the following anecdote. Having taken refuge for some time in the city of San Augustine, and got the name of Peter, he moved his residence to St. Anastasia's Island, which makes the harbour of the city, employed as a hunter by Mr. Fish, an English gentleman, who owned that island, and who gave it celebrity by the culture of the sweet orange. Peter being absent, a party of his enemies crossed the river, surprised his habitation, and murdered his wife and two children. On his return he did not hesitate a moment on the course to pursue; he fastened up his house containing the dead, repaired to Mr. Fish's dwelling near by, to borrow a gun that Mr. Fish had made with a large bore, expressly for shooting ducks in large flocks. In this Peter put an uncommon load of buck-shot, and getting into his canoe proceeded up the river, about six miles to a creek on the main, as though instinct had pointed out to him the way they went. He had ascended the creek, when a distant smoke curling above the forest, apprised him of an Indian camp. He landed, and taking his course through the woods of a hostile country, discovered four Indian men sitting on a log side by side, the fifth near by employed in cooking; he circled round so as to bring the four in range, crept up close, fired, threw down his gun and rushed up with his tomahawk. The report, the fall of four Indians, and Peter's presence, armed with such a weapon, were so sudden and impressive, that the one who was cooking neither attempted defence or flight, but became an easy prey to his vengeance. By this time he found that one of the fallen was not wounded, and was endeavouring to reach his arms, but Peter had the advantage in being already armed. On searching he found the scalps of his wife and children stretched and hung out to dry, which he brought off, with several articles of property they had stolen, some of them arms, and the scalps of the five Indians he had killed, the greatest of all trophies, in his conception; returned home and buried his wife and children the same evening; and literally pined to death over their grave. This anecdote I had from Mr. Fish, who pointed out to me poor Peter's grave.—St. Augustine Herald.

LITERARY PATRONAGE.

Patronage of authors is an antiquated fashion, and at present means nothing. It is still repeated by rote among a few young or ignorant writers, as an echo dies away by degrees into an unmeaning sound. The public favour is deemed a sufficient recompense. Nothing, for instance, can be more unjust than that an author, who has professedly written for the general taste, and has in consequence derived great emoluments from his works, should have a pension; while another, who has confined his toil to mathematics, or other abstruse pursuits, confessedly useful and highly meritorious, but not adapted to much sale, goes wholly unrewarded. This case evinces that a pension is a mere piece of van-glory in the government, which desires to have it recorded that such and such an eminent writer was pensioned.

VANITAS: VANITATUM VANITAS!

From the German of Goethe.

I've set my heart upon nothing, you see;
Hurrah!
And so the world goes well with me.
Hurrah!
And who has a mind to be fellow of mine,
Hurrah!
Why, let him take hold and help me drain
These mouldy lees of wine.
I set my heart at first upon wealth;
Hurrah!
And bartered away my peace and health;
Hurrah!
The slippery change went about like air,
And when I had clutched me a handful here,
Away it went there.
I set my heart upon woman next;
Hurrah!
For her sweet sake was oft perplexed;
Hurrah!
The false one looked for a daintier lot,
The constant one wearied me out and out,
The best was not easily got.
I set my heart upon travels grand,
Hurrah!
And spurned our plain old Fatherland;
Hurrah!
Naught seemed to be just the thing it should,
Most comfortable beds and indifferent food,
My tastes misunderstood.
I set my heart upon sounding fame;
Hurrah!
And lo! I'm eclipsed by some upstart's name;
Hurrah!
When in public life I loomed quite high,
The folks that passed me would look away!
Their very worst friend was I.
And then I set my heart upon war;
Hurrah!
We gained some battles with eclat.
Hurrah!
We troubled the foe with sword and flame,
(And some of our friends fared quite the same.)
I lost a leg for fame.
Now I've set my heart upon nothing, you see;
Hurrah!
And the whole wide world belongs to me.
The feast begins to run low, no doubt;
But at the old oak we'll have one good bout.
Come, drink the lees all out!

JUDGE LYNCH OUTWITTED.

Some years ago, Judge Lynch claimed a broad jurisdiction, in and about the vicinity of T—, Florida. He took cognizance of all matters, and punished all offenses, which were not otherwise provided for by law. No informality, or lack of proof, positive, screened the culprit from the infliction of his summary mode of punishment. If an individual, by any indiscretion or impropriety of conduct, rendered himself obnoxious, Judge Lynch was sure to apply the corrective. The public constituted the judge's grand jury, and just so sure as an individual excited the public voice against him, just so sure he was compelled to undergo the sentence of the judge, without the benefit of clergy.

I forget who was the first rail-ride man in Florida, but I well recollect that not a few passengers were conveyed out of the corporate limits of T—, on a single rail, that being the punishment in ordinary cases. But I have not forgot the first time that the judge's sentence could not be executed, and when his executive officers met with a resistance which they could not overcome.

John Rodgers was given to drink, and when under the influence of the brain-stealer, was in his own estimation, the most unfortunate man living. Naturally a quiet, well-disposed fellow; when intoxicated he became noisy, quarrelsome, and disagreeable. On that day, he had indulged to excess, and had got into numerous quarrels, in one of which he fired a horse-pistol on a small boy, who returned the compliment by peppering him with a full charge of shot, from a fowling-piece. The distance between the parties, however, prevented any serious damage being done, and but for the great disproportion in the size and age of the antagonists, the duel between John Rodgers and the race-rider, would have passed off without notice.

It soon became a town-talk, however, and as John went staggering through the streets, swearing vengeance, and exhibiting his wounds—his right arm and hand having received several of the shot—his conduct tended much to increase the excitement against him. Judge Lynch was not slow to make a decision in the case, and before dark it was currently given out that John Rodgers was to be ridden upon a rail that night.

Now, of all other men, perhaps John Rodgers had the greatest aversion to "sitting on a rail." He would rather have died than suffer such an indignity; and immediately on receiving this intelligence, he resolved that he would not be caught "sleepin' bery sound." He then took another large drink, and after clearing his throat, exclaimed in a whining tone of voice:

"Ride me on a rail!—Why I'll be shot, if I'd berid on a rail, for five thousand dollars!"

"Well you'd better put out, then," said the gentleman of the bar, as he set back the bottle and popped the "pic" into the drawer. "Judge Lynch has said it."

"Well, now I'm not a gain to be sarved no such trick," said John. "Judge Lynch be hangd!"

John sauntered out, crying and muttering to himself, "I'll blow 'em all to—, if they come a projectin' about this child."

He then stepped into a store, and purchased three pounds of powder, which he tied up in a silk pocket-handkerchief. As it grew towards dark, John, with his handkerchief under his arm, walked into a confectionary, kept by a good old Frenchman, and purchased a few cigars; lighted one of them, and commenced smoking. Already the officers of the high court of Judge Lynch were in pursuit of him, and as he saw them gather round the door, he began to puff away at his cigar and mutter curses against "The whole infernal pack of 'em."

up worse than ever you was afore—blast nation seize your plecters. You jest fool with this child—that's all—and if I don't blow you to kingdom come—you see if I don't!"

The crowd, which had assembled round the door, now gradually entered the room, and as they did so, John began to flourish his cigar and cry:

"Jest you tetch, now. If you lay your hands on me, I'll send you whartin', if this here powder's good for any thin'. I don't care for myself—I'd rather be blowed through the roof of this here store, than be rid on a rail—a confounded sight."

This last speech had attracted the attention of the old Frenchman, who began to look very uneasy.

"Ha, what dat you shall say!—blow off de roof from my house!"

"Lay hold of him," said the judge, who generally attended the execution of his sentences in person; "lay hold of him, fellows!"

"Stand off! Stand off!" exclaimed John, at the top of his voice, as he held up the powder in one hand and the cigar in the other. "Do you see this 'ere cigar, and this 'ere powder! Jest you lay your hands on me, and I'll tetch 'em together. If I don't now, dead burn me."

"Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the old Frenchman. "Go out of my house, sair—begone with your poodre and your cigar—what le diable!—will you blow all up my property!"

"Well, let 'em let me alone then. I'll blow all hands up and myself, too, before I'll be rid on a rail."

"Gather him up, gentlemen," said the judge; "the sentence of the law must be executed."

The crowd, which had now increased in number, gradually drew round the besieged Rodgers, and the end of the rail was seen entering the door.

"Here goes, then!" exclaimed Rodgers, drawing the cigar from his mouth, and applying it close to the handkerchief. There was a sudden rush to the doors, and a confusion of voices crying out, "Stop! stop!"—"Don't! don't!"—above all of which might be heard the old Frenchman crying out, "Murdare! murdare!"

"Well," said Rodgers, as the crowd dispersed, "I'd just as lieve be killed as rid on a rail."

"I tell you one, two, several times, to begone with your poodre magazine, and your cigar. Will you leave my house, sare!"

But Rodgers could neither be persuaded nor driven from his position against the wall, until the old man had prevailed upon the Lynch party to withdraw to some distance from his door. He then left the house, much to the relief of the old Frenchman; but ever as the crowd approached, he would prepare to apply the match. At one time they approached with more than usual determination, and when they had got quite near, a cry was heard to say—"Bring the rail!"

"You try it," said John, "and if you don't get into a hornet's nest, it'll be because fire won't burn powder, now mind."

The circle began cautiously to close round him, but as John knocked the ashes from his cigar, at the same time producing a few sparks, preparatory to touching it to the powder, he was again suddenly left alone. The individual who had worried himself considerably by carrying the rail, in his sudden retreat dashed it to the ground, and exclaiming, "Non comestis in statu combustibus!" abandoned the attempt—the rest of the posse soon imitated his example, leaving Rodgers triumphant.

Thus Judge Lynch, for the first time, witnessed the most utter contempt of his authority, and the most determined defiance of his power.

The following morning found John Rodgers a sober man, and from that time forth, he was never seen within the jurisdiction of Judge Lynch, of T—, Florida.—Augusta Mirror.

A WITTY AUCTIONEER AND AN OLD CLOCK.

The Christian Register of Boston publishes with just commendation the amusing speech of an auctioneer unnamed, who had the selling of the clock of the "old brick meeting-house" in Boston. To be sure, the Courier of that city throws some doubt upon the authenticity of this speech, in which case we have only to apply the Italian saying, Si non è vero è ben trovato.

A VENERABLE RELICK.

The clock which for many years hung in the interior of the "old brick" meeting-house, in this city, after various fortunes lately fell into the hands of the auctioneer. At the time of the sale, the auctioneer actually delivered the following speech, which we have been permitted to publish. We venture to affirm, that a more appropriate and witty speech never fell from the lips of the most celebrated orators at vendues:

"Here is the relick of the early days of our country's annals, a remnant saved; antique of its kind, and venerable for every association connected with its history—the old church clock—hearing a mark of patriarchal longevity in the date, that speaks it one hundred and eighteen years of age. Yet, while it has ticked and struck off the thousands and tens of thousands, who have looked on its calm face, into eternity, it is still in good time, and going! going! Though its existence was begun in the land of kings, moved by the spirit of our pious fathers, it followed them to the land of pilgrims, and was consecrated to serve in the house of God, whom they came hither to worship as the children of his kingdom, and not as spiritual slaves to earthly despotism. This sober, ever-going clock, came over in the days of caution and sanity. It came when a sea voyage was a serious thing, and religion a serious thing, and a church clock a serious thing. It counted the moments, while the minister of God was preaching, and his hearers listening of eternity. It echoed his text, 'Take heed how ye hear.' Then was there real clock-work and order in men's minds and principles. Vanity did not then stare this venerable monitor in the face, and study the while how to display its plumage. Avarice did not dare, under its measured click, to be planning in the temple how to lay up goods for many years. Nor was pride then puffed up by the breath of its own nostrils, while this mellow-hand was showing its duration cut shorter at the beat of every pulse. Now, who will let this venerable memento of those days be desecrated! Who will not wish to possess himself of it, as a relick of the age of simplicity and godly sincerity! Look at its aged but uncracked face. It is calm; for it has not to answer for the sermons it has heard. Look at it, ye degenerate sons of New-England! Do ye not seem to see the shade go back on the dial-plate to the days of your fathers, and to hear the voices of those aged servants of God, who went from their preaching to their reward! I would speak more, but the hour is come. To whom shall it be sold?"

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

"All the splendid furniture of his late residence had been sold, excepting his wife's harp. That, he said, was too closely associated with the use of herself; it belonged to the story of their loves; for some of the sweetest moments of their courtship were those when he had leaned over that instrument, and listened to the melting tones of her voice.—Washington Irving's Sketch Book.

THE TREASURED HARP.

Go, leave that harp! Twined round its strings
There's many a magic spell!
Leave that untouched! the strain it brings
This heart remembers well.
Let that remain! all else beside
Go scatter to the wind!
The chords that won my home a bride
No other home shall find.
It hath a power, though all unstrung
It lies neglected now;
And from her hands 'twill ne'er be wrung,
Till death these limbs shall bow!
It hath no price since that sweet hour
She tuned it first, and played
Love's evening hymn within the bower
Her youthful fingers made.
A spirit like a summer's night
Hangs o'er it, that cherished lyre,
And whispers of the calm moonlight
Are trembling from the wire.
Still on mine ear her young voice falls,
Still floats that melody;
On each loved haunt its music calls—
Go! leave that harp and me!

DESCRIPTIVE READINGS.

To what strange and unexpected circumstances is the success in life of some men owing! On the side of Mount St. Angelo, in the kingdom of Naples, is a little castle, perched on a rock like an eagle's nest. This nest is the residence of a nabob. He was a common sailor of Castellamare, who was thrown, in consequence of his adventurous disposition, on the shores of Huddonshire, where, assisted by the recollections of his youth, he hit upon the means of making a large fortune. It is the usage of the wood-cutters of Mount St. Angelo, to attach their fagots to a long cable, and thus make them slide down from the top of the mountain to the water-side. Our adventurer, at a critical moment, recommended a similar mode of transporting his cannon to a rajah in whose service he had engaged. The experiment was completely successful; a brilliant victory was the result, and a crore of rupees rewarded the ingenuity of the Italian.

Friendship, the wine of life, should, like a well-stocked cellar, be continually renewed; and it is consolatory to think, that although we can seldom add what will equal the generous first growth of our youth, yet friendship becomes insensibly old in much less time than is commonly imagined, and not many years are required to make it mellow and pleasant. Warmth will, no doubt, make a very considerable difference; men of affectionate temper and bright fancy, will condescend a great deal sooner than those who are dull and cold.

When I see leaves drop from the trees in the beginning of autumn, says Warwick, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world. While the sap of maintenance lasts, my friends swarm in abundance; but in the winter of my need they leave me naked. He is a happy man who hath a true friend at his need; but he is more truly happy that hath no need of his friend.

Pleasure is a rose, near which there ever grows the thorn of evil. It is wisdom's work so carefully to cull the rose as to avoid the thorn, and let its rich perfume exhale to heaven, in grateful adoration of Him who gave the rose to blow.

Among the writers of all ages, some deserve fame, and have it; others neither have nor deserve it; some have it, not deserving; others though deserving, yet totally miss it, or have it not equal to their deserts.

A young clergyman having, in the hearing of Dr. Parr, stated that he would believe nothing he could not understand. "Then, young man," said the doctor, "your creed will be the shortest of any man's I know."

Two citizens courting the daughter of Themistocles, he preferred the worthy man to the rich one, and assigned this reason: "I had rather she should have a man without money, than money without a man."

Archimedes being asked to go and hear a person who imitated the nightingale to perfection, answered, "I have heard the nightingale herself."

When Simonides offered to teach Themistocles the art of memory, he answered—"Ah, rather teach me the art of forgetting; for I often remember what I would not, and cannot forget what I would."

When Charles Lamb visited the Litchfield cathedral, his guide informed him that three men once dined upon the top of the steeple. "They must have been very sharp set," said Lamb.

Lamb one night wanted to demonstrate, after the manner of Swift, that the Man-tchou Tartars were cannibals, and that the Chinese were identical with the Celts (Soll Teas.)

The sparkle of a gratified wife's eye will go further than a ton of anthracite—it warms the heart.

The only difference between one man and another is whether he governs his passions or his passions him.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

THE WAR IN OUR DISPUTED TERRITORY.—THE DRAFTING AT SMITHVILLE.

Smithville, Down East, to the state of Maine,
March 8, 1899.

DEAR GENERAL MORRIS.—I was going to give you a kind of a history of our folks and our town, going away back to the beginning, and so coming down along in course, but we have been in such a distraction here about the war for a week past, that I can't think of anything else, nor write about anything else, till the flurry is over. My son John has gone down to the boundary war, along with the rest of 'em, and we feel bad enough about it, I can tell you. He's too young to go, I know; he's a mere striplin' of a boy yet; as I told you in my 'tother letter, he won't be seventeen years old, till the fifth day of next May, if he should live to see it. But the poor boy may never live to see that day now; for he's taken his life in his hands, and gone to fight for his country like a man and a hero, live or die. It was a tryin' time to us, General; it was a tryin' time—but I may as well tell you the story, and then you'll know.

After we heard the British had taken our land agent, and carried him off to New-Brumzick, we begun to look out for a squall. It was about dark, when the post brought the papers that had the account of it; so arter supper, we all went into grandfather's to talk the matter over. For grandfather knows more about such matters than anybody else in Smithville—he was out three years in the revolution, and was in the battle of Lexington before he listed, and had the fore-finger of his right hand shot off in the battle of Bunker-hill, just as he was pulling trigger, and aiming at a British officer that was hurrying up the hill, and driving his soldiers up like a fury. But grandfather always says he didn't lose his shot by it; for when he found that finger was gone, and wouldn't pull, he tried the next finger, and the old gun went without losing his aim, and the British officer fell; and he always believed it was his shot brought him down. Though grandfather is eighty-five years old now, and is so lame that he can't walk about much, yet his mind holds out remarkably, and he can talk about these things as smart as ever he could. His house stands right aside of mine, only fur enough apart for a long shed between 'em, and he used to live in the same house with me, or rather I lived in the same house with him, till I had so many children, and my family got so large, 'twas rather worrisome to the old gentleman, and we was rather scant of room, so I built another house, and moved into it, and got cousin Debby to live with the old folks, and take care of them.

So, as I said afore, arter supper we took the papers, and went into grandfather's, and I set down and read it all over to him, how a parcel of the British come over into our disputed territory, and went to cutting down our timber like smoke, so as to steal it, and carry it off in the spring when the rivers open, away down to New-Brumzick; and how our new governor, Mr. Fairfield, as soon as he heard about it, sent Mr. McIntire, the land agent, and a hundred and fifty men to put a stop to that stealin' business, and ketch the felers if he could, and bring 'em off; and how Mr. McIntire took his men, and marched away off down there into the woods, ever so fur, into our disputed territory, and got all ready, and was just a going to ketch the felers, and bring 'em off up to Augusta, when the thieving chaps turned about, and ketched him, and put him on a sled, and hauled him off away down to Fredrickton, in New-Brumzick, and put him in jail.

When I got along so fur, grandfather couldn't hold still no longer—he struck his staff down on the floor, just as if it had been a training-gun, and says so.

"John, there 'll be trouble; you may depend upon 't there 'll be trouble. If our people will stand that, they ain't made of such kind of stuff as the old revolution folks was made of, nor nothing like it. In them days, if the British had a took one of our men, and hauled him off to Fredrickton, and put him in jail, every man in the old Bay State, and every boy tu, that was big enough to carry a gun, would a shouldered it, and marched to New-Brumzick, and Fredrickton jail would a been stripped down in no time, and Mr. McIntire brought home agin."

"Says I, 'father, you mistake'—I most always call the old gentleman father, since my father died, and he's always been a sort of father to all of us, and to everybody in Smithville, from oldest to youngest—says I, 'father, you mistake; your revolution folks couldn't a brought Mr. McIntire home again, for he was not there in them days'—at's Mr. McIntire that's in jail now."

"Yes, they would," said the old gentleman, rising out of his chair, and striking his staff down on the floor harder than he did afore; "they'd a gone afore Mr. McIntire, or any other man living, that had American blood in his veins, and they'd a brought him back, if they'd had to fit their way through forty New-Brumzicks for him. Aint the people waking up about it no where I aint they going down to give them New-Brumzicks a thrashing?"

I looked at my son John, and I see his face was all of a blaze; and he looked as if he was just a going to burst out.

"Says I, 'John, my boy, what's the matter?'"

His face grew redder, and the tears come into his eyes, and he struck his fists together, hard enough to crack a walnut.

"By king," says he, "father, I wish I was old enough to train; I want to go down there, and help give them ere British what they deserve."

"By the memory of George Washington!" said my grandfather, "I wish I was young enough to train; I should like to shoulder my gun agin, and go and teach them New-Brumzicks better manners."

But what are they doing to Augusta? Aint there no stir about it yet?"

"Says I, 'we'll read on and see.' So I looked over the papers a little more, and found the governor had ordered ten thousand of the militia to be drafted to go down and keep the British out of our disputed territory, and prevent their stealing our pine timber."

"That looks something like it," said my grandfather; "that's a little like the spunk of old seventy-six. The British 'll have to let our disputed territory alone now, or else they 'll have to come to the scratch for it. I wish I was twenty years younger, I'd go down as a volunteer."

"I wish I was only two years older," said my son John, "then I should stan' a chance to be drafted; and if I wasn't drafted, I'd go, whether or no."

At that my wife and grandmother both fetched a heavy sigh. Grandmother said she thought father had been through wars enough in his day to rest in his old age, and let such things alone. My wife, she wiped her eyes, for they was full of tears, and begged John not to talk so, for he was too young ever to think of such things. And then she turned to grandfather, and asked him if he really thought there was going to be any war.

"Yes," said grandfather, "just as true as the sun will rise to-morrow, there'll be a war, and that pretty soon tu, unless the New-Brumzicks back out, and give up Mr. McIntire, and let the timber on our disputed territory alone. The orders will be up here, to draft the militia within two days, and I shouldn't be surprised, if they should be called out before to-morrow morning."

At that my wife and the gals had a pretty considerable of a crying spell.

After we'd talked the matter all over, we went home, and went to bed; but we did n't any of us rest very well. My wife she sighed herself to sleep arter awhile; and I heard my son John, arter he got to sleep, muttering about guns and the British, and declaring he would go. I had just got into a drowsie about midnight, when I heard a heavy knock at the door. I sprang out of bed, and went and looked out of the window, and asked who was there.

"Sargent Johnson," was the reply. "We've got to stan' a draft to-night. The governor's orders got here about an hour ago. We're sending round, to warn our company, to meet up here, to Mr. Wilson's tavern, at two o'clock this morning; it's the near about one now, and the captain wants Squire Smith to come over and help see about making the draft. He wants to get through with it as soon as he can, so them that's drafted may be getting ready, for they've got to set out to Bangor at eight o'clock this morning."

I told him I would come right over; and so I lit a candle and dressed myself as quick as I could, and come out into the kitchen to put on my boots, and who should I find there but my son John. All dressed, and his cap on, and he looked like a man. He had heard what had been said, and it put the fidgets right into him.

"Says he, 'father, I want to go over and see 'em draft.' I told him he better be abed and asleep by half. But he said he couldn't sleep; and I found the boy was so earnest to go, that I finally told him he might."

We hadn't more than got dressed, before we heard the drum beat, over to Mr. Wilson's tavern; and so we started off and went over. When we got there, they had a fire in the large hall, and the company was most all there. The captain had got a bowl and some black beans and white beans all ready, and he wanted me to draw for them, so they might all feel satisfied there was no partiality. There was one sargent to be drafted, and we drew him first; and it fell to Sargent Johnson. He stood it like a man; I didn't see as he trembled or turned pale a bit. He looked a little redder if anything, and kind of bit his lip as he took his gun and marched into the middle of the floor, and turned round and looked at the company, and says he,

"I'm ready to go and fight for our country to the last drop of my blood, but what we'll make the British back out of our disputed territory, and stop their thieving."

The company gave three cheers for Sargent Johnson, and then we went to drafting the privates. There was sixty in the company, and ten was to be drafted. So they took fifty white beans and ten black ones, and put 'em into the bowl, and held it up, so nobody couldn't look into it, and I was to draw 'em out as the orderly sargent called out the names. So when we got ready to begin, the sargent sung out,

"William Jones—"

I put my hand into the bowl and drew, and sung out,

"White bean."

"Peter Livermore," cried the sargent.

Peter Livermore started, as if he'd had a shock from an electrical machine; his legs shook a little, and he looked in the face as if he felt rather bad. I put my hand in and drew, and sung out,

"White bean."

Peter looked better in a minute. He's a great tall six-foot chap, and looks as if he could almost whip a regiment of common fellers himself; and although he's something of a brag, it's generally thought, when you come right up to the pinch of the game, he's a little cowardly. Peter stretched his head back, and straddled his legs a little wider, and looked round on the company, and says he,

"I sware, I thought I should a been drafted, and I almost wish I had. It would a been fun alive to a gone down there, and had a brush long with them ere New-Brumzicks. My old fowling-piece would a made day-light shine through fifty of 'em in half an hour's fighting. I sware I'm disappointed—I was in hopes I should been drafted."

The company knew Peter too well to mind much what he said; they only laughed a little, and the sargent went on, and called out,

"John Smith, the third."

I drew to it, and says I,

"White bean."

The sargent called out again,

"John Smith, the seventh."

That was the oldest son of uncle John Smith, the blacksmith, a smart boy, about twenty-three years old. Somehow, as soon as I heard his name, I kind of felt as if he was going to be drafted; and I put in my hand and drew, and sure enough, I sung out,

"Black bean."

John shouldered his gun in a minute, and marched out into the middle of the floor, and took his stand beside Sargent Johnson. He looked so resolute, and marched so quick, that the company at once gave three cheers for John Smith the seventh.

"John Sanborn," cried the sargent.

"White bean," said I.

"Ichabod Downing," said the sargent.

I drew, and answered the same as before,

"White bean."

"Jeremiah Cole," called out the sargent.

"Black bean," said I; "black bean for Jerry."

After waiting a minute, the captain called out, "where's Jerry Cole? Isn't Jerry here?"

"Yes, setting down behind here on a bench," answered a half a dozen at once.

"Come, Jerry, come forward," said the captain, "let us see your spunk."

By-and-by, Jerry come creeping out from behind the company, and tried to get across the floor; but his face was as white as a cloth, and he shook and trembled so he couldn't scarcely walk. He let his gun fall on the floor, and set down in a chair that stood by the side of the room, and boo-hoo'd out a crying like a baby. "Well done," said the captain, "there's spunk for you."

"What's the matter, Jerry? can't you go?"

"Boo-hoo," said Jerry, "I aint well at all—I'm very sick, captain; I don't think I could go any way in the world."

"Well, well," said the captain, leave your gun, and you may run home as fast as you can go and see your mother, and we'll get somebody else to go in your room."

At that, Jerry darted out of the door, and pulled foot for home, like a streak of lightning.

"Where's Peter Livermore," said the captain; "he may take Jerry's place, being he was disappointed at not being drafted." And he called Peter, and told him to take Jerry's gun, and stand up in the floor with the drafts. Peter coloured as red as you ever see, and begun to sweat. At last, says he,

"Captain, I don't see how I can go any way in the world, my family's out of wood and meal, and a good many other things, and I couldn't leave home."

"Oh," says the captain, "we'll take care of your family while you are gone, Peter. Come, take the gun; don't stop to parley."

"But, captain," said Peter, the sweat beginning to roll off of his face, "if I'd been drafted, captain, I'd a gone with the greatest pleasure in the world, and shouldn't wanted no better fun. But somehow or other, it seems to me like presumption, to go to throwing myself into danger, when it wasn't my lot to go. I shouldn't like to go, captain, without I was drafted."

"Well, well," said the captain, "you needn't go; we want no cowards to go. But who is there here, among the spectators, or among the men whose names have been called, that ain't afraid to take Jerry's gun and fill Jerry's place. If there's any one here that's willing to go, let him come forward."

At that my son John sprang like a young tiger, and seized Jerry's gun, and jumped into the middle of the floor and stood up by the side of Sargent Johnson, and shouldered his gun with so much eagerness and looked so fierce and determined, although nothing but a striplin' of a boy, that the whole company burst out in three tremendous cheers for John Smith, the tenth—that's what he's numbered; we go according to numbers in the village. The captain asked me if I was willing he should go. I never was so tried in my life.

For my own part, bein' the boy was so brave and wanted to go so much, I should a said yes. But then I knew it would almost kill his mother. So, what to do I didn't know. But I found the boy had got his mind so fixed upon going, that if he didn't go it would about kill him. So, on the whole, I told the captain yes, he might put his name down.

Then we went on with the drafting again and got all through without any more trouble, and got ready to go home about three o'clock. The captain told them that was drafted, that they must all be ready to march at eight o'clock in the morning, and they must be in front of the tavern at that hour, and start together for Bangor. My son John and I then went home, and made up a fire and routed the folks all out, and told 'em John was listed, and got to start at eight o'clock, to fight for our disputed territory. Such an outcry as there was for about a half an hour, I guess you never heard. My wife couldn't a cried harder if John had been shot dead there before her feet, though she didn't make much noise about it; for she always cries to herself. The older gals, they cried considerable louder; and some of the younger children, that didn't hardly understand what the trouble was about, sot in and screamed as loud as they could hawl.

At last, says I, "there's no use in this noise and fuss; the boy's got to go, and he's got to be off at eight o'clock tu, and the sooner we set ourselves to work to get him ready, the better. That seemed to wake 'em up a little. My wife went to work and picked up his clothes, and she and the gals sat down and mended his shirts and stockings, and fried up a parcel of dough-nuts for him to put in his knapsack, and got him all fixed up and breakfast ready about six o'clock. We hadn't waked up old grandfather in the night, 'em' he's so old; but in the morning we let him know about it, and he wanted my son John to come in and see him before he went; so we went into the old gentleman's room.

"Now John, my boy," said the old gentleman, "I feel proud to hear such a good report of you. You'd a made a good soldier in the days of the revolution. 'Twas such boys as you that drove the British from Lexington, and mowed 'em down on Bunker Hill. You'll feel a little queer at first when you see the enemy coming up to you with the guns piked right at you; and, brave as you are, you'll feel a little streaked. But you mustn't mind it; as soon as they're fired once, you want feel any more of it, and want keener no more about 'em than you would about a flock of sheep. But don't be in a hurry to fire—mind that—don't be in a hurry to fire—they told us at Bunker Hill not to fire till the enemy got up so near we could see the whites of their eyes. And 'twas a good rule; for by that means we let 'em get up so near, that when we did fire, we mowed 'em down like a field of clover, I can tell you. Be a good boy, John, and don't quit our disputed territory as long as there is any dispute about it."

By this time we see 'em begin to gather in the road up by the tavern, and I told John it was time to be off; so he took his gun, and his knapsack, which was pretty well stuffed, for each of the children had put in a dough-nut or an apple, or a piece of cake, after their mother had crammed in as much as she thought he could carry, and then he marched away like a soldier up to the tavern. When they started they had to come down again by our house and go up over a rise of land 't'other way about half a mile before they got out of sight. So we all stood out in a row along by the side of the road to see 'em as they went by. Grandfather got out as far as the door-step and stood leaning on his staff, and grandmother stood behind him with her spears on, looking over his shoulder; and the rest of us, with the children and cousin Debby and all, went clear out to the side of the road. Pretty soon they came along by, Sargent Johnson at the head, and the rest marching two and two. When they got along against us, little Ned ran up and tucked another great apple into John's pocket, and my wife called out to him: "'Now do pray be careful, Johnny, and not get shot."

Then grandfather raised his trembling voice, and says he, "Now John, my boy, remember and don't be in a hurry to fire." And the children called out all together, "good-by, John, good-by, John," each repeating it over, three or four times. John looked round and nodded once, when his mother called out to him, but the rest of the time he held his head up straight and marched like a soldier. We stood and watched 'em till they got clear to the top of the hill and was just going out of sight, when all at once John stepped out one side, where we could see him, and let his old gun blaze away into the air, and in a minute more they were out of sight. "Ah," said old grandfather, "that sounds like Bunker Hill; that boy'll do the business for them New-Brunswickers, if they don't let our disputed territory alone."

We feel dreadful lonesome, General, since John went away. It seems as if our family is most all gone now he's gone. If you should hear anything about his fighting down there to our disputed territory, I wish you would put it in your paper, for we shall feel dreadful anxious till we hear from him. So I remain your friend and subscriber,

JOHN SMITH, ESQUIRE.

SELECT DRAMATICK CRITICISM.

CROLY'S CATILINE.

AMONG the dramatic productions of the age there is not one to which we should assign a higher rank than to Croly's noble tragedy of Catiline. We are surprised that it is not more frequently produced upon the stage, for the character of the great conspirator in this play affords opportunities for the display of tragic powers, in our opinion unsurpassed, whether we regard the startling energy and beauty of the language or the dramatic force of the action. To be sure there are many passages, which it would be necessary to retrench, to adapt the piece to the stage; but this could be easily accomplished so as to do no serious injury to the dramatic effect of the tragedy. We wish that Mr. Wallack or Mr. Forrest would make the experiment, and give us an adequate personation of Catiline. It is truly a glorious part, and it would task the powers of either of those distinguished actors, to do it justice.

There are faults in Catiline, but they are those which would be recognized only by the classical student. In the first place the truth of history is violated, far beyond what is justified either by any sane theory of the art, or by the example of any who are entitled to be classed among its legitimate masters. Liberties with time are almost always necessary to the poet who dramatizes an historical action, and with them rightly taken no critic will quarrel. Liberties with place and scene are, in like manner, to a certain extent fair. But there is a plain rule which we at least can never consent to lose sight of; and this is, that the writer who weaves either drama or romance from the materials of history, must keep these materials in all essential particulars sacred; and from this rule Mr. Croly has in our opinion very unwisely departed.

The supposed ignorance of the spectator is, we maintain, the only ground on which the dramatist who violates history can hope to escape condemnation. No man who knows what happened at any particular period of time, can endure to see it misrepresented. Every violation of fact is to his mind a pain. He cannot sit out a tragedy full of such violations, without having at least a very great part of the pleasure, which the poet's genius might naturally have excited within him, neutralized. Would any man have dared to bring a falsified account of Catiline's conspiracy—an account falsified in any important particular whatever—before the eyes of an intelligent Roman assembly? The answer is plain. We see in the volume before us the clearest evidence that Mr. Croly is a very accomplished scholar, and the more we reflect on it, we are the more astonished that he should have ventured upon such liberties as he has taken with such a well-known story. The Marianism of Catiline—his imaginary wife—the imaginary daughter of Marius—his Hamlet—his Aspasia, and many things besides, were all perfectly needless. But with these exceptions we do not hesitate to say, that we consider Catiline the most brilliant tragedy that has in our time been added to the stock of the British drama.

It was a bold adventure for Mr. Croly to think of presenting anew, in a dramatic form, what Lord Orford so properly calls, in his memoirs, "the most brilliant episode in the history of Rome." Several of the chief masters of the art had already exerted all their genius on the story of Catiline; and yet none of them had been in any true sense of the word successful; and nobody ever dreamed of anything, when the name of this great conspirator was mentioned, but the unrivalled orations of Cicero, and the equally unrivalled narrative of Sallust. Nobody ever thought of the Catiline of Crebillon but as a miserable failure; that of Voltaire is better, but still bad; and Ben Jonson's tragedy, rich as it is in learning and rich in masterly declamation, is cold in its stateliness and undramatic, in the midst both of historical truth and of poetical ornament.

In the whole management of Croly's Catiline—in the structure of the plot—in the exposition, which is alike clear, natural, and powerful—in the dialogue, above all, which is throughout full of true dramatic vigour, we see, if we ever have seen them, the proofs of the author's dramatic vocation. Perhaps we never read any first tragedy, by any dramatist whatever, abounding so much in happy dramatic situations. It would be ridiculous to enter into anything like an analysis of a tragedy on the story of Catiline; we shall therefore merely quote a few passages, to justify what we have said in Mr. Croly's praise, as a master of dramatic dialogue, and a bold and elegant writer.

Hamilar, a Carthaginian hostage in Rome, of royal blood and ambition, is introduced alone in a grove near the city, meditating on the degradation of his country and himself, when Cethegus breaks in upon his solitude. These two men had been feasting together the same evening, at the mansion of Catiline, their common friend; but the Moor had left the banqueters early, because their mirthfulness did not suit the state of his spirits. Their mirth, it is true, had been but hollow; for that day Cicero had been elected consul, and the proud Catiline defeated in the object of his long ambition. It is thus that the two haughty and discontented spirits commune:

Hamilar. Hark! Who disturbs the night! [He listens.

Cethegus's voice.]

One of those dark-kards—a hot-headed fool; Senseless, and brave as his own sword.

Hallo!

[He calls.

I'll try what mischief's in his mettle now. [Cethegus comes in.

Ceth. Ha! prince of darkness—impetuous of the Nile—

Star-gazer!—you are welcome to them all;

Rome is no place for you! put on your wings,

And perch upon the moon! You left us all

Just in our glory.

Ham. 'Twas a noble set!

Ceth. Rome has no better;—all patrician blood,

Glowing with cyprus wine—wild as young stags—

Bold as bay'd boars—haughty as battle steeds—

Keen as flesh'd hounds—fire-eyed as mounting hawks.

Ham. 'Twill be a glorious day that lets them soar.

How wasn't with Catiline!

Ceth. He seem'd to feel

The fiercest joy of all; pledged the whole room

In brimming goblets; talk'd a round of things,

Lofty and rambling as in ecstasy;

Laugh'd, till his very laughter check'd our mirth

And all gazed on him; then, as if surprised,

Mixing the silence, mutter'd some excuse,

And sank in reverie; then, wild again,

Talk'd, drank and laugh'd—the first of bacchanals!

Ham. That looks like madness. [Aside.] He has been absurd:

The conslate was his by right.

Ceth. By right!

Ay, or by wrong! had I been Catiline,

I should have knock'd out Cicero's brains.

Ham. [Advancing to him.] Speak low;

The trees in Rome are spies. It may be done.

The great patricians hate him, though some few

Lacquey his steps. If Catiline were roused

To draw the sword, this talker would be left

Bare as his pedigree.

Ceth. [In surprise.] Raise war in Rome!

Ham. No,—but take down the consul's haughtiness;

Make the patricians what they ought to be,

Rome's masters, and restore the forfeitures

Now in plebeian hands.

Ceth. Show me but that;

And I am his, or yours, or any man's.

My fortune's on my back; let the usurers

Have my last acre in their happy hands.

Ham. You must have Catiline, for he has all

That make such causes thrive—a mighty name,

One that the youth will cling to; a bold tongue—

A bolder heart—a soldier's skill in arms—

A towering and deep-rooted strength of soul,

That, like the oak, may shake in summer's wind,

But, strapt by winter, stands immovable.

Ceth. He's a tried soldier!

Ham. A most gallant one!

Ceth. You've seen him in the field!

Ham. Ay, fifty times,—

'T the thickest fight; where all was blood and steel;

Plunging through steeds under'd, gory men

Mad with their wounds, through lances thick as hail,

As if he took the ranks for idle waves!

Now seen, the battle's wonder; now below,

Mowing his desperate way, till, with wild shrieks,

The throng roll'd back, and Catiline sprang out

Red from the graves to the helm!

Ceth. He shall be ours!

Then, Rome is full of malcontents; the land

Cumber'd with remnants of the war; the slaves

Will crowd to his first signal; in his house

He has the banner that the Marian troops

Still worship like a god;—but he will call

The act conspiracy.

Ham. Jove save us all!

Ceth. How now, Hamilar?

Ham. [Gang.] Face you well, my lord. [He suddenly returns.

Conspiracy! Is not the men undone?

All over bankrupt, broken right and left—

Within this week he'll be without a roof,

A roof, a bed, a robe, a meal to eat!

Conspiracy! He's level'd!—on the earth!

His last drachm hang upon this day.

And now you have him. This day has dissolved

His last allegiance. Go—you'll find him now

Tormented, like the hound that bays the moon,

Feeling to see the pomp beyond his reach.

Ceth. He has forsworn the world!

Ham. 'T's laughable.

Ceth. If he draw back!

Ham. Draw back! You'd find him flame.

Go to the banquet, ere they all break up;

Yet should be chill,—provoke him—strife dispute—

Seize on his hasty word. The revellers there

Will take it for command; and thus his name

Be mixed with tumult, till the lion snarled

Is forced to battle.

Ceth. Then, to Catiline!

I may be king or consul yet.

Ham. Away! [Cethegus goes.]

The hour of blood's at hand. [Draws his dagger.]

Be thou my god!

Away, bold fool! O, Rome! those are thy men!

Ay—you shall have a crown,—a crown of straw;

Chains for your sceptre; for your honours stripes;

And for your squalid court a maniac's cell;

Where you and your compeers may howl to th' night,

And rave rebellion.

We have indicated by italics two or three of what we think the finest things in this scene; but as a whole it is superb. The description of Catiline's behaviour at the debauch—the image of the oak, that "strapt by winter, stands immovable"—the beginning of the last speech of Hamilar, "Be thou my god"—but above all the magnificent description of Catiline in battle, "Red from the graves to the helm"—will not sink in comparison with the most powerful passages in Shakspeare. These extracts must be accepted by our readers as a sufficient specimen of the two first acts, in which the conspiracy is gradually worked up and discovered by the patriotic consul.

The third act closes with a scene of very great art, and of great power. Indeed out of Shakspeare we remember nothing equal to it in these respects. It is the scene, in which Cicero is heard by Catiline in the Senate-house, after the whole of the guilty machinations have been discovered, through the weakness (so far the truth of history is adhered to) of a woman and a mistress, the famous night of the famous "Quosque tandem abutere, Catiline," etc.

THE SENATE-HOUSE.—The Temple of Jupiter Statens. The senate, at night; a consul in the chair; CICERO on the floor, concluding his speech.

Cic. Our long dispute must close. Take one proof more

Of this rebellion.—Lucius Catiline

Has been commanded to attend the senate.

He dares not come. I now demand your votes!—

Is he condemned to exile?

CATILINE comes in hastily, and flings himself on the bench; all the senators go over to the other side.

Cic. [Turning to Catiline.] Here I repeat the charge, to gods and men.

Of treason's manifold;—that, but this day,

He has received despatches from the rebels,

That he has leagued with deputies from Gaul

To seize the province; nay, has levied troops,

And raised his rebel standard—that but now

A meeting of conspirators was held

Under his roof, with mystic rites, and oaths,

Pledged round the body of a murder'd slave,

To these he has no answer

Cat. [Rising calmly.] Conscript fathers!

I do not rise to waste the night in words;

Let that plebeian talk; 'tis not my trade;

But here I stand for right. Let him show proofs,

For Roman right; though none, it seems, dare stand

To take their share with me. Ay, cluster there,

Cling to your master; judges, Romans,—slaves!

His charge is false;—I dare him to his proofs.

You have my answer now! I must be gone.

Cic. Bring back the helmet of this Gaulish king

[The actors return with the helmet and axe.]

These, as I told you, were this evening seized

Within his house—You know them, Catiline!

Cat. The axe and helmet of the Allobroges! [Aside.]

Know them! What crimination's there! What tongue

Lives in that helm to charge me! Cicero—

Go search my house, you may find twenty such;

All fairly struck from brows of barbarous kings,

When you and yours were plotting here in Rome.
I say, go search my house. And is this all?
I scorn to tell you by what chance they came.
Where have I levied troops, tampered with slaves,
Bribed fool or villain, to embark his neck
In this rebellion? Let my actions speak.
Cic. (Interrupting him.) Deeds shall convince you! Has the traitor done?

Cat. But this I will avow, that I have scorn'd,
And still do scorn, to hide my sense of wrong:
Who brands me on the forehead, breaks my sword,
Or lays the bloody scourge upon my back,
Wrongs me not half so much as he who shuts
The gates of honour on me,—turning out
The Roman from his birthright; and for what! (Looking round him.)

To fling your offices to every slave;
Vipers, that creep where man dares not climb;
And having wound their loathsome track to the top
Of this huge mouldering monument of Rome,
Hang hissing at the nobler man below.

Cic. This is his answer! Must I bring more proofs?
Fathers, you know there lives not one of us,
But lives in peril of his midnight sword,
Lusts of proscriptio have been handed round,
In which your general properties are made
Your murderers' hire.

Bring in the prisoners.

[The lictors return with Cethegus, and others.

Cat. (Startled.) Cethegus! (Aside.)
Cic. Fathers! those stains to their high name and blood,
Came to my house to murder me; and came
Suborn'd by him.

Cat. (Scornfully.) Cethegus!

Did you say this?
Cet. Not I! I went to kill
A prating, proud plebeian, whom those fools
Palm'd on the consulship.

Cic. And sent by whom?

Cet. By none.—By nothing but my zeal to purge
The senate of yourself, most learned Cicero!

[A cry is heard without: More prisoners! the Allobroges! An officer enters, with letters for Cicero; who, after glancing at them, sends them round the Senate. Catiline is strongly perturbed.
The Allobroges come in, chained.

Cic. Fathers of Rome! If man can be convinced
By proof, as clear as day-light, there it stands!

[Pointing to the prisoners.

Those men have been arrested at the gates,
Bearing despatches to raise war in Gaul
Look on these letters! Here's a deep-laid plot
To wreck the provinces: a solemn league,
Made with all form and circumstance. The time
Is desperate,—all the slaves are up;—Rome shakes!—
The heavens alone can tell how near our graves
We stand ev'n here!—The name of Catiline
Is foremost in the league. He was their king,
Tried and convicted traitor! Go from Rome!

Cat. (Haughtily rising.) Come, consecrated lictors! From your throats: [To the Senate.

Fling down your sceptres:—take the rod and axe,
And make the murder as you make the law.
Cic. (Interrupting him.) Give up the record of his banishment. [To an officer.

[The officer gives it to the Consul in the chair.

Cat. (Indignantly.) Banish'd from Rome! What's ban-ish'd, but set free
From daily contact of the things I loathe!
"Tried and convicted traitor!" Who says this?

[With growing violence.

Who'll prove it, at his peril, on my head!
Banish'd!—I thank you for't! I break my chain!
I hold some slack allowance till this hour—
But now my sword's my own. Smile on, my lords;
I scorn to count what feelings, wither'd hopes,
Strong provocations, bitter, burning wrongs,
I have within my heart's hot cells shut up.
To leave you in your lazy dignities.
But here I stand and scoff you: here, I fling
Hated and defiance in your face.
Your Consul's merciful.—For this all thanks.
He dares not touch a hair of Catiline.

[The Consul reads.]—"Lucius Sergius Catiline: by the decrees of the Senate, you are declared an enemy and an alien to the state, and banished from the territory of the Commonwealth."

The Consul, drive the traitor from the temple!

Cat. (Furious.) "Traitor!" I go—but I return. This—trial!

Here I devote your Senate! I've had wrongs

To stir a fever in the blood of age.

Or make the infant's sinew strong as steel.

This day's the birth of sorrows!—This hour's work

Will breed proscriptio.—Look to your hearths, my lords!

For there henceforth shall sit, for household gods,

Shapes hot from Tartarus!—all shames and crimes!

Wan treachery, with his thirsty dagger drawn;

Suspicion, poisoning his brother's cup;

Naked Rebellion, with the torch and axe,

Making his wild sport of your blazing thrones;

Till Anarchy comes down on you like Night,

And Measure seals Rome's eternal grave!

[The Senators rise in tumult and cry out,

Go, enemy and parricide, from Rome!

Cat. It shall be so!—[Going. He suddenly returns.

When Catiline comes again.

Your grandeur shall be base, and clowns shall sit

In scorn upon those chairs;—your palaces

Shall see the soldier's revel, and your wealth

Shall go to deck his harlot and his horse.

Then Cicero, and his tools, shall pay me blood—

Vengeance for every drop of my boy's veins;—

And such of you, as cannot find the grace
To die with swords in your right hands, shall feel
The life, life worse than death, of trampled slaves!

[The Senators cry out,

Go, enemy and parricide, from Rome!

Cic. Expel him, lictors! Clear the Senate-house!

[They surround him.

Cat. (Struggling through them.) I go—but not to leap the gulf alone.

I go—but when I come—twice be the burst

Of ocean in the earthquake—rolling back

In swift and mountainous ruin. Fare you well!—

You build my funeral-pile, but your best blood

Shall quench its flame. Back, slaves! (To the lictors)—I will return!

[He rushes through the portal; the scene closes.

We have no room to quote from the concluding scenes of this remarkable and strangely neglected tragedy, but the reader may rest assured that the terrible catastrophe is terribly represented. Catiline, breathing blood, madness, pride, scorn, wrath—everything but hope, dies in the midst of the camp which he has scaled; and when the curtain drops upon him, the imagination of the reader—we had almost said the spectator—remains behind it, while memory recalls the awful description of the dead Catiline in Sallust:—"Catilina vero longe a suis inter hostium cadavera repositus est, et paululum intempera spirans; ferocissime animi quam habuerat vivus in vultu retinens."

The rapidity and vigour of the dialogue and the action—the strength with which the characters are conceived, and the ease and simplicity with which they are developed—the extraordinary beauty and energy of the language—the Shakspearian vividness of the metaphors—and the unflagging spirit with which the interest is kept up from the beginning to the end—these are the prominent merits of Croly's Catiline. On the whole, there can be no doubt that this, whether considered as a poem or as a drama, is a splendid performance, and one which must make the name of Croly immortal. Without very minute criticism indeed, and very copious quotations, we could scarcely hope to make our readers agree in all the praise we have bestowed on it. Let them read the tragedy for themselves, and we shall be satisfied to abide by their judgment."

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

A WIFE'S REVENGE.

THE city of King Bladud has been amused for some time past by the gaieties of the lady of a lately-treated baronet.

She is separated from him, and accuses him of deeds and words hardly consistent with a state of conjugal felicity. It is said that a scolding wife and a smoky chimney are two of the greatest plagues flesh is heir to; but it is, nevertheless, possible for a philosopher to bear them with tolerable equanimity. When, however, an attack is made upon a man's purse, it is a very different thing; his patience forsakes him then, if ever. In the very clever novel of "Marriage" is introduced a scene in which a Major Douglas has to submit to the infliction of the sarcastic attacks of an old virago upon his family, himself, and everything belonging to him. This he does with admirable patience, until the old lady sneers at his skill in the sports of the field, when his good temper fails him altogether. Now we think that an attack upon the purse can be more worse than even this. In the present case the lady is of that opinion, for her method of revenge is, if possible, to ruin her lord and master by her great extravagance. All her talents are exerted to attain this end. Her ingenuity is taxed to the utmost in this very amiable pursuit. Every extravagant freak that either she or her companions, (we can't say friends,) if it involves expense, and don't require prompt payment, is put into immediate execution; no whim can possibly come amiss to her; she pursues her headlong course with a vigour, energy, and enjoyment, which is particularly amusing to the looker-on, as it is understood that her cara-spasa is rather susceptible when its pockets are touched. How long she can continue to carry on this game it is impossible to calculate, but undoubtedly, if it continue much longer, the embarrassments of the gentlemen will be serious indeed. How he will extricate himself from his very unpleasant predicament is a matter of much speculation. Unfortunately for him, there is no divorce for pecuniary peccadilloes, and there is no other apparent speck on Lady—'s conduct. There was a rumour that he intended to pursue the same course as that of a certain police magistrate, who at once amused and disgusted the town by his indehelicacy. But it seems to us that such a course would be of very little use, as by the exercise of a little ingenuity on the lady's part the precaution might be set at naught. If a tradesman were to commence an action for the recovery of the value of necessities supplied to the wife, it would be no defence to allege (we apprehend) that the husband had already provided or paid for such necessities; for how could John Nokes know that his neighbour, Thomas Stiles, had accommodated the lady with the necessities of life amply, and yet never exceed an apparently moderate sum. The remedy we should suggest to Monsieur Mor is that he should take back the lady to his arms and heart. We have heard nothing alleged against either party; to render such a course improper. The gentleman should recollect that the treatment the lady experienced at the hands of her friends, in her youthful days, was so cruel and unjust, that it is impossible that the general tone of her moral feeling may have been wounded without being depressed, and this should be considered as some excuse. Both parties are miserable spirits; they cannot be more so under the same roof and it seems to us that the lady's conduct proceeds from piqued affection more than anything else. Surely, by the interference of judicious friends, the matter might be accommodated, and the accomplishment of our proposition would give us great pleasure.

* Can it be possible that Croly's sublime tragedy has never found a publisher in this country? And this, while an inane and trashy novel by A. or Lord B., is in the act of being promptly re-published by the publishers for the intellectual tastes of the people of the United States?—Ed. N. Y. THE BELL OF THE BALL.

"Arbitrator ex forme."—Ovid.

"ONLY think on my desolate state,
On an illness so un-a-propos!
Mrs. Grampus has given a fête,
And I was unable to go:
Dear Charlotte, to ease my despair,
Tell me all about Muggiesham-hall,
Say who were the favourites there,
Who shone as the bells of the ball!"

"Mrs. Grampus in fiery blazed,
To eclipse every beauty she strove:
The old colonel exclaimed, as he gazed,
"A prodigious fine woman, by Jove!"
But, oh heavens! what an arm, what a fist,
Her bulk all the loves would appal;
With her face like the sun in a mist,
She was not the bells of the ball."

"Lady Elmore moved like a queen,
A model of dignified grace;
Sure never more beauties were seen,
Than illumine her elegant face;
The ringlets which float round her head,
Her friends a warm Auburn miscall;
But Sir Harry pronounced they were red,
She was not the bells of the ball."

"It was pretty Miss Malkin's debut,
With her manners so gentle and mild;
And her eye of ethereal blue,
She looked like Simplicity's child;
But she danced not—perhaps she was shy;
But wherefore sit wrapp'd in a shawl?
Some thought her a little awry,
So she was not the bells of the ball."

"Lavinia was playful and gay,
And tripped like some lass on the green;
'She's a nymph, she's a sylph, she's a fay!'
Cried that stupid old Major Macqueen;
But mute she stood, as she saw him,
When she speaks, 'tis a horrible squall;
With a voice like a peacock in pain,
She was not the bells of the ball."

"Round the rich pretty widow from Leeds
All the officers throng'd as a prize;
In flirting she always succeeds,
Though there's something quite odd in her eyes;
Miss Middlethorp ventured to hint,
That on objects she obviously fell;
'T would be cruel to call it a squint—
But she was not the bells of the ball."

"Lady Lucy bore triumphs away,
Her charms might an anchorite warm;
The mazurka was made to display
All the grace of her delicate form;
On her cheek the fresh bud of the rose
Seemed destined each heart to enthral;
But, alas! it encroached on her nose,
And she was not the bells of the ball."

"All applauded Miss Lancaster's taste,
She was dress'd with such exquisite skill;
Every ringlet with science was placed,
Every look had its mission to kill.
Her complexion is fair as the snow,
But perhaps she's a little too tall;
I should think about ten years ago
That she shone as the bells of the ball."

"Then the petticoat pedant, Miss Pope,
Tried to mingle deep learning with love;
Not aware that 'tis useless to bore,
That the owl can combine with the dove;
While she danced, in impertinent tone
She desecrated on Spurzheim and Gall;
She might be as blue as the Rhone,
But she was not the bells of the ball."

"Never was so enchanting a night,
Each partner soft nothings could say;
The hours fled on wings of delight,
And I sigh'd at the dawning of day:
You remember Augustus Delmaince,
Whose taste is acknowledged by all?
Well, he said—but you'll think me so vain—
He said I was the bells of the ball."

FACTS AND SCRAPS.

OVER-AFFECTION FOR ANIMALS.—A lady kept a malicious ape, which bit one of her women so cruelly in the arm, that her life was in danger. The lady chid her ape, and told him not to bite so deep in the future. The maid lost her arm; and the marchioness dismissed her with a vague promise of a provision. The marchioness blaming this inhumanity, the lady answered, with great coolness, "What would you have me do with the girl? She has lost an arm."

THE FIRST STEP.—It is a que le premier pas qui coute: "The first step is the only difficulty." This proverb was oddly applied by a lady, who, hearing a canon if the company say that St. Piat, after his head was cut off, walked two entire leagues with it in his hand. "Yes, madam, two entire leagues!" I firmly believe it," answered the lady; "on such an occasion the first step is the only difficulty."

A GENTLEMAN.—Gentility is neither in birth, manner, nor fashion, but in mind. A high sense of honour, an adherence to truth, delicacy and politeness towards those with whom you may have dealings, are the essential and distinguished characters of a gentleman.

MR. PEEL.—A foreigner perambulating the streets of London, would have strong reason to believe that Mr. Peel was one of the most odious and unpopular ministers that ever existed. In almost every book-shop window it is to be seen a placard on paper, thus ominously inscribed: "Peel's Criminal Acts."

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

AMUSEMENTS OF WAR.—When Louis XIV. besieged Lille, the Count de Brouai, governor of the place, was so polite as to send a supply of ice every morning for the king's dessert. Louis said one day to the gentleman who brought it, "I am much obliged to M. de Brouai for his politeness, but I wish he would send it in larger portions." The Spaniard answered, without hesitation, "Sir, he thinks the siege will be long, and he is afraid the ice may be exhausted." When the messenger was going, the duke of Charost, captain of the guards, called out, "Toll Brouai not to follow the example of the governor of Douai, who yielded like a rascal." The king turned round, laughing, and said, "Charost, are you mad?" "How, sir?" answered he; "Brouai is my cousin." In the Memoires de Grammont, you will find similar examples of the amusements of war. You remember that when Philip of Macedon vanquished the Athenians, in a pitched battle, they sent next morning to demand their baggage; the king laughed, and ordered it to be returned, saying, "I do believe the Athenians think we did not fight in earnest."

VEUVES.—Extract of a letter from Naples, dated the 5th of January:—"Early in the morning of New-Year's day, we were awakened by a violent explosion like the report of cannon, and soon discovered that it was an eruption of Vesuvius. In half an hour afterwards a dense cloud of smoke and ashes covered Naples, having the same effect, from the electrical fluid issuing from it, as generally precedes a summer storm. Approachments were then made for the city; but the wind changed and carried the cinders towards the shore at Portici. The eruption ceased in the evening, but the detonations re-commenced on the second, and continued throughout the day. The earth was constantly tremulous under our feet. In the evening Vesuvius was all on fire, and the lava flowed down into the plain between Puzosi and Torre del Greco, emitting great vapours. On the third, the mountain became more quiet, and in the evening was not so much inflamed as on the preceding night, but sent out continual flashes, which is a phenomenon extremely rare. Since yesterday it has been at rest. If the eruption had continued as it began, we should have seen a renewal of what happened in 1822, when, during these days, Naples was covered with cinders, and candles had to be lighted at mid-day."

CAUSERS OF CONTINUAL QUARREL.—For Pope's exquisite good sense, take the following, which is a master-piece:—"Nothing hinders the constant agreement of people who live together but mere vanity—a secret insisting upon what they think their dignity or merit, and inward expectation of such an over-measure of deference and regard as answers to their own extravagant false scale, and which nobody can pay, because none but themselves can tell readily to what pitch it amounts to." Thousands of houses would be happy to-morrow if this passage were written in letters of gold over the mantelpiece, and the offenders could have the courage to apply it to themselves.

HEROES.—It were well if there were fewer heroes; for I scarcely ever heard of any but did more mischief than good. These overgrown mortals commonly use their will with their right hand, and their reason with their left. Their pride is their title, and their power puts them in possession. Their pomp is furnished from rapine, and their scarlet is dyed with human blood. If wrecks, and ruins, and desolation of kingdoms, are marks of greatness, why do not we worship a tempest, and erect a statue to the plague? A pangracious upon an earthquake is every jot as reasonable as upon such conquests as these.

A COMPLIMENT.—A Frenchman who had learned English, wished to be particularly polite, and never neglected an opportunity of saying something pretty. One evening he observed to Lady R., whose dress was fawn-coloured, and that of her daughter pink—"Mildly, your daughter is the pink of beauty." "Ah, monsieur, you Frenchmen always flatter." "No, madam, I only do speak the truth, and what all the world will allow, that your daughter is the pink, and your ladyship the drab of fashion!" It was with great difficulty the Frenchman could be made to comprehend his soliste.

COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISE.—During the domination of Bonaparte, sugar, coffee, tobacco, cotton-wine, &c., were sent by sea from London to Salonica (or European Turkey), where these goods were carried on horses and mules, across Servia and Hungary, into the whole of Germany, and even into France: so that goods were consumed at Calais, coming from England, only seven leagues distant, which goods had made a circuit equivalent, as far as expense went, to a voyage twice round the world!

INCREMENSAL FACT.—The Abbé Rogner, secretary of the French Academy, was collecting in his hat from each member a contribution for a certain purpose. The president, Rose, one of the forty, was a great miser, but had paid his quota; which the abbé not perceiving, he presented the hat a second time. Rose, as was to be expected, said he had already paid. "I believe it," answered Rogner, "though I did not see it." "And I," said Fontenelle, who was beside him, "I saw it, but I do not believe it."

DISGRACEFUL PEOPLE.—Some persons are of so teasing and fidgety a turn of mind, that they do not give you a moment's rest. Everything goes wrong with them. They complain of a head-ache or the weather. They take up a book, and lay it down again—venture an opinion, and retract it before they have half done—offer to serve you, and prevent some one else from doing it. If you dine with them at a tavern, in order to be more at your ease, the flesh is too little done—the sauce is not the right one, they ask for a sort which they think is not to be had, or if it is, after some trouble, procured, do not touch it; they give the waiter fifty contradictory orders, and are restless and sit on thorns the whole of dinner-time.

ARAB WOMEN.—The Arab women on the banks of the Nile, add to delicacy of form and natural elegance, a striking simplicity of dress. The poorest among them wear a long blue chemise, with a veil of the same colour—one corner of which veil they hold in their mouths when they meet any man, especially Europeans. A large mask of black taffeta covers the faces of the richer females, leaving nothing to be seen but the eyes and forehead. Ear-rings, several necklaces of shells or paste, intermingled with amulets of silver or of polished copper, bracelets, various and multiplied; the chin, the hands, and a part of the arms strewed with blue, the eye-lashes tinged with black—such are the particulars which complete the dress of an Arab female, and which, notwithstanding their apparent fantasticalness, produce an original and graceful ensemble.

DOMESTICK TURN.—Many women think they are domestic, if they stay at home to entertain company; while their husbands think they are as little domestic at home, as abroad.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

An esteemed friend requests to know, if we would be pleased to insert in the Mirror, "a case of two in medical jurisprudence." We "should be pleased" to receive any communication from the writer. From among the innumerable cases sent us upon the subject of the troubles in Maine, we select the following, from the pen of a young lady, residing on Walthamstow, Penna.:

"We cannot tamely submit to be driven from our territory."—Gov. Fairfield.

Soft mormur bright New-England's rills—

Proud wave her forests green—

Fair are our northern hills, and fair

Each vale that lies between.

For murmuring stream, for waving wood,

For mountain, plain, and for dell, their blood—

Our fathers freely poured their blood—

Our fathers bravely fell!

Yes! these were bought with purple streams

From many a noble vein;

And where those men unobscured stood,

Their sons must stand again.

Unfur! your banners, and go forth!

Ye sons of patriots dead;

And fight ye as your sires have fought—

Blest as your sires have bled.

Rush onward! with the trumpet's note,

And drum's deep roll go forth!

Help to defend from ruthless power

Your brethren of the north.

Fling forth! fling forth! the stripes and stars,

The banner of the brave—

Till high, upon Acrostock's stream,

Columbia's flag shall wave

With gleaming sword, and cannon's roar,

Go teach each daring son,

The lesson which was taught his sire,

When freedom's land was won.

The reader will find, on the fourth page, a capital letter from our old friend, JOHN SMITH, Esq., respecting the difficulties in Maine. These are the most graphic, and really the best Yankee papers we have ever seen, or expect to see, let who will write them. The spirit of "Major Jack Downing," from the same pen, notwithstanding their cleverness, were not so much to our taste as those of "JOHN SMITH, Esq." Their author has struck at a new line in literature, more pungent, racy, and original, than that adopted by "Ben." We like him none the less for being "native here, and to the manner born;" for we are among those who can appreciate a good production, even before it has received the commendation of foreign critics. We believe the author of these papers to be one of the cleverest men of the day, and think those who read them will coincide with us in this opinion. The letter published in today's Mirror we recommended to the sage of American artists, Mowbray, as a fit subject for the display of his peculiar talent.

Notes of the Knickerbocker, the Citizen, the Spirit of the Times, and the Baltimore Museum, are necessarily deferred till the next number—also, some new songs by J. B. Phillips—Annals by Mrs. Elliot—and a variety of other matter. The crowd of communications is so great upon us, that we begin to feel, like the rest of the papers in our neighbourhood, disposed to enlarge our dimensions.—John Neal has excelled himself in his story of "Goody Gracious." It is one of the best hits he ever made. Read it.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1839.

The Soaking Mountain in the Mississippi.—The Louisville News-Letter (one of the ablest weekly journals in the United States) has the following remarks upon the engraving of the Soaking Mountain in a late number of the Mirror:—"In design and execution it cannot be commended too highly, while its truthfulness to nature is quite striking enough to recall the spot to the mind of one who has ever visited it. The 'Soaking Mountain,' or, as the French voyagers have termed it, 'La Montaigne qui se trempe a l'eau,' which is represented by this engraving, is indeed one of the most celebrated spots in the magnificent scenery of the upper Mississippi. It is situated about one hundred miles above Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien, and its altitude has been variously estimated at from two to five hundred feet. At all events it is the loftiest eminence above the mouth of the Wisconsin. It is washed upon all sides by the waters of the river, and from this circumstance, perhaps, arose the tradition of the Indians, that upon a certain day in each year it sinks a little into the earth. The French voyagers, in their wisdom, have discarded the superstition, and thought proper to term it, 'the mountain which soaks in the water,' though the change of the word 'sinks' into 'soaks' is an arbitrary proceeding altogether; for if anything, there is less reason to suppose the latter than the former. The base of the eminence is composed entirely of solid rock corresponding with the adjoining bluffs; and this constitutes one of its most remarkable features, since there are but two other islands of a similar character between this point on the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico. One of these is the celebrated 'Grand Tower,' below St. Louis. All the other islands are composed merely of alluvial deposits of sand, though often covered with lofty trees and luxuriant vegetation, while this seems a portion of the bluffs themselves, cut off by the stream, and formed into a rocky, lofty island. Whether it was cut off from the eastern bank or the western, is not easy to determine, though from the latter it is five miles distant. It is about a mile in circumference, and the main channel of the river is here more than a mile wide. The view from the summit must be magnificent. By the Indians of the present day, it is called 'Monny Chankah,' or Bluff in the Water; and, as a manito, it is resorted to with offerings at the opening of the wild-geese season each year, in order to propitiate the Wakon for success in the hunt. But, whatever may be said relative to the name, or the situation of this celebrated scene, it is self-evident one of the most beautiful our eyes ever rested upon; and most faithfully have its beauties been delineated by the pencil and the burin of the artist. The painter could not have selected a happier hour, too, for his effort, than he has done. It is the soft season of sunset, of the Indian summer. A golden haze rests upon the distant hill-tops, and in calm quietude is slumbering on the gliding waters: the banks are fringed with the rich emerald of aquatic trees and evergreens—the smoke curls gracefully upwards from the summits of the cone-like, skin lodges of the Sioux Indians upon the shore; while some of the tribe are bathing in the river, and others are dragging their bark canoes to the land. We repeat, that the engraving is an admirable one, and we are gratified that another beautiful scene in the wilderness west has been redeemed from its primitive oblivion."

A caution to pedestrians.—Too following advice from the Picky one will answer as well for the meridian of New-York as of New-Orleans. It cannot fail to be peculiarly interesting to house-wives, who are particular as to the neatness of their domestic arrangements:—"It is sometimes very muddy in this city, and, therefore, some rule ought to be adopted for entering a house at such a time. The following, if not a good one, is very generally practiced upon. Avoid mats and scrapers; none but people whom nobody knows use those things. The entry and stair-carpet, especially if they are very costly, will get a good deal of mud off of your boots by the time you reach the drawing-room, particularly if you dig your feet well into them every step you go, which you ought to do; because it makes people think that rich carpets are every-day things to you at home. And should any mud still stick to your boots after you have reached the drawing-room, you may easily get rid of it upon the hearth-rug, by a little dexterity in handling your legs while forking your looks before the chimney-glass."

The Scott and Ballantyne Controversy.—By the following extract from a letter dated February third, published in the Pennsylvanian, it will be seen that the war of words in reference to the respective characters of Scott and Ballantyne, is likely to go on with unabated asperity. We should much regret any development, which might lead to any diminution of our reverence for the memory of Scott: "The pamphlet lately published by Ballantyne's executors has led to the announcement of an answer to it, under the title of 'The Ballantyne Humbog Handled,' which, it is expected, will be an attempt to defend Sir Walter Scott and his biographer, Lockhart, from the charges brought against them by the executors of James Ballantyne. This will lead the executors to publish documents hitherto kept back from feelings of delicacy, which have not been appreciated by Lockhart. The public will obtain authentic materials for judging for themselves of Sir Walter Scott's conduct."

"Miss Martineau's Morals and Manners."—The last Quarterly Review contains an admirable critique upon Miss Martineau's "Morals and Manners." It pronounces with great justice her last literary perpetration, "'How to Observe,' the very foolishlest and most unfeminine farraige we have ever met of apocryphal anecdotes, promiscuous facts and jumbled ideas—picked at random (or at least which might be so) out of the Penny Magazine and such like repositories. We should not have thought it worth while to take even this contemptuous notice of it, but that, wherever, throughout the volume, we have been able to detect a meaning, it is a mischievous one; and if it really be, as is said, the precursor of a course of Martineau morality, the sooner the public are warned against such at once stupid and impudent impostors the better."

Married and single.—Blackwood says, "that the fact of matrimony or bachelorhood is written so legibly in a man's appearance, that no ingenuity can conceal it. On the tops of coaches, in the coffee-rooms of inns, nay, in pewa at church, there is some inexorable instinct that tells us whether an individual (name, fortune, circumstances, totally unknown) be or be not a married man. Whether it is a certain subdued look, such as that which characterizes the lions in a menagerie, and distinguishes them from the lords of the desert, we cannot tell; but that the truth is so, we positively affirm." This philosophy reminds us of a stanza in Holmes's address to a certain portrait, which excited his commiseration, in a gallery of paintings.

"I know thou hast a wife at home,
I know thou hast a child,
By that subdued domestic smile
Upon thy features mild."

Euphonious names.—The Gazette objects with reason to such mellifluous names as the following, which occur in the geography of Maine:—"Aboljacknagsack river, Katichewas lake, Katspeknag lake, Ambijijis lake, Chigalaspasag falls, Pangauknus Portage, Sowadnehunk river, Umbazookush river, Caucaungamook river, Pongnongamook lake, Merimipicook river, Wapshenheng river, Baeshnengamook lake, Appmojeengamook lake, etc. etc." The Gazette says: "All the dentists, we doubt not, will be in favour of retaining these names, especially the last one. People living on the banks of that lovely lake will of course be obliged to have their jaw-teeth renewed every year."

Alarming.—A memorial has been presented to the legislature of Pennsylvania, praying that a tax may be laid on all single gentlemen over the age of twenty-five years. The proposition has, we learn, produced immense excitement among the Benedictines of the Keystone state, who regard it as an insidious attempt to drag them into matrimony. A tax of the kind suggested would, in the opinion of some of the wisest legislators of antiquity, be just and philosophical. We hope that the imposition will be effected."

Ion and Romeo.—Miss Ellen Tree recently played Romeo at the Camp-street theatre, New-Orleans, to Mrs. Barrett's Juliet. The performance was very successful. It must have been so, if equal in any degree to the Ion of Miss Tree; and we should think that the talent which could give so much effect to the one character could do ample justice to the other.

BY T. H. LISTER, AUTHOR OF GRANBY, ETC.

You told me once my smile had power
To chase your cares away,
To shed o'er misery's darkest hour
The cheering gleam of day;
That I was ill—your life—your light—
That, absent from my view,
You droop'd, as flowers at fall of night,
And I believed it true.

You told me once my accents fell
Like music on your ear,
That you were bound, as by a spell,
If I were only near;
That every purpose of your heart
From me its being drew,
From me it never could depart—
And I believed it true.

You told me once, what memory loves
With fond regret to trace,
While o'er past scenes it wildly roves,
Which time shall ne'er efface;
But naught repining thoughts avail
And vainly now I rue,
That you e'er told a flattering tale,
And I believed it true.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"A Book of the Passions, by G. P. R. James, illustrated with sixteen splendid engravings. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard." The illustrations to this volume are of a very superb and interesting character; and the typography of the work is extremely beautiful. The tales are by James; and this fact is enough to commend them to general perusal. They are in the usual chaste and agreeable style of the author, and typify with masterly power the passions of "remorse, jealousy, revenge, love, despair and hatred." To those in search of an appropriate gift, or gage d'amitié, we can with confidence commend this elegant and attractive work.

"Merchants' Magazine and Commercial Review."—The Mercantile Library Association of Boston, have passed a unanimous resolution expressive of their determination to unite with their sister society in this city in patronizing our friend Freeman Hunt's forthcoming periodical. The large number of our oldest and most respectable mercantile houses that have extended to the undertaking the sanction of their names and patronage, is pretty conclusive evidence of the estimation of Mr. Hunt's project, which we conceive not only novel, but practicable. The favourable auspices under which the work will make its appearance, united with the energy and efficiency of the enterprising proprietor, must secure its entire success.

"The Southern."—This is the title of a new monthly magazine recently commenced at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, by Mr. R. A. Eaton. The first number has just reached us, and it is full of promise. The "salutatory" address is manly and well written, and there is much ability manifest in the whole "getting-up" (the phrase is a vile one, but a convenient) of the work. Among the contributors we see the names of A. B. Meek, Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, H. W. Hilliard, Professor Barnard, Wm. R. Smith, A. A. Muller, and several other writers favourably known to the publick.

MUSIC.

This has been a musical winter. What with Miss Shirreff, Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Seguin, and Messrs. Wilson, Seguin and De-Begnis in opera at the National, and the concerts of Russell, Horn, Davis, Schlessinger, Scharfenburgh, King, Maroncelli and the different charitable societies, the lovers of sweet sounds have had abundant opportunity for gratification. These concerts have been generally well attended—especially that given at the Apollo, by Davis, whose masterly performances of the flute have rendered him a universal favourite. Much as we object to unaccompanied instrumental performances at these entertainments—such as overtures on the pianoforte "played by four hands," which not unfrequently occupy half an hour—(an eternity on such occasions)—"grand fantasies" on the violin, hautboy, trumpet, etc. which, with very few exceptions, are "grand bores"—we should nevertheless think a concert incomplete without the flute of Davis. The soirées of Horn have been graced by the fashion and beauty of the town. They are the most recherché and delightful things of the kind ever given in this country. They are classically beautiful, and are well calculated to refine and elevate the musical taste of the city. At the last soirée, Mr. J. P. Knight, the composer of the popular melody, "She wore a wreath of roses," sang a beautiful little song entitled, "In the days when we went gipsying," arranged by himself. It is a gem. Mrs. Horn sang a French air, called "Where zephyr dwells," the effect of which was electrical. It was loudly encored. Horn sang a number of songs in his own peculiar and chaste manner. "My Boyhood's Home," was sung by Mr. Horn, in a style at once impressive and beautiful. The other performers, Mrs. Strong, Miss Pearson, Messrs. Rogers, Bassett and Maynard, were in excellent voice, and gave universal satisfaction. Mr. Scharfenburgh, a young artist of much promise, presided at the pianoforte. Mr. U. C. Hill, whose performances are always listened to with pleasure, acted as leader, and Mr. Clarkson proved himself a thorough master of the violoncello. The next concert will take place on Thursday week, at the Lyceum, on which occasion a grand entertainment will be given. We hope to see the room crowded.

MISCELLANY.

BOWEY THREATH.—The re-construction of the Bowery theatre, is proceeding at a rapid rate, and will, doubtless, be completed within the specified time. It will be the most spacious and commodious structure of the kind in the country.

CONCEALED WEAPONS.—We are glad to perceive, that the legislature of Alabama have passed a severe law against the carrying of secret weapons, dirks, daggers, bowie knives, Mississippi tooth-picks, etc. The practice is an infamous and dastardly one, and it has too long been a stain upon society in the west.

SPIRIT OF THE YANKEE LADIES.—The Boston Atlas publishes an extract from a lady "down east," (somewhere in the neighbourhood of Smithville, we suspect,) which should be enough to inspire our Broadway daughters with true martial rage, and send them off armed to the teeth to Mad-as-waka, to die in the defence of so brave a dame. The lady writes: "It is to some a gloomy time, and some people are almost crazy. Mothers are burying their children—in imagination—and weeping over them already as dead, while others are more firm, and exclaim:

'Then forward and fear not, thy battle-cries be,
In glory return, or return not to me!'

I believe I have a little of the spirit of Seventy-six in me still, and were I a man, would most heartily, notwithstanding my peace-principles, buckle on the knapsack, and march forth boldly to meet the foe. Had I time, I would inflict upon you a political letter, and tell you how some people are hoping that there may be a war, in order that they may become a Caesar or a Napoleon; how some tremble lest they should show their heels to the foe, and how in the night we dream of battles, sieges, conquering armies, and certain victory; how we are waked by the notes of a bugle, or the distant sounds of the drum, and think for a moment that the enemy is upon us. Ludicrous things I might mention, and things horrible, but have not time. Suffice it to say, that since my recollection, there never has been so much excitement here, and instead of diminishing, it only rages more and more." Who, after witnessing the spirit of this daughter of Maine, will not be disposed to exclaim, "hurrah for our side!" Or, who will excuse himself from joining in our admiration, by quoting Philip Van Artevelde's sentimental libel on the sex:

"What's finest still, finds favour in their eyes,
What's noblest keeps the entrance of their ears.
The noise and blare of arms do not offend them now,
We too, and wisdom, that's admired of all
They can admire the glory, not the thing
Wherefore it is, that I would but possess,
If any, that which David wept, a love
Passing the love of women!"

SPANISH ETIQUETTE.—The etiquette of the Spanish court was the most severe in Europe. One of their kings even fell a victim to it. Philip III. being newly recovered from a dangerous malady, was sitting near a chimney, in which was so large a fire of wood, that he was almost stifled. Etiquette did not permit him to rise, nor a common domestic to enter. At length the Marquis de Pobar, chamberlain, came in, but etiquette forbade his interference, and the Duke of Usseda, master of the household, was sent for. He was gone out, and the flame increased, when the king bore it patiently, rather than violate his dignity. But his blood was so heated, that next morning an erysipelas of the head appeared, and a relapse of the fever soon carried him off.

LABOUR.—Let it not be forgotten that labour is the true source of wealth and the noblest foundation of honour. The idle and unproductive are the cancerous excrescences on the surface of society.

NARRATIVE OF THE

LOSS OF THE FORFARSHIRE STEAMER.

THE ENGRAVING BY ANDERSON.

"Down on the vale of death, with dismal cries,
The fated victims, shuddering, roll their eyes
In wild despair; while yet another stroke
With deep convulsion rends the solid oak.
Till, like the mine, in whose infernal cell,
The lurking demons of destruction dwell,
At length surrender torn, her frame divides,
And crashing, spreads in ruin o'er the tides."

THE Forfarshire steamer, a vessel of about three hundred tons burthen, under the command of Mr. John Humble, formerly master of the Neptune, sailed from Hull, on her voyage to Dundee, on the evening of Wednesday, the fifth of September, 1838, about half-past six o'clock, along with the Pegasus and Innisfail, for Leith, with a valuable cargo of bale goods and sheet iron; and having on board about twenty-two cabin and nineteen steerage passengers, as nearly as could be ascertained, Captain Humble and his wife, ten seamen, four firemen, two engineers, two coal trimmers, and two stewards.

Previously to leaving Hull, the boilers had been examined, and a small leak closed up! but when off Flambro' Head the leakage appeared and continued for about six hours, not, however, to much extent, as the pumps were able to keep the vessel quite dry. The engine-man, Allan Stewart, who furnished these particulars, also states that he had frequently seen the boiler as bad as it was on this occasion. The fireman, Daniel Donovan, however, represents the leakage as considerable, so much so, that two of the fires were extinguished; but they were re-lighted after the boilers had been partially repaired. The progress of the vessel was of course retarded, and three steam-vessels passed her before she had proceeded far. The unusual bustle on board the Forfarshire, in consequence of the state of the boilers, attracted the notice of several of the passengers—Mrs. Dawson, a steamer passenger, who is one of the survivors, states, that even before the vessel left Hull, so strong was her impression, from indications on board, that "all was not right," that if her husband, who is a glassman, had come down to the packet at the time, she would have returned with him on shore.

In this inefficient state the vessel, with above sixty individuals on board, was sent out and proceeded on her voyage, and passed through the "Fairway," between the Fern Islands and the land, about six o'clock on Thursday evening. She entered Berwick bay about eight o'clock the same evening, the sea running high, and the wind blowing strong from the north. From the motion of the vessel the leak increased to such a degree, that the firemen could not keep the fires burning. Two men were then employed to pump water into the boilers, but it escaped through the leak as fast as they pumped it in. About ten o'clock she bore up off St. Abb's Head, the storm still raging with unabated fury. The engines soon after became entirely useless, and the engine-man reported that they would not work. There being great danger of drifting ashore, the sails were hoisted fore and aft, and the vessel got about in order to get her before the wind, and keep her off the land. No attempt was made to anchor. The vessel soon became unmanageable, and the tide setting strong to the south, she proceeded in that direction. It rained heavily during the whole time, and the fog was so dense, that it became impossible to tell the situation of the vessel. At length breakers were discovered close to leeward, and the Fern Lighthouses, which about the same period became visible, relieved all doubt as to the imminent peril of all on board. An attempt was made to run the vessel between the Fern Islands, but she refused to answer the helm, and at three o'clock on Friday morning, she struck with tremendous force against the outer or Longstone Island.

A portion of the crew, intent only on self-preservation, had lowered the larboard-quarter boat down, and left the ship, amongst whom was the first mate, James Duncan. The stroke of the vessel on the rock was regarded as the signal of death. The master lost all self-possession; and his wife, who was on board with him, sought in cries of anguish and despair the protection which, alas! he could not extend. The cries of females on deck, mingled with the roaring of the ocean, and the screams of the wild-fowl disturbed from their resting-places; while the men, clinging to the vessel, awaited in silence their inevitable fate. Most of the cabin-passengers were below, and many of them asleep in their berths. As soon as the vessel struck, the steward ran down and gave an alarm; one passenger only, namely Mr. Ruthven Ritchie, of Hill of Ruthven, Perthshire, was saved. On being awoke he arose instantly, and seeing his trousers rushed upon deck; from whence, observing the sailors leaping into the boat, he, with an extraordinary effort by means of a rope, swung himself into it, and was thus miraculously preserved. The uncle and aunt of this gentleman made a desperate effort to get into the boat just as it was leaving the wreck, and, in endeavouring to leap on board they fell into the sea and perished in his sight. He had nothing on all the time he was in the boat, but a shirt and a pair of trousers; and his employment whilst in it, was bailing out the water with a pair of shoes for a "howskelly." The escape of the boat was remarkable. There was only one outlet by which it could escape being dashed by the breakers on the island, and that outlet was taken without the parties being aware of it. The boat's crew passed through the mighty current uninjured, and, after being exposed in an open boat all night, were picked up about eight o'clock on Saturday morning by a Montrose sloop, and carried into Shields. Mr. Ritchie had fortunately some sovereigns in the pockets of his trousers, which he brought out of the cabin, and these enabled him to procure clothes soon after being landed. The following is a list of the crew and passengers brought into Shields: John Matson, second mate; James Hill, Alexander Murray, Robert Tor, Allan Stewart, engineer; James Hall, coal trimmer; David Grant, Ruthven Ritchie, farmer; and James Duncan, first mate. Mr. Ritchie proceeded to Bamfurd, to inquire the fate of his fellow-passengers, and thence he went to Edinburgh, on his way home, to communicate the melancholy intelligence to his friends. The mate and some others of the crew reached Dundee, on Tuesday following.

The vessel struck aft the paddle-boxes; and not above three minutes after the few survivors had rushed upon deck, a second shock separated her into two parts—the stern, quarter-deck, and cabin, being instantly carried away with all upon them through a tremendous current called the Piper Gut, which is dangerous even in temperate weather, running between the Islands at the rapidity of six miles an hour, and in tempestuous weather becomes terrific; whilst the fore-part of the vessel remained fast on the rock. The captain took to the wreck, till washed overboard, with his wife in his arms, and both were drowned.

The situation of the few passengers who remained on the fore-part of the vessel was perilous in the extreme. Placed on a small rock surrounded by the sea, which threatened to engulf them, and their companions having but just before been swept away from them, they were clinging to life whilst all hope of relief was sinking within them, and crying for help, whilst the tempestuous billows drowned their feeble shrieks, and defied their puny efforts to escape. Their cries, however, were not unheard. Their shouts of distress fell upon the ear of Miss Grace Horsley Darling, who, with her father, Mr. W. Darling, occupies the outer Fern Lighthouse. She awakened her parent, and at daybreak he launched his boat, and prepared to proceed to their rescue. The state of the tide and of the weather was such as to render any attempt to reach the wreck extremely dangerous; and the old man, who had never before known the quailings of fear, was leath in such a tremendous gale to rush, as he considered, on certain death. After watching the wreck for some time, they discovered, from some movement, the living beings were still clinging to it, and the gallant female, who partook of her father's generous sympathy, as she acknowledged the relationship of flesh and blood, with matchless intrepidity seized the oar and entered the boat. This was enough—the noble parent followed, and, with the assistance of the fair sailor, conducted the frail skiff over the foaming billows, to the spot where the wreck appeared. By a dangerous and desperate effort, the father was landed on the rock, and to preserve the frail cable from being dashed to pieces, it was rapidly rowed back among the awful abyss of waters, and kept aloft by the skillfulness and dexterity of this noble-minded young woman. At length the whole of the survivors, consisting of five of the crew and four of the deck passengers, were taken from the wreck, and conveyed to the lighthouse, where the same tender hand administered to their wants, and, anxiously, for three days and three nights, waited on the sufferers, and soothed their afflictions. By the assistance of the crew they were enabled to bring the cable and its burthen to the Longstone Island. It is impossible to speak in too high terms of this unparalleled act of humanity, bravery, and disinterestedness. This perilous achievement—unexampled in the feats of female fortitude—was witnessed by the survivors in silent wonder. The main land could not be reached, from the state of the weather, till Sunday, and, during this time, the attentions of the heroine were indefatigable.

The names of the individuals saved from the wreck of the Forfarshire, by Mr. Darling and his daughter, are—John Kid, fireman, of Dundee; Jonathan Ticket, cook, of Hull; John Macqueen, coal-trimmer, Dundee; John Tullock, carpenter, Dundee; and John Nicholson, fireman, Dundee; of the crew. D. Donovan, fireman and free passenger, of Dundee; James Keeley, weaver, Dundee; Thomas Buchanan, baker, Dundee; and Mrs. Dawson, bound to Dundee, passengers. The entire number saved is eighteen of whom thirteen belonged to the vessel, and five were passengers. The remainder on board perished.

The wreck of the steamer was seen from North Sunderland, on the morning of the wreck, about six o'clock, when signals were hoisted and guns fired immediately, but men could not be found to go off in the life-boat. After some delay seven persons volunteered their services, and set out in a four-oared cable. The boat shipped several seas in the course of her perilous voyage, and on their way they spoke a steam-vessel of London, going north, and requested the captain to proceed to the wreck, offering at the same time to pilot the vessel, as they could easily have done to within a few yards of the lee of the rock in seven fathoms water. The captain, however, declined, and the men in the cable, after much exertion, succeeded in reaching the wreck. They found three bodies, one of them dressed in black, apparently about forty years of age, who, from papers found on his person, is supposed to be the Rev. John Robb, of Dunkeld. The other two were brother and sister, the boy eleven and the girl eight years of age, the children of Mrs. Dawson, who was saved by the exertions of Mr. Darling and his daughter. They also took a quantity of copper and some light articles which would soon have been washed away. The storm raged with unabated fury, and, in attempting to return, they were compelled to put in at Longstone light-house, which they reached with much difficulty, where they were obliged to remain two days and two nights, in a temporary building, the waves occasionally bursting in, and obliging them to seek shelter in the light-house tower, which was occupied by Mr. and Miss Darling, and the persons they had saved from the wreck. They made another attempt to reach North Sunderland on Sunday, but they were obliged to run in at Beadnell, where they remained till the following day. They visited the wreck on Monday, and found the body of an Irishman, named John Galleher, who lately resided at Dundee. The names of the brave and meritorious individuals who ventured their lives from North Sunderland, are as follows:—William Robinson, James Robinson, Michael Robinson, William Swain, Brooke Darling, (brother to Miss Darling), Thomas Cuthbertson, and Robert Knox. They behaved most gallantly.

The wreck was discovered from Bamfurd castle early on Friday morning, when a signal was immediately hoisted, and the alarm-gun fired along the shore, to apprise the fishermen of the calamity. The life-boat could not be launched from the extremely boisterous state of the weather, but everything was done that could be devised; and Mr. Smeddie, the principal agent, Mr. Hamilton, and others attached to the castle, were most indefatigable in their exertions.

On the following Monday the four bodies were brought to the castle, and on the next day an inquest was held before Stephen Reed, Esq., in the absence of T. A. Russell, Esq., when, after a patient investigation, the coroner summed up, and the jury returned a verdict to the following effect:—Wrecked on board the Forfarshire steam-packet, by the imperfections of the boilers, and culpable negligence of the captain not putting back to port. Dead on the vessel, one hundred pounds, being one half of the estimated value of that part of the vessel and machinery left upon the rock.

One of the most heart-rending circumstances connected with this melancholy event occurred during the night, when the survivors were on the rock. The vessel became a total wreck in less than a quarter of an hour after she struck; and those that were fortunate enough to get on the rock suffered severely from the cold, and from the heavy seas which washed over them at intervals. Their clothes were mostly torn off, and from continued exertions they were reduced to a state of complete exhaustion. The most agonizing spectacle was that of Mrs. Dawson, with her two children, a boy and a girl, eight and eleven years of age, firmly grasped in each hand, there she held them in the agonies of despair, long after the buffeting of the waves, which drove them to and fro, and deprived them of existence. She is severely injured, and remains at Bamfurd, unable to proceed homewards. Donovan is also much hurt; and he states that he lay for three hours holding on by a spike nail.

It is impossible to tell with certainty the number of those who have suffered, inasmuch as no entries were made when the passengers embarked. One of the arrivals states the number at forty-two, and another at forty-seven. As only five are known to be saved, the probable loss of life will be between thirty-seven and forty-two passengers; and the master and his wife, and seven of the crew, will make the total loss between forty-six and fifty-one persons.

The following are the names of some of the sufferers: Captain Humble and his wife; the Rev. John Robb, Dunkeld; Mr. Bell, factor to Lord Kinloch; Mrs. Allison, Peasholme-house, York, with son and grandson; Miss Martin, of No. 28 St. James's-street, Aberdeen, and one child. This lady had considerable property on her person; it is said about three hundred sovereigns, in some part of her dress. Mr. and Mrs. Allen, and one child, said to be lost from Russia; Mr. Robert Allison, of Dundee; Mr. John and Mr. William Grant, of Louth, Lincolnshire; Mr. Peston and a friend; Mr. Scott, of Dundee, and his son, about seven years of age; Mr. Brown and Mr. McCloud; Mr. Amett and two friends; Mrs. Patrick, of Hull, wife to Captain Patrick, of the Clara.

There are among the sufferers three gentlemen belonging to Perth, one to Fife, and one to St. Petersburg. A female staterage passenger lost two children: one was drowned, and the other died in her arms. Among the persons brought to the spot from a distance, was one gentleman who had lost his wife, son, and grandsons, another his mother and brother.

The only part of the vessel which remained, consisted of the fore-castle, part of the engine, paddle-wheels, anchor, cable, fore-mast, and rigging. One of the boilers were washed to sea, while the other two were thrown on the rocks broken. The engine, which was one hundred and eighty horse power, was greatly damaged. A quantity of new boiler plate was found among the wreck. A part is sunk a little to the south of Hawker's rock, and, as it is supposed, the bodies of several persons who have not been found are in it, a rope has been attached to it, for the purpose of raising it, in order to satisfy the anxiety of their surviving friends. The cargo is stated to have been very valuable, having been insured to the amount of four thousand pounds; but only three boxes of soap have been discovered. Parts of the wreck have been thrown on shore at Hauxley, Amble, Hartley, and other parts of the coast of Northumberland. The stern of the vessel, with the name, a hair-covered trunk, and a corded box, were seen on Monday, the tenth of September, from the deck of a London merchant steam-vessel, floating off Seaham. The stern was also seen, near the same place, from the City of Edinburgh steamer, the day before. The brig Williams, Captain Blythe, of Sunderland, from Hamburg, when about five miles from the land, off Hartlepool, on the same day, fell in with a quantity of wreck, which is supposed to have belonged to the Forfarshire. Among other materials was the poop of a vessel, together with a box about fifteen feet long, and two and a half feet square, containing a quantity of new machinery. The search is still going on for the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers, and the property of the vessel; and every assistance is rendered by the agents at Barmouth castle, as well as by the fishermen and revenue-officers on the coast.

The Forfarshire was a new vessel, having been little more than two years at sea. She first sailed from Dundee in May, 1836; she sailed weekly between Dundee and Hull, and had engines of one hundred and twenty or two hundred horse power. The captain (Mr. John Humble) belonged to Shields, and served his apprenticeship to the sea, in one of the collier sloops trading between that place and Newcastle. The first steamer he was in, was a small tug-boat, which belonged to Shields, called the Tarsat; he afterwards commanded another steamer, called the Neptune, which sailed between Hull and Newcastle. He also was sometime mate of the Eclipse, the Newcastle and Leith boat already mentioned.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

FORTUNE'S FROLICKS.

A NUMBER of years ago, there came to reside in the city of Bath a worthy elderly gentleman and his wife; she was nervous, and he was gouty. Having no children, they had begun to languish in the country; but now they had the pleasure of thinking that the lady's nerves would be strengthened; and that the celebrated waters, combined with the celebrated doctors, would, without fail, disengage the gout. Leaving part of their establishments at Hillberry Lodge, they only brought with them their trusty, thrifty housekeeper, Mrs. Deacon, who had been almost from time immemorial in the family, and had the interest of her master and mistress at heart. After being comfortably settled at Bath, both of the invalids began to find the change of air beneficial to them, and with plenty of money they did not want for society—Mr. Hillberry being exceedingly hospitable and fond of good living, of which the gout bore excellent testimony.

If matters went on placidly above stairs, it was more than could be said for the lower regions. "War to the knife" had been declared between Mrs. Deacon and every succeeding cook, for in the space of a month she had engaged and turned off three. The waste and extravagance of the Bath cooks was almost beyond belief. The pounds of butter that disappeared in a twinkling, the knots of sugar, the heads of cloves and nutmegs, was enough to drive a saint distracted, and there were nothing but murmurs and complaints from day to day. The gold earrings and lace veils gave proof positive as to what purpose their plunder was devoted, and Mrs. Deacon believed that if there was one set of people above another that deserved condign punishment, it was the cooks of Bath. The worthy old couple were much annoyed by this long-continued warfare and the bitter complaints of the housekeeper, and they both agreed, that, were it not for the cooks, Bath would have been without a fault, and they were almost afraid to meet Mrs. Deacon in the morning with her list of grievances, and her schemes for bringing about a reform. At length, after a dreadful blow-up between Mrs. Deacon and Molly, the former wrought up to the highest pitch, and on the point of boiling over, she came to announce to her master and mistress that another Bath cook was out of the question, and that next morning she intended going off to Bristol, to see if she could find a girl there that would suit her purpose. Leave was asked and obtained, and away drove Mrs. Deacon in the coach, and in due time was set down at the abode of an old friend of hers, the wife of a confectioner, and into her car did Mrs. Deacon pour her many grievances. Mrs. Carey not only sympathised with the afflicted housekeeper, but set on foot inquiries for a cleanly, good-tempered, active girl, who would do as she was desired; and at length the wished-for person was found in Barbara, or she was better known by the cognomen of Baby; her station in life was nothing higher than that of cleaning out the market every Saturday, where the old woman with whom she lived kept a stall. By common consent, Barbara was pronounced a good steady girl, of whom no one knew any ill—hard-working, and of a most civil obliging temper. Mrs. Deacon was as pleased as possible at the favourable account given of Baby; so that when a fat, fair, fresh-coloured damsel, with blue eyes and light auburn hair, presented herself to the housekeeper, she was perfectly satisfied. No earrings, no curls dangling from each side of her face, but with tresses braided, and a neat mob-cap, dark gown, and snow-white handkerchief and apron. An arrangement was soon made, and Mrs. Deacon left Bristol in triumph with her treasure, bidding defiance to the cooks of Bath, from this time hence.

Mrs. Deacon was determined to make Baby a first-rate cook, and, fortunately, she had good materials to work upon, for, although Barbara was at first astounded at the variety of saucers, stew-pans, pots, and kettles, of every shape and dimension, yet, by dint of attention, under Mrs. Deacon's management, she never required to be twice told the same thing. The harmony that reigned above and below was quite delightful to the old couple—no complaints of the insolence and extravagance of servants. Barbara was a treasure above all price. Four months after Barbara had entered her new service the old lady was taken ill; she required constant attendance, and as she was occasionally rather fretful, Mrs. Deacon did not feel herself equal to sitting up night after night. Barbara, who felt grateful to her benefactress, tendered her services, when she made herself so useful, that the old lady preferred her to Deacon. Barbara was never sleepy; she was never seen with a frown upon her face, no matter how unreasonable her mistress might be; she never bounced about the room as the housemaid did, but walked in so cautious a manner that her step was not heard. In spite, however, of the celebrity of the Bath doctors, the old lady died, recommending Barbara to the care of the old gentleman, and in her will leaving her faithful attendant a handsome present. Such proofs of regard were enough to have raised a little envy on the part of Mrs. Deacon, had not Barbara borne her prosperity in the meekest manner possible, and still continued her plain simple style of dress and modest demeanour.

Mrs. Deacon, soon after the death of her mistress, fell into bad health, and her nurse at last was recommended to her, and she set out for Devonshire, leaving Barbara to take care of her master, whose gout had been rather troublesome; but Barbara was so gentle in wrapping up his gouty foot, and so well adjusted his velvet shoe without giving him pain, that he began to consider Barbara as great a treasure as his wife had done. And he thought within himself, what would become of me if Barbara should leave me, or, for instance, if she should marry!—and now, I think of it, I suspect the grocer's foreman is looking after her. Barbara is very good-looking and sweet-tempered. Thus did the old gentleman cogitate, day after day, upon the possibility of Barbara leaving him, until at length he determined to make Barbara his own by the finest of ties; and, to the astonishment of the damsel, he proposed to marry her. She had no particular attachment to any one, and they soon settled the affair, to the amazement of all Bath, which was quite in an uproar upon the occasion. If he had been a poor man, nobody would have given themselves any concern about him; but for the rich Mr. Hillberry to degrade himself, was scandalous.

Barbara was as good a wife as she had been a servant, and conducted herself so much to the satisfaction of her husband, that, at his death, which took place some years after, he left all his wealth to his widow, who had in a short time admirers and lovers even amongst the nobility. One of those who had been among the first to blame old Hillberry for marrying Baby, actually proposed for her hand; but she replied, "That she knew they only wanted her money; but that, when she did marry, it should be to a man who would esteem and be kind to her." Barbara kept her word. She made a rational second choice, and enjoyed all the happiness her good conduct deserved.

JOB DODGE—OR THE STORMY DAY.

IT WAS a half-drizzling, half-stormy day in the middle of November—just such a day as puts nervous people in a bad humour with themselves and everybody else. Job Dodge sat brooding over the fire immediately after breakfast. His wife addressed him as follows:—"Mr. Dodge, can't you mend that front-door latch to-day?" "No," was the answer. "Well, can't you mend the handle of the water-pail?" "No." "Well, can't you fix a handle to the mop?" "No." "Well, can't you put up some pins for the clothes, in our chamber?" "No." "Well, can't you fix that north window, so that the rain and snow won't drive in?" "No—no—no," answered the husband, sharply. He then took his hat, and was on the point of leaving the house, when his wife, knowing that he was going to the tavern, where he would meet some of his wet-day companions, asked him kindly to stop a moment. She then got her bonnet and cloak, and said to her husband, "You are going to the tavern; with your leave I will go with you." The husband stared. "Yes," said the wife, "I may as well go as you; if you go and waste the day, and tittle at the tavern, why shall not I do the same?" Job felt the reproof. He shut the door; hung up his hat; got the hammer and nails; did all his wife had requested, and sat down by his fire at night, a better and happier man.

SINGULAR FEAT.—In July, 1776, a man having laid a wager that he would cross the Thames in a butcher's tray, without any other assistance than his hands, set out from Somerset stairs, and reached the Surrey shore in safety; he had on a cork jacket, in case of any accident. It is said that there were fourteen thousand pounds depending on this feat, and that upwards of seventy boats full of spectators were present.

ORIGINAL APOLOGUES.

FABLES FOR AUTHORS.

From the Spanish of Tomas de Ycaute.

THE NATURALIST AND THE LIZARDS.

Two lizards in an orchard lying;
A learned naturalist expatiating,
Spice of their vile extorials, he
Their utmost structure needs must see.
He cut the smallest of the two,
And look'd with microscopic view;
Wrote it all down—then cut again—
Now plied the knife, and now the pen.
His brother virtuosi stare—
Some wonder at, some blame his care.
The business o'er, and wearied now,
He lets the captive sister go;
Round her at home the lizards crowd,
While she with talk and vaunting loud
Tells how all day the doctor stood,
And cut the flesh and weighed the blood.
"I saw it all!" and yet—how quaint!
They call us insignificant,
Yea, mean! We, who within us bear
Things worth e'en human toil and care;
Things worth the labours of the pen;—
Be not too humble, brothers, then!
Let envious tongues say what they will,
We are a wondrous people still!"

Would you not have had authors vain,
From criticising their refrain!

TEA AND SAGE.

As Tea, the mandarin, from China came,
He met with Goody Sage—a journeying there;
"Whither, my lord?" says she. "To Europe, dame,
Where they appreciate my virtues rare.
And whither you?"—"To China! There they know
How to prize me. At home I've naught but scorn!"
Alas! the only spot one's worth to show
Is any place except where one is born!"

Thus Spaniards on Boleau or Tasso dote,
Who know not in what tongue Garcilasso wrote!

THE GOAT AND THE HORSE.

A goat one day enraptured stood,
To hear a skillful fiddler play;
Then in her joy addressed a horse,
Who likewise listened to the lay.
"Know, that such harmony is made
From the intestines, sir, of goats!
And thus (oh wondrous bliss to come!)
Mine may awake such charming notes!"
"The sounds are sweet," the horse replied,
In a somewhat less lofty strain;
"Yet where were they without the hairs
Plucked from my tail with care and pain!
The music gives me pleasure, sure;
But what, I pray, will be your gain,
When only after you are dead,
You, sir, can aid so sweet a strain?"

So all had writers, more or less,
Doomed through their lives unfort to be,
Despite the world's—their comfort take,
Appealing to posterity!

THE BEE AND THE CUCKOO.

Thus to the cuckoo said the bee:
"Have done with your monotony!
No bird had e'er a harsher tone—
And such an everlasting one!"
"Marry!" the cuckoo cried—"and you
Variety to talk of, too!
Your honey all of hue the same—
Your endless hexagons—you claim,
Since math'ematicians praise your skill,
To abuse all others at your will!"
"Not so," the bee replied, "not so!
Want of variety, you know,
Is never blamed, in things of use;
But works meant only to amuse,
If they have no variety,
Are poor enough, as all must see!"

THE VIPER AND THE LEECH.

The viper to the leech observed one day,
"Both of us sting—and yet, I know not why,
You are a favourite and a friend, they say,
While me they strive to kill, or from me fly."
"True, we both sting," the little leech replied;
"But mine gives life unto the sick; and yours
Death, even to the healthiest man, ensues."

In this, and this alone, the difference lies,
'Tis critics who behold with good and evil eyes!

VARIETIES.

MY DARK-EYED ZULETTE.

BY MRS. CRAWFORD.

MAID OF EVORA! my dark-eyed Zulette!

In my long hours of sorrow without thee,

I never found one that could make me forget

The charm that is ever about thee;

On the beautiful maids of my country I gaze,

But they wake but a passing emotion;

Oh! thou hadst the love of my happiest days,

The first fruits of my young heart's devotion.

Maid of Evora! my dark-eyed Zulette!

In the dreams of my slumber united,

I meet thee again, where so often we met,

When my spirit was gay and unlighted;

When beneath the sweet shade of the orange we roved,

And the fountain of Inez shone brightly

In the beams of the moon, that to look on I loved,

As it guided my steps to thee nightly.

Maid of Evora! my dark-eyed Zulette!

To thy heart still as faithful as ever

Is the joy that we felt when in secret we met,

And the pangs that it cost us to sever?

When I watched thy sweet looks, as I saw thee depart,

When thy last fond adieu had been spoken,

Had I thought twice by last, ah! surely my heart

In the grief of that moment had broken.

BLANCHE OF ROSSBERG.

There was no sound but the sigh of the night-wind in the deserted streets of Castile; the cry of the raven had ceased; the night-guard had sought shelter in his cot; nothing disturbed the silence of the hour but the sigh of the distant wind-blown, and the fulfilment of the blast, as it stirred the sickly frame of many an expiring lamp, or swept with restless moans the gloomy buildings of the city.

"'Tis a cold and cheerless night, Sir Alwyn; and, by our Lady! it were well to have turned longer in the hostelry. Holy Saint Eusebio, how the wind blows!"

"Lead on, good father, lead on, for the love of heaven! Poor, poor Blanche! In her illness she forgets me not. Count Rossberg's daughter—my patron's child—forgot not on her death-bed the humble Alwyn. But thou saidst not one was dying, father."

"I said even so; but I said but what I heard. St. Bertha, I have neither shriven nor seen the damsel. Sister Ulrica prayed the abbess that you might be brought; for, sleeping or waking, the maiden, since her illness, has done little else but murmur your name."

Alwyn struck his hand to his forehead; then suddenly grasping the arm of his companion, again exclaimed, "But thou sayest not she is dying, father?"

"Shine of the Virgin!" cried the monk; "I have told ye twenty times, Sir Alwyn! Dost thou think men quit their cells to go forth? Or do you think such night as this?"

Alwyn only replied by quickening his pace; and after proceeding for some time in silence, they at length reached the outer gate of the convent, and he was soon conducted by his guide into the entrance hall of the building. Here the youth—having declined the courteous offer of the monk to visit the refectory—after waiting impatiently for some minutes, was approached by a lay-sister, bearing a small silver lamp, who silently conducted him through several narrow but lofty passages, until she came to a small door, which she cautiously opened, and he was soon conducted by his guide into the entrance hall of the building.

A lady entered the apartment; and his companion, making a motion of silence, approached a couch, upon which a young and lovely girl reposed, as if in sleep. Long ringlets of silken auburn fell over her neck and bosom; one beautiful arm hung from the couch, the small white hand holding a crucifix of ivory; her face was pale, her lips, though half apart, were motionless; and so motionless she breathed, that the lay-sister bent for a moment over her, as if to ascertain that the spirit of the sick maiden had not passed away.

The fair sleeper slowly opened her eyes—"How fares the Lady Blanche?" inquired the lay-sister.

"Better, kind sister; the sleep has refreshed me. Thou hast been a kind nurse, Ulrica. But I shall soon trouble thee no longer."

"Say not so, sweetest Blanche. Thine eye has lost much of its restless lustre, and the blue veins on your brow tell no longer of death. Blessed Virgin be praised! Thou wilt live to be the Countess of Rossberg, and present me with thy bridal chaplet."

"Blanche! dearest Blanche!" said another voice near the couch; and young Alwyn, kneeling beside it, pressed her hand to his lips. His long dark locks hid the tears that were starting to his eyelids; but the maiden felt them fall fast and warm upon her arm.

"Alwyn! Can it be! Alwyn, how, in the name of heaven, came ye hither! Ulrica!"

"Ulrica is gone, sweet Blanche. 'Twas a kind monk conducted me to the convent. Thou art the same, my dear Blanche, as I have seen thee in my father's home. 'Tis a sad thing, Alwyn, to feel approaching death, and think of those that love us."

"Nay, but death approacheth not Blanche of Rossberg. Thou wilt live to gladden thy father's heart, and that of the founding Alwyn, who ere seeks this wizen hand, will win with his sword a name worthy of the daughter of Count Rossberg to share, or die for it. Oh! how I love you, Blanche!" continued the youth, as he covered her little hand with kisses.

Here a low and mournful sigh seemed to proceed from a distant part of the chamber, and was instantly followed by a loud burst of the moaning blast.

Alwyn turned to the direction of the sound. "'Twas but the wind," said he, in answer to an inquiring look of the maiden. "'Twas but the wind, sweet Blanche—even now methought it stirred the tapestry. In sooth it is a stormy night!"

"How palely the taper burns! Dost thou think, Alwyn, it was but the wind that sighed?"

"Nay, doubt it not. Thou wilt give me a lock of this golden hair."

* A fountain in Portugal, called "the Tears of Inez," in compliment to the beautiful and ill-fated Inez de Castro.

to wear as thy love-token on my crest," said the youth, as he played with the silken ringlets of the maiden. "Dost love me, Blanche?"

"Dearest Alwyn!"

Here a sigh, deeper and more sorrowful than the first, was heard in the apartment.

"What see'st thou, Alwyn, that you gaze so fearfully?"

Alwyn replied not, for a weight of sorrow sat at his heart, and his tongue clove to his mouth. Beside him stood a figure arrayed in the habit of the grave, regarding him with a fixed and mournful look. The features seemed to be familiar to him, as of one whose face he had gazed upon in infancy; but the cold and sorrowful eye froze the blood in his veins, his limbs trembled under him, and, powerless in mind and body, he sank heavily to the floor!

Loud was the hay of the hound, and merry the ring of the hunting horn, as a noble company of knights and gallants rode in the woods of Rossberg, their fiery steeds clamping on the bit, and their boar spears glittering in the morning sun. Two horsemen rode at some distance from the rest of the party, and seemed to be in deep converse—the one a tall and powerful man, somewhat past the meridian of life, and the other a graceful youth, apparently about three or four and twenty. Both were superbly mounted—their habits proclaimed them to be of good degree, and they seemed by their mutual air as if they knew right well how to couch the lance and rein the war-horse.

"Now, by mine honour, Count Rossberg," said the younger horseman, "thy fair Blanche is the only girl I would ask twice of heaven. I have won my spurs with her love-token on my crest, and, although my birth is hid in obscurity, yet as a knight of the empire—"

"Sir Alwyn of Eginhart," replied the other, "is fitting mate for the noblest maiden in Germany."

"Nay, that thou hast said before; and if I knew not the Count Rossberg better, I might think it were but said in mockery. Why then forbidd our union? None will ever love thy Blanche more devotedly than I, and mayhap, Count Rossberg, there are none whom she will love so well."

"Alwyn may not be. But think not that I deem the less of thee on that account. In boyhood you watched my sick pillow; thy sword in manhood has shielded me in strife; and, by St. Mary! thy quarrel should be mine. But think no more of Blanche: we will find thee as far and as noble a bride. Hark! hark! Alwyn—they have roused a boar!" and the Count at the words struck spurs to his steed, and dashed forward to its chase.

"Ay!" cried the youth bitterly, as he curbed his chafing steed, that snorted and trembled with eagerness to follow. "Ay! he says he loves me, but Count Rossberg is too proud to wed his daughter to a foundling, although that foundling took knighthood at a prince's hand, and on a strokefield. But he shall not vaunt it thus. By the laws of chivalry the maiden is mine; and I resign her, may my spurs be hacked from my heel! She shall now learn the result of this second appeal she so prayed me to make." So saying, the youth turned from the chase, and rode slowly towards the castle.

Night came on cheerless, and without a star. The wind moaned amid the tall forest trees, blending with the dull roar of the distant Rhine—the cottage light was extinguished in the valley, and the watch-dog was silent on the hill—every object was shrouded in gloom, and every sound was desolate.

"Other thee! fair Blanche. Heed not the rugged pathway, for thy steed is fleet and sure. Ah! now we can see the lights of the Abbey."

"Alwyn, heard you not aught as we rode along?"

"Nay, nay, Blanche, I heard but the night wind," replied Alwyn, a slight shudder passing over his frame.

"Methought twice that I heard a sigh as we rode in the gloom of the forest."

"On! on! sweetest Blanche," cried Alwyn as he urged the steeds towards the Abbey.

Blanche of Rossberg was kneeling before the altar—her hand was in that of Sir Alwyn's—the holy covenant had been made, and the priest was pronouncing his benediction, when the thunder of horse-hoofs was heard in the court-yard, followed by the sound of jingling spurs and clanking arms, as Count Rossberg, attended by a train of men at arms, entered the building. He approached the altar, and stood for a moment gazing on the young couple, who had both started to their feet—Blanche still holding the hand of Sir Alwyn; but her blue eyes suffused with tears, while he, on the contrary, regarded the intruders with a haughty and determined look.

Count Rossberg looked not on them in anger. His features wore an expression of melancholy, and he continued for some time silent, leaning on his heavy sword, as if the prey to indignant emotions. At length he said—

"Alwyn of Eginhart, I expected not this from you."

"Count Rossberg," replied the other, "this is no time for reproaches—perchance I may have some to make as well as thou—nor is the foot of the altar a fitting place to bandy angry words. Thy daughter, Blanche, is now my wife."

"Rash boy!" said the count mournfully—"She is thy sister!" A shriek of agony burst from the lips of the maiden—starting the silence of the long cold aisle, and echoing amid the lofty arches of the building—a thrilling and full of woe, that the monk stood agape as if petrified, and the stout limbs of the startled retainers trembled beneath their mail. Count Rossberg caught his fainting daughter in his arms, and Alwyn, covering his face with his hands, leaped against the rails of the altar.

In the forest of Rossberg there is a clear fountain, surrounded by the ruins of an ancient hermitage, at some distance from two green meadows, between which is a cross of rudely-sculptured stone. The fountain springs where once had stood an humble altar, and regarding it, there are many traditions; but, as tears for Blanche of Rossberg have often dewed the spot, the waters have long been held sacred of "The Hermit's Well."

DISTINCTION WITH AND WITHOUT A DIFFERENCE.—Distinction with a difference: "I have no objection," said a leveller, "that the ranks below me should be preserved just as they are now, but I wish to have none above me; and this is my notion of a fair and perfect equality." An instance of the distinction without a difference was offered by the Irishman who, having legs of different sizes, ordered his boots to be made accordingly. His directions were obeyed; but, as he had the smallest boot on his largest leg, he exclaimed, petulantly: "Confound the fellow! I ordered him to make one larger than the other; and, instead of that, he has made one smaller than the other."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

LAUREL-HILL CEMETERY.

BY A. M'KIN.

"Here the long concourse from the murmuring town,
With funeral pace, and slow, shall enter in;
To lay the loved in tranquil silence down,
No more to suffer, and no more to sin."—W. G. Clark.

SWEET garden of the sacred dead!

A bright, romantic spot,

Where flowers their softest fragrance shed,

Around each silent sleeper's head,

And love forsakes not;—

But rears with tender hand the vine,

With buds of varied hue;

The crocus and the eglantine,

That fondly round each other twine,

And drink the glittering dew.

Methinks less bitter were the grief,

To part with those we love—

To sleep where waves the vernal leaf,

Of flowers ever bright and brief,

That scent the balmy grove.

Affection's moistened eye would trace,

Beneath the lotus shade,

The loved and lost one's resting-place—

A brief but dear and hallowed space—

In pleasing garb array'd.

With faith and hope beyond the skies

Where saints eternal sing,

The dust thus und-d—and spirit free,

"Oh grave where is thy victory,

Oh death where is thy sting."

ANTIQUITIES OF CARTHAGE.

Sir Grenville Temple has employed six months in executing excavations in the neighbourhood of the site of Carthage, and his labours have been rewarded by a variety of interesting discoveries. In the ruins of the temple of Juno Coelestis, at Ganatt, the protecting divinity of Carthage, he found seven hundred coins of different articles of glass, and earthenware utensils. But the most remarkable and unexpected of his discoveries has been that of a villa on the sea-shore, and fifteen feet under ground. Eight chambers have been entirely cleared, and their form and decorations prove that the house belonged to some distinguished personage. The walls are painted, and the vestibule is paved in superb mosaic, in the same style as those of Pompeii and Herculaneum, and representing a variety of objects, such as marine divinities of both sexes, fishes of different species, marine plants, a vessel with women dancing on the deck, and surrounded by martial advisers, lions, horses, leopards, tigers, zebras, bears, gazelles, herons, and other birds. In the different chambers were found several human skeletons, supposed to be the remains of warriors killed during the storming of the villa. In another house Sir Grenville Temple has also discovered various interesting mosaics, representing gladiators combating wild animals in the arena, with the name of each combatant written over his head. In another part, are represented horse-races, and men breaking in young horses.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTH.

No one of ordinary reflection can have passed Shakespeare's fourth division of life, without having felt the fondness innate of recurring to the season of boyhood, when hope with her gaudy day-dreams seemed the living personification of truth. Although that period in event may seem the least important in life; and although we may have lived to see the vapour-cloud palaces, glittering with dew-drops, reared by our youthful imaginations, melt away before the noon-tide sun of manhood, still we cannot fail to observe and feel the mighty influence of those halcyon days upon our characters—those halcyon days which, as we recede from them, grow dearer and dearer, and in their influence, stronger and stronger. Hence, we never see an old man leaning upon his staff in the pleasant sunshine, or smoking his pipe by the cheerful fire in the long winter evening, who, if speaking of the present, does not take occasion to praise the past.

ITALIAN AUTHORS.

The misfortunes of nearly all the great Italian authors were remarkable. Ariosto lived in beggarly indigence. Tasso died in extreme want—Segni and Varchi were prohibited from publishing their laborious histories—Machiavel was a martyr to the Medici faction—Guicciardini suffered voluntary banishment, that he might not see Cosmo the first-destroyer of the liberty of the Florentine Republic—Galileo suffered the worst of persecutions, and Dante and Petrarca composed their works in exile. The human heart feels an honourable pride when we reflect on the dangers and difficulties these great men had to contend with, to think that dungeons, banishment, and poverty, were too feeble to repress their genius, bursting through the gloom of a benighted age; and it is ennobling to reflect that their names are immortal, while those of the tyrants who oppressed them are comparatively unknown, or if remembered, remembered only for the infamy attached to them.

REMOUSE.

Let not the guilty man who may now be enjoying the pleasant sunshine of prosperity, flatter himself that he shall escape a self-inflicted punishment for guilt. When adversity comes, remorse, with its poisonous fangs, begins to gnaw at the heart of its victim.

MUSIC.

Of all the arts music is the most divine. Vice derives but little aid from it, for even in the vicious it awakens noble sentiments. Happily it has not the power to express the passions.

THEODORE'S MESSENGER.

BY THOMAS HAYNES DALY.

I.
"Go, my messenger-dove—how I envy your flight
You on Anna will gaze ere you slumber to-night."
Thus Theodore cried, as he fastened the string,
And his letter lay hid 'neath its delicate wing.

II.
Away flew the bird, like a shaft from a bow,
Poor Theodore thought that its progress was slow;
From his casement at length he sank back with a sigh,
"But to-morrow," he said, "I shall read her reply."

III.
Oh, slow pass'd the day, and more slow pass'd the night,
He eagerly watch'd for the first ray of light;
His dove is returned, he has loosen'd the string—
His letter untouch'd still lies under its wing!

IV.
His courser is urged over mountain and heath,
Hor silence is caused but by danger or death;
Her cottage he sees, but no Anna is there—
In the castle she dwells—she is bride to the heir!

FROM CORRESPONDENTS ABROAD.

THE LATE MR. SNEER.

BY WILLIAM COX.

THE late Mr. Sneer obtained a considerable reputation simply by taking away the reputation of other people.

How so?

Mr. Sneer was a critic of the first water, and he tomahawked authors with more than Indian gusto. One of the shelves of his book-case was filled with volumes which he had, or thought he had, been instrumental in damning. These he used to contemplate with immense satisfaction. He called them his literary scalps.

He was the identical gentleman (whatever may be said to the contrary) who wrote the celebrated review of Byron's "Hours of Idleness." He it was that called the "Lyrical Ballads" nursery rhymes—that said Bulwer was well enough for boarding-schools and Box for pot-houses. He was not to be taken in like the rest of the world, by these pretenders to literature. It was also he who had the merit of discovering that Scott was no poet, but a mere "romancer in rhyme;" and it was he also that invariably pointed out the visible "filling-off" in the several Waverley novels, as they successively appeared.

When the above authors, in spite of his zealous endeavours, got into undisputed favour with the silly good-natured world, he gave in a little, and sometimes even perceived particles of promise scattered over their pages, but he was never the man to commit himself by downright, hearty praise. It appeared weak, foolish, and indiscriminating. Besides, he held that it always looked a great deal better to be dissatisfied with a book than satisfied; and for this reason: if satisfied, you see no further than other people who appreciate and enjoy it; but if dissatisfied, it shows that it takes something infinitely superior to what that book contains to satisfy you. Sneer invariably acted upon this maxim; upon which simple, good-natured people looked at him admiringly, and said—"Mr. Sneer was not to be put off with anything."

Sneer had no great quantity of acumen, but he had a plentiful stock of ill-nature, which answered his purpose quite as well—for what tells better or flies faster than an ill-natured remark. String a dozen or two of such remarks together, add a little malice, a sprinkling of untruths, and a few grains of flattery as a substitute for wit, and you have the promise of many a scorching, bitter, brilliant article at once. Sneer dealt very much in searching, bitter, brilliant articles.

He was not quick at discovering beauties—indeed, this was a necessary consequence of his system. He had quickness enough to perceive that perverseness and fastidiousness were often mistaken for taste; that a reputation for refinement of mind was frequently raised on no better superstructure than unsoundness of stomach; and that a person with deranged biliary organs was much more acute in discovering blemishes than those whose internal currents went on naturally and harmoniously. Accordingly, he "pooh'd" and "piah'd," and found such an immensity of fault with all sorts of authors, artists, actors, architects, and so on, that every one said he must be a man of very superior judgment indeed. This was also his own opinion.

Sneer professed a superabundance of reverence and admiration for the ancients. Not that he studied them, or in fact knew much about them, but their names had an imposing effect, and were of great use wherewith to knock down the moderns. Besides, he had no temptation to sneer at them, for what is the use of sneering at those who are insensible to your sneers. It would have been a wasteful expenditure of gall. No—it was your young, unfledged authors that he particularly delighted to anatomize. They had not received the stamp of the world's approbation, and of course were perfectly defenceless and unprotected. They had to look up to critics instead of looking down upon them, and Sneer was not one of your easy, good-natured folks (like Charles Lamb, and a few others), who let down the dignity of the critical vocation in an unseemly manner, by putting themselves on a level with their author, nay, sometimes, with foolish frankness, partially admitting their own inferiority by unreserved admiration, and hearty commendation, and acting rather as friendly assistants than as dogmatical censors. No one could lay the folly of good-nature to Sneer's charge, and it was capital fun to see how he would belabour a modest and timorous aspirant to fame or approbation, and knock his castles down about his ears. True, it gave him great pain to do so, (he said it did himself, and doubtless he would know,) but still, he added, "his sense of duty to the public compelled him to give an honest and candid opinion," and he often magnanimously added, for he was great upon this theme, "that through good report and evil report—despite whatever imputations might be cast upon his motives—and at whatever expense of personal feeling, he would still—unawed, unbiassed, undeterred—continue zealously, faithfully, fearlessly and steadfastly, to discharge that duty to that public."

A signal immolation generally followed or accompanied one of those spirited declarations.

Sneer pretty well understood all the means from "faint praise" to foaming vituperation, by which a clever man or a promising book could be brought into dispute. He always took high ground at the outset, giving the reader to understand that he (Sneer) was immensely superior to the poor devil whose performance he had condescended to notice. This being settled, he would proceed to select the worst passages, which he placed in the worst light, and he then set to work to point out with great unctious the "beauties" of the author. After this he would make extracts, not bad in themselves when read in their proper place, but rendered foolish and ludicrous by being placed in strange juxtaposition, or by being brought to bear upon each other in an incongruous manner. The reader having by these means been pretty well disposed to consider the author a fool, Sneer would then show the triumph of his art by venturing to give a really good specimen of the work. Supposing it to be of a light or humorous character, the reader, despite his half-formed prejudices, would be perhaps agreeably surprised and carried away to what he read, until his hearty laugh would be checked by Sneer's comment at the end—"And this is wit and humour! or at least what passes for such now-a-days! Shades of Sheridan, Smollett, Fielding!"—upon which it would suddenly strike the reader that he had been unconsciously betrayed into a very unseemly fit of admiration, and on re-perusing the passage he would find it exceedingly flat and foolish!—There is no withholding those invocations of the shades.

Sometimes he would select a simple and tender passage which he would much commend, earnestly recommending it to mothers as being perfectly harmless, and well adapted to infantile capacities. Or he would take one of a grave, stately and ambitious character, after the reading of which he would be seized with a fit of extreme humility—lament his incapacity to accompany the author in his eagle flights—express his confident belief that there must be some meaning in the said passage, or the gifted author would never have written it; but, at the same time profess his utter inability to find it out, which he would attribute to his being so much in the habit of reading the works of Milton, Pope, Dryden, Goldsmith, and other inferior spirits.

Occasionally he would hold out encouraging hopes. He would admit that the age of miracles had ceased, and that therefore nothing was to be hoped for on that score; but then he would contend that progressive improvement was the condition of humanity, and the grand characteristic of our species; and from these premises he would deduce grounds for believing that if the author could only be prevailed upon to utterly discard his present loose, fatulent, and vicious style, to learn humility, and to study carefully and zealously the best masters, it was not impossible but that he might, in after years, produce something not quite contemptible.

At other times he would administer execrating advice. If he knew the work under review to be the production of an elderly gentleman—the fruits of the patient labour of anxious years—he would then presume that it was only a school-boy indiscretion—a juvenile effervescence, which the good sense of manhood, and acquaintance with the world, would prevent again being repeated. At the same time, he would add a well-meant hint to the parents, guardians, or friends of the (presumed) youth, to nip such follies in the bud, otherwise they might have a tendency to render the young man ridiculous, and perhaps spoil a very excellent and efficient clerk or linen-drawer.

Did a work of ability exhibit an occasional grammatical error, he would then feelingly lament the want of a national system of education—admit that the "schoolmaster was undoubtedly abroad"—but at the same time express his surprise at the extreme dexterity of some people in keeping so thoroughly out of his way. Perhaps he would add the price of Lindley Murray's Grammar, and where it was to be had, with a word or two in favour of night or adult schools.

Another of Sneer's peculiar qualifications was the adroit manner in which he could detect a theft. In this respect he was a perfect literary Hays; indeed, he rather excelled that gentleman, for he could see a plagiarism direct where an ordinary person perhaps could not trace the most distant resemblance in either sentiment or expression.

In short, if Mr. Sneer was not an accomplished critic (which supposes rather a different class of qualities) he was what is termed an exceedingly formidable one. If he was not much beloved, he was a good deal feared, and that suited his temper and disposition better.

Mr. Sneer's death was characteristic. It was occasioned by the brilliant success of a work he had taken uncommon pains to crush. This prayed upon his spirits, and affected his liver—(some people hinted that he never had a heart)—the bile overdid its proper bounds, pervaded his whole system, brought on a bilious fever, and carried him off just as the fourth edition of the hated work was advertised. The deceased left a very numerous family.

THE FAIRIES' SONG.

BY MISS JANE TAYLOR.

I.
HARK! for the beetle winds his horn,
The dew-dropper glitters on the thorn;
Now let us to the daisied lawn,
Dancing along.

II.
From acorn cells we spring to view,
In robes of moonshine tinged with blue;
And pearly bands of evening dew
Bound in our hair.

III.
And now we form the magic ring,
And merrily dance and merrily sing;
A fairy's dance is a pretty thing,
In the moonshine.

IV.
But ere the dawn returns again,
We wind along the wooded lane,
And glow-worm torches light the train,
All the way home.

FROM CORRESPONDENTS AT HOME.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

Smithville, Down East, in the state of Maine, March 19, 1839.

DEAR GENERAL.—I've just got a letter from our son John, and as I 'pose you haist heard nothin' from him yet, since he went down to fight for our disputed territory. I thought I would set down and write a line or two, and send you John's letter, altho' a few lines he writ to his marn and the children, which don't seem to have much to do about the war.

I 'pose you might get the news from our disputed territory by the way of Smithville, about as quick as any way, for the post from Houlton, on the upper road, comes right by here. I got John's letter last night, just before bed time. I went in and read it over to old grandfather; and the old gentleman was so rejoiced about it, he couldn't hardly sleep a wink all night. But I mustn't write any more myself; if I do, I shan't have room to give you all John's letter; and I want to give it to you in his own words, for according to my notion, although he's but a stripling of a boy yet, and won't be seventeen years old till the fifth day of next May, yet, according to my notion, he writes remarkable well. He went to school to cousin Debby in his younger days, and since that, I've taught him the solid branches myself. But John writes as follows:

Our Disputed Territory, pretty near the Line, March the 12th, 1839.

DEAR FATHER—I take my pen in hand to let you know that I'm as hearty as a bear, and hope these few lines will find you, and mother, and grandfather, and cousin Debby, and all the children, enjoying the same blessing. We stood our march remarkable well, and are all alive, and safe and sound as a whistle. And Sargent Johnson makes a most capital officer. He's just such a man as is wanted down here—there's no sneering him, I can tell you. He'd fight against bears, and wild-cats, and the British, and thunder and lightning, and anything else, that should set out to meddle with our disputed territory. And he's taken a master-like to me too, and says if he has any hard fighting to do, although I'm the youngest in the company, he shall always choose me first for his right-hand man. He says I had more pluck at the drafting than any one in the whole company, and he should rather have me by his side in battle, than any three of the rest of 'em. But maybe you'd like to hear something about our march down here, and so on.

For the first four or five hours, we marched rather too fast, and got pretty nigh tuckered out, for we was all so earnest to get down there before the first battle come on, that we almost run half the time. At last, about one o'clock, Billy Wiggins—you know what a short-legged little fat chunk of a thing he is—he begun to lag behind a good deal, and puffed and sweat as had as our colt when we plough along with him. At last, as I said afore, about one o'clock, Billy Wiggins, who had got away a good many rods behind us, stooped short in the middle of the road, and called out to Sargent Johnson as loud as he could holler, and says he,

"It's no use; I can't run like a hoss all day, and without a mouthful to eat. I'm half starved now, and as tired as a dog. I say, Sargent Johnson, we must stop and rest a little while, and have something to eat, or I can't keep up with you no longer, and it's no use to try."

At that, Sargent Johnson ordered us to halt till Billy came up. So the poor feller come puffing along up to us, and rubbing his arm across his forehead to wipe the sweat off; and the sargent told him, 'bein' it was past one o'clock, we'd halt, and have some refreshments. There was a house a little ways ahead of us, and a plenty of wood piled round the door-way, that would make good seats for us to set down on; so we marched along up to it, and halted, and sat down on the wood-pile, and took off our knapsacks, and got out our victuals, and begun to eat our dinner. Presently, the old gentleman of the house looked out of the window, and see us, and he opened the door, and come right out to us, without any hat on, and says he,

"My boys, are you going down to fight for our disputed territory?"

Sargent Johnson told him, that was jest exactly what we was up to.

"That's right," said the old gentleman, "and you look like brave fellows too. Our company started off yesterday, and one of my boys has gone with it. I hope you'll be able to get there about as soon as they do, so that our side may be strong-handed before the first fight comes on."

Sargent Johnson told him, we was determined to be there before the first battle come on if possible, and meant to have a hard in't too.

"Ah, you're the boys for me," said the old gentleman: "if I was a few years younger, and wasn't quite so lame, I believe I should go with you. Did you ever hear anything so impudent as 'twas for them British to carry off our land agent as they did? and then to be stealin' logs on our disputed territory—why, it makes my blood bile when I think of it. But, come, don't set out here on the wood-pile; come, go into the house, and eat your dinners, and you shall have as much of my cider as you can drink."

We thanked him, and told him we didn't keer if we did. So we went in, and had a good drink of cider with our victuals, and set and rested ourselves nearly an hour, and then marched along again. We took it a little slower in the afternoon, so that Billy Wiggins made out to keep up with us pretty well.

We got to Augusta about sunset; and just as we was marching along by the State-house, which is a very fine building, more than as big again as our barn, and all made of hewed stone, and stands up on a little hill pretty near the road, so, just as we got along against the State-house, the Legislature was adjourned, and the folks was all coming out in a heap, right down towards the road.

Then he run along and whispered to us, and says he, "Now, boys, we'll give 'em a salute; and I want you should do it man-fashion. Now you mind and have your guns well-shouldered, and be very careful to mind the word of command, and all shoot to once. You must mind and pint your guns high, so as to go over everybody's heads, for you know there's balls in 'em—and these wint the British folks that we are going to fire at now, remember that. I shall give the word of command, Make ready, take aim, fire—and when you hear the word fire, you must pull trigger all to once, and blaze away like thunder."

We all told him we would, and he went along, and took his stand at the head of the company. We'd all kept our guns well loaded during the day, for fear what might happen, and he shouldered 'em as the sargent told us, and got all fixed, and stood with stiff upper lips, and all ready to fire. Just as the main body of the legislature-folks and the people got along down within about two rods of the road where we stood, Sargent Johnson hollered out with a good loud military voice,

"Make ready—"

Crack! went Billy Wiggins' gun—smoke, powder, wad, and everything blazing into the air. I never see anybody so struck up as Sargent Johnson was—he coloured as red as a blaze, and looked as if he would a bit Billy Wiggins' head off. But when he see the rest of us held on, and didn't pull, he plucked up courage again, and give the rest of the word of command.

"Take aim—Fire—"

In a moment we all pulled, pretty near together tu, and if we didn't give 'em a real stunder, I wot guess again. Some of the people jumped, and some squat, like geese going into a barn door. But when they found nobody wasn't killed, they come along down to the road, and inquired of Sargent Johnson what town we come from, and shook hands with us, and seemed to be very glad to see us, and said they was glad we'd got along; for things looked terrible equally down to our disputed territory, and the sooner we could get there the better.

Bime by Governor Fairfield come out of the State-house, and come along down to the road, and says he,

"My brave fellow-soldiers, I'm glad to see you; what town do you come from?"

Sargent Johnson told him we was the Smithville detachment, and was on our way down to our disputed territory, and if he had any commands to send that way, we should be happy to carry 'em. The governor's a little piece of a man to look at; but he say he's got grit enough aboard for two common-sized men. He said he had no particular commands to send by us, only he wanted us to get down there as quick as we possibly could, and report ourselves to Colonel Jarvis, and he would take command of us, and tell us what to do. And, says he, "I want you to tell Jarvis to hold on down there like a dog to a root, and not give up an inch to them British chaps; if he wants more men, only send word to me, and he shall have 'em by regiments, as many as he wants. But tell him never to give up an inch; if Sir John Harvey frets—let him fret. But above all, tell Jarvis to add to the logs, live or die. And now, my brave fellows," said the governor, "it's too late for you to go any further to-night; you shall have a chance to sleep in one of the lobbies of the State-house, and I'll see that you have victuals and drink provided for you; and I want you to be under way again by sunrise in the morning, whether I am up or not."

So we bid the governor good night, and he sent a man to show us the way into the State-house, and to bring us what we wanted to eat and drink. And he fared well, too, I can tell you—a plenty of bread and meat, and hot coffee, and a basket of apples. We helped ourselves, you may depend, as though we hadn't had anything to eat for a month. The legislator-folks came back in crowds and flocked round the door, and a great many of 'em come in and talked with us about the war down in our disputed territory. They all said the land was ours, every inch of it, and we must stick to it and not give up a single tree; for the legislator was determined to stand by us and would vote to pay all the expenses. After they'd all cleared out, we laid down and took a nap. And about an hour before sunrise I got up and looked out, and see 'twas all broad daylight; so I went and touched Sargent Johnson and told him 'twas time to be stirring. He sprung on his feet quicker than if he'd been shot, and says he, "Where? where? where's he? I'm ready for 'em. Give me my gun; give me my sword! Stand by, boys, I'll go ahead! Where be they?"

And then he begun to rub his eyes, and looked round and see me, and says he—

"Oh, John, is it you? I believe I was dreaming. I thought the enemy was just a breaking into our camp, and I was going to send daylight through 'em about the quickest." And then he looked out of the window, and says he, "By zounds! it's morning; come, John, call 'em up, and let us have a bite of something to eat and be going."

So I roused them all out, and we got some breakfast, and got all ready to start a little before sunrise. We found out where the governor boarded, and Sargent Johnson said he meant to give him a salute as we went by, if he wasn't up. So when we got along against the house, he give the word to fire, and we blazed away like a clap of thunder. In a minute the governor come running to the window in his shirt sleeves, and he opened the window and looked out, and says he—

"That's you, my brave fellows, you are the sort for me. I never shall be afraid of the British while I have such fellow-soldiers as you are. Tell Jarvis to stick to the old line; we'll have the line of '83, come what will. And don't forget to tell Jarvis to mind and hold on to the logs."

He wished us a speedy march, and shot down the window, and we jogged along.

It's no use for me to try to tell you all about the everlasting great long road we had to go over to get down here; for there's more mountains, and hills, and woods, and rivers, and ponds, and brooks, and snow-banks, and swamps, than you could shake a stick at for a month. Our disputed territory is a terrible long ways off, and there's no end to it when you get there. We didn't stop to Houlton, for our orders was to go right down into the midst of it, and report ourselves to Colonel Jarvis. So we inquired the way along and found Colonel Jarvis and his men was gone on to Fitzherbert's farm, down close to the line, and was building up a fortification. We marched along till we come clear in sight of the farm, and could see the men to work.

"Now," says Sargent Johnson, "now, my boys, is the time to show your best. See that your guns are well loaded, and march up to the camp like heroes."

We stopped and examined our guns to see if they was well loaded, and as Billy Wiggins was fumbling over his lock to see if the priming was good, somehow or other he let her go; and he had a monstrous heavy charge in, and she roared away through the woods like a harrycane. At that, Sargent Johnson almost swore, and said he wished Billy Wiggins had staid to home. But he told us to shoulder our guns and march up quick-step towards the camp. So we marched along, and in a minute or two we see a terrible mustering round the camp. They come out as thick as bees and begun to form into a line, and went to loading their guns as fast as they could make their hands fly. And a little, small, brisk man seemed to be taking the command, and placing the men this way and that, and making his bright sword fly about like a streak of lightning. Sargent Johnson told us to halt; for we begun to feel a little blue all to once. We didn't know but we had missed our road and got over the line, and that might be a camp of the British. So Sargent Johnson thought it was best to stop and reconnoitre a little.

Bime by we see one chap from the camp running towards the woods as hard as he could spring.

"'Tis the British," said Sargent Johnson, "'tis the British; and they are afraid of us; see how that feller runs!"

But in a minute we heard the brisk little man, that had the command, bawl out after him to stop, and he swung his sword round as if he'd take his head off. The feller looked over his shoulder, but kept along. At that the commander leapt up a gun and called again, and says he, "If you don't come right back, I'll put a ball through your heart in a minute." That stopt the feller, and he come back again and took his place in the ranks.

"There's spunk there," said Sargent Johnson, "let 'em belong to which side of the line they will. If I knew they was British, we'd face 'em and give 'em battle at once. But I should hate to fire at 'em till we know, for fear they might belong to our side."

We was a little staggered for a while to know what we best to do. As near as we could see what they was about at the camp, they was busy to work getting ready to fight us. And as there was only eleven of us, and there seemed to be some hundreds of them, we thought it was best for us to be on the look out, and see that they didn't get the advantage of us. Sargent Johnson said he didn't see how we could have missed the road, and he couldn't hardly believe yet, but what they belonged to our side. So says he—

"If there's any one of you that dares to go up with a flag of truce, I think we better send up and have a fair understanding with 'em before we begin to fight."

None of the rest of 'em started, so I told the sargent I was the boy for him to send on that errand. And says he—

"That's you, John, I knew before I spoke, you was the man for it. So get ready."

But come to look round we couldn't find anything to make a flag of truce of; for Sargent Johnson said it must be white, and we hadn't one of us got a white handkerchief or any such thing; so we seemed to be kind of stuck. At last, says I, "You needn't bother about that. There's more ways to kill a cat than one." So I tore off a good large square piece of my shirt and tied it on to the end of my gun, and says I—

"Sargent, I'm ready—"

After he told me what to say, I shouldered my gun and marched up towards the camp with my flag of truce flying. The camp stood up on a rising ground about a quarter of a mile from our company, and their soldiers was all out and formed in a line three or four deep. But I marched right straight up to 'em; and when I got up within a few rods, the commanding officer come along out with his sword in his hand and met me. Says I—

"Who commands these troops?"

"Colonel Jarvis," says he.

"I want to see him," says I.

"I'm the man," says he.

"Well, sir," says I, "you are the very man we've been looking for all day."

"Well, sir," says he, "I'm ready for you, let you want what you will. But is Sir John Harvey any where about here? If he is, you may go back and tell him we don't want any of his flags of truce, and no parleying about it; for we are determined to hold on to the land, every inch of it, and the logs too, if we have to die in the last ditch, and he may help himself if he can."

"But," says I, "my dear sir, you are mistaken; we aint Sir John Harvey's folks by a jug full. We are the Smithville detachment, under command of Sargent Johnson, and have come down to june your forces."

"Ah, ha!" says the colonel, "that alters the case." So he run back and told his men how 'twas, and they set up three tremendous cheers that made the woods ring again.

As soon as our company heard that, they come running up the hill like a flock of sheep, and Sargent Johnson and the colonel was so glad to see each other, that they shook hands so hard, I didn't know but they would have pulled one another's hands off. The colonel took us right into the camp and give us some dinner, and said "he was most confounded glad we'd got along, for he'd been expecting a brush with the British a number of days."

We haint had much chance to look about here yet, but when we do, I'll write again. You needn't be concerned about our giving up any of our disputed territory, for our troops is all as fair as tigers about it, and Colonel Jarvis, though he's a little, small, thin man, he's jest as smart as a steel-trap.

Give my love to all the folks, and I remain your loving son, JOHN.

Dear General, my son's letter is so long, I haven't got time to add another word. Yours, JOHN SMITH, ESQUIRE.

From the German of J. G. Herder

THE LILY AND THE ROSE.

TELL ME, ye graceful daughters of the rough, dark earth, who gave you your beautiful forms? for truly, by delicate fingers were you fashioned. What little Genie rise out of your cups? what delights feel ye, when Goddesses move softly over your leaves? Tell me, peaceful flowers, how they divided the joyous work, and how they rejoiced together, when they had woven your fine texture, and adorned you in manifold ways! But in silence, lovely creations, ye enjoy your being. Well, then! the teaching fable shall relate to me what your lips conceal.

When as yet the Earth was a desolate and naked rock, behold! a friendly band of Nymphs prepared the virgin soil, and good Geni were ready to embellish it with flowers. In various ways, they laboured together. Soon, under the snow, and in the low grass, modest Humility formed the hidden Violet. Hope stepped along behind her, and filled with cooling fragrance the little cups of the refreshing Hyacinth. Afterwards came a haughty, glittering choir of many-coloured beauties: the Tulip reared her head; the Narcissus glanced around with languishing eyes.

Many other Goddesses and Nymphs employed themselves also in adorning the Earth, and rejoiced over its beautiful appearance.

And behold! when many of their creations had faded, and the renown thereof and the joy of the creators had passed away, thus spake Venus to her Graces—"Why tarry ye, sisters of Grace? rise! and weave ye also from your charms a mortal, visible flower." They went down to Earth, and Aglaia, the Grace of Innocence, formed the Lily; Thalia and Euphrosyne fashioned, with sisterly hand, the flower of Joy and Love, the virgin Rose.

Many flowers of the field and garden envied one another; the Lily and Rose envied none, and were envied by all. In sisterly friendship they bloom together on one field, and heighten each other's charms, for sisterly Graces have fashioned and united them.

Maiden! on your cheeks bloom Lilies and Roses! may their tutelary Goddesses, Innocence, Joy and Love, united and inseparable, dwell there also.

THE HEAVENLY SHEPHERD.

Deep in the midnight, before the spring-feast on which the first born sons of the human race were to bring a thank-offering to the Creator, their mother was visited by a wonderful dream. The white roses that her youngest son had planted around his altar, were transformed to full red roses, which as yet she had never seen. She was about to gather them, but they fell to pieces at her touch. On the altar upon which heretofore only milk was offered, lay now a bleeding lamb. Weeping voices were lifted up all around, and a sound of despair was in them; and anon, all was lost in sweet tones, in tones which she had never heard before.

Then a beautiful meadow was spread out before her—more beautiful even than the paradise of her youth; and, upon it, kept his flock a white-robed shepherd, in the form of her son. The red roses were around his hair; and in his hand was the harp from which those sweet tones proceeded. He turned lovingly towards her, he was about to approach her—and vanished. The dream vanished with him.

Awaking, she observed how red the morning light appeared, and went with heavy heart to the feast-offering.

The brothers brought their offerings; the parents went home. At evening the younger son returned not. Anxiously his mother sought him. She found his flock scattered and drooping. Himself lay bleeding on the altar; the roses were dyed with his blood; the walls of Cain resounded from a neighbouring cavern.

Insensible, the mother sank upon the body of her son, when, for the second time, the vision appeared. Her son was that shepherd, whom she saw yonder, in a new paradise. The red roses were around his hair; tones of melody sounded from his harp, and thus he sang to her—"Look up; towards heaven, to the stars, weeping mother, look up. See yonder that glittering chariot; it conveys to other meadows, to a more beautiful paradise than thou sawest in Eden, where the rose of Innocence blooms unstained, and all sighs are lost in sweet tones."

The vision disappeared; strengthened in spirit, Eve stood up by the pale corpse of her son. And in the morning, when she had bewailed him with her tears, and crowned him with the roses from his altar, the father and mother buried him near the altar of his God, as the first ray of light appeared. But often she sat on his grave at midnight, and looked up towards heaven, to that high chariot of stars, and sought her lost shepherd there.

INKLINGS OF IDEAS.

HISTORY OF EVENTS THAT NEVER HAPPENED.

D'ISRAELI, in his "Curiosities of Literature," has a chapter on this subject. He mentions but two such events. Livy alludes to Alexander's projected invasion of Italy, and then giving loose to his imagination, descants beautifully upon what would have been the probable consequence, if he had put his design into execution.

After the Saracens had been expelled from Spain, Eude, a discontented noble, formed a conspiracy, which was timely discovered, to re-admit them and subvert the Spanish empire. If he had succeeded, many who now kneel in a church, would be prostrating themselves in a mosque.

Another and better example might be given. In 1637, Cromwell was on board a vessel to emigrate to America, when he was stayed by order of council. If he had come, the royal cause triumphing in the struggle that ensued, the king's prerogative would have swallowed up the rights of the people, and the English constitution would not exhibit, as it now does, an almost perfect model. We may easily imagine, too, what a different character a man of Cromwell's vast and restless genius would have given to this country. Instead of offering to the world a lesson of liberty, America would, in all probability, be groaning at this moment under the yoke of a despot.

OF PERSONS ONE WOULD LIKE TO SEE.

Under this head, there is a very beautiful essay in "Hazlitt's Remains," reporting a conversation between Wordsworth, Lamb and others. They, however, only specifying particular individuals, said nothing as to the kind of persons they would like to see. If I were to attempt to define those whom I would call up,

"Heroes I should never have seen else of this side of the dim shore," etc.

I would say that it was not those who were simply great, and distinguished only by the magnifying of those qualities they possess in common with the rest of the world, as Newton, Locke, etc.; but those who were marked by some eccentricity, some pleasant obliquity of character, who were unlike everybody else. That I may illustrate what I mean: Dr. Johnson and Coleridge were, perhaps, more celebrated than any two men that ever lived for their conversational powers. Now, I wouldn't trouble myself to talk with the former, while I would give the world to hear the latter preach, as Lamb designated his inspired outpourings. The difference is this: Dr. Johnson simply excelled in what he said, aided by no adventitious or extrinsic circumstances; Coleridge not only claimed by the matter, but much more by the manner, the swelling, rich and intimated voice, the wild, bright eye, the rapt air, and, above all, the thrilling topics on which he was wont to discourse.

THE RHINE AND THE HUDSON.

One thing showing the strength of the principle of association is, that we always transfer our idea of the social, literary and scientific inferiority of a new country, to its physical gifts likewise. I once heard a fellow say when he saw the Mississippi, "Not so bad for a new country!" recognising involuntarily the superiority of long settled states over those newly colonized, in all that relates to man or his works, and carrying over the same feeling to the works of God.

General opinion as to the comparative beauty of the scenery upon the Rhine and Hudson, affords another exemplification of this strange confusion of things. I have no doubt but that, really and intrinsically, one is as good as the other; but the Hudson is yet new, while antiquity and poetry have united to hallow the Rhine. The traveller on the latter recollects that two thousand years ago Cæsar battled upon its banks, that the castles frowning over its precipices were each the scene of some heroic deeds, some desperate and long-endured sieges; and that the plains stretching out on either side, have flowed with the blood of thousands of brave men. On the contrary, there are none of these associations connected with the Hudson, and in consequence it occupies, and will continue to occupy, only a secondary place in the eye of the world.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A NUMBER of ladies request that the inclosed may be inserted in the Mirror, for the benefit of its numerous female readers. It was published many years since, but a copy of it cannot be found except in bound volumes, and it is preserved thus (which has been sent from Virginia) is the only one north of the Potomack. We think the advice excellent;—followed, it will contribute to the happiness of

WOMAN.

ADVICE OF A FATHER TO HIS ONLY DAUGHTER,

Written immediately after her marriage.

BY PATRICK HENRY.

MY DEAR DAUGHTER—You have just entered into that state which is replete with happiness or misery. The issue depends upon that prudent, amiable, uniform conduct, which wisdom and virtue so strongly recommend, on the one hand, or on that imprudence which a want of reflection or passion may prompt on the other.

You are allied to a man of honour, of talents, and of an open, generous disposition. You have, therefore, in your power, all the essential ingredients of domestic happiness: it cannot be marred, if you now reflect upon that system of conduct which you ought invariably to pursue—if you now see clearly, the path from which you will resolve never to deviate. Your conduct is often the result of whim or caprice, often such as will give us many a pang, unless we see, beforehand, what is always the most praiseworthy, and the most essential to happiness.

The first maxim which you should impress deeply upon your mind, is, never to attempt to control your husband by opposition, by displeasure, or any other mark of anger. A man of sense, of prudence, of warm feelings, cannot, and will not, bear an opposition of any kind, which is attended with an angry look or expression. The current of his affections is suddenly stopped; his attachment is weakened; he begins to feel a mortification the most pungent; he is belittled even in his own eyes; and he is assured, the wife who once excites those sentiments in the breast of a husband, will never regain the high ground which she might and ought to have retained. When he marries her, if he be a good man, he expects from her smiles, not frowns; he expects to find in her one who is to control him, not to take from him the freedom of acting as his own judgment shall direct, but one who will place such confidence in him, as to believe that his prudence is his best guide. Little things, what in reality are mere trifles in themselves, often produce bickerings, and even quarrels. Never permit them to be a subject of dispute; yield them with pleasure, with a smile of affection. Be assured that one difference outweighs them all a thousand, or ten thousand times. A difference with your husband ought to be considered as the greatest calamity—as one that is to be most studiously guarded against; it is a demon which must never be permitted to enter a habitation where all should be peace, unpaired confidence, and heartfelt affection. Besides, what can a woman gain by her opposition or her indifference? Nothing. But she loses everything, she loses her husband's respect for her virtues, she loses his love, and with that, all prospect of future happiness. She creates her own misery, and then eters idle and silly complaints, but utters them in vain. The love of a husband can be retained only by the high opinion which he entertains of his wife's goodness of heart, of her amiable disposition, of the sweetness of her temper, of her prudence, of her devotion to him. Let nothing upon any occasion ever lessen that opinion. On the contrary, it should augment every day: he should have much more reason to admire her for those excellent qualities, which will cast a lustre over a virtuous woman, when her personal attractions are no more.

Has your husband staid out longer than you expected? When he returns receive him as the partner of your heart. Has he disappointed you in something you expected, whether of ornament, or furniture, or of any convenience? Never evince discontent; receive his apology with cheerfulness. Does he, when you are house-keeper, invite company without informing you of it, or bring home with him a friend? Whatever may be your repeat, however scanty it may be, however impossible it may be to add to it, receive them with a pleasing countenance, adorn your table with cheerfulness, give to your husband and to your company a hearty welcome; it will more than compensate for every other deficiency: it will evince to your husband, good sense in yourself, and that politeness of manners, which acts as the most powerful charm! It will give to the plainest fare a zest superior to all that luxury can boast. Never be discontented on any occasion of this nature.

In the next place, as your husband's success in his profession will depend upon his popularity, and as the manners of a wife have no little influence in extending or lessening the respect and esteem of others for her husband, you should take care to be affable and polite to the poorest as well as the richest. A reserved haughtiness is a sure indication of a weak mind and an unfeeling heart.

With respect to your servants, teach them to respect and love you, while you expect from them a reasonable discharge of their respective duties. Never tease yourself, or them, by scolding; it has no other effect than to render them discontented and impatient. Admonish them with a calm firmness.

Cultivate your mind by the perusal of those books which instruct while they amuse. Do not devote much of your time to novels; there are a few which may be useful, and improving in giving a higher tone to our moral sensibility; but they tend to rattle the taste, and to produce a dexterity for substantial intellectual food. Most plays are of the same cast; they are not friendly to the decay which is one of the ornaments of the female character. History, geography, poetry, moral essays, biography, travels, sermons, and other well-written religious productions, will not fail to enlarge your understanding, to render you a more agreeable companion, and to exalt your virtue. A woman devoid of rational ideas of religion, has no security for her virtue; it is sacrificed to her passions, whose voice, not that of God, is her only governing principle. Besides, in those hours of calamity to which families must be exposed, where will she find support, if it be not in her just reflections upon that all-ruling Providence which governs the universe, whether its nature be animate?

Mutual politeness between the most intimate friends, is essential to that harmony, which should never be once broken or interrupted. How important then is it between man and wife! The more warm the attachment, the less will either party bear to be slighted, or treated with the smallest degree of rudeness or inattention. The politeness, then, if it be not in itself a virtue, is at least the means of giving to real goodness a new lustre; it is the means of preventing discontent, and even quarrels; it is the oil of intercourse, it removes asperities, and gives to everything a smooth, an even, and a pleasing movement.

I will only add, that matrimonial happiness does not depend upon wealth; no, it is not to be found in wealth; but in minds properly tempered and united to our respective situations. Competency is necessary; all beyond that point, is ideal. Do not suppose, however, that I would not advise your husband to augment his property by all honest and commendable means. I would wish to see him actively engaged in such a pursuit, because engagement, a sedulous employment, in obtaining some laudable object, is essential to happiness. In the attainment of a fortune, by honorable means, and particularly by professional exertion, a man derives particular satisfaction, in self-applause, as well as from the increasing estimation in which he is held by those around him.

In the management of your domestic concerns, let prudence and wise economy prevail. Let neatness, order, and judgment be seen in all your different departments. Unite liberality with a just frugality; always reserve something for the hand of charity; and never let your door be closed to the voice of suffering humanity. Your servants, in particular, will have the strongest claim upon your charity; let them be well fed, well clothed, nursed in sickness, and never let them be unjustly treated.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

THE HEROINE OF SHAKESPEARE'S "MEASURE FOR MEASURE." There is nothing highly heroic in this drama excepting Isabella. I remember being once coy (says Campbell) in my admiration of this seemingly cold heroine, but better reflection has taught me to think otherwise. What would become of the human race, if the pride of woman in her party were capable of compromise? Adieu to all domestic affections! The dishonouring of the sex is introducing death into the source of life. This thought never struck me more forcibly than in reading the scene in Whetstone's play, in which Cassandra comes, disguised as a boy, to the house of Promos, in order to purchase her brother's life by the surrender of her virtue, and with the hope promised to her by Promos that he will skin over her shame by marrying her: a hope that deepens her degradation. I said to myself, thanks to Shakspeare that Isabella would have seen a thousand brothers perish, sooner than have submitted to such a shame.

EPITAPH ON SHAKESPEARE.—The following epitaph on Shakspeare was written in 1616, by an unknown author:

Renowned Spenser, Iye a thought more night
To learned Chaucer; and rare Beaumont, Iye
A little nearer Spenser; to make room
For Shakspear in your three-fold, four-fold tomb;
To lodge all four in one bed make a shift
Until doom's day, for nearly will a fifth
Between this day and that, by fate be a name
For whom your curtains may be drawn againe.

A NARROW ESCAPE.—A few days ago a notary of Dijon, in Burgundy, was proceeding to Genlis with a sum of four hundred pounds, when, near Faverney, a woman, who appeared much fatigued, begged that he would give her a lift. He consenting, she handed him a basket, and was about to get up into his vehicle, when he suspected his companion to be a thief, he dismounted, he had the presence of mind to drop his whip, requesting the pretended lady to pick it up for him. In the meantime the notary galloped off in double quick time, and on reaching his home was not a little surprised to find that the basket contained a pair of loaded pistols and a dagger.

USE OF DISAPPOINTMENT.—A story is told of a Scotch nobleman who, in order to break his daughters of too ardent a pursuit of pleasure, would allow them to accept of an invitation to a ball—dress for it—order his equipage to the door, but just as the expectant girls were about to step into the carriage, would suddenly remind it to the coach-house, order the young ladies to lay aside their ball dresses, assume their common habiliments, and return to the quiet avocation of the family.

FASHION IN DRESS.—The English correspondent of the New-York Star, has the following remarks upon the outer decorations of the English ladies:—"A decided novelty in fashion has been introduced at Paris. It is called a Châtelaine. A thick hook of gold, such as our grandmothers wore in the girdle to hold keys, a watch, etc., is placed in the hair—this is the châtelaine. The only qualifications are, it must be old and massive.

GRIEVES.—The number of this extraordinary race in Europe, Asia and Africa, is calculated to amount to seven hundred thousand. In America they have been hitherto unknown, though a small number are said to have emigrated to that quarter recently. Throughout the world they speak the same kind of gibberish, which is very similar to the language of Hindostan, to which country their origin has, on that account, been assigned.

EVADING THE QUESTION.—"Shant I see you hum from singin' skull to-night, Jerushy?" "No, you shant do no such thing. I don't want you nor your company, Reuben."—"Praps you didn't exactly understand what I said?" "Yes, I did. You asked me if you mightn't see me hum?"—"Wy, no, I didn't—I only asked you how your wum was!"

HOUSEWIFERY.—An ancient art, said to have been fashionable among young girls and wives; now entirely out of use, or practised only by the lower orders.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"THE RUINS OF ATHENS, TITANIA'S BANQUET, A MASK, AND OTHER POEMS. By G. HILL. Boston: Olin, Broaders and Co.

We are surprised that these very beautiful poems have not received a more general attention, than they appear to have excited from the press. The only explanation we can devise for this apparent neglect is, that the press have not been very generally favoured with copies. "The Ruins of Athens" is the longest poem in this elegantly printed volume, was, as we learn from the preface, begun at Piræus in 1838. It is written in the Spenserian stanza, and contains many passages of uncommon beauty and power. The following is not an unfavourable specimen of its tone:

"The moon is up—win cold and dewy eye
Peeps, like a vernal from her cloister, forth;
In dusky brightness: the gray peaks on high
Lift her old silvers in the clear, blue north:
The clouds ascend, on high winds borne, that come
Laden with fragrance; and from each high place,
Where every god in turn has found a home,
Nature sends up her incense, and her face
Unveils to him whose stone and dwelling are all space."

Of the lyrical pieces we prefer the lines "To the memory of a friend," and those entitled "Early Spring," "Lella," and "The Time is gone," remind us a little too much of Pinckney; and the verse to an old coin are evidently suggested by Horace Smith's famous verses to an old mummy. There is enough, however, in this volume to satisfy any one that Mr. Hill is a true poet, and we commend his volume to the favourable regards of the public.

"CONVERSATIONS ON NATURE AND ART." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

We are not partial to the conversational mode, in books, of imparting knowledge; but the work before us is so cleverly executed, that we must, in this instance, dispense with our usual objections. It embraces a variety of information, useful in the daily commerce of society or business, and treats in an intelligent manner of the arts and sciences, printing, libraries, manuscripts, botany and horticulture, manufactures, food, classes of mankind, with many other branches, all of practical utility. Numerous wood-cuts embellish the volume, the appropriate motto to which is:—"Je n'étudie pas de vain savoir, mais pour me rendre meilleur."

"THE PRINCE AND THE PEACOCK, OR THE STORY OF BRISTOL." By the author of "The Heiress," "The Merchant's Daughter," &c. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

One of the best, most interesting and most unexceptionable historical novels that have been read since "Scott's last." The author is, we believe, a lady. She has displayed rare powers of description, and an artist-like faculty of sketching character in these volumes. Not the slightest recommendation of the book is, that it illustrates with laborious fidelity a period of English history but little known.

"NICHOLAS NICKLEBY."—Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Messrs. Lea and Blanchard have published the eleventh number of this excellent and amusing work by Dickens. The interest is heightened with wonderful ability, and there is no flagging in the humor and pathos of the narrative. The characters of Mantlin, Squeers, Ralph Nickleby and Smike, are portrayed in a masterly style.

WORKS IN THE PRESS

A new novel of intense interest, founded on events that occurred in this city some few years since, is in the press of the Messrs. Harper. It is from the pen of one of those many men of genius in this country, who, notwithstanding the cares and perplexities of an active commercial life, find sufficient leisure for the exercise of their talents in the pursuit of letters; and it is not unfrequently happens that these smaller productions excel in freshness, originality, and fidelity to nature, even the more laboured compositions of those who make authorship a business. In this country, however, there are but few professional authors. Paulding—the race, inimitable Paulding—is a thorough man of business.—So is the bright-hearted, cheerful Halleck, as the books of John Jacob Astor will abundantly testify.—So is Bryant, whose muse breathes the very soul of solitude and communion with nature.—So is Sprague, whose drafts upon the "Celestial Nine," never return protested.—So is Wetmore, the Alcaeus among our country's bards.—So is Worth, whose verses ring like the sterling ore—and so are a number of others we could mention. But particularly so is the author of the forthcoming novel, the publication of which is looked for with much curiosity. Those who have seen the manuscript, speak of it in terms of unqualified commendation.

Daniels' History of the State of New-York, is in press, and will be published in the course of a few months.

Coleman has in press two new works, by Mr. Willis. The first of these is, the "Letters from under a Bridge," and the other, a collection of miscellaneous "Tales of Many Lands."

Lea and Blanchard have announced a number of literary novelties as forthcoming, which we shall notice more particularly hereafter.

MRS. LEWIS'S REPRODUCTIONS.

The valuable reprints of the British magazines and reviews continue to be issued from the establishment at the corner of Broadway and Pine-street, with unabated promptitude. The late numbers of Bentley's and Blackwood's magazines have been unusually attractive. There is, by the way, in the February number of Blackwood quite an unjustifiable attack upon Barry Cornwall. The criticism, with an evident affectation of disdain, exclaims:—"Ben Jonson by Barry Cornwall! This is really too much." The most masculine of intellects edited by the most offensive—one of the greatest of England's poets patronized by one of her smallest poetsasters. An eagle heralded by a wren! or is it absolutely a tom-tit! Wilson here overshoots his mark. If Barry Cornwall is a poetaster, the author of the "Isle of Palms" is no better. Cornwall's English songs and Dramatic Scenes will last while a taste for poetry and music shall survive.

NEW-YORK TRADE SALE.—The twenty-ninth New-York trade sale of books, stereotype plates, &c., took place on Monday, the twenty-fifth, at 106 Broadway. The catalogue occupies one hundred and eight large octavo pages, and it is enough to frighten a reader of ordinarily capacious digestion, to peruse it.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We are indebted to J. T. I. for his curious exposition. The coincidence he points out is indeed too decided to be accidental. With regard to the leading incidents in the three stories, which bear such a family likeness, they are doubtless original and of Arabian origin. In the "Cobbler of Brum," the fact was introduced in the preface which denigrated it as "A Turkish Legend." But the resemblance between "Yusuf, the Water-carrier," and "Besan, the blacksmith," is so remarkable, that Captain M. must either have written both, or appropriated the language and ideas of another with a degree of coolness, worthy of the author of the speech at the Convention dinner.—C. H. B.'s interesting communication shall appear. Thanks for the same.—H. H. R. is accepted. A very beautiful poem by Ione is on file.—The communications from B. A. E. shall be inserted with much pleasure.—The author of the very spirited translations from the Spanish of Yriarte, which appear in our paper of to-day, will accept our very best thanks. We commend these fables to the special attention of the "poor devil authors," for whose instruction and benefit they are intended.

A correspondent has sent us the opinion of Judge Lewis, concerning the appointment under the new constitution of Pennsylvania—a subject which has made some noise in that state recently. It is an able and a lucid document, distinguished for its legal acumen and sound judgment. We perceive that the Judge is spoken of as a prominent candidate for the United States Senate. He is an amiable and a singularly gifted man, and his talents and good qualities would render him conspicuous in any position, either under the state or general government. If it were not incompatible with the design of this work, we would publish "the opinion," as a specimen of fine writing and sound argument.

We trust that should any one take upon himself the responsibility of republishing the beautiful original melody by Russell, in our last page, due credit for it should be given to the author of the speech at the Convention dinner.—This demand is certainly no more than reasonable.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1839.

Grace Horsley Darling.—We publish to-day a full account of the wreck of the Forfarshire steamer, which afforded the opportunity for the display of the adventurous heroism of Grace Horsley Darling, the daughter of the keeper of Longstone Light. This young enthusiast in the cause of humanity appears to be an especial favourite with the poets, paragraphists and play-wrights of the day, and it will not be their fault if she do not become quite as celebrated as the renowned Joan of Arc. She has already been the subject of songs, poems, toasts, and story-books without number, and when the mist of time shall have magnified her exploits beyond even their present dimensions, she will doubtless go down to future generations in fairy legends along with Cinderella, Blue-Beard, Jack the Giant-Killer, and Valentine and Orson. But Grace is evidently a good, unpretending girl, and reminds us of Scott's beautiful creation—Jeanie Deans. The following letter was addressed by Miss Darling to the secretary at Lloyd's, returning her grateful thanks for the liberal donation given by the subscribers. The letter is verbatum as written:—"KIND SIR—I am very much obliged to the gentlemen who have given me the sum of twenty pounds, and I hope you will let them know that I feel very grateful to them who have so liberally rewarded me; and I thank God who enabled me to do so much. I thought it a duty, as no other assistance could be had; but still I feel sorry that I could do no more. Please, sir, I will thank you to pay the money into Messrs. Ridley's bank, at Alnwick, in my name. Your very much obliged humble servant, GRACE H. DARLING. Longstone Light, December 28, 1838."—The following is one of the best and most complimentary things we have seen written upon the subject. It is very beautifully turned:

TO GRACE HORSLEY DARLING.

A nobler name linked with sweeter name,
Ne'er won the voice of praise, the meed of fame.
Let laurelled wreaths the victor's brow entwine,
The civic crown, heroic girl, is thine;
And, better far, thy offices of love
Angels' spirits register above.
Oh! as my lot is, and still must be,
To breast the surges of life's stormy sea,
Still be it mine, in my extremest fear,
To find such GRACE—and such a DARLING near.

Bathing Establishment.—Dr. Combe is a warm advocate of frequent bathing. He argues that if students and professional men would faithfully attend to this item of their duty, we should not hear them speak so often of bad health, bad digestion, and unfitness for duty. One of the best and most extensive establishments for the purpose of bathing, has been opened within the last year by Mr. Leonard, at No. 400 Broadway, between Prince and Houston streets. Mr. L. has associated with himself an experienced engineer, and has been at great expense in fitting up his establishment in a novel and commodious manner. The water is conveyed to the baths in a state of the utmost purity, and by a process far more simple and manageable than that generally adopted. As the spring opens, it is the intention of the proprietor to extend his already extensive accommodations, and to render his establishment unrivalled in the conveniences it offers to bathers.

You know.—An Englishman, recently arrived, addressed us in the street the other day in the following terms:—"The Maine war, you know, will be settled, you know, without any trouble, you know, in the course of a short time, you know!" This phrase, you know, "is obtaining to a great extent in this community," you know.

New music.—We have received from Mr. Birch, No. 95 Canal-street, a set of quadrilles from Bolidier's celebrated opera of La Dame Blanche, arranged by William Martin, accompanied by the "Georgian Waltz," by the same composer. They are very beautiful, and the music is of that brilliant, popular kind, suited to the purpose to which it is appropriated.

Periodicals.—The Knickerbocker Magazine for March is adorned with a very neat engraving of the ruins of Jamestown, executed by Rolph, after a design by Chapman. Its table of contents is unusually rich, and will bear comparison with that of the best current English magazines. The "Down East Tableaux Vivantes," by N. Deering, are capital, and are alone enough to give character to the number. This is high praise, when it is remembered that Willis, Clark, Ticknor, Barber, Whitman, Bellows, Brainerd, Stout, Scholcraft, Holmes, Mrs. Seba Smith, Rockwell, Pierpont, and many other popular writers have contributed. But the principal novelty of the number consists in a continuation or revival of the admirable "Crayon Papers," by Washington Irving. These contributions must of course excite the eager attention of the "reading public," and give an impetus to the circulation of the Knickerbocker. We trust that the proprietors of this sterling magazine will receive an ample recompense for the eminent ability and enterprise manifested in its conduct, in a continued accession of that liberal support, which they have so justly merited.

Our worthy next-door neighbour of the Spirit of the Times astonished everybody week before last with the specimen number of his new volume. First the outside sheet, embellished with the various insignia of the sportsman—fishing-tackle, fowling-piece, race-horses, prize goblets, &c., claimed admiration. Then came the large sheet—twelve tremendous folio pages—crowded with thirty-six solid columns of letter-press—a whole library in itself—on a thousand subjects interesting to the sportsman and the general reader. And lastly, we were presented with two magnificent engravings of a biped and a quadruped—the biped being the charming Baysader, Augusta, and the quadruped the portrait of the well-known race-horse called Black Maria—the lady from the burin of Hinshelwood, and the horse from that of Dick. Really, if our friends and neighbours go on in this way, the whole population of the United States must (and should) immediately become subscribers to the periodicals to warrant these enormous outlays. The "Spirit of the Times" is now issued at ten dollars per annum, and it is cheap at almost any price. It continues as heretofore under the editorial direction of that "prince of good fellows," William T. Porter, Esq., who holds an inimitable pen, and possesses just the qualifications to render the "Spirit" the first journal in its way, extant.

The third number of "The Corsair" appears this week. It abounds in "airy gems and spoken flowers," from the treasures of its accomplished editors. The form of this work resembles that of the London Spectator, being a large octavo, extremely well printed, and containing in addition to its original matter, excerpts from popular English writers, and translations from the German and French. Success to our neighbours over the way, Willis and Porter, and a pleasant voyage to "The Corsair."

In speaking of new establishments we must not forget the old. Another paper is published in "our neighbourhood" besides those just mentioned, which is entitled to all the praise that has been bestowed upon it. We allude to our worthy next-door neighbour on the right, The Albion, than which no journal in the country is conducted with more ability; and no one gives to its readers a greater variety of valuable and interesting matter. The uniform urbanity of its editor, Dr. Bartlett, toward all his contemporaries, is an example which ought to be more generally followed. We could point out several recent instances of bad taste in violating the courtesies of the press, which redound to the disadvantage of none but their authors.

The Baltimore Museum for March is rich in original articles of a high order of merit. The prize poem by N. C. Brooks, Esq., from the Southern Churchman, is an exquisite piece of versification. The "Researches of the Polyglot Club," are conducted with much spirit. In the present number there are versions in three different languages of Richard H. Wilde's celebrated poem commencing, "My Life is like the Summer Rose." The Greek and Latin translations are by Mr. Brooks, and they are really capitally done, evincing the poet and scholar combined.

On duty.—The next exhibition of the National Academy of Design, promises to be more brilliant even than the last.

Niblo's Opera-house in nearly finished.

An original opera, by an American composer, is making quite a stir in the musical circles of this city.

There is a great demand for tenements in Brooklyn.

It is estimated that contracts have been made for upwards of eight hundred new houses, to be erected in this city during the coming summer.

The Croton water-works are to be finished in three years from July next.

The Bowery theatre is to be opened on the seventh of May.

Wallack and Maywood will sail for England in the course of a few weeks, to beat up recruits for their establishments.

Burton has been playing at Baltimore.

It is said that upwards of fifty thousand copies of the Sunday Morning News, containing the clock story, have been sold.

A new weekly paper to be called the Satirist, is in contemplation here. "Another, and yet another!"—"They come not single spies—but in battalions."

J. P. Knight, the composer, has just published two songs. They may be had of Hewitt.

Theatrical world.—It has been estimated that there are now living in Europe eighteen thousand one hundred and forty actors, twenty-one thousand six hundred and six actresses, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven prompters, and twenty-eight thousand seven hundred and sixty artists connected with theatrical establishments. A curious computation, and a doubtful.

I'VE HEARD OF THE FOREST BIRDS BY DAY.

THE POETRY BY H. S. VANDYKE—THE MUSICK ARRANGED BY HENRY RUSSELL, BY WHOM THIS SONG IS MOST RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED TO
J. WATTS HERBEE, ESQ.

ANDANTE GRAZIOSO.

I've heard the forest birds by day, Sing to the golden, golden noon, And waken on the startled trees The ingbuds of June; I've heard the sun-lit waters greet Their borders with a playful kiss; But, oh! to me more purely The stillness of a night like this, But, oh! to me more purely sweet, The stillness of a night like this, But, oh! to me more purely sweet, The stillness of a night like this, The stillness of a night like this.

SECOND VERSE.

I've heard the sounds of distant bells,
Come on the sparkling stream,
Like voices of the friends I love,
Or music of a dream;
I've heard a harp upon the tree,
Sigh music to the zephyr's kiss,
But, oh! to me more purely sweet,
The stillness of a night like this,
But, oh! to me, etc.

Original.
THE OLD WIFE.

WRITTEN FOR H. RUSSELL, BY JONAS S. PHILLIPS.

Old Time has dimm'd the lustre of her eyes, that brightly shone,
And her voice has lost the sweetness of its girlhood's silvery tone,
But her heart is still as cheerful as in early days of life,
And fondly as I prized my bride, I love my dear old wife!

When the spring of life was in its bloom and hope gave zest to youth,
We at the sacred altar stood, and plighted vows of truth,
And since, though changeful years have pass'd, with joys and sorrows rife,
Yet never have I seen a change in her, my dear old wife!

Her gentle love my cares have sooth'd, her smiles each joy enhanced,
As fondly through progressive years together we've advanced,
Though calmly now the current flows, we've known misfortune's strife,
Yet ever did she cheer my woes, my faithful, fond, old wife!

And ever since that joyous day I bless'd her as my bride,
In joy or sorrow, calm or storm, I found her at my side,
And when the summons from above, shall close the scene of life,
May I be call'd to rest with thee, my fond, my good old wife!

THE FINE ARTS.

THE APOLLO ASSOCIATION FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.

We have heretofore made our readers acquainted with the establishment of the Apollo Gallery in this city, for the exhibition and sale of works of art. We have from the first promulgation of the design spoken of it favorably. As it advances in the development of its usefulness, it gains in favour with the artists and the public; and every movement in its popular career gives it greater claims to regard and generous support. Since our last notice of the Gallery, an association has been formed, and a fund raised for the purchase of a selection of the works of American artists, which are or may be exhibited there, at any time throughout the year. Every subscriber of five dollars is a member for the year, which terminates on the third Monday in December. The fund thus gathered is placed at the disposal of fifteen gentlemen of taste, who, with the secretary and treasurer, are styled the committee of management, and their duty is to dispose of it according to their best judgment in the purchase of paintings or sculpture of the artists. The works thus made the property of the association will form a part of the exhibitions until the end of the year, when they will become, by lot, the property of individual members. The names of the gentlemen who compose the committee for the present year, are a sufficient guaranty that the duties entrusted to them will be satisfactorily performed. That every advantage may be afforded to the artists by the exhibition of their works, and that private purchasers may not be forestalled by the committee, it is provided that no picture, or other work of art, can be bought for the association, until it has been offered to the public one month; after which, if it is a work of merit, and not extravagant in price, the committee may purchase, and the artist receive his money immediately. This is the general outline of the plan, as we gather from the constitution. It is based upon the broadest and most popular principles. There are few who cannot, and we trust that all who can will, give their aid to carry out the design to its fullest extent. The artists of the whole country are equally interested in its success, and their friends in every section should sustain it. Members residing in distant states will stand on equal ground with our citizens in the distribution of the prizes; the only difference is, that those who never come to New-York will not be able to avail themselves of the privilege of visiting the exhibition, which the others enjoy without additional expense. Thus far the experiment has worked well. In a little over two months, we are informed, that nearly eight hundred shares have been subscribed for. The committee of management have commenced their selection of paintings from the first exhibition, and have distributed upwards of a thousand dollars among thirteen artists. We were ourselves among the earliest subscribers to the Apollo Association, and are gratified not only by the success which has thus far attended our experiment, but with the prospect of more extensive and useful results, corresponding with the extent and means of the association.

DUFOVE'S PAINTINGS.—The splendid paintings by Dufoue, at the Gallery in Barclay-street, are to be removed in a few weeks and the exhibition closed. Amateurs should not lose the opportunity of examining these remarkable works of art.

MISCELLANY.

JONATHAN OUTDOES.—A short time ago, "a fine old English gentleman," in the good town of Barley, though perhaps not one of the "olden times," always anxious to have the earliest news, went, in the course of his daily rounds, to a Mr. Boniface, who is distinguished for his wit and intelligence, and inquired of him the news of the morning. Mr. Boniface hesitated, and stammered out, "None," but shortly, as if recollecting himself, told him that the latest authentic news was, that a superb and elegantly fitted up steam-vessel was about to cross the Atlantic, from Liverpool, which had on board two acres of grass land, as many cows and sheep, and poultry, etc., as would find them with butcher's meat during the voyage out and home, and that the spirited proprietors intended to burn for coal, which they hoped to find, and thus be prepared for any length of voyage, without the fear of being short of fuel. The old gentleman, astonished, scratched his head, and walked away, muttering, as he went, "These are strange times; what shall we see next?"

HOW ARE YOU OFF FOR SOAP?—In the Illinois House of Assembly, during a recent debate, a member, named Mr. Happy, accused another named Baker, of an attempt to "soft soap" unsuspecting members; and that he had an utter contempt for "soft soap." Mr. Baker in reply, said, "The gentleman expresses contempt for 'soft soap.' I believe him sincere—if the members of the House will inspect his countenance closely, I dare say they will there find conclusive evidence that he feels the greatest contempt for 'all sorts of soap.'" Sharp shooters are they, in those backwood legislatures.

ADVICE TOO LATE.—I meant to have told you of that hole," said an Irishman to his friend who was walking with him in his garden, and stumbled into a pit full of water. "No matter," says Pat, blowing the mud and water out of his mouth, "I've found it."

WHAT NEXT?—A greenhorn lately took a notion to get married. After the ceremony was concluded, Jonathan took a quarter of a dollar from his pocket, deliberately tossed it up to the parson and handed it to him, saying, "Parson, keep the whole, you needn't give me back any change."

STANZAS

COMMEMORATIVE OF THE HEROIC BRAVERY OF GRACE DARLING AND HER FATHER.

On the occasion of the loss of the Port Fink, a steam ship.

In slumbers deep the father lay,
The storm it loudly blew,
His child in haste and wild dismay,
To his lone cabin flew.
"Why wakes my child at this wild hour?
The innocent should sleep
Most tranquilly, when wind and shower
Around their dwelling sweep!"
"Oh, father!" said the startled maid,
"I slept—but such a cry
Of horror woke me, I'm afraid
There's death or danger nigh!"
And hark! again—Oh! let us haste,
'Tis some bewilder'd crew
Upon the reckless waves waste!
Oh, fly!—in pity do!
Your arm is strong to stem the wave,
And heaven will give me power
To help and snatch them from the grave!
Oh! speed—'tis mercy's hour!"

The father kiss'd his fearless child,
Then, with an inward pray'r,
They launch'd amid the billows wild,
To succour sad despair!

A moment more and all was lost—
But, oh! what rapture when
Their little skiff, though tempest tost,
'Tis shore could safe again.

Oh! who could count the blessings shed,
Upon the gen'rous girl,
By lips that but for her were dead,
Amid the stormy whirl!

But oh! what must her heart have felt,
Such danger having braved,
When by her sire to heaven she knelt,
In safety with the saved.

SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

STORY-TELLING.

BY JOHN NEAL.

Of all the stories I meet with, none are so delightful to me as those I over-hear on board a steamboat or a stage-coach. Ten to one there's a decided character in them, whether true or false; and fifty to one you are a fool if you cannot see at a glance how much to believe. I remember two or three cases in point. I happened to be one of a hundred who were huddled together not long ago on board a large Ohio steamboat. The cholera had appeared and was raging far and wide along shore; the captain was running a race with another boat; and we were all getting ready for a blow-up. "May I be most to-tallyly excused?" shouted a by-stander, running past me and clapping his hands, "if that air Galley-police (written Galapagos) don't slip ahead like greased lightning." Ah! I withdrew immediately and prepared for the consequences.

On my way to my state-room, I had to pass a group of female passengers in earnest conversation. Cholera was the subject, and I stopped and listened, till I had forgotten my errand below and scarcely thought of the danger about us. The stories were evidently true—they were a part of the actual history and experience of the narrators. Many of them were exceedingly affecting, and some terrible, so much so that I could not sleep afterwards for thinking of them. But what astonished me more than everything else, was the strange apathy—the absolute carelessness—the every-day sort of manner that distinguished all the sufferers in relating their experience. Many were yet pale—very pale with watching and bereavement, or it might be from long and solitary illness, not none with fear. They spoke of death and of its terrors with a frightful child-like familiarity. Many stories were told that I shall never forget, and all with a straightforward simplicity of truth. But one which I gathered, little by little from repeated conversations between two of the party, a mother and daughter, made a very strong impression upon me. The mother was a tall, high-spirited Virginian, who, having married a Yankee, had lost a goodly part of her reverence for the usages of the Ancient Dominion. Her daughter, a child of sixteen, was just returning from school at Philadelphia, with all the warmth of a school-girl and all the hopes of a woman. They lived at New-Orleans, but passed their summers at the north. Accident drew us together, and I had an opportunity of rendering them a little service which made us acquainted forever.

On the preceding birth-day of the daughter, whose name was Cordelia, the mother, who had grown weary of New-Orleans, where the cholera was raging with unprecedented violence, determined to fly for her life. "Though very ill at the time, being under a course of salivation for the liver complaint, and given over by the physicians, arrangements were made immediately, and passages engaged for the north on board a first-rate northern ship. They were punctual at the place and hour of departure; but when they arrived, the ship was under way. Half desperate with fear, though full of determination, they nevertheless pursued her in a small open boat. After a long chase they overhauled her, but owing either to accident or unskillfulness, the boat, loaded down to the waters edge, was run in between the ship, then under full way, and one of those tremendous steamboats which are employed in towing fleets up the Mississippi—dragging off two or three great ships at a time against wind and tide and the whole strength of the mighty river, at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour—more or less; literally ripping them out of the mud, if they go ashore, and that without stopping and without the slightest change in the steady play of their ponderous machinery—tearing them up as it were by the roots, if they happen to touch, and winking off with them as Gulliver might with a hard-fist of Lilliputian forty-fours and a line of battle ship under each arm. Just put yourself in the situation of these two unprotected females at the moment. The waters roaring and flashing and leaping about them as at the foot of Niagara—the flues bellowing and shaking—the bells ringing, the women screaming—the crews and passengers of the steamboat and the two ships in tow all in confusion, crowding to the quarter rails and looking over their sides—the mother more dead than alive—the daughter a mere child—the boatmen bewildered and helpless with terror—right coming on the right—a frightful dead before them and no possibility of escape. They were looked upon as already lost—of the multitude who saw the situation of the boat, there was not one who did not regard the destruction of the whole party as inevitable. Yet owing to the calmness, the self-possession, the clear voice and the preternatural courage of that child, they were all saved, and the poor sick mother herself was lifted aboard in a state of insensibility. But here they were beset with new dangers. It was already dark—there was a portentous lowering of the southern sky—they had been dragged through a sand-bank by the steamboat and lost their rudder. Having neither ship in tow, she cast them off as soon as the accident was discovered, and proceeded with the other to sea. Night came on with a tremendous blow. Here was a hurricane among the stars—a shrieking—and the striped flag was blown to ribands. Their ship was no better than so much drift-wood after the rudder was torn off, and to add to their misery, the captain himself thought proper to call them together in the middle of the night and assure them there was no hope! They were urged to make their peace with God and prepare for the worst.

While they lay pitching about in this helpless condition, the crew discouraged—the captain at prayers—and the ship unmanageable—the cholera broke out among them. The man at the wheel dropped, and was a corpse in four hours. "Me W!" the mother had mentioned, saw him fall and heard his moaning. Her daughter was instantly despatched to his relief with a camphor-bottle. A child was taken next—and died in six hours, with its head in the lap of its poor distressed mother. It was a beautiful girl, about eleven years of age, and out of mercy to the mother, instead of being thrown overboard, the body was kept until their signals of distress were answered afar off, as by telegraph, and another large steamboat appeared bearing down to their relief. And now put yourself in the situation of our adventurers once more. Behold them on their way back to the city, from which they had fled for their lives only the day before. Pestilence and death are abroad now. Yet they are happy. Angry waters and a lowering sky are about them. Yet they heed neither. Even their proud ship is unsafe. They are staggering blindfold over the precipices of the great deep—the burial-place of nations. Yet their hearts are overflowing with thankfulness. They are purified as with fire. Can you explain the mystery? Do you understand it—or feel it? If yes, then do you understand all that is worth knowing of the human heart—all that is worth knowing of philosophy—all that is worth knowing of earthly religion.

But our story is not yet finished. They arrived in safety at New-Orleans. Here no coffins were to be had. And they were obliged to wrap the body of the little girl in her bedclothes, and to bury her with them, had and all. Such is but one of the ten thousand frightful cases of the cholera, to be heard out of the mouths of living witnesses, as you journey through the wide west. The mother was a widow and kept a boarding-house in the city. Yesterday, she was the mother of three beautiful children; afraid of the pestilence and anxious to put them at school in the north, she, too, had embarked for that region. To-day she would be comfortless—hopeless—in the power of her whole family wretched and cast away—the pale and blighted rose—but for the mystery above mentioned. Yesterday she was flying from the destroyer, and shaking with fear. To-day, she has turned back upon him—and her countenance is unchanged, her heart untroubled. And why?—God is with her. She has been truly fortified by the desolation, the bereavement and the experience of the last twenty-four hours.

But to our story. There boarded at the house of this poor widow a young man from Philadelphia, by the name of Bn. He was sitting at the table drinking wine, as the bereaved mother appeared, stealing through the next room on her way to the chamber of her daughter. Most of the boarders were alert in their sympathy. And all but one were profoundly moved when they were told the circumstances of the child's death. It was not that they were struck with consternation at the near approach of the destroyer. It was not that they had now lost one of themselves—and so suddenly! It was not that the most beautiful link of the golden chain that held them together had been touched as it were by the summer lightning, and instantaneously melted—that a pale and blighted rose had been scattered to the winds—that the living sunshine of their house had departed forever—that the sound of a clear and beautiful voice, the echo whereof had not altogether died away—the singing laugh of childhood—the perpetual music of a young, innocent and therefore happy heart, was never to be heard again. It was nothing of all this—it was the unutterable distress of the mother at having her child so buried—so suddenly and under such peculiar circumstances. Had the child been smothered in her sleep the mother could not have felt more. But the young man who belonged to Philadelphia, turned away with a laugh, when he heard the story, saying, "Let the dead bury the dead." That very night he was a corpse.

One other brief specimen of "stories from real life," such as you may hear day after day on board the stage-coaches and steamboats of our country—the stories, I should call them—and I have done. Where do you find an old traveller, especially from the western country, who has not had many a narrow escape worth publishing? And in his own language, too, if he would but tell the truth? You have but to step on board a steamboat or a stage-coach, to enter a bar-room, or a barber's shop, especially as I have said before in the western country, that wilderness of empires, where human life, like everything else of a home-growth is thought nothing of—dog-cheap in the estimation of the people themselves, and no great bargain at that in the estimation of others—and what a world of adventure, of trial, hardship and suffering is opened to your view! Books might be made of the stories you would hear in a single evening, and capital books too. I assure you; brimful of energy and vivacity and truth; and always told with a straightforwardness and simplicity which are irresistibly impressive. Not long ago I happened to be where the subject of steamboat adventures came up. Only a month before I had been aboard a large steamboat (the McDonough) when she was literally drift on the high seas—her main shaft broke—night coming on with a thick fog and every appearance of the September gale—breakers all about us and the open sea glittering to leeward not half a mile off. We had nearly two hundred passengers aboard, with the adventure a pint of water and a biscuit apiece for the next twenty-four hours; and enough, too, in all conscience, for any voyage we were likely to make if the wind shifted. No, aware of the risk we ran with our colours running down—pulled long faces—and prepared for the worst. After waiting a long while, and just as we had drifted within a half cable's length of a dangerous reef, on our way toward the open sea, and were beginning to pitch and roll as most of these great unwieldy contrivances are in the habit of doing, you know, just before meal-time—except where the passengers and themselves saw our signs of distress, and bore down to our relief. While she was towing us, first one way and then another, at the rate of a mile an hour, a large brig appeared standing toward us, with every sail set. Judge of our feelings! But you cannot, unless you happen to know that there is nothing on earth half so helpless or unmanageable as a huge steamboat on the high seas, drift upon her shafts. Her fire, her machinery disabled, and her sails, if she carries any, not half large enough to keep her steady. In half an hour the brig would have been alongside—but just at this moment, the schooner parted her hawser, and filled away, and the brig, misunderstanding the manoeuvre, sheered off, and we were left to our fate. In the course of the next watch we had two or three narrow escapes, and were driven away part of a buoy as we swung through a dangerous part of Portsmouth reach, and twice we were so near the formidable rock that I could have jumped ashore.

Now, every thing considered, this appeared to me a very decent sort of an adventure in the steamboat way, and I told it therefore with a moderate share of self-complacency. But nobody else appeared to think so—nobody stared—nobody drew a long breath, after I had got through—no questions were asked; and to tell the truth, I began to have some doubts of the story myself before I left the company—whether it was worth telling or not I mean. Compared with half a score I heard that night, mine was but a milk-and-water affair, after all.

Take an example or two from the experience of Dr. S— of Baltimore, a gentleman of high character, who had been accustomed to the savage glories of the western world for many years. He had seen a boat snagg'd some years before in the Mississippi—the Consort—and something happened to bring it to his recollection, and so he just happened to mention it in a sort of parenthesis—nothing more. He was sailing one way and she the other. All at once while they were looking at her, they saw her stop and begin to settle. After a few moments, she changed her course and aimed for the shore, like a wounded Leviathan. Her deck was crowded with passengers; there were at least a hundred on deck with all their baggage, or plunder as they call it there. They soon reached the shore, and a large hawser was made fast to a tree. But in the midst of the rejoicing that followed—it swung off—the captain was tipped up by the roots—and down she went headfirst. All the passengers jumped overboard. Two or three odd incidents occurred in the very presence of the narrator. A newly-married man, being unable to persuade his wife to take the leap, caught her in his arms and flung her over, to the amazement of everybody—and then followed her. Another young man was fished up, just as he was settling down for the last time—when they pulled him out they found an old Dutch woman hanging to his legs. All the passengers were saved, but the vessel and cargo were lost. But such, it will appear, is but an everyday sort of occurrence in the Ohio and Mississippi—even Doctor S. himself speaking of it, as if it were hardly worth mentioning.

At another time, I believe in 1832, he saw the Kentucky, Capt.

Buckner, in a situation not paralleled in the history of steamboat adventures. It would be a glorious subject for a picture—and then what a transparency might be made of it! The Kentucky was a new boat on her first trip, and having reached Louisville, she ran up river a little way to show off. On her return, as she approached the falls, which are twenty feet high, she rounded too and stood for the canal. But the engineer let off too much steam—the boat fell away—grew unsteady—loitered—and was beginning to yield gradually and slowly to the tremendous weight of the river. The deck was crowded with passengers, and the shores covered with people, afraid to move or speak.

It was evident to all that she must strike the pier at the entrance of the great ship canal, when, if nothing worse happened, her chimneys would be tumbled about the ears of the passengers and her boilers unshipped. But to the astonishment of everybody, instead of striking, she only touched the pier, and lifting herself slowly up she slid gently upon it to the distance of several feet. All safe, now! all safe! cried the people aboard. All safe! shouted their friends ashore. But in the midst of the congratulations and rejoicing that followed, somebody on the pier was observed pointing at the stern with a look of unutterable horror—the boat began to move—the roaring of the falls grew louder and louder—the passengers rushed forward in a body to escape over the bows—and the people on the shore ran down the bank to the waters edge and stood there with outstretched arms, waiting the frightful consummation. She swung off notwithstanding all their efforts, and gradually, though reluctantly yielded to the strength of the river, began to move sideways towards the falls. Not another word was spoken, either aboard or ashore. Louder and louder thundered the waters, and faster and faster moved the huge pile, freighted with human creatures on their way to immediate and inevitable destruction. Already were they upon the pitch of the Falls, so that the passengers could look over into the gulf below and see the rocks, and the fierce terrible waters leaping and roaring for their prey. At this moment she touched—rubbed—flattered for a few seconds, and then broached broadside to, and grounded!—yes grounded! on the very edge of the crumbling precipice, with the whole pressure of the Ohio upon her side, hurrying headlong toward the Mississippi! Out went every hawser and rope with two of three chain cables. Every heart and every arm was employed struggling to keep her from moving. All the hawsers and cables were strained tight, but they could not move her an inch. Out with her cargo! start her cargo! shouted a dozen voices from the shore; out with her cargo! start her cargo! cried the people aboard, and immediately a large number of lighters were seen crowding and hurrying to her relief. These lighters were pulled ashore by a rope. The cargo was very valuable, and the work of discharging was continued till after dark. During the night another incident occurred of which the narrator was an eye witness. Owing to some accident, or the most extraordinary carelessness, one of the lighters was not made fast; and while the men were stowing the cargo with lanterns, happening to turn our heads, after looking another way, the Doctor, we saw them drifting slowly astern of the boat, apparently toward the falls. Before any earthly help could reach them, or even prepare the people aboard for their danger, over she went headlong among the rocks! A tremendous outflow followed, above and below the falls. Boats were run out—lanterns swung in the air—and multitudes were seen making down the banks and calling for volunteers. It was generally acknowledged that such a boat could not live ten minutes below; notwithstanding which six men instantly volunteered and pulled after her in the long boat! What a subject for a painter; as I have said before—ay, and what a subject for a poem! The roar of the waters—the midnight darkness—the outcries of the multitude above and below the falls—the innumerable lanterns dancing about in the air and along the surface of the river—the desperate courage of these unknown men—altogether it was a story worth telling, reader, I'll leave it to you if it was not! Well—over they went! over into the foaming and roaring abyss! their pathway visible to thousands, notwithstanding the darkness of the night, by the lanterns and torches they carried, as their well-estered boat shot like a black shadow over the white surface of the tumbling and effluent waters. After a breathless pause of a few minutes, a joyful uproar was heard below. All safe! all safe! came pealing up, as with the voice of trumpets from the very centre of the whirling abyss, and after a little more waiting, it was ascertained not only that these brave fellows had escaped without loss or injury, but that even the flat-bottomed boat had made the passage without touching a single rock!—not a man was lost!—Are you astonished at these things! Do you doubt their truth! They are every word true. And what is more, they are things of daily occurrence in the great western country—that store-house of kingdoms,—and though stories.

GAETITIES AND GRAVITIES.

MACBETH'S CASTLE.

The traditions respecting the history of Macbeth, as related in the neighbourhood of the castle, are highly interesting. The current story is, that Macbeth, after his elevation to the throne, had resided for ten years at Carneddin, in the neighbouring parish of St. Martin's, which the country people call Carn beth, or Macbeth's Castle. Two of the most celebrated witches lived one on each side of Macbeth—one at Collice, the other not far from Dunsinane House, at a place called the Cape. Macbeth, being superstitious, applied to them for advice; and, by their counsel, built a lofty castle on the top of an adjoining hill, since called Dunsinane, which, in the Gaelic language, signifies the hill of ants, implying the great industry necessary to form such a building. From the top of the hill there is a view of fifty miles in every direction. When Malcolm Canmore came into Scotland, supported by English auxiliaries, to recover his dominion from Macbeth the Giant, as he was termed, he marched through Birnam-wood, where they were induced, from some motive, to ornament their bonnets, or carry in their hands branches of the trees. Macbeth, when informed of this, began to despair, in consequence of the witches' prediction, which had warned him to beware—and when Malcolm prepared to attack the castle, he immediately deserted it, and flew to the opposite hill, pursued by Macduff; but finding it impossible to escape, threw himself from the top of the hill, was killed upon the rocks, and buried at The Long Man's Grave, as it is called. The story narrates that Macbeth was put to death; but the above is the tradition of the country people, who add, that not far from it is the road where Banquo was murdered.

THE KING OF THE SOUTHERN SEA.

Or! the whale is free, of the boundless sea;
He lives for a thousand years
He sinks to rest on the billow's breast,
Nor the roughest tempest fears,
The howling blast, as it hurries past,
Is music to lull him to sleep;
And he scatters the spray in his boisterous play,
As he dashes—the king of the deep.
Oh! the rare old whale, mid storm and gale,
In his ocean home will be,
A giant in might, where might is right,
And king of the boundless sea.
A wondrous tale could the rare old whale
Of the mighty deed disclose,
Of the skeleton forms of bygone storms,
Of treasures that no one knows.
He has seen the crew, when the tempest blew,
Drop down from the slippery deck,
Shaking the tide from his glassy side,
And sporting with ocean and wreck.
Then the rare old whale, etc.
Then the whale shall be still dead to me,
When the midnight lamp burns dim;
For the student's book, and his favourite nook,
Are illumined by the aid of him;
From none of his tribe could we'er imbibe
So useful, so blessed a thing.
Then we'll on land go hand in hand,
To hail him the Ocean King.
Oh! the rare old whale, etc.

FEMALES—COMFORT.

We are often surprised at the heroic contempt with which our fair women seem to entertain for comfort. In the arrangement of their attire, elegance and fashion seem to be the only points consulted—and with heroism and fortitude which would do honour to a Brahmin, they resolutely refuse to case their frail bodies in attire fit to resist the inclemency of the season. Shoes with soles as light as paper are worn by the women for their neatness, while men wisely put on boots with soles half an inch thick. Every other part of the men and women seems to present the same contrast, as if the ladies were the stronger, instead of the weaker, as we are in the habit of considering them. That all this gratifies the u. n. o.'s we have no doubt. That consumption, and the whole class of bronchial diseases spring from it is evident. We pity the poor woman to whom poverty denies articles of clothing essential to comfort; but, even in their rags the poor are generally better protected against the weather than the fashionable, “in all their glory.” If corporeal suffering is indeed an inconvenience, no one would naturally fancy that the first wish of those possessed of competence of wealth would be to secure themselves against the rude waiting of the elements. Perhaps the very wealthy do. Actual wants and luxuries supplied, there is abundance left for the purchase of elegance. The latter class of commodities are from their very character most prominent, as they are intended to be. Imitation suggests to the less wealthy a desire to ape their richer neighbours. With the imitators the order of purchase is reversed. They look first to the preservation of such appearances as shall make them assimilate in externals to the pecuniary rank of their models. Hence come cheerless drawing-rooms, abundant in ornament and deficient in comfort. Hence come lean larders, half-furnished kitchens, poorly filled or empty fuel repositories. Hence the disposition to—

To host one splendid banquet once a year.
To defraud the daily cheer.

Thousands, whose property will just enable them to support a splendid misery, will thus immolate comfort, and deny themselves necessities, and to all weave a veil over their actual penny—which veil, after all, is so transparent, that the voracious child may see through it. So goes the march of vanity from the inhabitants of the neutral ground between rich and poor down to the very poorest. Each class is engaged in a continual struggle to appear of a wealthier grade than that which it occupies. In dress, upon which topic we stated the same foolish feeling is manifested the same sacrifice of health and enjoyment to display and discomfort. The money that is properly expended, with reference to one's own actual needs, might make him or her happy, so far as money is capable of producing happiness, is wasted in foolish endeavours to support state beyond the reach of the vain mortal who struggles for it. And not only the evils of such a course are present, but future. Many a man who might have saved a competence has wasted the opportunity on the shrine of vanity; and when the need of the neglected provision arrives, the poor devotees fall from the unequal race in pursuit of fashion, into abject penury and ungloried poverty. Then they see the folly of their previous course, when no possibility is left to them to undo it; and their distress is cheered by the malicious taunts of former rivals who rejoice at their downfall.

ECCENTRICITIES OF ALFIERI.—Alfieri, that eccentric Italian and fine poet, was partial to long hair, and wore his hair floating about, just as we see the poor Ophelias. One day he was leaning against a sideboard, decorated with a costly Chinese tea service, when, by a sudden movement of his tresses, down went one of the tea-cups. The lady of the mansion took the liberty of telling him that he had spoiled the service, and he ah as well have broken them all; when instantly Alfieri, without uttering a syllable, or changing countenance, swept off the whole service upon the floor. Again, he at the theatre of Turin, was falling over a side-box, into which his lovely woman ringlets fell, and wherein was a lady. She broke out into the most violent exclamations upon his locks, and kept repeating the same; but the weather was mute; he was for the present ungrateful. Next morning, however, the lady received a parcel, containing all the hair of the poet's head, with the following billet:—“If you like, we'll hear, here it is; but, for heaven's sake, let me alone.”

THE SON TO HIS MOTHER.

BY SAMUEL LOYER.

There was a place in childhood that I remember well,
And there, a voice of sweetest tones bright fairy tales did tell;
And gentle words and fond embrace were given with joy to me,
When I was in that happy place upon my mother's knee.
When fairy tales were ended, “Good night!” she softly said,
And kiss'd and laid me down to sleep within my tiny bed;
And holy words she taught me there—methinks I yet can see
Her angel eyes, as close I knelt beside my mother's knee.
In the sickness of my childhood, the perils of my prime,
The sorrows of my ripper years, the cares of every time;
When doubt or danger weigh'd me down, then, pleasing all for me,
It was a fervent prayer to heaven that bent my mother's knee!
And can I this remember, and e'er forget to prove
The glow of holy gratitude—the fondness of my love?
When thou art feeble, mother, come rest thy arm on me,
And let thy cherish'd child support the aged mother's knee!

JOHN SMITH.

Never was a poor mortal so hunted down by the bloodhounds of the press as the personage whose name heads this article. If the newspapers of this country, yes, and all Europe, are to be believed, there never was a more consummate villain than he is, or has been. There is nothing too base that he will not do. He has been charged with innumerable murders, robberies, and a thousand other crimes; and he has been detected in so many that he must, by this time, be perfectly acquainted with all the lawyers, judges, juries, and prisons in the Union. At least such is the character given him by our editorial brethren. But we cannot believe he is quite so bad as he has been represented to be, inasmuch as he has frequently been charged with the perpetration of numerous offences in various sections of the country. At the same time, all of which it appeared to us, it would be utterly impossible for him to do—and hence, we are led to conclude that the whole press has conspired against him, to injure his reputation, and in many instances to do him personal injury when he is in nowise deserving of it. His character, within a few weeks past according to the papers, has however undergone an entire change, and he was acquiring a very respectable name. It was said that, becoming disgusted with the christian religion, (no doubt, in consequence of the bad reputation he had so long borne among christians,) he had gone to the east, and turned Mohammedan. We next find his name announced in the Philadelphia papers, as a candidate for the office of constable, and a large meeting of his friends called to adopt measures calculated to secure his election. As we have a better opinion of the people of the city of “brotherly love,” than to believe they would attempt to place him in so high and respectable an office, unless a very great reformation in his former vicious habits had taken place, we took it for granted that such was the fact. But before the election had been held, we learn the poor fellow had at last got rid of the troubles and perplexities of this troublesome world, having accidentally fell, between the ship Oronoco and the boat Pacific, at New Orleans, on the evening of the nineteenth ult., and before he could be recovered, life was extinct. We are happy to say that the last assertion is not correct, but we regret to be compelled to add that he has again fallen into bad habits, having, no longer ago than last Wednesday, been arrested in this city, charged with attempting to pick the pockets of several gentlemen who happened to be in his way. He was taken before Thomas McDowell, Esq., and on the oath of one of our citizens, whose pocket it is said, he had among others attacked, was committed to prison to await his trial.—Delaware Gazette.

FACTS AND SCRAPES.

COLDST OF ALL CLIMATES.—The earth has no spot upon its surface, either habitable or otherwise, which is so cold as Yakutsk, a paltry yet principal town of Eastern Siberia, where a few wooden houses are intermixed with numerous tents. In this dreary and remote region the earth is always frozen, the summer's thaw never reaching below three feet from the surface, the subterranean ice having a computed depth of two hundred yards. In January the thermometer has been known to sink eighteen degrees below the hithermost cold experienced by Ross during his last expedition; and yet the inhabitants, favoured by a warm though short summer, reap both wheat and barley, and cultivate successfully potatoes, and various other hardy vegetables.

ANCESTRAL PRIDE.—When Dominico Contarini happened to be ambassador from Venice at the court of Vienna, in audience one day with the emperor, a difference of opinion arose, which led to some sharper expressions than etiquette permitted, when the Austrian monarch, who had already flatly contradicted Contarini, exclaimed with sudden warmth, “If your excellency doubts my word, you ought at least to respect my superior rank, and be silent.” The insulted blood of fifteen centuries rushing into the cheeks of the haughty Venetian, “Rank!” he exclaimed, “Speak to a Contarini of rank! Let me tell you majesty, that my family gave five sovereigns to their country before your ancestors ceased to be hereditary boys.” The congenial pride of the old republic was so prodigiously gratified by this rebuke, that Dominico became doge upon his return, with universal acclamation.

THE MATRIMONIAL DIFFERENCE.

Said Fry, “It is plain she is breaking your heart.”
(When between man and wife mischief-making.)
“That's no odds,” cried poor Sneak, with his hands to the part,
“Tis my head she is constantly breaking!”

COURAGEOUS AMES!—The Dorien (Geo.) Herald thus exhorts the young men of that town to volunteer to go against the Indians:—“Hannibal passed the Alps; Caesar crossed the Rubicon; Napoleon forced the bridge of Lodi; and why not the farmers and merchants of Dorien cover themselves with glory by wallowing in the bogs of Okefenokee!”

MORALS OF MATRIMONY.—During the session which has just broken up, the Legislature of Alabama passed thirty acts of divorce.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

TO —, WITH A PHILLIPINA.

O! days of the magical wand and ring,
Of the wizard's spell and power—
When the madspe people'd each fount and spring,
And the fays each greenwood bower—
Ye have pass'd away with the fire and stake,
And the spell is no longer cast;
And the nymphs have departed from fount and lake,
With the tide of the wondrous past.
And the sprites who inn'd through the moonlit hours,
Where no night unarm'd might pass,
Now dwell in the cups of the prairie flowers,
And dance o'er the prairie grass.
They are gone—all gone! but the fair green earth
Remains, thou knowest, a spell,
To conjure the sprite who presides o'er the birth
Of the twins of the almond shell.
Oh! when far away, shouldst thou hap to meet—
Where improvement's line must pass;
With the tiny print of the faires' feet,
At morn, on the prairie grass.
And the memory cometh upon thy heart,
Of the home where thy kindred be,
Then whisper, I pray, ere the thought depart,
The spell thou hast breath'd unto me.
And the household hearths,
And the summer paths,
Where thine early haunts have been,
O'er the magic glass,
Of thy mind, shall pass,
At the charm-word—"Phillipina!"

IONE.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN PERSIA.

The following is from the pen of a distinguished Continental Traveller.

Two years ago, I was in the capital of Persia, on the Nau-Rous, or first day of the new year. This city of mud and dust was full of strangers on the occasion; the citizens had put on their holiday clothes for three days; all the grandees of the empire, all who belonged to the king's household, and the thousand princes of the kingdom, were covered with silks and gold; the merchants, artisans, and common people, had provided themselves with new garments. Mirth and pleasure reigned everywhere; everywhere was eating, singing, visiting, and distributing presents. Among these happy mortals the king was happiest, and not without reason, for, on the third day, his misery here was to be gladdened by receiving the tribute of his people, and the contributions from the different provinces. But a few hours before, he had been distributing shawls, silks, and money, which he was soon to receive back, ten-fold, from the ambition or fear of his courtiers. From his window, he was to review in review the treasures destined for him on their way to their final burial in his capacious coffers.

The whole court was invited to the ceremony, including the corps diplomatique. This consisted of a Turkish ambassador, and the English legation, to which I attached myself. In front of the castle, in which the king dwells, is a large square, crowned by two towers, which command the gate of the harem; our tent was pitched on the top of one of these, and the king was opposite us. The square was full of grandees and soldiery. Wrestlers were ready to enter the lists, and two bears and some rams had been brought in for the same purpose. Lastly, some Indian jugglers and an ape were stationed a little way off; near them a dozen boys, in women's dresses, were dancing on a little carpet.

Soon a universal hoo, hoo, was heard, which announced the approach of the monarch. The palace-gates were opened, and forth issued the Farrachs, or runners, armed with long sticks, with which they belaboured the spectators plentifully, apparently as a regular part of the ceremony, and not from any necessity for it. We noticed the real delight they seemed to take in beating the servants of the Turkish ambassador, fellows dressed in red, of grave and proud mien, who bore the blows with singular stoicism, hardly turning their heads to look, and moving not an inch quicker. Negib Effendi, their master, looked on, and only said, "Ah! they have hit Ahmet on the head, and Hassan on the back too—very singular!" He then raised his hand to his beard, in token of surprise. The bastinado ceased as soon as the king had taken his seat under his tent. He was an intelligent-looking, venerable old man, distinguished only by his long beard, and the plainness of his dress. The mark of his rank was three branches of diamonds on his sheep-skin cap.

As soon as he was seated, the prince-royal, Ali-Khan, advanced, followed by his vizier and other attendants, and saluted the throne, after which all rose, and stood in the attitude of servants, waiting for the pleasure of their master. The king began by ordering up the wrestlers. Their skill gave rise to heavy bets, and the conqueror received for the year the title of Pahlevan Bachi, or chief of the wrestlers, and two gilded clubs, the symbols of his dignity. Fatch-Ali-Chah threw him, with his own royal hand, two tomans, (about five dollars and a half), a sum he seemed not to think in proportion to his exploits and his bruises. He, therefore, advanced in front of his majesty, to reproach him for his advance. He received another toman, and an order to depart; but, as he seemed in no hurry to do so, Ali-Khan and the Farrachs drove him away with their sticks.

The Indian-jugglers and the ape, took warning by his example, and performed their feats without asking any reward; the two bears and the boys behaved with equal discretion; but not so the rams. These illustrious animals belonged to personages of the very first distinction—one was the property of the king, the other of his son,

Ali-Khan—and as they had beaten all their antagonists, it was necessary to pit them against each other. The royal present, which the shepherd who had charge of the conqueror was to receive, was forty tomans. After two rounds, the royal ram seemed to have the worst of it, and was making off, when his majesty, to shirk the bet, called out to put an end to the battle. This did not suit Ali-Khan's shepherd, who caught the runaway by the horns, and put him back in front of his antagonist. In vain the centre of the universe cried out, bero, bero, peder souchi, (off, off, son of an accursed father), a battle was inevitable. The prince and his servants fell upon the unlucky shepherd, but it was too late. His ram triumphed, and to the great delight of the people, the king was forced to hand over to his son the forty tomans, which, however, he took care to get back the next day.

This began the presents. The city of Ispahan came first, and its contribution was loudly announced as being a hundred thousand tomans, a hundred mules, and a hundred Cashmere shawls. These mules and shawls were, however, only nominal, a kind of currency; both were the king's own property, and understood to stand for a certain number of tomans. Afterwards came Tibriz; only, however, for form's sake, as this province, having charge of the war with the Russians, was freed from tribute. In like way, Shiraz contributed leaves of sugar, wines, and camels, Yezgi alks, etc. etc. After the cities and provinces, came the princes and grandees, who caused to be led by, the same mules and the same camels, with the same shawls, all being things that had a fixed value, which was afterwards paid in money.

This ceremony lasted three or four hours, during which we were choked with the clouds of dust raised by the multitude present, all of whom, the men below in the square, and the women on the terraces above, seemed in ecstasies at the sight of such riches. Our Turkish friend thought the ceremony very undignified. As to the English embassy, they were treated with respect, and worn out with ennui.

THE FRECHMAN IN PURSUIT OF INFORMATION.

Ven I was in Paris, I read in de journal something about your country. I long great deal for to see him. I read de journal more encore, to ascertain precisely your manner and your habit. I learn him exactly, so I tink den, from leetel story written by le Docteur Franklin, vich he call "de Visale." "Aha," say I to myself, "I shall take de ship and sail for New-York, right way, to get de information." I put le Docteur Franklin into my pockets, and I begin to reflect on his story about "de Visale." Le Docteur Franklin was grand philosophe in dis country, but one ting dat he write in "de Visale" is ver much foolish. He say, "ven I was little garçon, my parents fill my pocket with l'argent; I met von other little garçon in de street vich visale. It please me ver much, so I buy him, and give for him all de argent." Vich is just like leetel dem foolish boy would do. Den he say, "I go home much please visale, and trow de whole house into one confusion," vich is very natural. But de part voit I tink is most foolish part, is ver he say, "people in dis country pay too much for de visale." Ven I come here, I look all round me very much, to see the people voit pay de too much for de visale. I no spike de English long voyez vous, so I cannot inquire voit dey no visale; but I am very much astonish, ven I see nobody dat don't visale nevoir; so I say to myself, Monsieur le Docteur Franklin dem humbug, to say de people of dis country pay too much for de visale, ven dey no pay for no visale nevoir at any time. So I no read him no more, but I read Madame Trollope, who say dat de people of dis country voit de leetel penknife ver small, and cut de leetel end of de stick ver much. So I come to de grande conclusion, dat le Docteur Franklin I no comprehend ven I read in him how de people hev always visale continually, but dat he mean, de people here always voit de leetel piece of timber vat you call chips. I remain sometime under dis impression, vich disturb my sleep, and my head is vat you call ver much confused, till I find vat vat he all mean, ven von day I learn, to my grande satisfaction, dat all de people in dis country voit, vich is, dat de eet ver much de same as dey do in Paris, only more corn-beef, vich is all I learn since I come here to get de information.

APPROPOS OF M. FREDERIC SOULIE'S NOVEL.

An ably-conducted French review contains the following just criticism of the raw-head and bloody-bones' school of fiction, so much the vogue in France at present.—"The curse of English literature is the fashionable novel—that of France is oppressed by the diabolical novel. Our neighbours are presented with wire-drawn ideas, expressed in a style of equal feebleness and pretension. Strained metaphors and bold, not happy innovations, fill every page of these productions, and it is to these very faults they owe their reputation and their success. In France, violence is done to good taste and good sense in a mode still bolder and more offensive, and all our natural wholesome instincts and sensations are destroyed by exaggerated conceptions, which call the imagination into undue and unhealthy action. M. Frédéric Soulié belongs to this school, which I should be tempted to call the black band of literature; for it has rooted up our old and venerable persuasions and beliefs; it has, so to speak, torn from us by violence those simple and honest sensations which had before kept their place, like those old mementoes of our ancestors, time-honoured shreds, in which so many generations had lived of the vast materials they found in the heart and imagination of the mass! They have transformed them into mere passions, without aim, without purity, without elevation, as the Vandals, who destroyed so many palaces, left nothing in their stead but miserable hovels that afflict and depress the soul."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

MY PASSAGE.

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE FISKE, D. D.

It was a gallant ship, wherein I rode,
As in an ark, the tempest-driven waves;
Firm on her prow a hero stood erect,
Carved from the trunk of some proud forest tree—
FRANCIS THE FIRST frowned on the subject deep!

The morn was misty;—snugly trimmed she lay
Enveloped in the fog, prepared to spread
Her swan-like canvass to the doubtful winds
The clock toll'd twelve:—the steamer, like a huge
Sea monster, puffed beside the smoky wharf.
"The passengers aboard!"—a voice exclaimed.
Then, all leaped on the deck,—the captain first—
A gentle spirit, yet, a daring tar.
Groups of poor Swiss, grotesque and hardy men,
With the curled pipe, and dress of motley hues,
And tawney women, with their boys and girls,
Returning, to their native valleys, home.

'Tis come—the hour of parting has arrived.
We leave the dock; farewell those clustering trees
Which, in the summer, shade with foliage deep
The pleasant walks around the Battery!—
And now, in their autumnal richness clad,
Display a gorgeous, but a fading, scene.
How often have I spent, beneath those bowers,
The cool fresh evenings, while the setting sun
Flashed o'er the golden bay, and countless ships
Sported or slept upon the radiant waves!
A melancholy pleasure 'tis to see
The city we have dwelt in disappear,
When on our way to lands so far removed!
To mark the spires grow dim—the domes, like clouds,
Brood thick upon the distance—and to feel
What doct and pen! dwell upon the seas!

We reach the ship—the anchor soon is weighed—
Her sails are ready for the ocean-breeze.
The steamer cleaves her—and close, side by side,
Wheels her forced track, disputing with her prize,
Like a levathan, through wind and tide.

Behold my home, for many a weary day!

Behold the narrow boundaries of my life!

Behold the entire world for me! beyond

I look around, with eager gaze—to see

Who are my fellow-prisoners;—but few!

There are, an aged man, with hoary locks,

Leans o'er the railing, pensive and alone.

Yonder, a comely youth, with pallid brow,

As though he parted with some loving one,

Paces the deck,—a third, with book in hand,

Seems deeply set upon some serious task.

And one strange lady—like a spirit cast

Upon some solitary isle, unknown.

And knowing no one. These are they, with whom

'Tis mine to hold companionship—how long!

Three weeks have passed—when, lo! upon my sight—

Refreshed, as is my spirit—breaks the land!

It seems enchantment, after long, dull weeks,

All ennui, all monotony, to view

The first dim cliffs of Europe—the green hills

Of "la belle France"—we seem to throw aside

Whate'er has troubled us, or given us pain—

To bury in the ocean we have crossed

All passion and all conflict—a new life

Dawns on our being, radiant as the morn

Of a sweet summer, waking up the birds

From their delicious rest among the flowers

Though black, and shapeless, like a blighted pile

Of ruins, Havre strews her hill and vale;

Yet, 'tis a harbour, after anxious days

Of wayward fering on a weary waste.

And such I deemed it:—when my trembling feet

Iighted, once more, upon the solid earth,

I recked not though a barren isle it were,

Or lovely land!

Yet not so bleak, in spring,

The neighbouring hills with trees and villas crowned

And there are gay and hospitable souls

Dwelling within her walls;—and on her streams,

Among a thousand various flags, the stars

And stripes flare out triumphant over all!

SERVANTS.—The celebrated Earl of Chesterfield left, by his will, legacies to all his menial servants, equal to two years wages each, considering them "as his unfortunate friends, equal by birth, and only inferior by fortune." The venerable and godly John Claude, when on his dying bed, thus addressed his son, who, with an old servant, was kneeling before him: "Be mindful of this domestic; as you value my blessing, take care that she wants nothing as long as she lives."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

WOMAN'S COURAGE.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

I.
THE manly lover by his young beloved,
Stands shelterless amid the raging storm;
Shall not his dauntless spirit now be proved,
While she clings trembling to his sterner form?
Their hands are closely clasped, but she is brave—
The grasp that is uncertain is his own!
He views the fatal flash, the whelming wave,
Fearful with her, though fearless when alone.

II.
For her, what is there that he would not dare!
With her, he shudders at the thunder peal!
And she, lest one beloved her grief should share,
Assumes a courage that she cannot feel.
But woman has a courage of her own:
For her the plague-struck chamber has no fears;
She cheers the dying, and, till life is gone,
Denies herself the luxury of tears!

ORIGINAL TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

A SCHOOL INCIDENT.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

BY THEODORE S. FAY.

WHEN I was fifteen, after a long holiday, my father began to talk to me of the necessity of application. He placed in my hands biographies of great men who had overcome obstacles by perseverance and industry. "My son," he said, "you have been an idler long enough. I have not suffered you to be so from carelessness. Your delicate health induced me to incur the disadvantages of abandoning severe study at your time of life. Your education, however, has not been neglected. I have shown you something of the world. You have tasted pleasure. I thought of the rose bud and cast down my eyes. You are not one of those weak persons who cannot taste without drinking to intoxication. Pleasure is meant for man—not as the object, but only as the cheerer and recreator of his existence. Have you been happy since you left B—ville?"

"Sometimes, sir."

"You have studied but little."

"I have read a great deal, sir."

"What have you read?"

"I ran over a list tolerably long, but my father smiled."

"You have been picking the flowers. You have not performed the labours of life. What should you do if I were to be taken away from you, without leaving you any means of support?"

"I have never thought of losing you, sir. But the navy—the army—"

"Should you be obliged to adopt either of those professions, of which you know nothing, and which might probably disappoint your hopes as you grew older, you would have but few opportunities of study. You would be engaged in other pursuits and other reflections. By-and-by you will be cheated with some smooth faces—some little agreeable—and then, good-by study. Now is the time, and if you please, you shall commence immediately."

I expressed myself quite ready.

"To-morrow, then, I will go with you to Mr. Stanley's. He keeps the best school, I understand, in the city. You will be obliged to study as you have never studied before. He is severe to a fault. I do not approve of his system, as I think no gentleman ought to suffer a blow. But I trust much to your discretion. Your powers of mind are good—your industry, I am sure, will be persevering, and your general character makes me hope the best. It is the fate of all mortals to be obliged to pass through scenes of difficulty and danger. You may as well begin now as later. You will require much care, heavy labour, strict propriety of deportment in all things. You will moreover be called upon, doubtless, to exercise your good sense, of which you have a full share. Respect your masters, and respect yourself. You will find some above you in capacity. You are commencing a new career. It is not an easy one. 'Bid farewell, for at least the present, to the soft pleasures in which you have been engaged. Arouse your energies for active exertion. If you have energy, I expect to see it from this moment in your actions. You have read Telemachus?"

"Yes, sir."

"What do you think of it?"

"It is very beautifully written, and afforded me much amusement." "Amusement! Did you draw nothing but amusement from its pages? You are old enough to have found in it the most valuable instruction. Read it again, I will give you three days. It is a work calculated to elevate your character, and expand your understanding. When you have finished it, we will go to Mr. Stanley's. Now, if you please, for the last time, for a considerable period, we will visit the theatre this evening. — plays Othello. I wish you to see what effect genius combined with study can produce. Neither the poet nor the performer spent his life in dancing!"

There was a slight emphasis on the last word. The whole conversation made a deep impression on my mind, as did everything from these revered and beloved lips. With its dignity there was a certain kindness, and also a certain discount which startled me.

"I have been an idler," I thought. "I see he thinks me so. This subject he has waited for me to broach; well, let the future speak for me."

Mr. Stanley was a schoolmaster, celebrated for the thorough manner in which he conducted young gentlemen through the prefatory stages of a classical education. His learning was as extensive as it was precise; and he was, moreover, an excellent map and a kind one out of class. In school, however, he was a terrible impersonation of that great bewildering of mankind, duty; which idea has sanctified many errors as well as crimes. Half the cruelties and follies of the earth have been committed by the best of men, possessed with a mistaken sense of duty. Mr. Stanley thought it his duty to use his strap, with a most unflinching and indiscriminating perseverance. Error was to be flogged out of the establishment, mistakes, whether caused by idleness, accident, limited comprehension, or demonstrable necessity, was to meet its sure and instantaneous reward. He undertook the task of educating his pupils with no other influence than fear. Twenty years of experience had taught him the efficacy of this course, and had hardened his heart as well as improved his hand. From the mere force of habit, which prevented his perceiving its absurdity and injustice, he often punished, I believe, without reflection. It came to be on his mind, divested of temper. It was not a token of wrath, and of course, after beating every individual under his charge for so long a period, it could scarcely be of disgrace. It was to his pupil what the lash is to the horse—a mere way of urging him on—of keeping his attention awake, of preventing his stumbling. Blows commenced at the moment of assembling the school, and ended only with the welcome word, "young gentlemen, you are dismissed." A young friend, who had been some years under this auspicious system, gave me some appalling particulars.

"He will never strike me," said I, with a warmth.

"Won't he?" was the reply.

I was a little agitated on approaching the house. My father was also silent. A servant conducted us into a neat drawing-room well furnished with library, globes, maps, and my quick eye did not overlook a long and apparently much-worn instrument of leather placed upon two nails, and which by instinct I concluded to be one of the cat-and-nine-tails. I waited the entrance of my Cerberus with an equivocal feeling. "What, I who had half exhausted the pleasures of the world, who thought my education complete three years ago, who had been in love! I, trembling under a cat-and-nine-tails!"

I was in the habit of conversing with my father, and, in my own estimation, a man. I had even smoked a cigar and written a small poem. When Mr. Stanley entered I made an easy bow, as much like my father's as I could. Mr. Stanley took no notice of my salutation, nor of me either, for some minutes, while my father addressed him. Then he looked at me, as he would at a piece of cloth or a horse that he was going to buy, and asked in a dry tone—

"How old is he?"

"Fifteen."

I reddened. My father shook me by the hand, and said—"Well, sir, I expect much from you," and took his leave.

On a motion from Mr. Stanley, I followed him into the school-room. On entering he waved his hand with a brief—"Your seat, sir."

For three or four days I was left mostly to myself. A Latin grammar was placed in my hand, and a lesson given me, which I learned without difficulty. I had time for observation: I heard the slap of the ruler—the blow of the strap—often received without a cry. There were more than a hundred boys, and three ushers. The strictest order reigned over everything. Class after class recited—hour after hour rolled away—blow after blow—slap after slap—groans, screams, shrimings, and awful wail faces. I thought it an odd place for study, but custom and necessity reconcile us to everything. Among the ushers, two attracted my particular attention: one from his quiet, gentlemanly, encouraging air—the lightness and good humour with which he inflicted the punishments ordered by Mr. Stanley, and the aid which he endeavoured to give to his young charge. I was luckily brought into contact with him at once. He was a young Irishman, full of goodness, sense, and learning, and we got along together admirably. The other was an American—a stern, domineering despot, who flogged with fidelity up to the reigning system, and spared neither age nor merit.

The scene made upon me a profound impression; but it had a beneficial effect. I had determined that I would never deserve—and never submit to chastisement. In order not to be brought into the predicament, in which I foresaw any attempt of the kind would place me, I aroused myself to the utmost pitch. I rose before day—studied by lamp-light—and I devoted all my evenings to my task. My progress was rapid—my conduct irreproachable. At the end of a year, I was the only boy in the school who had not been flogged. It was remarked of me, and I learned that the despotical usher had said, "I had better keep clear of him," in a jocular way, to some of his more intimate pupils. This redoubled my dislike, but it also redoubled my exertions. I soon became a good Greek and Latin scholar.

My friend, the severe usher, whom the boys nicknamed Draco, was, one day, by a change in the arrangements, called upon to hear our class in Virgil. It happened that Mr. Stanley, and the other ushers, were, during the hour, absent from the room. My disgust at this man had already reached a high point. We all considered him narrow-minded, cruel, and insolent; and his eternal "don't tell me, sir," and "do you dare to bandy words with me!" completed the disagreeable impressions which he had made on me. Upon this afternoon he called upon my class. We were reading Virgil. There is a certain passage which boys consider peculiarly difficult to construe, and which is rendered more formidable by a traditional idea of its importance. This gordian-knot was in our lesson. We were accustomed to stand around our master, in a half circle, while each one in turn mounted a stage on his right, and there recited his portion. Aware of this difficulty, I had devoted to it every moment of my time. I was at the head of the class. I mounted the stage, and read my part very well. My successor had the famous sentence. He failed. The usher strapped him, and sent him to his seat. The next did the same, and met a similar treatment—the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, in short all underwent the same failure and the same fate. I was then left alone, and, in a brutal voice, ordered up. The whole school knew I had never been flogged—they knew and hated the character of the usher—and they waited the termination of the scene, with all eyes turned towards me. I was, of course, excited and agitated, but my determination only grew more inflexible. I commenced—I stammered—commenced again—became confused—and heard a titter run round the whole room. I felt that I was frightened out of what I knew by a man who intended to take advantage of his position. He was resolved to correct and flog me; and a feeling entered my breast which I have experienced since, but had never known before. He raised the strap. I lowered my book, turned to him, and said,

"Stop, sir—I will not submit to be flogged—I knew my lesson this morning, and have studied it as carefully as I could."

His eyes opened upon me with a stare of the liveliest indignation, only checked a moment from its outbreak by utter astonishment.

"You will not submit to be flogged!" he echoed in a tone of incredulity and wrath.

"No, sir."

"You will not submit!"

"No, sir—I will not submit."—He rose and turned up the cuff of his coat, with an eye that glistened like a snake's, and laying his hand on my collar, he exclaimed, "Why, you atrocious young scoundrel, I will flog you alive!" the strap descended upon my head and ears. He lifted his arm to repeat the blow, I dashed my book into his face, and then struck him forcibly in the mouth; in an instant, a wild shout rang through the room, rulers, ink-stands, books, and everything that could be procured by a hundred rebellious and indignant slaves, were showered upon his head. He staggered back towards the door, which some one opened, and the poor fellow was shoved and kicked fairly down stairs; in an instant, every book and ruler was collected—every rebel was in his place—every countenance was demure. Mr. Stanley entered at the noise; but found no clue to the mystery. He was too wise to institute any inquiry, as I was afterwards told. I had taken my part coolly, and left the room, resolved never again to re-enter the doors where I had received this disgrace. I went to my father, and told him the whole story. He made no comment whatever.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

Smithville, Down East, in the state of Maine, March 34, 1839.

DEAR GENERAL—I've just got another letter from my son John down in our disputed territory, and as I know you feel anxious to hear how they get along down there, I hasten to send you a copy of it. It is as follows:

Our Disputed Territory, pretty near the Line, March 30, 1839.

DEAR FATHER—"Tell mother, I ain't shot yet, though we've had one pretty considerable of a brush, and expect every day to have some more. Col. Jarvis has took quite a liking to our little Smithville detachment. He says we are the smartest troops he's got, and as long as we stick by him, it isn't Sir John Harvey, nor all New-Brumzick, nor even Queen Victory herself, can ever drive him off of Fitzherbert's farm. Perhaps you mayn't remember much about this Fitzherbert's farm, where we are. It is the very place where the British nabbed our land-agent, Mr. McIntire, when he was abed, and asleep, and couldn't help himself, and carried him off to Fredericton jail. Let 'em come and try to nab us if they dare; if they wouldn't wish their cake was dough again, I'm m's taken. We've got up pretty considerable of a little kind of a fort here, and we keep it manned day and night—we don't more than half of us sleep to once; and are determined the British shall never ketch us with both eyes shut."

But I 'spose mother's in dreadful fidgets to know about the brush, that I mentioned in the first part of my letter; so I must make haste and get along to it. It wasn't exactly a scratch with the British soldiers, but something just about as bad, and I don't know but a little worse, for it was along with them thieving trespassers, that's been cutting down our trees and stealin' our logs. And I think I should as I've run my chance among soldiers as among thieves."

That night after we got here, when the sentries was all placed round the fort, and the things all put up for the night, Colonel Jarvis asked us to go in and set down and have a chat. So we did; and he asked us all about our march down here to our disputed territory, and what the news was to home, and if we see the governor as we come along, and if he sent any word to him, and so on. Sargent Johnson told him all about it, and told him the governor was terrible earnest for him to hold on to the logs; and said he mustn't never fletch a hair, nor give up an inch of our disputed territory, let what would come, and he must put a stop to their cutting down our timber."

Colonel Jarvis said, the governor might let him alone for that; if Sir John Harvey got hold of any of them logs, he would have to get up earlier in the morning than ever he did yet.

"Now, Sargent Johnson," said the colonel, "you are a smart officer, and you've got a smart little company here; and bein' you've jest come into the service, it wouldn't be no more than fair that you should have a chance to take hold of some kind of a job that should be an honour to you and your company, and show to the people of the state what sort of gnt you are made of. I think it's very likely there's some of them are thieving chaps about here in the woods yot, cutting down our timber; and you may take your men in the morning, and load up your guns and go off on a cruise, and see if you can catch any of the rascals, and bring 'em and their teams off here prisoners of war; and the rest of us 'll stay here and guard the fort while you are gone. If the rascals set out to fight, don't show 'em no quarter, but take 'em, dead or alive, and bring 'em off to the fort."

"Sargent Johnson told him, "that was jest sich a job as we should like, and we'd be out in the morning bright and airy and go at it."

Accordingly, as soon as it was daylight in the morning, I turned out, and give Sargent Johnson a touch, and told him 'twas time to be stirring. He was on his feet as quick as a wink, and told me to call the men and tell 'em to get ready. In a few minutes we got our breakfasts, and put some dinner in our knapsacks, and see that our guns was all well loaded; and after the colonel told us which way we better go, we marched off and struck right into the woods.

We had rather tough getting about, pretty much all the forenoon, scratching about through the bushes, and climbing over logs and stones, and working our way through the swamps; but towards noon we begun to come along into the timber-land. And, my stars! sich great whapping pine trees, as straight as a candle, and tall as a liberty-pole, and standing all round as thick as the pear-poles in our garden. I guess you never see.

"Ah," says Sargent Johnson, "this is the place where them thieving chaps picks their huckleberries. We shall get upon the track of some 'em bime-by!"

At last we come to a pretty considerable of a kind of a little river. Sargent Johnson told us to keep a sharp look out now, for they hailed the logs into these small rivers and brooks, and in the spring when the ice broke up, they would shoot 'em along out into the Astookook river, and then shoot 'em away off down the St. John's river, and carry 'em off to England, and nobody knows where. We followed the river up a mile or two, and I was away a little ways ahead of the rest, and at last I heard a sharp kind of a click, like the sound of an axe chopping wood. I listened a spell, and then I heard it again; and I told Sargent Johnson we was close upon 'em, for I could hear 'em chop. At that we all stopped and listened, and we could hear 'em as plain as day. Sargent Johnson then told us to see that the primin' in our guns was all right, and to foller him as still as mice. So we crept along as careful as if we was going on eggs. Bime-by we got on to a little piece of rising ground, where we could look down towards the bend of the river, and there we see 'em as busy at work as a thief in a mill. They had a little log cabin for themselves, and another one for their oxen, and one chap was jest driving the oxen in, to give 'em some hay, and the rest was going in to dinner; all but the one that we heard chopping; and he was digging his axe into the side of a great large pine-tree as big round as a hogget. Bime-by one of 'em come to the door, and hollered to him, and told him to come in to dinner, for the beans was all turned out, and growin' cold. But she said the beans might go to rot for what he keered, for he wouldn't come in till he got his tree down, any how. So he kept his axe agoing, click, click, and we kept still and looked on. We see the tree was pretty nigh off, and bime-by we heard a crack, and then a little louder crack, and we looked up, and see the top began to lean and tremble a little—it was a monstrous great big tree—and then the cracks come quicker and louder, crack, crack, double crack, and the old tree begun to whisk through among the tops of the other trees with a roaring sound like a harrycane, and then in two winks of a hum-bird's eye, it went crash on to the ground like a clap of thunder, and made all smoke again.

"By king," said Sargent Johnson, "if that's the way they steal our timber, I think it's a caution."

After the tree was down, the chap stuck his axe into the stump, jest as when anybody's a readin' he puts his finger on where he left off, and then he went into the camp to dinner.

"Now," says Sargent Johnson, "now's the time. While they are at dinner we'll surround the camp, and take 'em by surprise."

We looked down on to the bank of the river, and we see two or three everlastin' great piles of logs, as big as two or three houses, that they had cut, and hauled, and rolled down the bank. This made some of our company feel a little blue, for fear they might be too many for us. And they asked Sargent Johnson if we hadn't better wait till they come out of the camp, so we could see how many there was of 'em. For there was only eleven of us, and by the great pile of logs they had hauled down to the river, there might be a hundred of them.

Sargent Johnson said he didn't care if there was five hundred; he'd surround their camp, and take 'em prisoners. And says he,

"If any of you is cowards, you may turn about and go back now, and them that stays will have the honour all to ourselves."

At that they coloured up some, and said they was no cowards, but was ready to go as far as he would.

So Sargent Johnson then give us off the plan of the campaign. And says no—

"You see there is a door to the cabin, and it stands a little ways open; and you see there's holes cut out through two sides of the cabin for windows. Now we must creep up as still as midnight, so that they shan't see no hear us, and when we've surrounded the cabin, I'll give a little bit of a low whistle, and in a moment, two of you must poke your guns right into them windows, and I'll step right into the middle of the door with my sword in one hand and my gun in 'tother, and two more of you must spring right behind me and poke your guns in over my shoulders, one over my right shoulder and 'tother over my left shoulder; and the rest of you must stand off, all ready to fire, about two rods from the camp, as a core deserv. Colonel Jarvis says it's always best to keep a core deserv, when you are going to make an attack. And as soon as I've got in the middle of the door, and staring of 'em right in the face, I'll sing out to 'em like thunder—"Now you rascally stealin' chaps, now I've got you; now if you don't give up in a minute, we'll shoot you down like squirrels." And I guess that'll fetch 'em to. If it don't, and they set out to fight, why then we must fight, that's all; and that's what we come down here for."

After Sargent Johnson had given us our orders, we told him we understood 'em, and would stick to him through thick and thin. So we crawled along towards the camp as fast and as still as we could. We had to climb right over that thundern' great big tree that they jest fell, because it was sich a bad place to get round any end of it. But at last we got along up within three or four rods of the camp, and Sargent Johnson made a sign for us to halt, so we might all get ready; and come to look round, one was missing, for there wasn't but ten of us. And come to look round to see who it was, it was Billy Wiggins. Sargent Johnson looked cross enough, and a little surprised too; for he said, for all Billy was sich a fumbling, clumsy little chap, he never thought he was a coward. At that I looked back the way we come, and I see Billy's head bobbing up and down bein' that great pine tree, as he was jumping up with all his might and trying to climb up on it. I see in a minute what the difficulty was; he couldn't get up on to the tree, and he didn't dare to holler, for that would muster 'em out of the cabin. So I run back and jumped up on to the tree and got hold of Billy's hand and hauled him over. And we pretty soon got all ready to make the attack. Every man had his gun panted towards the cabin and all ready to pull. I and Jonathan Downing was to stand behind Sargent Johnson and pint our guns over his shoulders; and Seth Joselyn was to stand to one window and Billy Wiggins to 'tother. As soon as we was all ready, Sargent Johnson give a little, easy whistle, and we all sprung to our places; but before Sargent Johnson had time to begin to speak, Billy Wiggins's gun—I guess there must be something the matter with Billy's forefinger, for his gun blazed away like lightning into the cabin window, and his ball went splash right into a log on 'tother side. And all in the same breath the rest of our guns was all pokin' in on every side, and Sargent Johnson was bawling out to 'em with his roaring voice and calling of 'em "stealin' rascals." Oh, father! I wish you'd been there. "If you ever see a flock of mice in the butterny nibbling round a pan of meal, and see the old cat jump right into the window and land right down in the middle of 'em, and see how them mice wend it, you might guess a little how them prisoners of ours jumped and sprung round and screamed. As I was looking right in over Sargent Johnson's shoulder, I could see the whole on't. There was six of 'em, and they was all setting round the table eating their dinners. They had a great large milk-pan in the middle of the table full of baked beans and three or four pounds of fat pork on the top of it; and a kettle of soup on one end of the table, and bread and potatoes and so on, all over the table. And when the thunder-clap broke upon 'em all to once, they all sprung right up as if they'd gone out of their skins; and the table went like a lock of hay in a whirlwind. It bounced up in the first place almost to the roof of the cabin; and when it come down, the beans flew from one side of the room to the other, like shot in a pepper-box; and the soup-kettle and the bread and the dishes and the potatoes I couldn't keep the run of.

After the first scream was over, and they see they wasn't killed, one of 'em sprung and ketched a handspike that they had to stir the fire with, and another ketched up a stool that they had to set on, and another run behind the door and brought out an old gun. But when they see our guns pokin' in round so thick, they sprung into the corners and squat down behind the barrels, and begun to holler "don't fire! don't fire!" At last after they begun to get still a little, so he could be heard, Sargent Johnson told 'em to lay down their arms. At that, one laid down his handspike, 'tother one his gun, and things begun to get considerable quiet.

Then Sargent Johnson asked 'em if they was willing to surrender themselves prisoners of war. At that, one of 'em that seemed to be the head man among 'em, a short, thick, fat man, with a red face and a bluish nose, stepped forward and asked Sargent Johnson what he wanted. The sargent told him they must deliver themselves up as prisoners of war and be carried to the American camp.

"And then what is to be done with us?" said he.

"Well, then, you'll have to be sent to Bangor, to be tried for stealing the logs on our disputed territory," said Sargent Johnson.

"Well, then, we'll die first," said he, and he sprung back and ketched up the gun. But when he looked round and see the rest of his men was as white as a cloth; and quivering behind the barrels, and see our guns all panted right at him, he see 'twas no use. And says he, "Captain, don't fire, I'll give up." And he brought his gun and give it to Sargent Johnson. Then Sargent Johnson ordered 'em to come out two by two, and we took and tied 'em together by twos, so we could guard 'em easy; and then we went to the hovel and took out the oxen. There was two yoke of oxen and a horse; and we yoked 'em up and loaded all the provisions they had in the camp and started off for our fort. Jonathan Downing drove the oxen; and Billy Wiggins—Sargent Johnson said Billy was sich an unlucky kind of a feller he had no patience with him but after all, he said he didn't know but what his gun goin' off so, did about as much good as anything—so on the whole, bein' he had sich short legs, he said Billy Wiggins should ride the horse.

So when we all got ready, we marched off towards our fort, and got back just about sunset. And as we was coming up the hill towards the fort, they all come out to meet us and give us a salute. I guess you never see a man more tickled than Colonel Jarvis was. He hopped up and down and slapped Sargent Johnson on the shoulder more than forty times; and declared if the oxen was only fat enough, we'd have one of 'em roasted whole the next day for dinner.

But I can't say any more to-day; so give my love to the folks, and I remain your loving son,

JOHN.

Dear General, so much for my son John's second girt. Don't you think he grinds it out pretty well for a boy that isn't seventeen years old yet? Yours,

JOHN SMITH, ESQUIRE.

FROM THE NOTE-BOOK OF A TRAVELLER.

HERMITAGE PENHA DE FRANCA.

A FAVOURITE walk with the foreign residents in Macao, is to a high hill to the westward, commonly called the Penha; its proper name, however, is Niliu, on the summit of which stands the ancient Hermitage Penha de Franca, erected in 1632. After leaving the Praya Grande, the ascent to the hill commences by a rocky and uneven path; at intervals some few steps are excavated to aid the ascent, but for the most part, one has to scramble over the rocks and stones in no very comfortable manner. The path is very circuitous, now passing near the entrance to some Chinese village, guarded by troops of the most ugly, ungainly, abominable set of curs ever seen. Approach too near, and up they start from every corner commencing in concert such horrid yelps from every variation of the gamut, which, although most annoying, need cause no alarm, for like their masters, the chop-stick gentry, they are arrant cowards. Again, you are passing close under the brink of some old wall, the blue bricks apparently about to tumble upon you, or, through a cluster of Chinese graves. Many tasty dwellings of Portuguese or English residents attract attention; their neat green verandas, or bamboo frames covered with matting, stretching along the front, while now and then, as a gate may be left open, the interior discloses a gaudy show of flowers. One of these, a large and handsome dwelling, was pointed out, as being formerly the residence of Lord Napier. Near this, on an abrupt rise of ground, may be seen the foundation (laid many years since) of what would undoubtedly have been a princely edifice, to judge by the massy and extensive walls. It had not the superstition of the owner prevented its completion. It was intended for the dwelling of a rich Portuguese lady, who commenced the work upon a scale of grandeur correspondent to her wealth, which is said to have been immense. Shortly after its commencement, some unexpected domestic calamity befell the lady; this the wily priests resolved to turn to their own advantage. Instead of breathing comfort to the afflicted woman, they assured her, her punishment was just for ever wishing to erect so fine a dwelling, and that to avoid other misfortunes equally severe and rescue her own soul from purgatory, she must renounce the pomp and vanities of the world, and bequeath her wealth to the holy church. "Give your money," said they, "to the holy Madre de Deus, and your salvation is secure." It is needless to say the frightened woman did as the reverend padres advised, shut herself up in the convent of Santa Clara, leaving this relic of earthly pride and spiritual superstition to crumble to the ground.

In the centre of the extensive grounds which these walls enclose, a Chinese family have erected their hut, at the door of which a woman was standing with a child in her arms; my companion addressed a few words to her in the Chinese tongue; she smiled, seemingly much pleased, and with all the mother's pride, held up her babe for us to admire—no other theme but the praise of her child could have drawn so much expression into features as unmeaning as the Chinese possess, but now they lit up at once with an animation which showed the right chord had been touched. A stranger cannot but be struck with the similarity of the Chinese features; they seem all to have been cast in the same mould, all equally stupid and unmeaning; this may in a measure be owing to their style of dress, the women of the lower class, especially those who live in the Tanka boats or Sah-pen, dress so much like the males, that were it not for the handkerchief thrown over the head and tied carelessly under the chin, it would be difficult to distinguish them; those of a grade or two higher, arrange their hair with much neatness, adorning it either with gold or silver ornaments, or little sprigs of white flowers, and may be seen at all hours walking up and down the Praya, with merely a small bamboo umbrella to shield them from the sun; occasionally, also, a lady with the celebrated "small feet" and embroidered slippers, tottles along; this, however, is of rather rare occurrence, it being only such as have been reduced from high life, that bear this badge of cruelty, and proof of illustrious descent about them. The Chinese litters compare this anstedly gut in their mistresses, to the graceful weaving of the willow! It is language to see the Chino-man, with his white small clothes, long robe of blue or black crape, awkward shoes, shaven crown and long noded queue, strapping along so humbly holding up his fan, with all the airs of a belle, to shade him from the rays of the sun.

Having reached the summit of the Penha, the view is charming, in every direction the eye is arrested by the most romantic scenery. The Penha being at the western extremity of the peninsula, all Macao lies before you. It might truly be called the city of hills, for they rise in every direction, presenting a wild and romantic aspect, heightened by the numerous forts and convents capping their summit. To the east is the lofty Monte Charil, on which stands Fort Guila; directly at its base, a rocky point extends into the sea, on which is erected Fort St. Francis, with a church bearing the same name. At a little distance from a grove of banians, peep forth the white walls of the convent Santa Clara. On another elevation, nearly in the centre of the town, stands the Monte Fort. Fronting the residence of the governor on the Praya, is St. Peter's Fort, and on other points equally picturesque are the Bar and Bombario Forts. Scattered among these lofty hills are the dwellings of the Portuguese, English, and American residents, and separated from near communion with Bartarians, may here and there be seen the closely-packed huts of a Chinese village, across whose narrow streets or lanes the inhabitants are rapidly gliding, bearing their little strings of fish, or baskets containing either the gleanings of the streets or refuse from some foreigner's table, while parties of Lascars, Caffres, and Chinese are wandering among the hills. The long rains and typhoons, to which this climate is subject, combine to give Macao an air of great antiquity; thus buildings, in reality quite new, have from these causes a very time-worn aspect. During the wet season, the rain pours down in torrents or furious showers for weeks, washing away the chenam or plastering spread over the exterior of most of the dwellings, and at the same time rendering everything within doors damp and uncomfortable. The water drops from the ceiling, and to preserve their silks and other fine articles from the effects of the damp, the ladies are obliged to pack them away in tin boxes, wrapped in oiled paper, and otherwise guarded from the air. Then come the typhoons—the wind blowing tremendously, tearing off the tiles, sometimes unroofing whole streets, while over those dwellings on the Praya Grande, the sea rushes furiously, sweeping away the verandas, and often penetrating even into the drawing-rooms. To add to the terrors of the tempest, during most of the time the thunder rolls awfully, reverberating over the hills and adjacent islands, while the lightning is incessant and vivid.

The Hermitage Penha de France is very much dilapidated, and will soon be a ruin. A part of it has been lately repaired and rendered tenable for a few old friars. It is surrounded by a high, black wall, extending some distance. On one part of it is erected a rude stone cross, which Portuguese ships passing the Penha, are in the habit of saluting by firing a few guns.

ORIGINAL LETTERS FROM THE WEST.

LETTERS FROM DETROIT.

We left Pontiac and his associates at sword's points with the British at the very instant of developed treachery.

"I said the chief was brave
As ever bright that belted girdle;
Yet dare not say that now his blood
Kept on its wont and temper's food."

It is recorded that, at this crisis, "Monsieur Pontiac," as he is oddly enough called in the French manuscript before alluded to, actually trembled. And well he might, for what snail again dear Sir Walter?

"Though space and law the stag we lend,
Ere hound we slip, or bow we bend,
Who ever recked where, how, or when,
The prowling fox was trapped or slain!"

Yet Major Gladwyn, foregoing the gratification of a natural desire of revenge, in the prudence which dictated a conciliatory course with the savage neighbours of his isolated command, contented himself with drawing aside the blanket which concealed the shortened rifle, reproaching the chief with his treachery, and ordering him and his party from the fort. The Indians retired in sullen silence; but, as soon as they had passed the gate, gave the yell and fired upon the garrison, proceeding afterwards to wreak their baffled fury upon various unoffending families in the vicinity, whom they murdered in cold blood. Hostilities were continued for some time after these occurrences, and so much were the troops harassed by their strange wild foes, that they began to think seriously of abandoning the post and retiring to Niagara. At this juncture, Major Campbell, the former commander, who still remained in the fort, was persuaded to try his influence with the natives, with whom he was supposed to be popular. He consented, with a generosity which deserved a better fate, to trust himself with the wily Pontiac in his own hair, and, accompanied by Lieutenant McDougall, proceeded to the Indian camp. As might well be expected, these brave officers were detained as hostages. Lieutenant McDougall, after some time, succeeded in making his escape; but Major Campbell was horribly murdered near Bloody Bridge, (now the eastern extremity of Jefferson Avenue,) by an Indian who had a private grudge against him, and who made his escape to Sagawau; Pontiac loudly disclaiming the deed and its perpetrator.

The battle of Bloody Bridge, the consequence of an Indian ambush, resulted in the loss of the commander of the British force, and seventy men, with forty wounded. Yet Pontiac's ardour seems to have cooled from this time; and after the arrival of General Bradstreet, in the spring of 1764, with an army of three thousand men, the chief abandoned the country and retired to Illinois, where he was assassinated by a Peoria Indian. The Ottawas, and the tribes in their alliance, avenged his death to the utmost, and the memory of the great Ottawa chief is still held in the highest reverence among his countrymen in the wilderness.

During the revolutionary war, the British, who had taken unwearied pains to conciliate the Indians, employed their agency in many deeds of atrocious cruelty; a warfare, calculated to arouse the most deadly passions of human nature; "a warfare," says Mr. Cass, "to distress, not to subdue." General Clarke succeeded, after exhibiting in a series of brave and persevering efforts, the best qualities of a soldier, in humbling to the very dust the pride of Governor Hamilton, who had marched as far as Vincennes, with the intention of cutting him off; and Hamilton, with some of his abettors in the savage acts to which we have but alluded, was sent in irons to Virginia.

The recognition of our independence was followed by difficulties touching the surrender of the posts. These gave rise to an Indian war, which called into action Harmar, St. Clair, and Wayne, and which ended in the evacuation of Detroit by the British, and the peaceable exchange of the British for the American flag.

In June, 1805, Detroit was completely destroyed by fire—so, literally, we are told, that but two buildings were left standing. The inhabitants remained for some time encamped on the commons behind their devastated site, and not a few of them had begun to rebuild their dwellings, renewing the town on the contracted and inconvenient plan of most fortified frontier places, when General William Hull arrived with the dignity of governor of the territory. His immediate care was the adoption of a new plan for the rising city. Judge Woodward, to whom is attributed the labyrinth of triangles which now conspire to puzzle not only the stranger but the residents themselves, is said to have regarded his plan as combining all the excellences to be culled from the annals of city-building—from that of Tadmar in the wilderness to that of Washington our own—and often declared the magnificent outline "would take eight centuries to fill up." It is the opinion of those best acquainted with Detroit, that the judge must await the completion of his design for the encumbers which he doubtless considered his due. Grand crescents—avenues of all sizes and in all directions—triangles of all possible acuteness—and "passages which lead to nothing"—would be gladly exchanged, as says Colonel Whiting, (from whose address before the Historical Society I borrow these brief but applicable items,) "for the simplicity, symmetry, and convenience of the plan of William Penn."

The new town of Detroit had no other defence than the fort in rear until 1807 or 1808, when the threatening movements of some of the neighbouring tribes of Indians led to the erection of a stockade around it, which was not removed until 1817.

The details of General Hull's surrender of Detroit to the British, under General Brock, would probably have little interest for the readers of the Mirror. It is still a subject of angry reminiscence with the older inhabitants, and I have seen the eyes of a fair Pen-thesian, who was not born when it happened, glitter with indignation as she spoke of it. General Hull has had his defenders certainly; yet when I have been sauntering up the Springwells road, the path of General Brock's approach, (narrowed in as it is by) the river on one side, and high fences on the other, I have thought that a small party of old women, armed with their snuff-boxes, knitting-needles, and that other sharper little weapon which they usually carry about them, might have held the pass against a considerable force. This disastrous blunder had the most distressing consequences. After the British had taken possession, the Indians, in their employ, "carried plunder and devastation into almost every house, and through almost every farm in the territory. The miserable inhabitants had no alternative but to submit or incur the hazard of more aggravated outrage. Most of the citizens of Detroit were sent into exile, and distress and ruin appeared to be the inevitable lot of all."

General Winchester, who was afterwards sent by General Harrison to endeavour to retrieve some of the disgraces of that humiliating campaign, seems to have emulated the fame of that other commander, who, according to the wicked rhymes of those days,

"Gave Canada a dreadful evening—
Burnt one log—but—killed one dead Indian."

But Perry's victory saved all!—opened the lake to General Harrison, who soon after crossed his army to the Canadian shore, and, in the course of a short campaign, which was brilliantly finished by the battle of the Marston towns, drove the enemy from the north-western frontier."

Governor Cass's administration commenced in 1813, and from this time the inhabitants of Michigan reckon their day of prosperity. But what is so uninteresting as prosperity! As long as

"—Martial spirits, all on fire, Breath'd only blood and mortal ire," the vicissitudes of the lonely border fortress furnished materials for many a wild tale. But now the rich turf of Michigan covers the remains of Fort Shelby.

"Warriors from the breach of danger
Pluck no longer laurels there;
They but yield the passing stranger
Wild-dower wreaths for beauty's hair."

The warlike Tecumseh is represented by a pretty thriving village—the Shawnee Prophet has suffered himself to be "trotted out," "shorn of his beams," from one end of the union to the other—"and Ahlwick is a market town"—proud of its wharves, and its steamboats; and its blocks of brick stores. The fur-trade, which has (at least since "Astoria") something of picturesque interest, is exchanged for loads of flour from the broad plains of the interior of this fertile peninsula, and whole hactombs of beef and pork, and mountains of cheese and dried apples, from Ohio. Yet these vulgar matters, though "of no use to any but the owner"—certainly of none to the poet or the historian—are, after all, very comfortable things in their way; and Detroit is confessedly a more desirable residence in 1839 than it was in 1701. In my next I shall endeavour to give some idea of its present appearance.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

PIANOFORTE PLAYING.—A late writer on the "art of playing the pianoforte," makes the following judicious remarks:—"The genius of the pianoforte demands, as an essential quality to every performer—rapidity of finger. The glitter of notes evenly played with both hands, long scales, uninterrupted by any break, permitting surprising touches of modulation and combination of notes that cannot be obtained with equal facility from any other instrument to be heard—are the principle upon which our pleasure from the piano is derived. Adagios and cantabile movements may be played upon more vocal instruments with equal, if not superior effect; but there is nothing which can do what the pianoforte can with respect to variety, and in certain effects it is unrivalled. In reflecting for a moment on the vast variety of combinations that passages for the piano assume—the new difficulty that grows out of every new form—and that of the myriad of notes we hear in the concerto of some eminent players, each individual note is produced by the energy of some one out of the small human allotment of fingers—again, that each key must not be merely touched, but that its force must be calculated, or there would be no equality in playing, we may (recalling the original imperfections of the hand) imagine what labour goes to the formation of a perfect mechanism. There is scarcely any instrument that presents such complex forms of study, or that demands such constant, patient, and judicious practice. And yet in this country the common error is to suppose that the road to the acquisition of a perfect command of the instrument, to the talents of a Moscheles, or a Cramer, is one of amusement. It is imagined that by playing pieces of music to sweeten the labour of practice, mixed with a few scales, a player will at length be formed. A young lady is left till she is fifteen or sixteen years of age under the care of such a teacher as she finds at school; she then quits, and going with her friends to some party, hears some excellent playing, and is seized with an ambition to excel. On attempting to produce on her own piano something like what she has heard, she becomes sensible that her fingers do not move with the even force and regularity that they ought. A master is engaged to correct her defects; but, even let him set to work as judiciously as he may, what is he to do with a hand that has been so long neglected? Or what inclination is there in a grown pupil to undertake all that labour which should properly be accomplished in childhood?"

HOMOEOPATHIC DOSES.—It is the division of doses of medicine into such infinite fractions that has drawn upon the homoeopathic practice the denunciation of the allopathic physicians, as it is considered utterly impossible that such imponderable particles can produce any beneficial or prejudicial effect. However, experience has afforded abundant proofs that these infinite atoms do produce positive and evident effects. What appears to our sensible organs an atomic fraction, may produce phenomena on the organism which we cannot comprehend, but should not therefore be denied. Let one grain of iodine be dissolved in one thousand five hundred and sixty grains of water, the solution will be hmpid; let two grains of starch be dissolved in two ounces of water and added to the first solution, and the liquor will forthwith assume a blue tint. In this experiment the grain of iodine has been divided into one million one thousand five hundred and sixty. Dissolve the four-hundredth part of arsenic in four hundred thousand parts of water, and the hydrosulphide will bring it into evidence. Let a five-thousandth part of arsenic of ammonia be dissolved in five hundred thousand parts of water, and the addition of the smallest proportion of nitrate of silver will obtain a yellow precipitate. Numerous experiments of a similar nature may be resorted to, to prove that the most minute particles of two substances possessed of chemical affinities may be brought into action, although diluted, infinitum.

ACID CONTAINED IN ANTS.—Contrary to the once-received doctrine, that no acid was to be found in any animal, except as the effect of disease in the alimentary canal, many insects secrete acrid and powerful ones. The fact once known, has been long known; but Mr. Fisher, of Sheffield, about 1670, seems to have been the first who ascertained that this effect is caused by an acid with which ants abound, and which may be obtained from them by distillation, or infusion in water. Margraff and other chemists have confirmed the discovery. The subsequent experiments of Deyeux, Portercy, and Vanquelin, have ascertained that this acid is not of a distinct kind, but a mixture of the acetic and malic. These acids are in such considerable quantities, and so concentrated in these animals, that, when a number of Formica rufa are bruised in a mortar, the vapour is so sharp, that it is scarcely possible to endure it at a short distance. It also transpires from them; for they leave traces of it on the bodies over which they pass; and hence, according to the experiments of Mr. Coleridge, the vulgar notion that ants cannot pass over a line of chalk is correct; the effluence produced by the contact of the acid and the alkaline being so considerable as in some degree to burn their legs. The circumstance of much of the food of ants being of a saccharine nature may account for this copious secretion of acid, the use of which is probably to defend themselves and their habitations from the attack and intrusion of their enemies.

IMPOSSIBILITIES.

Fied is the dream so fondly nursed,
Of angel joys the fragile token;
The banble of our love is burst,
Its cobweb ties for ever broken.

Then seek not passion to renew—
Believe me that the dream is ended;
Who in this wise world ever knew
Of cobweb ties or bubbles mended!

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.—It has been observed, that if the French had been an educated people, many of the atrocities of their revolution would never have happened, and I believe it. Furious mobs are composed, not of enlightened men—of men in whom the passions are dominant over the judgment, because the judgment has not been exercised, and informed, and habituated to direct the conduct. A factious declaimer can much less easily influence a number of men who acquired at school the rudiments of knowledge, and who have subsequently devoted their leisure to a Mechanic's Institute, than a multitude who cannot read or write, and who have never practised reasoning or considerate thought. And as the education of a people prevents political evil, it effects political good. Despotick rulers well know that knowledge is inimical to their powers.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"ATHENIA OF DANARUS," A Tragedy, by Rufus Dawes. New-York: Samuel Colman. 1839. Pp. 118.

We took occasion some months since to commend this work, when in manuscript, to the favourable attention of the managers of our principal theatres. It has lately been published in an elegant style by Mr. Colman. A more careful perusal has confirmed us in our opinion of the high dramatic and literary merit of the play. The action is developed with consummate skill, and the terrible catastrophe presents one of the completest triumphs of the tragic art that we remember in the whole range of the acting drama. There is little opportunity for the development of character in a tragedy written for the modern stage, in which it is requisite that the representation should not occupy more than two hours. The starring system is another obstacle in the way of the attainment of this object; for every trait or action that attaches interest to the subordinate characters, is opposed by the star, as calculated to detract from his or her peculiar importance. There is an essential difference, likewise, between dramatic effect and stage effect; for that which is supremely dramatic in the closet may be made supremely ridiculous on the stage. Those who complain of the inferiority of the dramatic productions of the present day to those of the Elizabethan era, do not take into consideration how few of the plays of the elder dramatists, of Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Massinger, retain possession of the stage. Indeed, what modern audience would sit through the best play of Shakespeare, unaltered, and unadapted, and unentertained? It is plain, that what was once merely a work of genius, must now be a work of genius and art combined. The modern dramatist, who writes for the stage, must not only be a poet, but an artist, versed in all the technicalities of the profession, and fettering himself by mechanical rules. It is according Mr. Dawes no small praise to say, that his tragedy is at once a good acting play, and a beautiful dramatic poem. The principal characters, are characters in the best sense of the word. That of Athenia is portrayed with matchless power and truth; and Calous is the impersonation of all that is generous and noble in the hero and the lover. We need but refer to the extracts we have already published, to prove that our estimate of this beautiful tragedy is not exaggerated.

"INDICATION, OR A TALE OF THE FAR WEST, AND OTHER POEMS." By J. K. Mitchell, M.D. Philadelphia: Carey and Hart. Duocemmo. Pp. 212. 1839.

A favourite correspondent has sent us a long critical notice of this beautifully-printed volume, which, we sincerely regret, we must defer for want of room. Coming, as the paper does, from a lady, and one, whose writings have frequently enriched our columns, and whose good taste in literary matters we have never been in the habit of disputing, we cannot omit the publication of her remarks without an apology, which we herewith respectfully tender. So much for the criticism—now for the work itself. The longest poem in this volume is that from which it derives its name—"Indication." It abounds in good poetry, and the merit of the "Song of the Prairie" alone is sufficient to redeem all its faults. It is a story of the West, and affords the author opportunities for many exquisite and highly-wrought sketches of forest scenery, mountain and stream. We would like to quote the admirable picture of night on the Alleghenies, and several other passages, which we had marked for that purpose, did our limits permit. But we must content ourselves with referring the reader to the work itself, with the assurance that we have read it with great pleasure, and that it cannot fail to afford him equal satisfaction. Many portions of the poems are bold, original, and struck off with the hand of a master. There are several minor poems in the collection, which are remarkable for their grace of expression and beauty of thought. To adequately appreciate this work, the reader should know the author, who is a physician of Philadelphia in arduous and incessant practice, and whose amiable qualities and brilliant intellectual endowments, united to his bland and gentle demeanour, have rendered him an ornament to the most polished circles of our fair sister city. The work is appropriately dedicated to Dr. Chapman, in a poetical address full of truth, simplicity and feeling—like honourable to the author and his venerable friend.

"THE MERRY TALES OF THE THREE WISE MEN OF GOTHAM." By the author of "The Dutchman's Friends," "Westward Ho!" "Salmagundi," &c. New-York: Harper and Brothers. Pp. 226.

This forms the fifteenth volume of the complete works of James K. Paulding; and those who are unfamiliar with its racy and amusing contents, will do well to make themselves acquainted with their forthwith. As the title promises, the tales, which are three in number, are full of fun and merriment, containing satirical hits at many of the popular fallacies and humbugs of the day. We are glad to see the works of Mr. Paulding published in this complete and handsome form. Like the productions of Irving, they are incorporated in the American classics, and have already established for the author a permanent reputation as an acute and elegant writer, and a satirist of pre-eminent powers.

"LONDON IN 1838." By an American. New-York: Samuel Colman. Pp. 208.

The statistical portions of this work are apparently executed with fidelity, and we doubt not that the manual will be of service to all who may find themselves strangers in the great British metropolis. There is much agreeable gossip scattered through the pages, and the author's advice, is, as far as we are able to judge, very good. To those about starting for England in our packets and steamships, it cannot fail to prove both an instructive and an entertaining companion. The wood-cuts, that embellish this volume, add materially to its value.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"B.H.B." and ad libitum remarks on international copyright, are placed on file for insertion.—We know nothing of the grievance of which "A Citizen" complains.—"Aisy's" account of the Fancy Ball will be quite acceptable.—We must decline the contributions of "Y.C." "Vivian," and "X.T.C."—We publish to-day another original poem, from the pen of the most popular of living English song writers, Thomas Haynes Bayly. Like all the poetical productions of the author, it is characterized by a beautiful simplicity and an artist-like grace, which an inferior hand might in vain attempt to rival. It presents a perfect picture to the mind's eye, and is as true in its philosophy as it is touching in its poetry. The songs of Bayly, unambitious as they may seem in point of style, contain the ingredients of perpetuity, being already familiar as household words to all lovers of music wherever the English language is spoken.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1839.

Grace Darling again.—The last number of the Mirror contained the narrative of the loss of the Forfarshire steamer, with an engraving, which has been so well received by our readers, that we this day publish a medallion likeness of Grace Darling, engraved by Dr. Anderson, and the words of a popular song just published by Horn and Davis. We are indebted to these enterprising publishers for the drawings from which these cuts have been taken, and which accompany the melody, which has an original arrangement and symphonies, by Charles E. Horn. It is a beautiful specimen of lithography and music-engraving. There are several songs on the same subject, but none that we have seen has been produced with so much care and skill. It may be added, that the above likenesses of Grace and her father are copied from actual portraits, said to be faithful delineations of the originals. The song, to which we have referred may be found on the first page of this day's Mirror.

North River steamboats.—For the information of those who travel, we take this opportunity of stating that the following boats are now running daily between this city and Albany. They are in admirable order, having been overhauled, refitted and repaired during the past winter. The Albany has had her bow altered, and she now measures two hundred and eighty feet in length! These boats are of the first class, and are commanded by courteous and efficient officers. The fare is three dollars in both lines—meals extra.

DAY LINE.

CHAMPLAIN—Captain Goram.
ALBANY—Captain Jenkins.
ERIE—Captain Benson.

One of these boats leave the foot of Barclay-street, every morning at seven o'clock.

NIGHT LINE.

DEWITT CLINTON—Captain Roe.
SWALLOW—Captain McLean.

One of these boats leaves the foot of Courtland-street every afternoon at five o'clock. While noticing the regular boats of the "North River Steamboat Association," we must not omit to mention, that the Highlander, commanded by Captain Johnson, has commenced her regular trips between New-York and Newburgh, stopping at Coldwell's and West Point. We trust there will be no landing of passengers from small boats this season. That custom ought to be abolished entirely.

Tagliani.—Our readers may, perhaps, be gratified by a brief account of the ballet in which Mademoiselle Tagliani has just had such wonderful success in St. Petersburg. It is called La Gitana, the Gipsy, and was offered by the author, M. Tagliani, the celebrated dancer's father, to the Paris Opera some years since, but was declined by the manager, as he was then getting up the opera of La Esmeralda, another gipsy piece, founded on the character of that name in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame. La Esmeralda dropped dead at once, while La Gitana carries everything before it. Now for the details. "On the fifth of December," says Count Waldynski, a correspondent of L'Artiste, "the first night of the new piece, to aid in getting up which, the emperor had appropriated two hundred thousand rubles, a crowd, without example, kept moving to the theatre from early morning. Unluckily it was a thawing day, and you can well imagine that the feet of so many men and horses did not improve the state of the pavements. Two deplorable accidents occurred; a boy was crushed to death near the ticket-office, and a young man suffocated at the entrance of the fourth gallery. Singularly enough, it has since been reported that they had been brothers, sons of a merchant of Gantai-Dwor. As a work of invention, the ballet of La Gitana is certainly above all others of the kind, as you may see by a brief sketch. In the first act, we are at the fair of Frankfort-on-the-Main; that is, three hundred persons are brought on the stage at once, coming and going, singing and shouting, blowing horns and beating drums. Some play at different games, others ride flying horses; some are dancing on ropes, others climbing mats de cocagne; beyond are sharpeners, bears, apes, quack doctors, Savoyards, merry andrews, Tyrolese minstrels and gipsies, each busy in their own way, to the mixed music of rattling carts and hand organs. The second act, and you may fancy the effect of such a contrast, is laid in the thickest forests of the Pyrenees, where the gipsies are encamped. And do not imagine that the torrent which rolls down before you, is manufactured, as it would be in Paris, out of sundry yards of painted canvases: it is bonafide torrent produced by a bonafide waterfall, twelve feet high and twenty-four feet wide, which rolls as majestically as may be, under three solid bridges, which are crossed every minute by horsemen at full gallop. It is thus surrounded by nature herself, that the gipsies execute their dance, after which the whole caravan, counting two hundred persons, beats up and marches off in search of another resting-place. The third act carries us to a masked ball, alongside of which your famous ball in Gustave is nothing at all. Imagine two hundred and sixty dancers, and a hundred and forty figurars, in the richest and most varied dresses, lighted by five thousand bougies in a hundred and twenty lustres, and you will have some idea of the ball in the Gitana. What do you think now of M. Tagliani's ball? Do you know of any constructed on so gigantic a scale, offering such a field for the display of one of the greatest splendour and the most refined taste? Neither at Paris, London, nor Vienna, have I seen anything that can be compared to it. But you will ask me where is Mademoiselle Tagliani all this while. Wait a moment. It was proper to describe you the scene in which she appears, before speaking of the lady herself. She appears in the Gitana four times. In the first act she dances a gipsy dance of the usual kind. In the second, she dances something I hardly know how to describe to you, but it is one of the strangest and most wonderful things in the world; being executed, as you may well suppose, with the most elegant precision and graceful lightness, to a true gipsy music, that is to the music of bottles, kettles, glasses, frying-pans, tongs and skillets, and other kitchen furniture. In the third act she appears twice, first in a pantomime scene, in which she displays great talent as an actress, and feeling and pathos unsurpassed; and afterwards, in the splendid ball-scene I mentioned before, in which she dances a pas shynen, composed for her in Paris by her brother. It would be prudent, perhaps, to confine myself to this mere list of the performances of our great artist, for how can I hope to describe in words the inconceivable perfection to which she has attained—the airiness that a swallow might envy—the grace at once modest and voluptuous, the wonderful lightness and buoyancy? At the same time, how can I refrain from expressing the powerful impression she produced? If I were to live a thousand years, I should not forget the evening of the fifth of December—I shall never forget those exquisite attitudes, those graceful hoverings between heaven and earth, those tiny Atlantides feet, more rapid in their movements than a bird's wing. I have seen Mademoiselle Tagliani often since she has been at St. Petersburg, but I may safely say that I did not really know her till I saw her in the Gitana. My letter would be imperfect if I did not mention that the new ballet has obtained a success never before equalled. The receipts, the first night, were fifty thousand two hundred and nine rubles, and have not fallen off a cent for ten days.

The Theatres.—The Park has been doing a very fair business with Rienzi, La Fayette, the Last Days of Pompeii, and other specimens of the illegitimate drama. We wish that the taste of the public had authorized Simpson to give us entertainments of a higher and more intellectual character, wherein the inimitable powers of Placide might have been displayed. But there will soon be a lustration of the boards of the Park. Miss Foe and Caradori Allan are engaged. The National has thus far had a most prosperous season. The opera has been succeeded by the performances of Wallack, which promise to be unusually attractive. At the Franklin, Dimme-dore has been active in the production of novelties, and what with the Old Clock, the Aroostook War, and other good things, he has done a profitable business.

Simmons's lectures.—Mr. Simmons appears to bear away the palm among the popular lecturers of the day. His course upon Shakespeare, at the Stuyvesant Institute, has attracted very full and fashionable audiences. A succeeding course upon American orators will doubtless have equal success. Mr. Simmons is an admirable ecologist, a practised and elegant writer, and a man of undoubted genius.

Yankee characters.—We learn that some one is dramatizing the inimitable letters of John Smith, touching the doings on the frontier, for the Franklin. The pictures of Yankee character in these sketches, are as faithful as they are amusing. We think they far surpass anything in the original Downing letters by the same author.

THE VILLAGE BELLS.

A FAVOURITE BALLAD—WRITTEN BY JAMES SMITH—COMPOSED BY JOHN WHITAKER.

ANDANTE AFFETTUOSO

The vil-lage bells! oh, how I love To hear their mer-ry chimes, Ring out a-cross the sun-lit fields, So like to former times, with Ma-ry by my side the flow'ry dells, And thought no sounds on earth so sweet As my vil-lage bells! my vil-lage bells, my vil-lage bells, My na-tive vil-lage bells, my na-tive vil-lage bells, Dear bells! My na-tive vil-lage bells!

2—Again I hear them soft and low,
Come sweeping o'er the plain,
With feelings once 'twas heav'n to know,
And bliss to feel again.

For though I've dwelt where music all
The soul with rapture swells,
I ne'er heard sounds could thrill my heart,
Like thine, my village bells! &c.

3—How many a scene to mem'ry dear,
Their plaintive notes recall:
The school, the dance upon the green,
And thee! more dear than all.

My Ma-ry, when life's noon is o'er,
My fancy fondly tells,
In quiet we may pass our eve,
Where sound our village bells! &c.

THE GIPSY'S INVITATION.

WRITTEN FOR H. RUSSELL, BY JONAS B. PHILLIPS.

I.
Oh! come with me to the forest green,
Come, brother, and dwell with me;
And there I'll show you our woodland queen,
And a gay young thing is she—
Her eyes are bright as the stars that shine
O'er the ocean broad and blue.
Then leave thy home,
With the free to roam,
And join our gipsy crew.
Come, brother, come! we are bold and true,
And join our gipsy crew.

II.
We love to dwell in the brake and fen,
And a joyous home have we;
'Tis not like the gilded haunts of men,
But, oh! it is far more free!
Our lamps are the fire-fly's glit'ring light,
Our gems are the morning dew;
We sing and laugh,
And the wine-cup quaff,
Oh! join our gipsy crew!
Come, brother, come! we are bold and true,
Come, join our gipsy crew!

MISCELLANY.

POWERFUL INDUCEMENT.—The following tempting invitation appears upon a window in a gin-palace, in the Elysian neighbourhood of Seven Dials, London:—"Stop! stop! Here you may get the regular knock-me-down, sow-me-up, do-me-brown, ask-me-how, come-it-strong, out-and-out, genuine never-spilt, cream-of-the-valley, price two pence the glass, including a rusk and a dash of carraways."

A BUSY FELLOW.—The New Era says there is an editor down east who is not only his own compositor, pressman and devil, but keeps a tavern, is village schoolmaster, captain in the militia, mends his own boots and shoes, makes patent Brandreth pills, peddles essences and tin-ware two days in the week, and always reads sermons on the Sabbath, when the minister happens to be missing. In addition to all this, he has a wife and sixteen children.—The Boston Morning Post says this is not all—he owns a schooner, and came to Boston with a cargo of potatoes and onions, last fall, raised by himself and gave notice to his subscribers, when he left, that the issuing of the next number of his paper would depend upon the wind—atmospherical and financial, we suppose.

A FEE-LEW.—A surgeon and a lawyer had very little good feeling for each other, and the following dialogue took place:—"If," asked the surgeon, a neighbour's dog destroy my ducks, can I recover damages by law?" "Certainly," replied the lawyer; "pray what are the circumstances?" "Why, sir, your dog last night destroyed two of my ducks." "Indeed! then you certainly can recover the damages; what is the amount?" "I'll instantly discharge it." "Four shillings and six-pence," chuckled the surgeon. "And my fee for attending and advising you is six and eight-pence," responded the attorney; "and unless you immediately pay the same, my conduct will be sut-able."

HUMMING-BIRD.—There is a species of humming-bird in the East, trochilus minimus, so very small, that the ladies of those countries in which it is found not unfrequently, on account of the transcendent beauty and splendour of the tiny creature, wear the dead bird for an ear-drop. It feeds almost precisely like insects, on the refined nectar of plants, while on the wing. It has a missile tongue. When captured, this delicately organized little creature expires instantly.

WILLIAM TELL OUTDOING.—In Northern Pennsylvania, some time since, a feat was performed in Ridgebury, Bradford county, which throws that of William Tell in the shade. A man named Lathrop Baldwin, with a rifle, shot an apple from the head of Thomas Fox, at eighteen yards distance, arms length. There was no cap on Fox's head, his hair was combed down smooth, and the apple was a small one. Both were somewhat in their cups.

NO PROOF OF RESPECTABLE CONNECTIONS.—A young woman who was brought before the Boston police, alleged in defence of her respectability, that she was acquainted with all the lawyers in New-York. She was instantly committed for six months.

THE PLANTAGENETS.—Fulke, earl of Anjou, having been guilty of some crime, was enjoined, by way of penance, to go to the Holy Land, and submit to castigation. He acquiesced, habited himself in lowly attire, and as a mark of humility wore a sprig of broom in his cap. The expiation finished, Fulke adopted the name of Plantagenet, not from the Latin name of the broom, Plantago-genista. His descendants continued the name, and many successive nobles of the line of Anjou decorated their helmets with this plant. The arms of Richard I. were two lions combatant. Crest, a planta-genista, or broom-sprig. Upon his great seal a broom-sprig is placed on each side of the throne.

CHARACTER OF A GENTLEMAN.—A lawyer, at a circuit town in Ireland, dropped a ten pound note under the table, while playing cards at the inn. He did not discover his loss until he was going to bed, but then returned immediately. On reaching the room, he was met by the waiter, who said, "I know what you want, sir; you have lost something!" "Yes, I have lost a ten pound note." "Well, sir, I have found it, and here it is." "Thanks, my good land, here is a sovereign for you." "No, sir, I want no reward for being honest; but," looking at him with a knowing grin, "wasn't it lucky that none of the gentlemen found it?"

INGRATITUDE.—When Brennan, the noted highwayman, was arrested in the south of Ireland, curiosity drew numbers to the jail to see the man loaded with irons who had long been a terror to the country. Among others was a banker, whose notes at that time were not held in the highest estimation, who assured the prisoner that he was very glad to see him there at last. Brennan, looking up, replied—"Ah, sir, I did not expect that from you, indeed I did not; for you well know that when all the country refused your notes, I took them."

A FRANK CONFESION.—Dr. Barthiez, a French physician, who effected many wonderful cures, had no faith in his profession. He said that physicians were like blind men with sticks, with which they struck at the patient and his disease; and so much the better for the patient if they hit the malady instead of the patient himself.

WELL-BEING.—"We are in the midst of a revolution," as the man said when he was caught in the fly-wheel of a steamboat.

ORIGINAL TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

A SCHOOL INCIDENT.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE SECOND.

BY THEODORE S. PAY.

A few weeks after this incident, my father asked me to ride with him, which I was often in the habit of doing. It was a pleasant summer afternoon, and we pursued our way down to the ferry-boat that plied between New-York and Hoboken. I never knew nature more peaceful and beautiful, and perhaps the scene from the Bay is as lovely, in its way, as the earth can show.

On landing we rode up a delightful path that led through a thick wood along the shore, commanding magnificent views of the town, river, bay, shipping, and neighbouring country. At length we stopped at a small cottage, the aspect of which charmed me greatly. It was white as snow, and the little columns by the door were intertwined with flowers. A neat garden lay on one side, and a small hot-house appeared to contain some rare plants.

"Is it not a pretty spot?" said my father.

I fully acquiesced, and discovered some anxiety to learn whom we had come to visit.

"Let us enter," said my father.

We did so. If anything could surpass the neatness of the exterior, it was the internal arrangements of this lovely and yet simple abode. There was nothing to be seen costly or elegant; all was plain and unpretending; but the curtains were of a snowy whiteness, the floor and tables clean; and everything arranged with the utmost order. Some pleasing paintings hung against the walls, and were placed on the mantelpiece, and several cases were filled with books. An aged lady of a pleasing appearance, and a young girl—than whom I thought I had never seen any one so beautiful, did the honours of our reception. They seemed to have expected my father, for a table was set out, with a spotless napkin, a large bowl of cream, and some sugared fruits. There was a piano and music-books, and after having partaken of the refreshment, the young girl was requested to try the piano, of which it appeared my father had just made her a present. There was a little air of mystery about all this which I could not fathom. Our beautiful companion complied without hesitation. Her voice was full of music; she had been well taught, and moreover, possessed taste and feeling. She sang some melodies then recently published by Moore, with a simplicity that charmed me. Her air had in it something pensive that awakened sympathy. Her smile was soft and sweet, and left her features sad, and in the melancholy passages of the music, I thought I detected in her manner a feeling as if she were applying the sentiment to herself. I was strongly interested in her, and, on our return, was vehement in expressions of delight.

"They are an interesting family," said my father; "a natural refinement imparts to them the elegance and taste generally derived from education."

"They are not common people, certainly," said I.

"The grandmother is a plain woman, full of good sense," replied my father, "without any of the advantages of cultivation. The young lady has received many advantages. You will be surprised when I tell you who they are, since they seem to have made such a favourable impression upon you. The elderly lady is the grandmother of Mr. Brace, your unfortunate usher. The other is his sister."

"Mr. Brace!" said I. "Mr. Brace! What, that despicable, cruel, stupid pedagogue, are they relations of his?"

"You are a little too fast, my son," said my father. "Mr. Brace, whatever may be his faults, is neither stupid nor a pedagogue. If he has an unfortunate manner, he has a good head and a good heart."

"Mr. Brace!"

"You shall judge for yourself. His father was a southern merchant, originally poor, who amassed a rapid fortune and educated his children as you have seen. Mr. Brace was intended for the bar, and his sister received the accomplishments which her father deemed proper for a lady. A few years ago the father died suddenly and a bankrupt."

"A bankrupt!"

"A bankrupt—leaving his widow, daughter and son, penniless and friendless in a world which, for the orphan, has little charms."

"The orphan?"

Mr. Brace stepped forward for the support of his bereaved family. He had not yet acquired his profession, and had, therefore, no means of gaining a livelihood but labouring as an usher in a school. For a long time he could not succeed even in the sad alternative of getting this species of employment. Mr. Stanley at length heard of him, and understanding his situation, his honesty, and high sense of honour, he engaged him in his establishment. He has found him a faithful and useful aid. His only fault is a too eager zeal in his vocation. It arises from an honourable wish to do his duty. With the salary connected with this situation—he has, for some years, supported his mother and sister in this cottage, whither he repaired, every evening, after the toils of the day, to cheer their minds—to bring them the little comforts of life—and to pursue his studies. He has a taste for botany. The pretty garden is the work of his hands; as are also the paintings, which you admired upon the walls. I am told that it would be impossible to find a more devoted son and affectionate brother. His manner is hard and unapproachable. Perhaps he is wanting in the more light and graceful attributes of character. He cannot sing, or dance—"I thought there was a little irony in the emphasis of these words,"—and he has not, as Odello says, "those soft parts of speech which chamberlains have;" but what then—has he the virtues of a man, and a good one. He performs a duty. He is offering up the truest worship to his Maker. To the heart of that aged mother he is a support—a happiness; to the tender beauty of his sister, he is a protector and a guide. Their prayers ascend for him daily." Tears rolled down my cheeks.

"You are aware, my dear boy," continued my father, "that in consequence of the incident with you, he has lost his place. He has now no means of support, and is living upon the limited savings of his past labours. Mr. Stanley told me, that he had never a better instructor, only for that manner, which prevented his being popular among his boys. He could not retain him in his service after what occurred, 'without injuring the reputation of his establishment.'"

"I am very sorry, sir. I had no idea that any such consequences would or could have followed what I did. I will go down on my knees to him, before the whole school, if Mr. Stanley will take him back."

"No—that would not be proper—I do not admire kneeling on such slight occasions. What is done, is done. I do not attach any particular criminality to your share in it. Mr. Brace, whatever may be his virtues, was certainly to blame; and so is Mr. Stanley, for pursuing such a brutal system of instruction. I allow much for your situation, and do not wish to impair your self-respect. Such collisions are disagreeable, but they may be sometimes necessary. I have given you this insight into the affair, not to humiliate or wound, but to instruct you. I wish you to see how good and evil are linked together—what painful consequences may unexpectedly follow from the indulgence of a momentary impulse—what a dangerous thing it is to go through life without reflection, prudence, moderation, and forbearance. It is not always proper to pursue a course to the extremity, even when you are in the right. I fear you have neglected opportunities to conciliate Mr. Brace; or, that having found yourself in that relation with him, you did not take the most wise and noble course to escape from it."

"What other could I have taken, sir? A blow put an end to my presence of mind. I lost my reason, and if I had held in my hand a pistol, I cannot say but that I should have discharged it. I was scarcely conscious what I did."

"Exactly, but you should never suffer yourself to lose coolness and presence of mind—he who does so, is as bad as a drunkard—and you confess, you might have committed murder."

"What could I, what ought I to have done?"

"Listen—When I was a boy, like yourself, at school, one of my friends was placed in a situation resembling yours. He, like you, had determined never to submit to a blow, and a hot-headed usurer, like Mr. Brace, one day struck him. He was larger than you, and was possessed of sufficient personal strength, to have knocked him down. Instead of doing so, he very calmly said, 'Sir, my respect for these walls, and my unwillingness to afford a bad example, make me bear the indignity which you have inflicted upon me: I have done no wrong, and cannot be disgraced by a punishment which I have never merited; but I shall request my father to remove me from a situation, where I may be to-morrow exposed to a similar injustice.' The usurer was rebuked by his calmness and magnanimity, and frightened by the consciousness that he had been in the wrong. He solicited his forgiveness before all those who had witnessed the insult, and, not only did he never again presume to strike the young hero—for, he has since become known to the world as one—but the custom of corporal punishment, before too prevalent in the school, went almost entirely out of fashion."

"Ah, my dear father, if I had but known this story before—"

"Do not be grieved—life is full of similar dilemmas—you will not long want opportunities of displaying moral courage and self-command, if you possess them.—With them, you may become anything—without them, my son, as you advance in life, you will be betrayed into actions, which will cover you with regret and self-reproach."

SKETCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.

THE STREETS OF NEW-YORK.

BROADWAY—CHATHAM-STREET.

I love the streets of our modern Babel. There is not a foot of the trottoir in Broadway, from its union with the plant carpet of verdure on the Battery, until it skirts the gravel walks of the Park, which is not dear to me, as the dark eyes and shadowy lashes of a houri to the heart of a true Mussulman.

There is poetry in the very flagging of that charming thoroughfare, for hath it not echoed to the tread of her, the very sole of whose slipper was a shrine at which I was a devout worshipper! Discourse not to me of the nooks and solitary places which cluster around the picturesque shores of our inland seas, and majestic rivers, while I can roam along the crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis—a hermit amid the multitude—weaving mine own bright fancies at will—or, if it please me to dally awhile with the thoughtless, or laugh with the merry, or to attune mine with the fashionable—the lamp of Aladdin is mine—præsto-change—and it is gone!

Broadway—dear Broadway! Channel of the gay and serious—the wealthy and the houseless—the clothed in purple, and the half-clad in linsey-woolsey—thy restless current, like the waters of Lethe, rolls onward to oblivion—leaving no trace of the desires and passions, monstrosities and vagaries which run their daily career within thy limits! It is a common truism, uttered alike by citizen and stranger, that there is but one Broadway in America. Other cities have their beautiful promenades and attractive thoroughfares—but he who desires to view human nature in all its varieties—to meet splendour and parade, frivolity and eccentricity, pride and humility mingled, and jostled, and jumbled together, for our moment—and the next separate and distinct—distant as earth from heaven—must visit the Broadway.

From the Bowling Green to Cedar-street, fashionable boarding-houses invite resident and visitor to enjoy their comforts and luxuries. Between Cedar and Canal-streets, shops tastefully adorned meet the eye on either hand. Here are displayed in their most alluring dress the wares of booksellers and music vendors—dealers in silks, satins and laces—importers of toys, carpeting, and annually—of new fashions and perfumers—merchant tailors, hatters, and jewellers: in short, every article which can please the fancy is here daily exposed to the gaze of the curious.

Opposite the Park—Titan-like—rises the Astor House, massive, substantial and imposing—the interior combining all the conveniences and elegancies of a princely hotel—its hundreds of servants marshalled into obedience and system by the admirable tact and skill of the proprietors.

A lounge in the saloon of the Astor, during the hours of arrivals and departures, is a study. Scores of new faces appear as if by enchantment, and dozens of familiar countenances vanish in a breath. The dark-eyed daughter of the south sits by like a beautiful vision, on one hand—the laughing blue-eyed beauty of the west, and the pensive maiden from the east, attract your notice on the other. But all this baffle and activity creates no confusion. Porters, waiters, chambermaids, and bar-keepers, all move harmoniously within their different spheres. Lounging on your ottoman you touch the elastic spring at your elbow, and in a twinkling your wishes are gratified.

The American, on the opposite corner of Barclay-street, attracts your notice—conducted by that favourite of the travelling public, Cozens, whose hotel at West Point was so long the centre of attraction during the seasons of bud, blossom, and fruit. Like the proprietors of the Astor, Cozens is an artist. Possessing a rare tact of giving to his wishes the force of command, he appears ever at your side when his presence is desired. The City-Hotel still continues one of the distinct features of Broadway, and is said to be conducted admirably by its new proprietors—while Washington Hotel, Carlton-House, and the Athenæum above, and Congress-Hall, the Tremont, and Franklin below the Park, still flourish as of old.

If you desire a bird's-eye view of this great thoroughfare at its most attractive point, join me on some sunny afternoon at the American Museum, situated at the junction of Broadway, Chatham Row, and Ann-street. We will pause on the balcony, which communicates with the second floor, and view the living tide rolling its parted current at our feet.

Cast your eyes to the right of the City-Hall, along Chatham-street—that mighty funnel through which the population of the whole north-eastern section of the city is disgorged—and mark the crowd of bakers' and milkmen's carts, drays, coaches, omnibuses, furniture cars, and fruit, vegetable, charcoal, and oyster wagons, which block up the pavement. The motley crowd on the sidewalks are, you perceive, composed of hawkers of penny papers, radishes, loco-foco matches, and pocket combs, crying their wares—mechanics and labourers returning from their daily task—merchants' clerks, assistants, and loungers—merchants and shop-keepers—pick-pockets and light-fingered gentry of more humble pretensions—salots and filles de chambre, together with a miscellaneous rabble, whose whereabouts and occupation remaineth a mystery to all but old Hays and his myrmidons.

Turning to the left, the whole sweep of Broadway, from Trinity Church to Canal-street, is within the scope of your vision. On contemplating its never-ceasing bustle, your first reflection causes you to exclaim—how much like Chatham-street, yet how dissimilar!

The same mass of human beings actuated by like passions, impulses, and desires—yet in outward seeming the very perfections of contrast. Private equipages, the highly polished panels of which flash back the sunbeams, are drawn by animals whose blood and actions might entitle them to a place in the stud of an emperor—while the character handles his gay ribbons with that skill and tact which can alone be reached by a genius in his line. The liveried footman exhibits his slender form to the utmost advantage as it sways gracefully to and fro with the motion of the vehicle, and the study of a month would not qualify a tyro to rival the courteous salute with which he greets his fellows as they pass. Numbers of these beautiful vehicles roll along Broadway in fine weather, and it is pleasant to take note of the fineness of their appointments from the set of the harness—faultless in model and exquisite in finish—to the perfect balance of the body on its elastic springs. But beautiful as is the display of coaches, omnibuses, calvets, chariots, phaetons, barouches, gigs and tilburies, which pass and re-pass on the pavement, the trattori in the great point of attraction. The varieties of fashion of either sex here exhibit their decorations to the admiring gaze of the uninitiated, and he must be fastidious indeed whose taste is not satisfied with any of the varied specimens of apparel which pass in review before him. Were it fair to individualize, I would direct your attention to you modest little maiden in plain satin, leghorn bonnet, and fawn coloured slippers, as my beau idéal of taste and propriety.

It is very obvious, however, by the glance of superiority of the queen-like beauty now passing her, that we are at issue on the question of taste: and I must confess that her beautiful blue eyes and half-parting lips have reversed my decision.

Consider me, therefore, for the next five minutes enlisted in the cause of beauty in laces, flounces, and feathers, while gentlemen with quizzing-glasses at their button-hole, ebony canes and whalebone combs, are the only galleys worthy of ranking as their escort. But the coup d'œil is still more imposing; and the brilliant throng, with their gay dresses, throw the more humble features of the prospect into shadow, until the shifting panorama appears like a moving rainbow.

Chatham, below Pearl-street, is the Lombard-street of the metropolis, where the descendants of the once favoured children of Israel are congregated as pawnbrokers and dealers in second-hand clothing. Chatham square, from time immemorial, has been the paradise of shoe dealers, where "leather and prunella" obviously holds a higher rank than was assigned to them by the Bard of Avon.

I was much amused in passing by the shops of these helpers to the understanding, a few evenings since, to view the ingenious methods they devised to attract custom. On the front of one, the words "no humping" stood in bold relief—while the door of his neighbour was filled by an immense boot, over which the largest specimen of ox horns I ever witnessed spread their ample dimensions as if in triumph.

The floors of these cordwainers are at times covered with hand-bells, illustrating the superiority and cheapness of their wares, while, as if apologetical for the apparent paradox of each selling lower than his neighbour, you are informed in staring capitals that the "nimble sixpence is better than the slow shilling."

After reviewing our city at every point, I am convinced that Chatham-square, on the west side, exhibits a more dense crowd, near the hour of twilight, than any other section; and the force of the current being upwards, it requires no little skill in the pedestrian who successfully attempts a passage in the opposite direction.—Madsoman.

SELECTIONS FROM NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TRAVELS IN ARABIA PETRÆA.

THERE is no portion of the earth's surface, towards which the attention of the civilized world is turned with a deeper interest and curiosity than to that which forms the subject of an attractive work, entitled "Impressions of Travel in Arabia Petrea," by Alexander Dumas, translated from the French by a lady of New York. The author, M. Dumas, is well known as a poet of distinguished genius, and a highly successful dramatic writer. His "Impressions" in this work are conveyed with great liveliness and truth, and there is a vein of buoyant humour running through his descriptions, which gives them a peculiar charm. The translator, who is understood to be Mrs Edward S. Gould, has executed her task with a spirit and ability, which attach to the English edition much of the merit of an original work. It may be said of it, as of Coleridge's Wallenstein, that it is a transference of thoughts and expressions from one language into another rather than a translation of words and idioms. The peculiar humour, and the flashes of poetry, which irradiate the pages of the original, are conveyed with equal and sometimes superior power to the English reader. We have rarely met with a translation, which, while it was so far from being literal, was so faithful and unexceptionable.

The contents of the volume are of a character highly interesting and instructive to the biblical student, and at the same time amusing to those readers, who require the stimulants of romance and novelty to pique their intellectual appetites. The description of Cairo is one of the best and most ample we remember to have seen; and the account of Napoleon's campaign in Egypt furnishes many incidents and facts not generally known. The author's bivouac with the Arabs—his adventures in the Desert—the exploits of Salem, the Robber, who was "supp'd as a serpent, active as a panther, light as a gazelle"—the passage of the Red Sea on foot, without the intervention of a miracle—the wanderings in the "Bewildering Valley"—and the visit to Mount Sinai, are all described with a vivacity and beauty of style which cannot fail to interest.

We subjoin a few extracts from this valuable work, recommending the reader to possess himself of the whole without delay.

THE BATHS OF ALEXANDRIA.

After the mosque, the bath is the finest embellishment of oriental cities. The one to which I was conducted is a vast edifice of simple architecture, and neatly ornamented. At the entrance is a large vestibule, having rooms on the right and left for the reception of cloaks, and, in the rear, a door hermetically closed. Through this door you pass into a room warmer than the surrounding atmosphere, and from this (as I afterwards learned) you may retreat if you choose; but put your foot in one of the adjoining closets, and you are no longer your own master: two attendants seize you, and, for the time, you are the property of the establishment.

Much to my surprise, this was my predicament. I had scarcely entered a closet, when two strong men belonging to the bath laid hold of me, and, in an instant, I was stripped to the skin. One of them passed a linen shawl around my waist, while the other buckled on my feet a pair of gigantic clogs, which at once made me a foot taller. This mode of shoeing not only rendered flight impossible, but, by its clumsy elevation, destroyed my equilibrium; and I should inevitably have fallen, had not the two men supported me on either side. I was fairly caught; I could not retreat, and therefore suffered them to lead whither they would.

We passed into another room. Here, whatever might be my resignation, the vapour and heat stifled me. I thought that my guides had mistaken the way, and trundled me into an oven. I tried to shake them off, but my resistance was anticipated. Besides, I was in no condition for a trial of strength, and was obliged to confess myself vanquished. In a few moments I was astonished at perceiving that, as the perspiration poured from me, my lungs began to dilate, and my respiration returned. In this state I passed through five or six rooms, the heat of which increased so rapidly that I began to believe much had for five thousand years mistaken its proper element, and that his appropriate destiny was boiling or roasting.

At last we came to the furnace. Here the fog was so dense that I could not see two steps before me, and the heat so entirely insupportable that I partly faint. I shut my eyes, and resigned myself to my guides in utter helplessness. After leading, or rather carrying me a few steps further, they took away my girdle, unhooked my blos, and extended me self-swooning, on something like a marble table in the middle of the apartment.

Here, again, I soon became accustomed to the infernal atmosphere. I prudently took advantage of the gradual return of my faculties, and looked about me. With my other senses, my sight revived; and, despite the fog, I made out with tolerable accuracy the surrounding objects. My attendants seemed to have forgotten me for a moment: they were busy at one side of the room. I lay in the centre of a large, square saloon, inclosed, to the height of five or six feet, with variously coloured marbles; a series of spouts threw out four corners of smoking water, which, falling, on the pavement beneath, glided down into four basins, like cauldrons, at the four corners of the room. On the surface of the water these basins was an indefinite number of bald heads bobbing about, and expressing, by the most grotesque contortions of face, various degrees of felicity. This spectacle so occupied my attention, that I scarcely heeded the return of my masters. They came, however; one with a large wooden bowl of soap-suds, the other with a ball of fine hemp. Suddenly one of the rescues inundated my face and neck with his suds; and the other, seizing me by the shoulder, rubbed most furiously my face and breast with his hemp. This treatment and the pain induced by it were so perfectly intolerable, that all my powers of resistance and resentment awakened at once. I bolted upright, kicked my hempen friend half across the room, and planted my fist in the face of soap-suds with such good will that he lay sprawling on the floor. Then, knowing of no other remedy for the soap, (which was blistering my skin), I drew a straight line for the basin that seemed the most inhabited, and boldly plunged in. I had misjudged. The remedy was worse than the disease. Before my face and neck were scalded: now, my whole body was scalded: the water was boiling! I yelled with pain; sprang on and over my neighbours, who could not comprehend my case; and got out of the tub almost as rapidly as I got in. However, I was not rapid enough to escape the effect of the ablution: my body was as red as a lobster. I was stupefied! I must be dreaming, or riding a nightmare. Yet there was no deception. Here, under my very eyes, were men stewing in a broth of which I had tried the temperature, who evidently took great delight in the operation. What could it mean? My notions of pleasure and pain became confused: they could enjoy what to me was agony! I once more resolved to resign myself to fate. I doubted my own judgment, but I distrusted my own senses. I determined, again, to submit to my tormentors. They came, having recovered from my assault. I followed them without resistance to another basin. They made signs to me to descend the steps: I obeyed, and found myself in water of about thirty-five or forty degrees according to the scale of Celsius, forty of which correspond to one hundred and twenty degrees of Fahrenheit. This seemed to me temperate.

From this I passed to another of a higher temperature, but still supportable. I remained in it, as in the first, about three minutes. I then proceeded to the third, which was still some ten or twelve degrees hotter; and, finally, reached the fourth, where I had commenced my belated apprenticeship. I approached it with the greatest repugnance, but I had made up my mind to go through with my desperate adventure. I first dipped my toe in the water: it was hot, certainly; but not so scalding as before. I gradually immersed my whole body, and was surprised to find it endurable. In a few seconds I thought no more of it, though I am confident the heat of the water must have reached to my forty or sixty-five degrees. When I emerged, my skin had changed from the lobster scarlet to a crimson.

My attendants now again took me in hand. They replaced the linen around my waist, bound a shawl on my head, and led me back through the rooms by which I had entered (taking care to add to my covering at each change of atmosphere) until I arrived at the chamber where I was so unceremoniously stripped. Here I found a good carpet and pillow. My turban and girdle were taken off; I was enveloped in a large woollen gown, and left alone.

I had now an undefeatable feeling of comfort. I was perfectly happy; yet so exhausted, that when the door was opened, half an hour after, I had not changed my position by the movement of a finger or a muscle.

The new comers was a sinewy and well-set Arab. He approached my couch as if he had some business with me. I looked on him with a sort of dread very natural to a man who had passed such an ordeal as I have described; but I was too weak to attempt to rise. He took my left-hand; cracked all his joints, and did the same to the right. After my hands, he administered upon my feet and knees; and, to finish the matter, he dexterously threw me into the position of a pigeon-toe-be-broiled, and gave me the coup de grâce by cracking the vertebrae of my spine. I screamed with terror, thinking my back-bone was broken, to a certainty. My masseur then kneaded my arms, legs and thighs for a quarter of an hour, and left me I was weaker than ever: my joints were stiff, and I had not strength sufficient to cover myself with the carpet.

A servant now brought me coffee, pastilles, and a pipe; and left me to intoxicate myself with perfume and tobacco. I passed half an hour in a drowsy state, lost in the vagaries of a delicious inebri-ation, experiencing a feeling of happiness before unknown, and entertaining a supreme indifference to every (absent) earthly thing.

I was awakened from this by a barber, who shaved me, and combed my whiskers and moustaches. Next, my Arab returned, to whom I made signs that I wished to depart. He brought my clothes, assisted me in my toilet, and led me to the chamber opening on the vestibule, where I found my cloak. The cost of this entertainment, was a piastre and a half, or about ten cents.

CARAVANS IN THE DESERT.

Once set in motion, nothing arrests the progress of the caravan. Necessity urges them forward, for the two demons of the desert, hunger and thirst, are behind them. As long as the day lasts, they speed onward, like waves before a tempest. The sick fall, and none pause to help them. Mothers, who have not strength to carry their children, lie down beside them. The hyenas and jackals follow the caravan, as the wolves followed Attila's army. Each evening they halt at an old encamping ground, early recognized from the heaps of bones, left by their predecessors; and each morning they depart, leaving a new supply of bones to replenish the monument for future guidance. After a march, or rather a race, of eight days, the remnant of this host armies, diminished in its numbers one third or one half, at Korti; where again falling in with the Nile, they pursue its course without interruption, and in great comparative comfort, to Cairo. Sometimes it occurs that during the eight days in the desert the simoon arises, and shakes its wings of fire over the devoted host. Then soldiers and slaves disappear in the Nubian sands, as did the army of Cambyses in the wilderness of Ammon. The pasha waits impatiently for the return of his army with the captives: time rolls on; he makes search for them; but no trace can be found—not even a rumour can be heard: conjecture alone may appraise him that the bones of his troops and his victims are bleaching in the trackless wastes of the desert. I know not if these details will make an impression on any who may chance to read them in the midst of a city, and by their own firesides; but I do know, that when one is in the desert, suffering heat, hunger and thirst—when he sees those waves of sand undulating on the horizon, which the breath of the kamseem may the next moment cause to roll over him—when he hears the wild concert of hyenas and jackals—these details will depress him with a mighty and solemn power. For my own part, this was one of the most meditative nights of my life. Happily, we had the expectation of arriving at Suai on the following day; and this fact was a balm for fatigue, a panacea for woe.

ROMANCE OF THE HAREM.

We have read Miss Pardee's last new work, under this title, with much interest. Like all the writings of that lady, it abounds in beautiful thoughts and pleasant fancies. We take the following poetical gems from the volumes before us.

THE RAIN-DROP.

There was a bright and sunny sky
Sprung over a laughing land;
But one small vapour was floating by
Where the wild wave kissed the strand;
As it passed o'er the ocean-swell,
A rain-drop from the dark cloud fell
"Alas!" the limpid moisture sigh'd,
As it claved the yielding air!
"And must I perish in that tide,
And die unregarded there!
Hard is my fate to be thus given
From my glorious place and the vault of heaven!"
Down, down it fell; but ere the tide
Touched the bright sand of the shore,
An oyster that thirsted, open'd wide
Its pearl-encrusted door;
And by the soft-breathing of the air,
The limpid drop was wafted there.
Time pass'd—then a fisher came,
And from that oyster drew
A precious prize, whose wondrous fame
Through many a region drew;
The rain-drop had become a gem,
To deck a monarch's diadem!

THE HEART'S FREEDOM.

Oh! the heart is a free and a fearless thing;
A wave of the ocean! a bird on the wing!
A riderless steed o'er the desert-plain bounding,
A peal of the storm o'er the valley resounding:
It spurns at all bonds, and it mocks the decree
Of the world and its proud ones, and dares to be free!
Oh! the heart may be tamed by a smile or a tone
From the lip and the eye of a beautiful one;
But the frown and the force with its impulse contending,
Ever find it as adamant, cold and unbending.
It may break, it may burst, but its tyrants will see
That even in ruin it dares to be free!

JOY.

Joy is a bird!
Catch it as it springs;
It will return no more
When once it spreads its wings
Its song is gay, but brief
The voice of sunny weather;
But, ah! the bird and leaf
Vanish both together!
Joy is a flower!
Pluck it in its bloom;
'Twill close its petals up
If darker skies should gloom.
It is a love, a love, a love
And formed for sunny weather;
But, ah! the flower and spring
Vanish both together!
Joy is a child!
Sense it with its mirth;
For soon its lip will know
The withering touch of earth.
The eye is bright as truth,
A type of sunny weather;
But, ah! the smile and youth
Vanish both together!

MISCELLANEOUS EXTRACTS.

ORIGIN OF FEMALE NAMES.

We shall have the pleasure, in this paper, of informing those of our fair friends who hear names derived from the German tongue, and others in modern use, what is the signification of their various appellations; a piece of information, which, unless specially given to philological studies, they are not likely to acquire. Those over whom the words Adeline or Adeline have been pronounced at the font, are, etymologically speaking, princesses, such being the interpretation of these German terms. They are beautiful names. If the preceding names be of regal strain, Alice or Alisia is of the poeage, signifying noble; and a sweet name it is, for the bride of honor or burgess. Amelia, changed into Emily or Amy, is of French origin, and has the meaning of beloved. Amy Robert rises at once to the mind in its search for individuals who have graced these appellations. It would be almost a relief to the feelings to think the sad story of Amy Robsart a fiction, but almost all our historians admit her death was occasioned by a fall from a staircase, the result of a cruel plot on the part of her ambitious husband. Julius Mickle's ballad, beginning thus beautifully—

"The dews of summer night did fall,
The moon, the radiant orb of day,
Sulver'd the walls of Cambrall hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby."

amply shows the general belief that the people dwelling in the neighborhood of the scene of the tragedy. So that Amy is justly to be held a name hallowed by benevolent associations. Blanche is one of the loveliest of female names. It is from the French, and signifies white or fair, which is also the meaning of Bianca, the Italian form of Blanche. It would be decidedly a pleasure to the ear to have such a name as Blanche in more common use, and we would beg to hint to fair womankind that it is a matter of no light importance to them to best agreeable names of this sort. Men may not absolutely marry on the mere score of names, yet it must be no trifling pleasure to have it in one's power to sound such a name as Blanche in chamber or lobby of one's wedded home, when any matter requires the joint conjugal consideration. Brigitte is one of the few Irish names in use among us. It signifies bright or shining bright, and is a very distant name of the Deborah order, applicable with much propriety to good old housekeepers or buxom dairy-maids. Charlotte is the feminine of Charles, and has the same meaning as that formerly mentioned, valiant-spirited, or prevaling, which last character is applicable, we have no doubt, to many fair Charlottes, wedded and unwedded. Charlotte Corday, a young French girl, who freed her country from a woman named the Marquis, dishonour to this name. Caroline, also, is a feminine form of the word Charles, or rather of its Latinised name, Carolus, and has the same signification, of course, as Charlotte. Both of these are common female names, and are not undeserving of being so. Edith and Eleanor are from the Saxon, and signifying respectively happy and all-fair. The original name of Edith was Eadith or Eadil, and the name of the name, nearly the same as the latter of these, was the baptismal appellation of Byrón's child,

"Ada, sole daughter of my house and best."

Emma is generally understood to be from the German word signifying a nurse, or a good nurse. Imma was the form in which the name was borne by Charlemagne's daughter, a lady who distinguished herself by a remarkable proof of affection for her lover Eginhard, the emperor's secretary. This attached pair not daring to meet openly, on account of the comparative meanness of the lover's rank, held their interviews in the princess's apartments. While they were there together one night, a fall of snow came on, and left the ground covered. This was only found out by the lovers when they were about to part, and caused them great alarm. Eginhard had to cross a courtyard, and his footsteps in the snow would have betrayed his visit. In the confusion, the princess Imma took to her heels, and her lover carried him across the court, knowing that her own footsteps would excite neither remark nor suspicion. But it chanced that Charlemagne had risen from his couch that night, and opened his window, which overlooked the same court, and which permitted him to see, by the moonlight, the stratagem to which love had driven his daughter. The emperor at once admitted his lover and was engaged at the whole circumstance, but he suppressed his ire until sometime afterwards, when he laid the matter before his council, and asked their advice. Opinions were divided on the point, and Charlemagne adopted the lenient course. He gave the hand of Imma to her lover. Such is the story of the first person in history whom we find to bear the name of Imma or Emma. Frances is a very agreeable name, the feminine of Francis, and has the like meaning of frank or free. Gertrude, also from the German, signifies all truth. Gertrude must ever be associated in our minds with the image of young, gentle, beautiful, trusting woman, because such was the character of her of Wyoming, who was

"The love of Pennsylvania's shore."

Harriet and Henrietta, since Henry, the corresponding male name, signifies rich lord, may be held to signify rich lady, a meaning not unworthy of the names. Margaret is from the Syriac (some say Hebrew), and has the sense of magnificent. Around this name, circumstances, that oblivion cannot touch, have thrown sad yet sweet recollections. Its more common form is Madelina or Madeleine, than which nothing can be more pleasant to the ear or eye. Melcent or Milicent is a name sweet as honey, and honey-sweet is indeed its interpretation in the most literal sense. Even in the restricted state of Milly, there is a degree of mellifluousness about this term. Rosalie might be adopted into familiar family use with much propriety. It is immediately from the Italian Rosabella, which signifies a fair rose. Tabitha is a name which was not once uncommon in Britain, but somehow or other it has been assigned over from the human to the feline race. Taddy is a cat, and nothing but a cat. The term is from the Syriac, and signifies a rose, a very different animal, indeed, from puss. The famous sister of Matthew Bramble, in Smollett's Humphrey Clinker, d.d. much to make old maids shivers with puss in the use of Tabitha in all time coming. In the same novel occurs the name of Winifred, which signifies winning peace. The famous queen of Northumberland, so contrived the escape of her doomed husband from the Tower of London, was a Winifred, and a bright honour to the name. A sainted lady of Wales, however, was a much more wonderful Winifred. Hear the illustrious Pennant on this subject.

"In the seventh century there lived a virgin of the name of Winifred, of noble parents, and niece to St. Beuno. Beuno, after building a church and founding a convent in Carnarvon, visited his relations in Flintshire, and, obtaining from his brother-in-law a little spot at the foot of a hill where he resided, erected on it a church, and took under his care his niece Winifred. After a time, a neighbouring prince of the name of Cradoch, was struck with her beauty, and at all events determined to possess her. He made known his passion to the lady, who, affected with honour, attempted to escape. The wretch, enraged at the disappointment, instantly pursued her, drew out his sabre, and cut off her head. Cradoch received on the spot the reward of his crime; he fell down dead, and the earth swallowed up his impious corpse."

"The severed head of Winifred," continues the legend, "took its way down the hill, and stopped near the church. The valley, which from its uncommon dryness, heretofore received the name of Sych naist, indicative in Welsh, of that circumstance, now lost its name. A spring of uncommon size burst from the place where the head rested. The moss on its sides diffused a fragrant smell. Her blood spotted the stones, which, like the flowers of Adonis, annually commemorate the fact, by assuming colours unknown to them at other times. St. Beuno took up the head of his niece, carried it to her corpse, and, offering up his devotions, joined it nicely to the body, which instantly re-united. The place was visible only by a slender white line encircling her neck, in memory of a miracle far surpassing that worked by St. Dionysius, who marched many miles after despatching with his head in his hands. St. Winifred survived her decollation fifteen years."

The honour in which the heroine of this legend was held, is testified by the remains of a beautiful polygonal well, covered with a rich arch, and supported by pillars, which still exist on the spot where the miraculous stream gushed forth. The ruins of a beautiful chapel of Gothic architecture are also visible there. The whole legend is carried on the wall. Such is the true history of the most famous of the Winifreds.

We have reached the close of our list, or rather lists, and yet we find that some names, not unworthy of being noticed, have been omitted, chiefly because they do not belong to any of the before-mentioned divisions, being in part, at least, the creation of fancy. Shakespeare and other great poets seem to have been successful in the invention of names, as on other points to which they applied their imagination. We do not know that Rosalind was of Shakespeare's invention, but, whether it was so or not, it sounds in our ears as one of the very sweetest of names, and we would humbly recommend its general adoption.

"From the east to western land,
No jewel is like Rosalind."

The first part of the name is evidently from the Latin rosa, a rose, like Rosamunda, but the ind is most probably a termination appended for mere euphony. Shakespeare's Viola, too (a violet), is worthy of all acceptance. The name, under the form of Violet, is not uncommon among us. And then Miranda, which signifies to be admired, as is expressed in the exclamation of Prince Ferdinand, when he first hears it,

"Admired Miranda! indeed the top of admiration!"

Perdita, which signifies the lost, or a foundling, is no whit inferior to the preceding; and the same may be said of Cordelia, which has the meaning of cordial, or hearty. But of all Shakespeare's names, one, which he in all probability invented, and which has no meaning that we are aware of, is perhaps the most beautiful. This is Imogen. Why should appellations like these be unused, when the changes are rung upon a limited number of names of far inferior beauty, till absolute confusion is created in families and nations? Why should the Estrine of Ben Jonson, with the meaning of spring or vernal, or why should the of Spenser, which signifies the only one, be laid aside and forgotten? Let the ancient stores be drawn upon, and let us have the pleasure of at least uttering a musical sound every time we speak to each other. We say this, half-jestingly, half-seriously; jestingly, because we fear that others may be disposed to look upon the matter in a jesting light; and, seriously, because we really think that too little care is usually exercised in the selection of names, and because to pass by beautiful names for others every way inferior, seems to us something like wearing coarse garments when fine ones are at our command. The long lists which we have now given out at least in the power of those who feel desirous of so doing, to exert a choice in this matter for the benefit of their yet nameless posterity.—Edinburgh Journal.

"Heavenly Una with her milk-white lamb"

THE QUEEN AND THE LIONS.

We had the good fortune (having fallen asleep during the performance) to be in the theatre at Drury, when her majesty witnessed the feeding of the lions on the stage, after the audience had been let out. A plausive side-scene, placed just before our side-box, intercepted our view for some time, but at length we got a sight of the royal party. The following is all we can recollect of the conversation which took place:

"Don't you feel very much afraid sometimes when you've got your head in the lion's mouth, Mr. Van Amburgh?" said a thin clear voice; "and is it true that, if the lion wags his tail, he is sure to bite your head off?" "Van Amburgh" aggravated his voice to such a submissive whisper that I could not hear what he said in reply. He did not seem half so independent as his beasts, who were roaring away, and clawing at their bars, and lashing their tails like the surges of the ocean.

"Dear, dear, what a sweet pretty leopard!" said the same pretty voice; "and so playful too. Well, I should like to have one of your leopards, Mr. Van Amburgh. Cousin All should feed it. What a delightful romp I could have with it! Mais gardez vous, Madame la Bèronne"—and then there was a loud scream and clear laugh. "Well, I couldn't have thought that the creatures was so fierce!" Oh! the dreadful brute. I dare say he would almost attack me if I went near the bars."

"Do you think, Mr. Van Amburgh," said the young lady again, "you could take another lamb in as safely as you did that one to-night. Here is one who would like very much to try the experiment." And she laid hold of the lapel of the coat of an elderly gentleman standing by, and pushed him slightly towards the bars, saying to him, "Do now, there's a good, kind man. It would be such fun." The elderly gentleman did not appear to think so. He jumped back with such agility, that, if the curtain had not been down, he must have fallen into the orchestra, and, as it was, he only saved himself by a very decided clutch of the bit of green baize. Such a laugh! Such a clear, ringing laugh, I never heard."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

MY JOURNEY FROM HAVRE TO PARIS.

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE PIRE, D. D.

To Paris! hence to Paris! 'Tis the hour.
See! on the ancient church-tower points the clock,
And warns me 'tis the hour to hurry hence.
My baggage, on the brawny shoulders borne
Of a gaunt porter, chattering as he goes,
Precedes me, through the mud of narrow streets;
Sometimes impeded by the heavy cart;
Sometimes by asses, bearing on their backs
Panniers of figs, or of fruit, for sale;
Sometimes by women, browned and wrinkled things,
Crying their fish, and treading the hard stones
With clattering sabots;—through them all we pass'd,
Not without fierce contention, and a war
Of noisy words, and desultory oaths.
We reach the "Place"—'tis that of Notre Dame.
The diligence, a huge, unwieldy bulk,
Stands ready:—on its top are piled,
As on a wagon, baggage of all kinds—
Mine, with the rest, is thrown upon the heap;
And leather covering, clasped with straps around,
And roughly buckled, makes them fast and safe.
My porter grasps my hand—(and money too!)
Doffs his bonnet, and bids me "bon voyage."

Say, reader, has it ever been thy fate
To take thy seat in a French diligence?
Thou hast beheld, in sooth, a marvellous scene!
The driver, in his magisterial strut,
Cracking his whip, and talking to his beasts.
The conducteur, a liveried gentleman,
With medal on his breast, and well-glazed boots
Clasping his very thighs:—he calls the names,
And gives, with dictatorial mien, his place
To every voyageur.—The aristocrat,
With thick mustaches and a bearded chin,
Ascends the coupé—the interior
Is made for people of a lower grade!
And the roté, for whom?—for the canaille!

But on!—The driver quickly mounts the box;
The conducteur more slowly follows—crack!
The loud lash snaps—the horses gallop off—
The heavy wheels tear up the very stones,
And like a whirlwind through the alleys sweep,
And through the streets—and dashing through the gates,
Thunder, in freedom, on the open roads:

'Tis night—a hundred villages are pass'd—
And my companions, with their heads encoined
In tasselled caps, conveniently snore!
I slumber not—oh! would my eyes could close
Their heavy lids in peace! and would my mind,
So pained with thinking, could forget, in sleep,
The sorrows—

But, a vague gloomy thoughts!
Romen is here—beneath the midnight shades,
Her vast cathedral, reared in gothic times,
And all her modern buildings are involved;
And if a lamp, suspended in the streets,
Sheds, ever and anon, a doubtful ray,
It scarce can flicker through the foggy night.

We snatch a brief repast—so brief, in truth,
That, ere 'tis ended, hark! the conducteur
Summons the travellers to take their seats.
We rush in dark confusion—and again
The horses, driven to their utmost speed,
Their heavy flight commence;—the silent streets
Beneath their hollow hoofs re-echo loud,
And widely on, no more to pause again,
(Save to renew the cattle,) is our course;—
Till Paris, basking in the noon-day sun,
Opens her welcome gates—along the streets,
With flourishing of horn, and headlong speed,
We thunder, dashing from our wheels the mud,
Until, amid a thousand looks on,
Notre Dame des Victoires marks our journey's end!

NATURAL RELIGION.

Come quietly away with me, and we will walk up and down the narrow path, by the sweet-briar hedge; and we will listen to the low song of the blackbird, and the fresh air will cool our aching brows, and we shall find comfort. To these things, fresh air and the bird's song, and the fragrance of the lovely flowers, God has given a blessing; like sleep, they are his medicines—"balm of sweet minds." We will walk to and fro under the shade of those elms, and we will be calm; bitter recollections shall be made sweet by the thought of his mercies; and in the midst of the sorrows we have in our hearts, his comforts shall refresh our souls; and our minds shall be stored with many thoughts, sweet, like the perfume of these flowers.

CHEERFULNESS.

David Hume declared he would rather possess a cheerful disposition, inclined always to look on the bright side, than, with a gloomy mind, be master of an estate of ten thousand a-year.

STANZAS.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

I.

Or what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff?
From the May-day pastime shrinking,
He shares not the merry laugh.
But the tears of the old man flow,
As he looks on the young and gay;
And his gray head moving slow,
Keeps time to the air they play.
The elders around are drinking,
But not one cup will he quaff;
Oh of what is the old man thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff?

'Tis not with a vein repining
That the old man sheds a tear,
'Tis not for his strength declining—
He sighs not to linger here.
There's a spell in the air they play,
And the old man's eyes are dim,
For it calls up a past May-day,
And the dear friends lost to him.
From the scene before him shrinking,
From the dance and the merry laugh,
Of their calm repose he is thinking,
As he leans on his oaken staff.

II.

Go and forget that we have met,
Go to the friends dearest to thee;
Loved as thou art, freely depart,
When far away think not of me.
Others more fair will receive thee;
Garlands like mine they will weave thee;
Smile and deceive, they will believe,
E'en as I used to believe thee.

Though my tears flow bidding thee go,
More should I weep wert thou to stay;
Better at once all hope renounce,
Than see thee change day after day.
Go—I will never accuse thee;
Seek her whose smile will amuse thee;
She in her turn too soon may learn
What I endure thus to lose thee.

III.

I saw her on the vessel's deck,
A young and blooming bride;
Her heart's first love, her wedded lord,
Was standing at her side:
And gazing on the friends of youth,
Perchance her eyes were dim;
But, smiling through her tears she said,
I give up all for him."

Oh! long had those two beings loved,
Exchanging vows of truth;
How sad it is when sorrow steins
The happy page of youth!
When fortune smiled, her promised store
Lay in a foreign land;
But danger had no fears for them,
Encountered hand in hand.

Again she sought her native shore,
Ere two brief years were gone;
Her hand no gentle pressure felt,
She paced the deck alone!
To weep upon a mother's breast,
Again she cross'd the wave;
And, self-reproach, in secret mourns
Desertion of his grave.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE FRENCH.

APPEARANCES ARE DECEITFUL.

A PROVERB.—IN ONE ACT AND TWO TABLEAUX.

FIRST TABLEAU.

(The stage represents a lady's elegant sleeping apartment. The orchestra expresses that the noises of the city are gradually dying away. As the curtain rises, the clock of a distant church strikes.)

Persons.—PAULINE, Countess de Lusy.—AGATHE, her femme-de-chambre.—A MAGISTRATE.—ARTHUR DE MONTREUIL, his nephew.—VERDIER, royal counsellor.—A VALET.—A DOOR-KEEPER.

SCENE I.

Agathe.—(Is reading in an easy-chair by the fire—when the clock ceases striking, she rises.)—Past twelve o'clock! and madame, who is always so domestic, not back from the ball yet! I listen, and listen—always hope every moment to hear the coachman calling out to the porter, "Door, if you please!"—(A distant hoarse voice cries, "Door, if you please!") Ah, this time, I was not mistaken; it is the countess, let us light her up.

SCENE II.

Countess.—My poor Agathe, I am actually dying of ennui!
Agathe.—Madame la Comtesse seems fatigued; will she retire to bed at once?

Countess.—No, I am not sleepy. When one comes home from a ball, the mind is the only thing dull, but the body is always restless. What a scene of idle noise, of empty talk, of profitless activity! Eyes full of dust, a void in the soul, and a brain still beating with the silly tune of a quadrille, that keeps sleep a thousand miles off. This is what we bring home with us from a ball. Give me my peignoir, and my writing materials.

Agathe.—What, madam, to-night!

Countess.—Ah, Agathe! why did I not stay at home, like you, by a comfortable fire, wrapped up warm, to finish the novel I began this morning!

Agathe.—I, madam! I am sure I would never think—but you, madam, who are young, lovely, and rich, how is it that you ever suffer ennui to approach you!

Countess.—For me, life has not yet fairly begun. I have been married once, and am about to be a second time—as they say, at least—and my reason and my heart have been consulted as little the second time as the first. My first lord and master was a young man, who loved nothing but himself. He spent our two fortunes so fast, and so completely, that my poor father was forced to take to hard work again, to leave me a second one. Yet this lately wealth, he owed, as he often told me, chiefly to a large loan his brother had made him, and his dying wish was, that to pay off the debt, I should marry my cousin; my cousin Verrier, you know.

Agathe.—I know him, perfectly well, I think.

Countess.—I have now been a widow two years; but the settlement of my estate has been slow, and my cousin seems to think it prudent to wait awhile. He seems too determined not to marry me without an inventory of all my property, real and personal. I have a thousand times wished I might lose this fortune, so as to be free from him. But no, a week ago, everything was finally decided in my favour.

Agathe.—Does not your cousin know it yet!

Countess.—He has a great deal to do—he is counsellor at Versailles. Besides, this cause was decided at once, contrary to all usage, when I little hoped for success; was little prepared for it; so that I was forced, as it were, to receive a large amount of money unconsciously, and to be rich in spite of myself. My cousin will be delighted to hear it, for he loves me, I suppose.

Agathe.—I suppose he prefers the pretty fortune to the pretty widow. Why does he come here so seldom!

Countess.—He is a royal counsellor, as I told you; in the meantime, Agathe, I am ennuyée, in town and country; at home and abroad. Nothing will do me good but solitude. I have as yet seen nothing in this world to satisfy my previous ideas of it. I am like the child that says, "is this all!" and then sits down to cry. I hear people talk of illusions, deceptions, of unexpected results, why is it then that nothing happens to me but events known beforehand, and commonplace sensations! They say, for instance—draw the table closer—that there are beings nobly extravagant, that is to say, something out of the common order; audacious spirits, heroes, phantom-shapes. You pull my hair. They say that, to one, the devil dictates his memoirs; that a poor Scotch girl had a familiar spirit by her hearth that was in love with her; why, then, am I thus alone in the world, here in the Rue Saintonge, in the Maraie!

Agathe.—Take care, madam, and don't speak so loud; or the geni of the ward may plunge us into some strange adventure.

Countess.—Oh no! everything about me is known and arranged beforehand, and provokingly reasonable.

Agathe.—Have you, then, forgotten that young cavalier whom you adore, without even having scented him, whom you first saw at Versailles, and who has since so often crossed your path, in the depths of the Bois de Boulogne, or under the green oaks of Barrege!

Countess.—I sometimes think of him, but I fear he exists only in my imagination. I do not know what his name is; he met me—where, I really cannot say—and I have been foolish enough to take this fancy for a reality. To be candid, I long for money, to save that which is not, and, as Rousseau says, "the land of Chimeras is the only one fit to live in." But go to sleep, and may your slumber be free from idle dreams.—(She quits the room.)—Alas the day! I must set to work and write; better now than to-morrow, since it is on business. It is time I invited my grave cousin to come back from Versailles. Well, well, since I owe him myself in payment of my father's debts, it is just as well to deliver up the bride and the dowry as speedily as possible. I shall, at any rate, be free from the danger of watching both of them. The dowry! when I reflect that almost the whole of it is here in my possession, here, in this little secretary, I begin to grow uneasy. A woman, sole guardian of a portfolio, with five hundred thousand francs! If it was known, would I be safe! Five hundred thousand francs, in this money-getting age! It would be a troublesome charge, even for a banker; how much more so, then, for a widow, with only a few servants around her, at the end of this vast, solitary hotel! Well, well, I must make up my mind to take a husband—husbands understand how to take good care of their money. I noticed this evening the wife of our neighbour, the rich banker; he leaves her exposed alone to all the attacks of amorous glances and soft speeches; but he takes good care to have his darling ducats under lock and key. So I'll e'en write at once.

"You must know then, my dear cousin."—(The door behind her opens gently.)—Eh! is that you again, Agathe! What have you forgotten? oh! Why don't you answer!—(The lamp goes almost out.)—Oh heavens; a man! a stranger!

SCENE III.

(The Stranger is elegantly dressed and muffled in a cloak. He wears white gloves; on entering, he cuts the bell-rope, and lowers the lamp.)

The Stranger.—Make no noise, madam, I beg of you.

Countess.—Who are you, sir? I do not know you!

The Stranger.—Don't be alarmed.—(The Countess tries to gain the door; she is led back to her seat with the greatest politeness.)—Do pray be good enough not to try to alarm your servants; the first scoundrel that enters here, is a dead man.

Countess.—I am choking.

The Stranger.—I have not come to offer you any violence, madam, and—(laying a pair of pistols on the table)—I should be deeply grieved at causing you any uneasiness.—(The Countess runs to another bell; the rope comes off in her hand.)—Don't be alarmed, I repeat; and give me, too, an instant to recollect myself, for it is impossible to approach so much beauty without agitation.

Countess.—What is your object, sir?—I do not come near me!

The Stranger.—Your figure makes apprehensions of that kind very intelligible, madam, but your chaste fears are groundless.

Countess.—Oh, fool that I was! I thought of spirits.—(Aloud)—Then, sir, you are a th—

The Stranger.—Oh fie, no! I have some engagements to fulfil, madam, some obligations that you would regard as sacred, if it was in my power to state them to you, and I really must honour them.

Countess.—I do not understand you, sir!

The Stranger.—I have not been fortunate in my late speculations at the Stock Exchange. Still I feel great confidence in my talent for business. I have hit on a scheme that cannot fail to succeed, and I come to inform you, that you are admitted into partnership with me, and to beg you to lend me five hundred thousand francs.

Countess.—I have not got it, sir.

The Stranger.—Excuse me, you have. You have even something more, but that small amount is all I want. There it is, in your secretary, at the bottom of the second drawer to the left, in a Russia-leather portfolio.

Countess.—But, sir—

The Stranger.—Trust me with the key, if you please. We two together shall make excellent operations. My word for it, you will have no reason to regret having taken a few shares in my project. I am a business man. I work fifteen hours a day, and hardly ever sleep.

Countess.—(Arde.)—If I could only see his face!

The Stranger.—The key, if you please! I might of course, if I thought proper, open this pretty piece of furniture, which evidently came from Versailles, without your aid; but I should be sorry to damage it any, and I am sure you do not wish to be disobliging to me. Besides, who would wish to play the master and order, when it is so sweet to obtain! Come, the key!

Countess.—I really don't know where I have put it, sir. I am getting distracted!

The Stranger.—Perhaps it is one of those I see in that glass bowl, yonder!

Countess.—(Stretching out her hand to prevent him.)—But, sir!

The Stranger.—(Stretching out his hand towards his pistols.)—But, madam—

Countess.—(In a choking voice.)—The smallest one.

The Stranger.—Very well. Who can doubt of success, when you are interested in the undertaking!

Countess.—Upon my word, he is gallant withal! Quite the manners of the faubourg St. Germain!

The Stranger.—You see I do not disturb the money I find in the drawer. This is devoted to family expenses. God forbid that I should wish to entrench on the elegance of your table, or on the wages of your servants.—(The countess raises the lamp.)—Ah! pray excuse me, (lowering it again,) my sight is very feeble! I find too strong a light injurious to me. This purse of pearl contains four napoleons; they are set apart for madame's toilet; this is her private budget, the sinking fund destined to pay her debts at cards, and I therefore respect it, although it would be much more in the fashion to invest this money in shares in some one of the many inventions that just at present give new life and energy to French industry.

Countess.—You really seem, sir, to be quite at home in all kinds of business operations.

The Stranger.—I should be behind the age, if I were not, madam.

Countess.—Odious rascal!

The Stranger.—What did you please to observe? Ah! here is the portfolio we were looking for. Observe that I take only what is absolutely indispensably necessary for the success of our little joint-undertaking; five small packages, holding each a hundred pieces of bank-note paper. I will make a memorandum at once of the amount of capital paid in by you. The employment of the funds shall be determined by mutual agreement; and the dividends equally shared between the two partners.

Countess.—Oh heavens, if I could only be relieved!

The Stranger.—Now, madam, your politeness deserves a return; and I hand you first the key of your secretary; secondly, that which enabled me to reach your apartment. Have an eye to your porter.

Countess.—How!

The Stranger.—But now, as I was coming in, he asked me where I was going, and the following conversation took place between us:—"But, sir, madame is alone." "I know it." "In bed, perhaps." "So much the better." "She is asleep." "I hope not." I then showed this unprincipled dog of a porter my key, slipped a piece of gold in his hand, and he is now watching in his box waiting discreetly till I get out of the house before he shuts the great gate. If I was in your place, I would turn him off to-morrow.

Countess.—So then, sir, you have stolen my reputation, too! (Aside.)—The bell on the left has escaped him. If I could only have the wretch arrested! Let me keep cool.

The Stranger.—And now, madam, it would, I suppose, be proper for me to retire? I know that you would be delighted to be rid of my presence, but I really cannot leave you yet.

Countess.—How, sir?

The Stranger.—Once for all, do not be alarmed. I am not guilty of such bad taste as to suppose that any hope of success with the ladies can be founded on alarming their fears; but I really must remain long enough to render probable the motive for my visit, which I had the honour to suggest to your porter.

Countess.—I am ruined!

The Stranger.—Oh, by no means! Everything will come to the light, one of these days, and you will be fully acquitted. In the meantime, as you will readily see, I am forced to enjoy your society for a little while. It would never be imagined that the man who was so happy as to approach you at this hour, would be so unworthy of his good fortune, as not to endeavour to prolong the interview; it would be highly imprudent.

Countess.—I am borne down by the weight of this double blow! The Stranger.—If my conversation is disagreeable to you, madam, I will retire to the other end of the apartment.

Countess.—Why, really, sir, you seem to be very much your own master here. (Aside.)—His face seems to me to be greatly in contrast with his profession.

The Stranger.—This is the first time, madam—

Countess.—That you have been engaged in such an operation!

The Stranger.—Oh no, by no means; but that a man presumes to dictate to you in your own apartment. You will excuse, I hope, that which justifies everything even in politics, necessity.

Countess.—(Aside.)—I really believe the brigand wants to show me that he knows the world.

The Stranger.—How delightful it is to be in a room occupied by a woman! I have always had a predilection for such places. It is an enchanted spot; everything breathes the grace of her presence, everything is embelmed by her breath!

Countess.—If I could only remove him from it to a good dungeon! The Stranger.—Will you allow me to warm my feet a little before I leave you? I am subject to a tendency of blood to the region of the heart.

Countess.—(Offering him a chair.)—Certainly, sir, certainly. Pray, make yourself at home. (Aside.)—I shall then have a better view of him, and perhaps be able to reach that bell.

The Stranger.—Yes, if I was free to choose among all retreats and places of refuge, I would seat myself neither on the chair of a Caesar, nor the cushions of a harem, but by a fireside in the room of a beloved woman. I would rather share her sofa than the throne of the world.

Countess.—Without regard to her fortune! (She raises the lamp.)

The Stranger.—Excuse me, but my night is very delicate.

Countess.—(Aside.)—Like your honesty.

(The stranger quietly changes his place, and takes a seat between the countess and the bell-ropes.)

The Stranger.—What book is it you amuse yourself with in your leisure moments? Will you allow me!—a novel! I spy the author who succeeds in keeping so fine a pair of eyes open! A woman's novel, too! How can women, who themselves inspire romances, waste their time in writing them? How can they descend to the rank of poets, when they are themselves poetry!

Countess.—(Aside.)—A man of talent; too, heaven help me!

The Stranger.—And do none of these pictures, madam, ever affect your sensibility? Excuse me, but if you know how deep an interest I take in everything that—

Countess.—That belongs to me!

The Stranger.—I would venture to ask—I am afraid it is a rudeness—what is—the state of your heart?

Countess.—The impudent fellow! In point of fact, sir, (pointing to the open secretary.) I have fewer secrets for you than for any one else; and since you are good enough to watch with me, I may, perhaps, be induced to answer your questions. I will reply, then, that I have been thus troubled but once in my life.

The Stranger.—How, pray?

Countess.—It was a stranger, a traveller, whom I saw but for a moment in the Pyrenees, (the stranger seems confused.) he disappeared of a sudden, just after a very large robbery had been committed in the neighbourhood. Perhaps you have heard him spoken of?

The Stranger.—We never interest ourselves in provincial matters, madam. You were reading Walter Scott, I see. What a pity that that writer made himself only a narrator, when he might have been a historian! What, abdicate the dictatorship of genius! amuse the idle, instead of instructing nations! what, to be without philosophy and without convictions in the nineteenth century; what a pity! Ah! here is a French author who must succeed: he never mortifies his readers' good opinion of themselves: he is always just on the level of the public. What do you think of this other? he is always in chase of wit.

Countess.—I, for one, will bet on the wit.

The Stranger.—Ah, you are too severe.

Countess.—How is it that I can so forget myself as to answer, to chat even with that horrid monster; it is inconceivable!—(Can I be fascinated?)

The Stranger.—Do you not think, madam, that literary discussions are always wearisome, and that if we were to dismiss from the two rival camps, the fools on one side, and the madmen on the other, the strife would cease for the want of combatants?

Countess.—I can say but little, sir, in answer to any opinions advanced at such a moment. An antagonist who has begun a discussion as you have done this, seems to me to have by far too much coolness and premeditation in his ideas, to induce me to attempt to change them. But it is very late, and I crave permission to take my leave.

The Stranger.—Are you sleepy?

Countess.—I am not exactly in a situation to induce sleep, but I fear to trespass on your time.

The Stranger.—Allow me, madam, to send you to-morrow some new works to counteract the effect of these on your imagination, and to form your mind and heart. On politics, I will send you the defence of the present ministry, by one of its subordinates; very noble and patriotic. In morals, the last academic discourse of the virtuous M. Talleyrand; it is quite edifying. Lastly, for light reading, I will send you the Comedy of Death; you will find it very comical. Will you promise me to read them?

Countess.—Unless I should find it impossible; in which case, I am free.

The Stranger.—I hope, madam, with the aid of time, to remove any little unpleasant impressions that may have been caused by my first visit.

Countess.—I trust your last. (Exit the Stranger. The Countess rings hastily.)—If I am only in time to have the fellow caught! The bell rung, my people are aroused. Thank heaven! I already hear a hurried step. Somebody is coming—aid is nigh!

The Stranger.—(Re-appearing.)—Oh, you are an ungrateful woman! While I forgot myself in talking literature for your edification, you were spreading a net for me! You have closed one outlet, but I was preparing with another. We part friends, I hope. May I hope to live a little while in your recollection! I pray you to pity the unlucky dog, who, bidding you farewell at such an hour as this, carries with him nothing but wealth.

(Servants arrive, and are hurried off in chase of the robber. The Countess notices that the Stranger has forgotten his pistols. Anxiety—alarm—TABLEAU.)

SECOND TABLEAU.

SCENE.—A magistrate's office. A red robe is thrown over the back of a chair, and his official square cap is lying on a table strewn with papers.

SCENE I.

Enter VERDIER, ushered in by an officer.

Verdier.—What do I want—what do I want—why, to see the magistrate, to be sure.

Officer.—He is not yet visible, sir.

Verdier.—What! not at nine o'clock; and to me, too, his old friend!

Officer.—(Solemnly.)—Sir, he has not breakfasted yet.

Verdier.—Ah, that indeed!—but tell him my name is Verdier, royal counsellor at Versailles; that asks a hearing, and that my business is very pressing.

Officer.—(Aside.)—Everybody's business is always very pressing.

SCENE II.

Verdier.—(To the Countess outside.)—Come in, madam, come in; I can conceive your diffidence and embarrassment. For a woman to let herself be plundered—to have an impudent rascal enter her apartment at night, is painful to endure, and unpleasant, doubtless, to repeat; but justice must take its course: we must, above all, recover the money and follow up the criminal, if we have to dive to the very bowels of the earth after him.

Countess.—Do you know, cousin, that you are beginning to exercise rights you have not yet fairly acquired, in giving me directions in this way. Why did you bring me here?

Verdier.—Why, to make your deposition, of course. And I really conceive, that when the whole of your dowry is in peril, your future husband has some interest in it. How much have you lost—exactly?

Countess.—I have told you already, five hundred thousand francs. Verdier.—I had some hopes! I had not heard that horrible sum right. Oh, the deuce! But, then, you have still got your farm at Vermeuil—your woods at Faisceaux, have you not?

Countess.—No; I had just received the money for them.

Verdier.—How confoundedly awkward!

Countess.—Why, cousin, you are out of temper; you seem to get crosser and crosser every minute.

Verdier.—Yes—I feel quite bewildered.

Countess.—Do you love me any the less!

Verdier.—We shall find that portfolio yet.

Re-enter the OFFICER.

Officer.—As you are a friend of the family, sir, you might walk up stairs, and see my master's nephew, M. Arthur, instead of waiting here.

Verdier.—Arthur de Montbert! I know him very well, but my business here does not concern him. (To the Countess.)—He is a strange young man, madam. I mean to avail myself of his influence with his uncle. He is inconsistent, and often extravagant: in a word, he is a poet, and I would add, a madman, but that it would be a repetition. Do you know him?

Countess.—No; at all.

Verdier.—He spends a great deal of money, and is the envy of a vast many good mothers who have daughters to dispose of. Only that he is, as I said, guilty of a thousand solecisms.

Countess.—As, for instance?

Verdier.—Why, to be young, for example, at twenty-five, really in love, obliging and polite.

Countess.—Disinterested too, perhaps?

Verdier.—So they say; but what credit to him, if he is so rich!

Countess.—No matter; if he is anything of the kind now-a-days, he is an original.

Enter the MAGISTRATE.

Magistrate.—Well, well, what is the matter! Are there no courts, no police-magistrates, no other tribunals but mine? And M. Verdier, too, a business man, to disturb a magistrate in his hours of repose! We belong to the public only from ten to five, my dear fellow, as you know very well.

Verdier.—Yes, my good friend, for public affairs; but this is a matter of private interest.

Magistrate.—Sir, there is a verse of Horace, which declares "Nothing should trouble him that's eating breakfast."

Verdier.—What, haven't you breakfasted yet; if so, I will be as brief as I can. I admit the full force of your reasoning.

Magistrate.—Oh, you are a sensible man, and a judge of good living—I can get along with you.

Verdier.—We have come here to complain of a very extensive robbery.

Magistrate.—By the way, that reminds me that when we dined last with the vice-president of our court—a splendid feed it was too! you lost a bit of a truffled turkey. Now is the time of year to pay it.

Verdier.—Very well; but the present business is about a portfolio.

Magistrate.—It is a debt of honour!

Verdier.—Very well; by and by, then. They say there are no trifles this year.

Magistrate.—It's the turkeys that raised that report. However, to business.—(To the Officer.)—Bring me a bouillon, at any rate.

Verdier.—Madame here was surprised—

Magistrate.—Madame is the complainant, then. Let her be seated. So, Verdier, you never make any new discoveries in your neighbourhood?

Verdier.—Alas! my friend, no.

Magistrate.—Well, I have made a discovery.

Verdier.—What is it?

Countess.—Do hurry him, if you can.

Magistrate.—Ah, my friend, it is beyond all price—the finest thing in the world. You know very well that lapwings are an excellent dish, but sometimes a little tough?

Verdier.—Heaven help you!

Magistrate.—They must be kept as long as possible. Since last year I kept them in a half-length bath of acetic acid, well flavoured with tarragon; and in this way I give the wings the game flavour, at the same time I souse the rump. What do you say to it?

Verdier.—Delicious!

Magistrate.—As there is a lady in the case, however, we must do the thing politely.—(To the Officer.)—Call my nephew. He will act as our clerk, madam, and receive your testimony. And, besides, my dear fellow, you know that no cook in the universe ever succeeded in making a soufflé of fish. Well, sir, I—I have solved the problem: I have made a sturgeon into a soufflé—I could make a whale! We will proceed to business in one moment, madam. (The Officer enters.)—There is a woman in the next room, madam, who says she has brought something for you.

Verdier.—The pistols he left behind, no doubt. Go, madam.—(Exit the Countess.)

Enter ARTHUR.

Arthur.—I obey your summons with the greatest pleasure, uncle; and, to gratify you, sacrifice without regret—

Magistrate.—What!

Arthur.—A stoople-ache I was just going to. Ha! Verdier here—(troubled.)—Glad to see you.

Magistrate.—Keep him company a little while, my lad. When I am fasting, you know very well I can't talk at all.—(Sits down at the back of the room before the bouillon.)

Arthur.—What brings you here so early, Verdier? Is there any impropriety in asking?

Verdier.—Oh no, but you would not believe it—a man—or a dozen men, have stolen—

Arthur.—Oh, in a case of that kind, I can't be of the least possible use, and will be off to keep my engagement.

Magistrate.—No, no, you are wanted here.

Arthur.—I will return in a moment.—(Going.)

Re-enter the COUNTESS.

Countess.—What voice is that?

Verdier.—Do detain him, madam.

Arthur.—Allow me to render my most respectful homage.

Verdier.—(To her.)—Aha, you seem astonished—have you not seen our friend before?

Countess.—I believe not—I go out so seldom.

Verdier.—That would not prevent his paying you a visit.

Arthur.—I should certainly never venture to, without an introduction.

Verdier.—He is right; he is very bashful.

Countess.—Can it be?

Verdier.—(Stopping Arthur, who makes a second attempt to escape.)—I was just saying that twenty men entered the Countess's chamber last night, and carried off a valuable portfolio.

Arthur.—Are you quite sure of it?

Verdier.—What, sure! Ask her—(turning to the Countess.) Why, how pale you are! You look as though you thought yourself in danger yet. But do not be alarmed: I would protect you—so would this gentleman.

Arthur.—With my life!
 Countess.—Yes, sir, but there was only one robber—only one man, about your size and shape—who was guilty of this base crime.
 Arthur.—Do you imagine what motive he could have had!
 Verdier.—By George, I should think it was plain enough. He must be a great scoundrel.

Arthur.—Yes; to judge by appearances. You must pursue this affair till he is detected: it is your duty.

Countess.—Is that your advice, sir?
 Arthur.—Certainly. But there is one difficulty in this, and one that I am very sorry to be obliged to point out: I am afraid you will never discover the thief.

Verdier.—Why?
 Arthur.—Oh, he must of course have hurried off as fast as possible. Loaded with wealth, as you say he was, he must have had the command of means of escape—he doubtless took post. You said the robbery took place at midnight!
 Countess.—I said nothing of the kind.

Arthur.—Well, then, he has nine hours start of us; he will have fifteen before the police can get to work. By this time he is, perhaps, at Angoulême—at Bordeaux—heaven knows where.

Countess.—(With meaning)—I do not think he is so far off.

Arthur.—(Coolly)—Do you happen to know, madam, what route he took?

Countess.—Oh, it can't be he!—the thing's impossible!—(Aside.)

Verdier.—Do you know, Arthur, that my cousin will be ruined, actually ruined, if she loses this portfolio.

Magistrate.—(Wiping his lips)—Now, young folks, I am at your service. You have lost, you say—

Countess.—My whole fortune, sir.

Magistrate.—(To the officer who takes away the bowl)—A little salish! Well, you say a young man entered your room, and took what?

Countess.—A portfolio.

Magistrate.—If it contained only some ten or twenty thousand francs, madam, I will not discourage you. He may feel remorse or fear; I know what the conscience of a rogue is. But if the sum was larger—

Countess.—Five hundred thousand francs.

Magistrate.—Why, who could be such a fool—(checking himself). Perhaps it will never be recovered.

Verdier.—I was sure of it! Oh heavens! However, madam, finish your deposition, describe the shape and colour of the portfolio as closely as you can, while I hurry to the police-office to have a search commenced at once. Arthur, my friend, you have it in your power to do me a great favour.

Arthur.—What is it?

Verdier.—This portfolio will certainly never be found!

Arthur.—Why, I don't like to speak certainly, but my uncle is positive—

Verdier.—Very well; then be good enough to hand (pointing to the Countess) a letter, I will send you shortly. I shall never have the courage to tell her to her face what I think, and to witness her sorrow. [Exit.]

SCENE III.

Magistrate.—Come, madam, let us proceed. What did this portfolio of yours look like?

Countess.—Why, sir, like all other portfolios. (Aside.)—The presence of that young man terrifies me.

Magistrate.—Was it large or small; red, green, or black?

Countess.—To describe all this in presence of—(Aside.)

Arthur.—Why do you hesitate, madam?

Countess.—I feared, sir, we were about to discover the culprit.

Magistrate.—Why should you fear? He should be punished, no matter what his station in society.

Countess.—Even if he was one of your own family?

Magistrate.—Ah, that is another thing; but a supposition of that kind is—

Arthur.—Perfectly inadmissible.

Magistrate.—Was it calf or morocco?

Arthur.—Perhaps, madam, it was Russia leather.

Countess.—(In an accusing tone)—Yes, sir, it was Russia leather.

Magistrate.—I am very happy to assist your memory.

Magistrate.—Write—Russia leather. Had it nothing else we might know it by—no lock?

Countess.—No, sir.

Arthur.—(Peeping into the side-pocket of his coat)—Perhaps it had only a silver clasp!

Countess.—Yes, sir.

(Arthur slips the portfolio into the Magistrate's cap.)

Magistrate.—Well, madam, a Russia leather portfolio may be recovered, even if it has a silver clasp; but as I have been already under the disagreeable necessity of stating, if it contained half a millions of francs, it will never come to light again.—(He puts on his cap very gravely and the portfolio falls at the Countess's feet.)—What is all that?

Countess.—Why, really—why, Judge, it is—

Arthur.—Speak out, madam—what restrains you?

Countess.—My lost portfolio!

Arthur.—Let us look at the contents.—(Opening it.)—The amount is just right: five hundred thousand francs.

Magistrate.—Hand it over here. How the deuce did this thing get into my square cap? How long have thieves and judges been on such good terms? Who has been here to-day? I must make a report on this strange event, and follow up the rogue. Meantime, at all events, your fortune is safe, for it is in the hands of a magistrate.—(Going.)

Countess.—Oh, dear sir, do not leave me here alone!
 Magistrate.—Why not, there is a gentle knight to protect you! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.

Arthur.—Well, madam, you are once more rich, and consequently once more dear to your cousin Verdier. What do you intend doing?

Countess.—Pursue the man who gave me such a fright. I was at his mercy; and I owe it to myself and to the public to obtain ample reparation.

Arthur.—But will you not marry your cousin—or, if you were free, would you forbid, as you have done, all efforts to please you, and give yourself again to that drossy soul, who values nothing that is yours, but your gold?

Countess.—(Aside.)—He is partly right! Your singular compliments, sir, are, I must say, wholly uncalled for. I have never had an opportunity of rejecting any respectful and suitable advances.

Arthur.—Because every one knew that you were chained down by an idea of compulsory gratitude; every one could see, with deep regret, but with the clearest certainty, that in order to fulfil a promise to the dead, you were about to renounce life, that is love!

Countess.—(Aside.)—Ah! it must be a great happiness to be loved!

Arthur.—What will the rest of your life be? what will remain to you at its close, but a dissatisfied spirit, and a soul whose powers were never called into being?

Countess.—(Aside.)—I have never been loved!

Arthur.—And while you are ready to make such a sacrifice of yourself, to one of the most selfish of mortals, you will cause to be pursued and punished a man, who is, perhaps, after all, innocent. Suppose he was not what you think him?

Countess.—Such a supposition would enhance his guilt instead of diminishing it. If it was not the love of money that led him astray, what are we to think of the wickedness of his heart, and the baseness of his conduct? What, sir, trifle with the fright he inflicted on a woman!—run the risk of blasting her fair fame for ever!—destroy her reason, perhaps, by the alarm he caused her, and rob her of her honour for ever! Oh, it is base; or else the act of a madman.

Arthur.—(On his knees.)—Yes, you say rightly, of a madman; of a lunatic, who had rather see you perish outright, than enter the arms of another. Perhaps, his only aim, in stripping you of your wealth, for a single day, was to show you the true character of him who was about to become your husband. Accuse him, if you wish; I will aid you to do so. Punish me, if you will, for having failed in dissuading you from the idea of a marriage that I detest.

Countess.—Sir! what you presume to say of my cousin, is a fresh insult. He would have been true to me in my adversity.

Enter the OFFICERS.

Officer.—A letter for M. Arthur.

Arthur.—To be forwarded to you, madam.

Countess.—"In haste!" it is my cousin's writing—(reads).—"It is not, my cousin, because you no longer possess certain trifling pecuniary advantages, that I beg of you to accept my excuses, and that I decline the honour of your hand, but from a just regard to public opinion. I am extremely susceptible, as you well know, on points of honour; and the entrance of a young man into your room at night, a fact which is beginning to be generally known, forces me to make a sacrifice that is extremely trying to my feelings."

Arthur.—Now, you know the man, thoroughly.

Countess.—So, sir, you see, that as I told you, my honour must suffer for an action—

Arthur.—That I cannot justify to your reason, I know, but that I might to your heart. Oh, would you but let me appeal to it!

Countess.—In favour of a stranger!

Arthur.—Of a stranger who knows you well; who has followed you everywhere, from the groves of Versailles to the rural villages of Barrege—

Countess.—What, are you—

Arthur.—A stranger, Pauline, who has risked life and honour to save you from the worst evil that can befall a woman; the irreparable misfortune of entrusting her whole existence to a being unworthy of her. But he has been unsuccessful; and, therefore, I repeat, do not hesitate to punish him. If necessary, I am prepared to accuse myself. Do you hesitate, madam! I will save you the trouble, and disclose myself at once.—(throws open a door; gen-d'armes are seen waiting in the distance.)

Countess.—Stop, stop, I command you!

Re-enter the MAGISTRATE and VERDIER.

Magistrate.—These fine fellows have been put under our orders, Verdier, to go in pursuit of the thief.

Verdier.—We have something better yet—hurra! we have found the portfolio! Oh, cousin, how much I love you! We were made for each other!

Countess.—Yes, my portfolio and you.

Verdier.—When shall we have the wedding, my dear cousin?

Countess.—Why you said nothing about that in the letter I just now received.

Verdier.—You careless fellow, is it possible you have handed her my letter already?

Arthur.—Did you not ask me to do it at once?

Magistrate.—By the way, who has been in here this morning?

Officer.—No one, but M. Verdier.

Arthur.—How, Verdier—ah, Verdier!

Magistrate.—To plunder and restore, sir, would be a contest between avarice and fear, nothing else, and the galleys—

(The gen-d'armes advance to arrest VERDIER.)

Verdier.—This is almost too good! Why, you surely don't suppose—

Magistrate.—Unhappy man! was the dowry your only object?

Verdier.—Cousin, cousin, do come forward for me.

Magistrate.—What, to enter a lady's house at night, at the risk of being condemned to hard labour for life!

Verdier.—You must marry me, to retrieve my character.

Countess.—Not so; I shall never marry, or, if I should ever yield to such a folly, it should be only in favour of a devotion unequalled, and to reward a man, who loved me enough, to prove it by risking not the vulgar sacrifice of life, but by venturing even his honour.

Verdier.—If you ever meet such a man, I advise you not to keep him waiting.

Countess.—I shall try to follow your advice, cousin.

Magistrate.—Returning the portfolio to the Countess.—Now, you are satisfied, madam, but the law is not. We have already taken proceedings; we will continue on your deposition, and inflict exemplary punishment on the criminal.

Countess.—(Greing her hand to Arthur.)—I withdraw the complaint.

Magistrate.—That's lucky for you, M. Verdier!

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

ABSURDITIES.—To attempt to borrow money on the plea of extreme poverty. To lose money at play, and then fly into a passion about it. To ask the publisher of a new periodical how many copies he sells per week. To ask a wine merchant how old his wine is.

To make yourself generally disagreeable, and wonder that nobody will visit you, unless they gain some palpable advantage by it. To get drunk, and complain the next morning of a headache.

To spend your earnings on liquor, and wonder that you are ragged. To sit shivering in the cold because you won't have a fire till November. To suppose that reviewers generally read more than the titlepage of the works they praise or condemn. To judge of people's piety by their attendance at church. To keep your clerks on miserable salaries, and wonder at their robbing you. Not to go to bed when you are tired and sleepy, because "it is not bed-time."

To make your servants tell lies for you, and afterwards be angry because they tell lies for themselves. To tell your own secrets, and believe other people will keep them. To render a man a service voluntarily, and expect him to be grateful for it. To expect to make people honest by hardening them in a jail, and afterwards sending them adrift without the means of getting work. To fancy a thing is cheap because a low price is asked for it. To say that a man is charitable because he subscribes to an hospital. To keep a dog or a cat on short allowance, and complain of its being a thief.

To degrade human nature in the hope of improving it. To praise the beauty of a woman's hair before you know whether it did not once belong to somebody else. To expect that you, tradespeople will give you long credit if they generally see you in snabby clothes. To arrive at the age of fifty, and be surprised at any vice, folly, or absurdity your fellow-creatures may be guilty of.

HEALTH OF LONDON.—Although London stands low, in point of salubrity, in comparison with the provinces of England, it stands very high when compared with most of the continental cities, and even states. With all the boasted advantages of the climate on the Mediterranean shores, the settled salubrious seasons of France, the glowing atmosphere and serene blue sky of Italy, we find England, and even its gigantic crowd, and almost boundless metropolis, enjoying a greater share of health, and consequently possessing a higher value of life, than the inhabitants of almost any foreign city or state in Europe, or perhaps in the world. It stands with respect to Paris in the ratio of health, as forty to thirty-two; to Leghorn as forty to thirty-five; to Naples as forty to twenty-eight; and a quarter; to Rome as forty to twenty-four; and to Vienna as forty to twenty-eight and a-half. The mortality in the latter city being as high as one to twenty-two and a-half, or in other words, nearly five per cent. of the whole population die annually.

EPIGRAM

The French have taste in all they do,
 Which we are quite without;

For Nature when they gave goût,
 To us gave only gout!

Condenn not in such haste,
 To letters four appealing;

French goût is only taste,
 The English gout is feeling!

AMERICAN DEER.—They suffer most from wolves, who hunt in packs like hounds, and who seldom give up the chase until a deer is taken. We have often sat on a moonlight summer night, at the door of a log cabin on one of our prairies, and heard the wolves in full chase of a deer, yelling very near in the same manner as a pack of hounds. Sometimes the cry would be heard at a great distance over the plain; then it would die away, and again be distinguished at a nearer point, and in another direction—now the full cry would burst upon us from a neighbouring thicket, and we could almost hear the sobs of the exhausted deer. * * Immense numbers of deer are killed every year by our hunters, who take them for the skins and skulls alone, throwing away the rest of the carcass.

VENISON HAMS AND HIDES are important articles of export. The former are purchased from the hunters at twenty-five cents a pair, and the latter at twenty cents a pound. In the villages of Illinois and Missouri we purchase for our tables the saddles of venison with the hams attached, for thirty-seven and a half cents, which would be something like one cent a pound.—Hall's Notes on the Western States.

PATRIOTIC EXHORTATION.—Sebastiano Foscarinus, some time duke of Venice, caused to be engraved on his tomb in St. Mark's church, the following exhortation to his countrymen:—"Hear, O ye Venetians! and I will tell you which is the best thing in the world—it is to contend and despise riches."

BAD THINGS.—An ignorant servant, an aching tooth, an empty purse, a loud talker, a long story, and a farewell address once a week.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON." By Jared Sparks. Boston: Published by Ferdinand Andrews. 1839. Pp. 562.

THIS admirable work supplies what has long been a desideratum, a succinct, well written, well illustrated, and handsomely printed life of Washington. The biography of Marshall is valuable rather as a collection of authentic documents and facts, than as an elaborate and thoroughly-digested memoir. Mr. Sparks's work is every thing that we could wish, both in point of style and materials. No man in the country has had better opportunities of becoming possessed of every important particular in the life of Washington, and no man could have applied himself to his high task with a sincerer devotion, or executed it with a more conscientious fidelity. We need not add that no gentleman's library in the United States should be without this elegant volume. The plates, which are fifteen in number, are executed in the finest style of the art. Mr. Samuel Colman, No. 8 Astor-House, is the agent for the work in this city.

"THE AMERICAN IN PARIS." By John Sanderson. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Levy and Hart. 1839.

The London critics have spoken of this agreeable work in terms of unqualified commendation, and this fact alone will be enough, we suppose, to commend it to the favour of many readers in this country. But apart from this consideration, the book is truly one of the most amusing and spirited books of this travelling age. It will be an invaluable companion to those who contemplate a visit to Paris; while to those who prefer staying at home, it will convey a most vivid impression of the scenes, characters and gaieties of the French metropolis. We have marked several passages for quotation, for which we soon hope to find room.

"TRAVELS IN SOUTH-EASTERN ASIA." Embracing Hindustan, Malaya, Siam, and China, with notices of numerous missionary stations, an account of the Burman empire, &c. By Howard Maclean. In two volumes. Boston: Gould, Kendall and Lincoln. 1839.

To those who are interested in the progress and existing condition of the American missions in Asia, these volumes may be strongly recommended. They contain a mass of information in relation to the countries visited by the author, who is favourably known to the public as a clergyman of distinguished talents. Mr. Maclean has collated his materials with evident care and industry. An excellent map of south-eastern Asia accompanies the work, which is also embellished with numerous wood-cuts and engravings on steel. The typographical execution of these volumes is neat and correct.

"CRITICISM: ITS USE AND ABUSE." By Samuel F. Glenn. Washington City: William Fischer. Pp. 11. (1)

"The critic," says Mr. Glenn, "may apply be compared to the father of a numerous family of children: to some he gives the gifts of approbation; to others he gives the punishment of the birch." We fear that if we were seriously to assume this solemn paternal relation towards our author, we should be obliged to be far more liberal of the "birch" than of "the gifts of approbation." But we will leave it to the "Squeers" of the press to inflict the merited degree of chastisement, in this case, reminding them of Solomon's advice as to "sparing the rod." Did we not have hopes of Mr. Glenn, we should venture no such recommendation. But his crudities of style and sentiment, render him a fit subject for execration.

"THE STYLE OF THE LEXAPHE, AND OTHER POEMS." By Samuel M. Janney. Philadelphia: Henry Parkes. Pp. 180.

There is little to find fault with in this neat collection of poems. The author would seem to have written no line, "which dying he could wish to blot." His verses are always calculated to promote the cause of truth, piety, and good taste. The preliminary essay on poetry is excellent, and so is the dedication. Mr. Janney appears to have based his style principally on that of Cowper and Gray, who are his favourites among the modern English poets. There are many verses in this collection, which would do no discredit to either of those great names. The following stanza from the dedication, eloquently expresses the design of these poems:

"Tis not an idle song, I here present,
The wildering lies of passion to impart,
But framed with higher views,—and with intent
To waite the truest feelings of the heart.
For 'tis the province of the minstrel's art,
(A noble art were worthy pursuit,)
To soothe the anguish left by sorrow's dart,
To cheer the lonely hours of solitude,
And fill the soul with love for all that's great and good

"THE AUTHOR'S PRINTING AND PUBLISHING ASSISTANT." Including interesting details respecting the Mechanism of Books. New-York: Frederick Saunders, 357 Broadway. 1839. 16mo. Pp. 43.

The object of this little work, as we learn from the advertisement, is to afford such a view of the technical details of printing and publishing, as shall enable authors to form a judgment of all subjects connected with the publication of their productions. The information it contains is of a nature not very generally accessible, but at the same time valuable and interesting. We commend to the attention of all writers for the press, the remarks upon the correction of proofs and upon errors in manuscript.

"LESSONS IN FRENCH AND TALES IN FRENCH." By Madame Guizot. Boston: W. Ticknor.

Mr. Colman, at his establishment under the Astor-House, has for sale two capital little works for young students in French—one being "Tales in French," by Madame Guizot, and the other "Easy Lessons for learning French." Both these volumes will be found valuable assistants in the acquisition of a language, a knowledge of which is becoming daily of increased importance.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The sketch entitled "Appearances are Deceitful," is very French, and very original. Its great length has excluded many commentaries prepared for the Mirror of to-day, and among them another characteristic letter from John Smith. Rather than mar the interest of the story—we have an utter aversion to long "to be continued" tales—we have given it entire, and think the reader will thank us for not spending it by "breaking it in two."—Fortia is thanked. We will take her advice. It is given in a spirit of frankness, which entitles it to every consideration.—As Placide says in the comedy, "it is really gratifying to find one's self properly appreciated." Fortia will understand the application of this remark. It is evident that Roccus does not know us. When we make up our minds to do what he is pleased to term "a good-natured action," we never trouble our heads about what other people may think or say. All the reward we ever either expect or wish, we receive in the gratifying reflection that we have had an opportunity of being serviceable to the meritorious in our day and generation.

Influence of the imagination among theatrical performers.—The audience at the National Theatre were lately electrified by a scene, which offered a curious instance of the effect of imaginary woes in producing a display of actual passion and distress. We allude to Miss Shireff's personation of Clari, in John Howard Payne's pathetic drama of "The Maid of Milan." In the last scene of the play, the penitent Clari, who has been seduced from her humble but happy home by Vivaldi, a proud young nobleman, returns, and seeks her parents. She first encounters her mother, to whom she is soon reconciled. But the father, who is of sterner stuff, spurns her from his path. It was in the midst of his terrible imprecation upon his child, that Miss Shireff, as Clari, rapt by the cunning of the scene, and by a sensitive imagination, fell into violent hysterics, and uttered the most piercing shrieks. The curtain was immediately dropped upon the scene, the effect of which upon the audience was that which might have been naturally awakened by an actual occurrence of an intensely tragical nature. Many instances, of a similar kind, have been mentioned. Mrs. Sloman, a few weeks since, in Philadelphia, was agitated in a like manner while personating the part of Mrs. Beverly, in the "Gambler." It is a fact, attested by hundreds of witnesses, that John Palmer, the celebrated tragical actor, fell and died, while in the character of "the Stranger"—giving utterance to the words, "there is another and a better world!" Moliere, the celebrated comedian, and styled by Voltaire "the best comic poet that ever lived in any nation," was seized with death while acting in the character of a sick man, in "Le Malade Imaginaire," one of his own plays. The same part, it is said, proved fatal to the actor who succeeded him. Pliny relates a story of a player who imitated the god so naturally, as at length to bring the disorder upon him! (Take warning, Placide!) Madame Claron, the famous French actress, accounted for prematurely growing old in appearance, by the influence of the imaginary griefs and distresses with which she had been constantly overwhelmed, year after year, on the stage. In Madden's estimate of the average duration of the lives of authors in the various departments of literature and science, he places that of tragical poets far below that of any others; and both he and Coleridge account for the singularity by the theory, that the imaginary passions and sufferings through which the minds of such writers must pass, produce, in a degree, the same effect upon the physical system, as would have been occasioned by the wear and tear of actual emotions of grief, anger, jealousy, revenge, terror, remorse, and the other elements of tragical and dramatic action.

Statue of Victoria, by an American artist.—A statue of Queen Victoria, recently completed by Mr. J. V. Stout, a young sculptor of this city, is now presented for public exhibition at the Stuyvesant Institute. It will, we think, be generally pronounced one of the most remarkable and original specimens of the noble art of statuary ever executed in this country. The figure is nearly as large as life, being four feet eleven in height, and distinguished for its lightness, grace, elegance, and dignity. The left arm is bent, resting becomingly on the waist in front, the hand holding a flower—while the right hand, grasping a sceptre, hangs negligently adown the right side. The attitude is one of perfect repose, but at the same time full of energy and character; and the limbs are disposed with exquisite taste. The symmetrical beauty of the form, and the anatomical developments, will, at once, strike the observer. In the contour of the neck and waist, and, indeed, of the whole figure, the sculptor has been very successful. The drapery, which is disposed in such a manner that the most fastidious could not raise the shadow of an objection, is managed with consummate ingenuity and skill. It would seem as if the wind, blowing against the front of the statue, had drawn all the folds of the drapery tightly behind, throwing them gracefully diffused down the left side, and leaving the entire lineaments of the figure from the neck to the ankles covered, but not concealed. In every position, in which this statue is viewed, it will be found to disclose new beauties. The likeness is said to be a very fair one, and the figure is sylph-like and beautiful. We advise all amateurs of the art to avail themselves of this opportunity of examining the production of a young sculptor, who, by this single effort, has shown himself a man of the highest genius in his arduous profession.

Catherwood's panorama of Thebes.—An evening cannot be spent more rationally than in visiting Mr. Catherwood's admirable panorama of Thebes, now open for exhibition at the corner of Prince and Mercer streets. The view of the ruins of the "hundred-gated city" is truly sublime.

Whiskers and long hair.—A letter from Paris states, that to be a fashionable young man in that metropolis, you must wear your hair falling in massive locks upon your shoulders—your beard must be in the style of Francis the First, whilst your hand must be tightly squeezed into a canary-yellow glove; part of the costume as decidedly characteristic of an exquisite aristocrat of the present day, as a red heel was in the time of Louis XIV. Thus dressed, you may present yourself everywhere—even at the jockey-club, the arbiter of ten in Paris, at the present day. Our distant readers may not be generally aware, that these delectable fashions are quite as much in vogue among our Broadway dandies as they are in France. Long hair, long whiskers, and a beard, a la Francis the First, are all the rage. The derivation of this fashion of long hair is somewhat amusing. A young Parisian established himself a few years since in Cairo, in a business in which industry and perseverance would infallibly have led to competence. But our hero was impatient, and resolved to take a shorter cut to fortune. Thinking it no harm to cheat the infidels, he was in the daily practice of frauds, which, while they filled his coffers, were of little advantage to his character. At last, his dishonest practices became so notorious, that the pacha was compelled to punish him in a manner in which all similar offenders had been punished in Cairo, from time immemorial. The youthful Shylock was nailed up to a pillory by the ear, and this punishment was repeated as often as his offences were discovered, until at length both his auricular organs were pierced with as many holes as a cylinder. Indeed, so obnoxious did he become at last, that the cad, placing the gentleman's head between his knees, cut off both his ears with a razor. But the Parisian, in the meanwhile, had managed to transfer a large property to his native metropolis, and thither he followed it soon after the loss of his ears. But how should he conceal his disgrace? After much reflection, he leagued himself with half a dozen individuals suffering under a similar inconvenience, and they introduced the elflocks, now an fashionable, and which effectually concealed their losses. Nothing could have been more fortunate. They all made excellent matrimonial speculations, and it was not until their wives undertook to comb their hair, that they discovered, to their horror, that their husbands had no ears! Our fair readers must make their own application of the moral of our story.

Original letter of Benjamin Franklin.—The original copy of the following letter of Benjamin Franklin, hitherto unpublished, was recently presented to Mr. D. Needford, the manager of the Franklin Theatre, by a gentleman of this city. Though unimportant in some respects, it is interesting as being stamped by the marked characteristics of the author, both in its style and matter:

Passy, near Paris, December 24, 1777.

DEAR KINSMAN—The bearer, Mr. Holker, is a gentleman of great worth and excellent character, and a particularly friend of mine, who, if he sees encouraging prospects, may possibly make some commercial prospects in America: in which case you may be assured that his engagements will be executed with good faith, and the exactest punctuality. I recommend him warmly to your civilities and to those of my other friends. And, as he is well acquainted with the state of affairs here, I am persuaded his conversation would give a good deal of satisfaction to gentlemen in public situations with you; and therefore I request that you would introduce him to the acquaintance of Mr. Bowdoin, Dr. Cooper, Mr. Winthrop, Mr. Cushing, and others engaged in the government of your state.

Your affectionate uncle,

B. FRANKLIN.

JONATHAN WILLIAMS, Esq.

Foreign chat-chat.—Lady E. L. Bulwer's new novel of "Chevalry, or the Man of Honour," is said to be a satire on her husband, the author of "Pelham," etc., from whom she is at present separated. The lady has doubtless had "provocation;" but, under any circumstances, it is in bad taste for husband and wife to abuse each other publicly.—Laman Blanchard is writing the Life and Correspondence of L. E. L., in three volumes.—Marryat and Colburn are at law, and it would seem that the publisher had the best of the quarrel.—Charles Keen was to sail immediately for the United States.—A new opera by Barrett, entitled "Farnelli," has been produced at Drury-Lane.

Mr. Sinclair.—The "spring-time of year is coming," and with it has come Mr. Sinclair, well known as one of the most delightful vocalists of the day. We are indebted to him for many moments of blameless enjoyment, and his very name is to us what music was to Ossian—like the memory of days that are past, pleasant and mournful to the soul.

New-York Historical Society.—Mr. ex-President Adams has accepted the invitation of the New-York Historical Society, to pronounce before it an address on the approaching anniversary of the inauguration of Washington, as the first President of the United States.

New music.—"The Old House at Home," a ballad, sung by Phillips, in the opera of "Francis the First," the music by Loder—and "Autumn Leaves," a ballad, sung by Mr. Segun, in the opera of "The Village Coquettes," the words by Dickens, and the music by John Hullah, are the titles of two beautiful songs just published by Millet, and to be obtained at his saloon, in Broadway.

Mr. Willis's new play.—"Tortosa, the Usurer," by N. P. Willis, has been entirely successful, Mr. Wallack sustaining the principal character.

La Petite Augusta.—This youthful and promising danseuse was announced to appear at the Grand Opera in Paris towards the close of the last month.

SECOND VERSE.

First began the handsome man, Feeling proudly o'er her fan, Red his lips, and white his skin, Could such beauty fail to win? Then she smil'd to hear him speak, Then she smil'd to hear him speak, Then a tear was on her cheek; Beauty vanish—gold depart— Wit hath won the widow's heart!

THIRD VERSE.

Then the man of wit and sense Wood her with his eloquence, Now she heard him with a sigh, Then she blush'd scarce knowing why; Then she smil'd to hear him speak, Then she smil'd to hear him speak, Then a tear was on her cheek; Beauty vanish—gold depart— Wit hath won the widow's heart!

NATIONAL LYRICS.

DURING the American Revolution there was a band of bold, energetic and fearless heroes in Massachusetts, who fought on their "own hook," and roamed through the camp of the British at night, burning and destroying, reckless of all personal danger. They were six in number, and rode fine, spirited steeds, who seemed to understand their duty almost as well as their masters. The following song is said to have been sung by them.

We are but six—our steeds and we
At midnight scour the lines for prey;
Behind, the blazing plain we see,
While on and on we fire our way.

We are but six—our deeds are told
Around the Briton's watch-fire light;
True as our steel our hearts, and bold
The giant arms that tell our might.

We are but six—morn after morn
A soldier stiff lies at his post;
Back to their homes our cattle borne,
To feed our country's starving host.

We are but six—and he, our guide,
From his stern duty never fled;
Where'er he leads his comrade's ride,
Through bristling spears and showers of lead.

The tyrant's foe throughout the land
We wave the flag of blood on high;
We are but six—and six we'll stand,
Or six in death and glory lie!

MISCELLANY.

FRANCH GALETY.—In the campaign of 1812, a distinguished general officer of the French army was severely wounded in the leg. The surgeons on consulting declared that amputation was indispensable. The general received the intelligence with much composure. Among the persons who surrounded him he observed his valet-de-chambre, who showed by his profound grief the deep share which he took in the melancholy accident. "Why dost thou weep, Germain? said his master smilingly, to him. "It is a fortunate thing for thee, you will have only one boot to clean in future."

A WHOPPER.—We have heard of a man who is so tall that his pantaloons have to be wove in a rope-walk. He folds up like a two-foot-rule, and has to get on his knees to put his hands in his pockets.

THE SILVER HOOK.—Doctor Franklin observing one day a hearty young fellow, whom he knew to be an extraordinary blacksmith, sitting on the wharf bobbing for little mudcats and eels, he called to him, "Ah, Tom, what a pity it is you cannot fish with a silver hook." The young man replied, "he was not able to fish with a silver hook." Some days after this, the doctor passing that way, saw Tom out at the end of the wharf again, with his long pole bending over the flood—"What, Tom!" cried the doctor, "have you got the silver hook yet?" "Heaven bless you, doctor," cried the blacksmith, "I am hardly able to fish with an iron hook." "Poh! poh!" replied the doctor, "go home to your anvil, and you will make silver enough in one day to buy more and better fish than you can catch here in a month."

MARGARET OF NORWAY. In the great church at Roskilde, there is shown a large whetstone, which they say was sent to the celebrated Queen Margaret, by Albert king of Sweden, in derision, intimating that women should sharpen their needles, instead of aiming at war. The wit, which is very poor, was better answered by the queen, who replied, that she would apply it to the edges of her soldiers' swords. She was as good as her word: she fought Albert in a pitched battle; gave him an entire overthrow; and made him prisoner. In that situation she kept him seven years, and then released him on very hard conditions.

EXPLANATION.—In a conversation the other day, after mentioning the movement of immense stones by the tempest in the West Indies, Mr. L. mentioned that, just before his arrival there, a twenty-four pounder had been blown, by the violence of the storm, from the battery into the sea. "That," rejoined his friend, "explains to me what I never could understand before—the meaning of its 'blowing great guns!'"

AN EDITOR IN TROUBLE.—A young lady in Shippensburg (says the New Orleans Picayune) has threatened the editor of the Herald with a "licking" the first time she catches him out. His anxious mother had better keep him. We would much rather meet fifty men, armed with pistols and Bowie knives, than one of the tender sex of the borough of Shippensburg when "excited."

EPIGRAM ON A LADY AND HER PICTURE.

Original, and copy, too,
Seem closely with the art acquainted;
The likeness, therefore, is quite true,
For both are—very highly painted.

ADVICE TO A GENTLEMAN IN LOVE.—Are you in disgrace with the lady you love? "No!" "Are you in favour?" "No!" "The medium?" "Yes!" "That is bad; you had better have had a quarrel. It is much easier to pass from storm to sunshine, from Indus to the Pole, than to make indifferent dulness into grace and favour."

AUGUSTUS BROOM—A SONG.

In a parlour gay, one summer day,
With hut and port crest,
Augustus Broom, a young bridegroom,
Lay down to take some rest;
When Agnes sweet, his darling bride,
Came in and sat down by his side,
And said, "My dear, your Nancy's here;"
He with a snore replied.

"What, asleep!" said she, "and as yet but three Weeks since we two were wed;
I thought of a walk, or at least some talk;
In all your fondness fled?
Do give me some attention, pray,
And let not Nancy have to say,
That when she has dressed, and done her best,
Her pains are thrown away.

Nay, since you will be sleeping still,
I know what I shall do;
Those whisks fair, beyond compare,
I'll clip a curl or two.
I know you love them passing well,
And would not one for a kingdom sell;
But 'twill serve you right for this shameful slight,
And be a joke to tell."

The deed was done, and she thought 'twas fun,
For hair can grow again;
But when Broom n' us feel the cold hard steel,
He started up a-ma-n.
"My dear," he cried, with a frantic roar,
Ane quickly off both whiskers tore.
"It is too bad—you would make one mad—
They cost me two pound four!"

GALLANT CONDUCT.—Sir Cloudesley Shovel, whose melancholy shipwreck on the rocks of Scilly is well known, was, when a boy, on board a ship commanded by Sir John Narborough, who, during an action, expressed a very earnest wish to have some orders of consequence conveyed to a ship at a considerable distance. Shovel, hearing this, immediately undertook to convey it; and this he actually performed, swimming through the enemy's line of fire with the despatches in his mouth.

THIS LIBERALLY OF LOVE.—In Tristram Shandy, Trim, giving an account of his beautiful Begum, who attended him during a fever, and relating the feverish dreams which disturbed his slumbers, says, "I was all night long cutting the world in two, and giving her half."

NEW-ENGLAND WITCHCRAFT.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

THERE are plenty of witches in New-England to this day—take my word for it. I have seen at least a dozen or two within the last quarter of a century; and if I might, I could tell you such things!—"Whit they are I know not"—as Lear says; and therefore, instead of a long story about New-England witches, with red lips and staring eyes, and hearts heaving at the approach of their prey, what if I try my hand at a story of New-England witchcraft—every word of which is true!

The early history of New-England, or of Massachusetts Bay rather, abounds with proof that witches and witchcraft were familiar things, believed in without flinching, for a great while, in the most enlightened part of our whole country. This belief, indeed, was very general not a hundred years ago, throughout all north America, very common and very active just before the revolutionary war broke out, and prevails to this day along the savage outskirts of New-England, as well as within the shifting and shadowy interior of the western and south-western states, which are springing up of themselves all along the shore of the great western wilderness of "liquid herbage," where "empires unknown in bright solitude lie."

It has never been confined, however, until within a few years—a very few—to the uneducated and barbarous, nor to a portion of the white settlers, nor even to those who had to do with the natives, a part of whose awful faith it was, that no white man was permitted to question, that witchcraft and sorcery were the offspring of the bad power they worshipped. It was rooted in the hearts of men, who were altogether remarkable in the history of their age, for wisdom, and learning, and piety; of men, who fled from their quiet firesides in Europe, to another world, as it were, and buried themselves alive—in search of truth.

We may smile now, to hear witchcraft spoken seriously of; but we forget, perhaps, that our belief in it, is like our belief in the re-appearance of the dead, among the blue waters, the green graves, the still starry atmosphere, and the great shadowy woods of our earth; or like the beautiful, deep instinct of our nature for worship—older than the skies, it may be, universal as thought, and sure as the steadfast hope of immortality. We may turn away with pity now from the devout believer in witches, wondering at the folly of those who pretend to put faith in such matters, and quite persuading ourselves, in our great unquestioned wisdom, that all who have done so, however they may have been looked upon by past ages, were never of the truly great and wise—never! But we forget, perhaps—I do not like to use certainly forget, though I shouldn't be far from the truth, if I did—we forget, perhaps, that we are told in the book of books, the scripture of truth, about witches with power to raise the dead, about wizards and sorcerers that were able to strive with the anointed high priest of Jehovah, before the misbelieving majesty of Egypt, with all his court and people gathered about him; and of others who could look into futurity, interpret the visions of sleep, read the stars, bewitch and afflict whom they would, cast out devils, and prophesy—false prophets, not because that what they said was untrue, but because the great original of their spirit was un sanctified; lying prophets, not because they never told the truth, but because they were the children of unoly power, the offspring of the father of lies. And we forget, moreover, that laws were made about conjuration, spells and witchcraft by a body of British law-givers, renowned for sagacity, deep research, and a grave, thoughtful regard for truth; and that but a few generations ago—the other day, as it were; and that a multitude of superior men have recorded this belief in magic and witchcraft and sorcery. Such men as the great and good Sir Matthew Hale, at a period when there was no lack of knowledge, wisdom, or inquiry; and such men, too, as the celebrated judge, whose commentaries on the laws of England, if we may believe the men of the law—not otherwise—the pride of the British empire and a pillar of light for the nation; and that a multitude of other men, as well as women, have been tried and executed by authority of British law, administered by British lawyers, within the last one hundred and fifty or two hundred years, in the very heart of Old England. If these men were not sincere, if they had not taken pains to satisfy themselves, they were murderers and blasphemers, and they knew it; and were punishable, even as their victims were, by death.

We may smile—we may turn away with pity—but could such things have occurred, either in the British parliament, or in the British courts of law, without some proof—some, whatever it was—proof to the understandings of people, who, in other and weightier matters, are looked up to as the great men of this age with absolute veneration; proof that creatures, endowed with strong, if not with preternatural power, did inhabit our earth, and were able to work mischief, according to the popular notions of witchcraft and sorcery. We know little or nothing of the facts, upon which their belief was founded. All that we know is but hearsay or tradition. They were eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses. They knew all that we know of the matter, and a thousand times more. We are not only ignorant of the facts and circumstances, but we are living afar off in a remote age. Nevertheless, they were believers in witchcraft; while we have no language wherewith to express our pity and contempt for all who speak sensibly of it, or venture to regard it as a possible thing. How dare we! What right have we to say that witches and witchcraft are no more, that sorcery is done with for ever, that miracles are never to be wrought again, or that prophecy shall never more be heard by the people of God, uplifting her voice like a thousand echoes from the everlasting solitudes of the sea, or like uninterrupted thunder, pealing over the terrible and haughty nations of the earth—till thrones and palaces, temples and pyramids topple down together, heading to the dust; and the preternatural and the mysterious are merged for ever in the natural and the evident!

But, however, we may regard such men as Sir Matthew Hale, Judge Blackstone, and the hereditary legislators of our father-land, it were quite impossible for us—New-Englanders as we are!—to question the sincerity of the Plymouth settlers—the PILGRIMS or FATHERS, who laid the foundation of a mighty empire among the perpetual rocks of old Plymouth, and along the desolate shores of New-England; and just as impossible would it be for any person in his senses, acquainted with their character and their history, to question their belief in witchcraft and sorcery; for, at one period, a season of sore perplexity for them, and while they were yet wrestling for a foothold among the rocks and shores of the new world, about four hundred of their industrious population were actually imprisoned for witchcraft, or under accusation for matters, which were looked upon as a fatal evidence of witchcraft! By referring to the records of that age, it will be found, that in the course of about fifteen months, while the Fathers of New-England were beset on every side by the savages and by the French, no less than twenty-eight persons received sentence of death, of which number nineteen were executed, one died in jail, and one was deliberately crushed to death—according to British law, because, being a brave and powerful man, he would not plead to so preposterous a charge before the twelve who had found every accused person guilty. Some few escaped, one hundred and fifty were discharged, when the frightful superstition of the day was over; and about two hundred more of the accused were not proceeded against. Of these, about fifty made confession of their guilt; and at the trial of a woman, held in great awe by the settlers, three of her own children declared themselves to be witches, and gave a particular account of their voyages through the air, and over sea, night after night; and of all the mischief they had perpetrated by the direction, advice, and authority of their mother, to whom, they said, the devil had promised, before a whole congregation of witches, at one of their churchyard gatherings, that she should be queen of hell.

The following narrative, which relates to a period when the popular fury was raging with irresistible strength, cannot be well understood, without a brief illusion to earlier parts of the New-England history; nor, perhaps, without a general account, a very short one it must be, of the breaking out and growth of witchcraft in the new world.

The PILGRIM FATHERS, as they are now called, went ashore partly of their own accord—partly from necessity, for their destination was further south, at Plymouth, Massachusetts Bay, in the winter of 1620. They fled from Europe to avoid persecution for a new religious belief; and yet, within a few years after, they found themselves established in comparative security and the rights of conscience respected, they fell upon the Quakers, and scourged and banished them, or put them to death, because of their new religious belief, and because they ventured to insist upon the rights of conscience. The Quakers died in their faith, prophesying heavy sorrow, insupportable too, and a mighty series of strange but near affliction to the land. Within a short time after this—so short a time, that it was remembered and spoken of as a judgment, after the dreadful paroxysm had gone off—a woman, who had pursued a female preacher on her way to prison, with insult and outrage, was taken up for a witch, accused by intimate friends of having to do with the Prince of Darkness, and put to death—so says tradition—upon the very spot where she stood still for a time to scoff at the poor Quaker-woman, who held on her meek and quiet way, without a word of reproach or complaint—her withered hands locked upon her bosom—her head not bowed, in her unspeakable distress, but lifted as if in prayer to something visible, at one time in her path over the green turf, at another, afar off in the blue bright air—but visible to herself alone. There live those now, said a writer of the next age, who are persuaded that she saw a spirit on her way to the jail—which was the way to the grave.

Soon after, and within less than nine years from the first arrival of the Quakers at Massachusetts Bay, another female was executed for witchcraft, and other stories began to be whispered about of a similar nature, to prove that she also had been prophesied into the grave, being one of another party, who had gone out of their way to scoff at an afflicted woman, about to perish for the truth's sake. From this period, (1665,) there was no other trial for witchcraft within the borders of New-England, till the year 1691; but a belief was fixed in the very hearts of the people, that the prophecy of Mary Dyer, the aged Quaker woman, uttered on her way to the scaffold, would surely be accomplished.

It was accomplished! A shadow fell upon the great, happy earth, at noonday. The waters grew dark as midnight. Everything alive was quiet with fear; the trees, the birds, the cattle, the very hearts of men, who had gathered together in the house of the Lord for worship and prayer. The shadow of the grave was abroad with a voice like that of the sea. Earthquake, fire, and storm, followed; inundation, war, and strife, in the church. A woman, it was believed, had re-appeared on earth, or in the air, right over the very place where, having been cruelly driven out of New-England by religious power, she, with a family of sixteen, had been put to death by the savages. Everybody knew her voice—and all trembled at the story, and turned pale, as if they saw the apparition before them, with the large quiet eyes, hovering in mid-air; and saying, (for she was a haughty and ambitious woman,) that she had come back to be judged of the elders, according to her well-remembered promise, after which, it would be for her to judge them, forever and ever.

The people were seized with a strange fear. They knew that she had been able to draw away from their peculiar worship a third part of their whole strength, when she was alive, and a better faith, if not of strange gods, at least of a new faith, and who should say that her dangerous power might not be fearfully augmented by death!

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

A SKETCH FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS.

GRACE was the pet of the village—pretty, lively, and, like all other pets, very self-willed; but the effects of this latter quality were softened down and rendered quite lovable by her open, generous disposition, which would not allow her to injure another, even to gratify that ruling passion. Some said that Grace thought herself sufficiently handsome, and termed it vanity. True, perhaps, when each Sabbath morning found her ready decked for the sunny walk to the parish church on the hill-side, or the week-day's evening saw her in her little chamber window plying her needle—yes, perhaps then, as she caught a side-long glance at herself in the little mirror, she might think it no such great wonder that the young men gazed as they passed her, or that they looked so curiously at the bow-pots and flowering geraniums perched on the sill of her casement—perhaps, too, she might think they cast a glance beyond. But was this vanity! No; Grace was as free of that hateful quality as the bird which carolled so joyously in his bright cage on the cottage wall. Vanity cannot be justly attributed to those who are only conscious of possessing the qualities which are theirs in reality, but to those alone who boast to themselves of perfections which they can never hope to possess. Such was the case with those who termed Grace vain.

One fine autumn evening she sat, as usual, beside her geraniums, over which was hung her little bird Pet; but the leaves of the former hung droopingly, as though to ask of their sweet mistress the usual drop of spring water, and poor Pet chirruped and hopped from perch to perch, and ruffled his yellow feathers to attract her attention, but in vain. No cooling drop greeted the sickly leaf—no tiny finger placed a bit of sugar between Pet's cage wires. And how was this? Was Grace ill? No; but her thoughts were wandering, and although her eyes were fixed full on poor Pet and his companion plants, she never saw one nor the other. And whither were her thoughts wandering? Only into a neighbouring lane, up which she strolled when the sun was beginning to dip his bright head 'neath the blue tops of the neighbouring hill. It was a very pleasant lane, but as its sides were bounded by high hawthorn and wild rose-bushes, it may be supposed that Grace did not go there for the sake of any beautiful prospect, for her whole height was not more than the top of the banks on which the bushes grew. For what, then, could it be! In truth it was that there generally accompanied her thither a very pleasant companion—not her mother—not one of the neighbour's daughters. No; but a young man, the son of a farmer not far distant.

Yes, the truth may as well be told. Grace had given, or thought she had given, her little heart to this companion of her strolls; and, indeed, any one to look on him, might imagine a better choice could not be made. Tall, handsome, and athletic he was, and his eyes beamed when he looked on her. But they who knew him better than Grace, said that he was wild and fickle. Neither did they scruple to warn her of that knowledge. But Grace would not believe. How could she, when she said that, although they spoke against him, they were always ready to welcome him to their own homes? Besides, there was an eloquence far more powerful to the heart and to the understanding of Grace—more eloquent, more easily believed than aught they could utter. Yes, the eye and tongue of William Clively were the monitors most eagerly sought, and most willingly listened to when found. How could she think he was deceiving her—no harshness in his soft voice. But there was one who did not like him, to whom Grace had ever been accustomed to pay the most profound submission, because that humility had never been forced, but ever won from her by love. That being was her mother!

She had now been sitting in this deep reverie some ten minutes, from which she was roused by a light hand being laid on her shoulder. The blood mounted to her temples and cheeks, for she knew, without raising her eyes, that it was her mother, and she felt conscious that that mother's eye was reading her innermost heart. She also knew she had naught to fear, for though at this moment her little heart had been rebelling, her parent's chiding was ever one of gentleness.

"Grace, love," spoke the mother, gently placing her hand on the half-downcast head, "why do you not go forth this evening? See, the sun has almost lost his last bit of crimson in the deep gray. Come, love; you have been sewing all day. Just throw your scarf around you and walk in our garden."

"I would rather not, mamma," answered Grace in a low tone, turning her head still more from her parent, and then, for the first time, casting her eyes on the drooping plants and now sulky little Pet. But she quickly added, "I will water my trees and chirrup to Pet a little, for he seems quite to have the mopes."

"And how comes it that he has the mopes, love?" again spoke her mamma.

"Ah! I see, mamma," returned the now half-earnest, half-smiling maiden. "I see you have been reading my heart, and that it is useless to keep anything from you. But though you have seen part that was passing there, you cannot tell all!"

"But I can guess, Grace; and that, perchance, will do as well. I doubt not you thought me very cruel—very inconsiderate in not allowing you to have quite to your own way; and I doubt not that you thought I knew very little about it; but sit down, love, and I will tell you a little passage in my own life, and after that I shall leave you to judge for yourself, only first assuring you that I have every proof that William Clively is very wild, and his father quite unable to support him in his present extravagance. See here, love, I have brought my knitting; so take up your work from the window-sill, and thus, while we are quite industrious, I will proceed to tell you that my sketch commences when I was about a twelvemonth older than you are now. At that time, Grace, I was circumstanced, too, somewhat as you are. You understand me, love?" Grace blushed and smiled.

"I had a rebellious heart, too; and there was one for whom I was rebellious—the whom I had set up as the idol of my idolatry, and one whom, unfortunately, neither of my parents approved. But yet, Grace, I own that I thought my knowledge of his habits far exceeded theirs; and all I knew of him was fair and open. Things continued thus for above eighteen months, at the end of which time my eyes were fearfully opened to his vices—he committed a forgery and absconded; though it is probable, had he started no injury would have awaited him, for his friends, who were wealthy and powerful, made up the sum for which he had risked so much, and paid it. Grace, it was some time, even then, before I could perfectly win my heart from his idolatry; but it had seen its error, and my mind was made up to overcome such perversity, and I did it. Yes, Grace; I know what it was to feel cherished affections warring against my own convictions of right. You will perhaps say that he had deserted me, and it might be that pride rose superior to neglect and slight; but not so. He did not desert me—he did not slight me; for though all others were ignorant of his destination, I knew better he had fled, and from thence received a letter full of affection and repentance for past follies. But, Grace, had I forgiven, or rather overlooked his vice, (for I did forgive), I never could have placed confidence in him again; so I wrote him once, but that once was to discard him for ever. From that time I busied myself in tending my garden, in assisting my neighbours, and, indeed, in various ways of which I had not thought before, so that people approved my conduct, too; every eye greeted me, every tongue welcomed me in joyous tones; and in time my own heart grew joyous, and felt a lightness it had never known till then, even in its wildest moments of affection for the now unworthy. But I did not know the fullness of the happiness I was to reap from that one of my life till five years had elapsed. During that period, love, your dear father had died, and knowing from all that he was beloved and respected, he won me, although not a fiftieth part so handsome or so engaging in his manner as he of whom I have been speaking. But he soon taught me to love him—I do not mean with the girlish wildness I had loved before—but with an affection which might last through sorrow, sickness, death, dear Grace!"

The tears started to the sweet eyes of Grace, and fell thickly upon the little border on which she was so busily plying her needle, as the thought of her fond father passed across her heart, and smote it for its rebellion against her will to whose care he had so solemnly entrusted her on his death-bed. The mother was also silent for a few moments.

"Well, love," she at length resumed, "you were but a few months old when, one day, I was sitting with you in a small arbour in the garden of the dwelling where we then resided. On a sudden I heard the latch of the garden gate raised, and a poor, emaciated-looking man toiled up the sunny walk. He appeared in the last stage of wretchedness, and sickness seemed to add its heavy load of misery where already there appeared to be an accumulation of ills. I rose with an intention of inquiring into his condition, and relieving him as far as my means would permit; and, taking you in my arms, I stood before him. But, Grace, I suppose that time had not so charged me as it had done him, for he instantly ejaculated my maiden name! Yes, love, you may well drop your work, and raise your eyes. It was indeed he whom I had loved, and persisted in loving, in opposition to my parent's judgment. At that moment your father appeared at the door, and when I looked on you and on him, contrasted with the wretched being that shrunk before me, my heart leaped with gratitude to God for teaching me to subdue my own evil passions. Your father had known, before our marriage, all the circumstances concerning him and myself, so that a few words made known to him the cause of the surprise pictured in both our countenances; and to make me love and reverence him still more, that good man relieved his present wants and provided for his future ones. Yes, Grace, your father fed, clothed, and lodged that repentant creature in a neighbouring cottage till he recovered health and strength—may, more, he concealed his name from all inquiring ears, and not an eye which had once known could now recognise Charles May."

"Charles May, mamma!"

"Yes, love; Charles May! The same who used to pay us the yearly visit from London, to evince his gratitude for your father's kindness. The same who died in our village of decline seven years after, leaving you the Bible and prayer-book as the only legacy which could be bestowed by poor, but repentant Charles May! But now, dear, it is growing quite dark; I will go and see our evening meal prepared, and when we have taken that, pray to your Maker, and then retire to your pillow."

And so Grace did; and the next morning, when she entered the breakfast-room, she threw her arms around her mother's neck, and whispered that she had gained the victory; she, too, would try if her mind might not overcome the erring inclinations of her heart. Yes, and Grace succeeded; and twenty years after, when she saw a daughter of her own grown up, she remembered how mildly her own mother had won her from her folly; and she felt that, to be obeyed by that daughter, she must remember that herself had once been a wild and willful being, and that it is only by placing our own hearts in the situation of others, that we can hope to influence them by our precepts.

MADEMOISELLE MARS.

The Parisian public and the critics have discovered, suddenly that Miss Mars is old; they have actually ventured to proclaim the discovery with the consoling exclamation—"We love you, Ours!"

They have gone so far as to remark that, how resplendent soever her diamonds, there is an attraction which she can never have again—youth. Her reign is over. The plainest of girls, Rachel the Jewess, has been placed on her throne. Last week, four rogues were tried at the Paris Assizes, for a robbery committed on the paraphernalia of Mdlle Mars at her dwelling. She was called upon as a witness—I translate for you, literally, the introductory examination—"Mademoiselle Mars, stand forward before the court (lively movement of curiosity.) The President, in a most courteous and winning tone—"You call yourself Miss Mars? Yes, sir, Anne Hippolyte Boutet Mars, artist's daughter of the French theatre. Your age, Miss? Forty-five years, sir. In the month of May last a crown was stolen from you? Yes, sir. That crown was of gold? Yes, sir, and gold, I believe, of silver? But it had no material value except in the workmanship. It was an homage to your dramatic triumphs? Yes, sir, each of the great parts which I played, was designated on one of the leaves of laurel," etc. As soon as she had given her testimony, she withdrew, and with her the greater part of the spectators, consisting of a multitude of lawyers in their gowns, old actresses, ladies of fashion in their most elegant dresses, dandies and dignitaries. "All," says the reporter, "attracted to the court by the renown of the illustrious comedienne, as a similar crowd was, in 1839, when she came to depose about the robbery of her diamonds, to the amount, in price, of one hundred and fifty thousand francs, and as if the tribunal had to try one of those grand crimes which specially attract spectators of distinguished name."

The same reporter adds, with all seriousness and sincerity—without the least imagination of hyperbole and burlesque—"This was quite an ordinary case of theft; nothing remarkable was to be disclosed; but the principal witness, the first witness, was to be Mlle Mars; she was to appear for a few moments only, and to utter a few words; but that is enough to account for the rush of fashion, and the impatient eagerness of the overflowing hall."

You must be convinced by these details that the popular actresses are divinites everywhere in Paris, even before and for the Bench of the Assizes. Notwithstanding the universal worship and sympathy, a general titter, or more, an absolute laugh, followed the lady's declaration of her age—forty-five! Every auditor knew—the lived French or Continental world knows—that Mademoiselle has lived, child and woman, sixty years and upwards. Perhaps she dated from the epoch of her theatrical birth! I saw her thirty-one twelve-months ago, playing all her great characters, with a maturity of form and power that warranted the presumption of thirty, though the could admirably personate all the stages between the teens and that round number. A bystander in court whispered that she could look rather young for sixty, but positively looked old for forty-five.

The Pagan savages are related to jeer at their fallen idols; so the unchristian wits of the Paris press, now that Miss Mars has been supplanted by the theatrical critics, for her favorite characters, make merry with her substitution of a calendar so far short of the parish register. It is said that the Police have advised her to lay aside a portion of the dazzling jewels which she wears as Lady Stratford, in Casimir Delavigne's new Comedy La Populaire—the rogues who rendezvous in the theatre being too strongly tempted by them, and even her life being thus endangered. It is subjoined, in some of the newspapers, that the diamonds make new conquests for her—give her a new host of admirers whose lot it may be to wear her chains a very long time—in the galleys. The political murmurs at the design of La Populaire are over that the said diamonds are the most brilliant things in an absolute sense, and that, if Lady Stratford should not follow the advice of the Police, she will be obliged, every year, to tell her age in a court—decliner son age.

The dealers in trinkets and precious stones grow enormously rich in Paris. Independently of the immensity of their business, I better understand how since I read the testimony on the trial above-mentioned, of the artist who made the stolen jewels, followed the lady's declaration for three thousand francs to the gallant officers from whom she received the tribute; and when asked by the chief judge of the court, what was its intrinsic value, he answered, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred francs—la façon et la clôture en faisaient tout le prix. I presume that this instance of opus superabat usum, is an ordinary sample of the trade. A curious book was published, last month, on the history, nature, extent, and condition of the gold and silver-smith, and jewelry profession in this capital, in aid of a petition from them to the government, in which they are represented to labour under peculiar burdens and obstacles by law, and to suffer terrible distress.

Love.—A young girl, scarcely yet awake to the mysteries of her nature, and flitting over the first demonstrations of love, in like a child sporting on the rippling strand of the sea, when a high tide is all about coming in.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

I CANNOT DANCE TO-NIGHT.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLY.

Oh! when they brought me thither,
They wonder'd at my wild delight,
But would I were at home again,
I cannot dance to-night
How can they all look cheerful!
The dance seems strangely dull to me,
The music sounds so mournful,
What can be the reason be!

Hark! hark! at length he's coming,
I am not weary—let me stay!
I hear his laugh distinctly now,
'Twill chase the gloom away.
Oh! would that I were near him,
He sees me not amid the crowd,
He hears me not—an' would I dared,
To breathe his name aloud!

He leaves that group of triflers,
And with the smile I love to see,
He seems to seek for some one—
Oh, is it not for me?
No, no! 'tis for that dark-eyed girl,
I see her now return his glance;
I pass on—he takes his hand—
He leads her to the dance!

WILKIE.—Sir John Sinclair happening once to dine in company with Mr. Wilkie, the painter, that distinguished artist was asked, in the course of conversation, if any particular circumstances had led him to adopt his profession. Sir John inquired, "Had your father, mother, or any of your relations a turn for painting? or what led you to take that art?" To which Mr. Wilkie replied, "The truth is, Sir John, that you made me a painter."—"How," I exclaimed the baronet; "I never had the pleasure of meeting you before." Mr. Wilkie then gave the following explanation: "When you were drawing up the 'Statistical Account of Scotland,' my father, who was a clergyman in Fife, had much correspondence with you respecting his parish, in the course of which you sent him a coloured drawing of a soldier, in the uniform of your Highland Fencible Regiment. I was so delighted with the sight, that I was constantly drawing copies of it, and was thus incessantly transformed into a painter!"

SOMNAMBULISM.—Dr. Prichard, of Bristol, knew a man in the habit of attending a weekly market. He used to ride in his sleep, saddle his horse, and awake to a sense of his situation only by the animal stopping at the turnpike. Another ludicrous case was that of an exquise, who had been a regular frequenter of a fashionable promenade, at a watering-place. The dandy was seen to get up at night, and, while fast asleep, walked in his nightgown along the brow of the hill, lifted his glass with the indescribable air of a finished exquise, smiled and smiled, and gracefully saluted parties of ladies whom he fancied he saw as when awake. Animal magnetism, where it has, in reality, been induced, is merely a state of artificial somnambulism. Castelli translated Italian into French in his sleep. The most curious thing was, that, when at a loss for a word, he turned it up in his dictionary.

THE SARYUNYAS.—In the terrible famine which happened in the year of the Bengal era 1177, (A. D. 1770,) many Hindoos, unable to resist the cravings of appetite, ate food from impure hands, and lost caste. These and their descendants have now united into one tribe, which is called Saryunya, because in every revolution of sixty years a famine, or some other great calamity, is supposed to occur on the year called Saryunya, as happened at the time above-mentioned. The Saryunya amount to one hundred and thirty or forty families, confined to the western parts of this district (Bengal). They have instructors and priests of their own. They now follow the Hindoo customs so far as to abstain from beef, but eat everything else. They cultivate the land.

THE SUITOR.

Full little knowest thou, who hast not tried
What hell it is, in suing long, to bide
To lose good days, that might be better spent;
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to-day, to be put back to-morrow
To feed on hope, to pine with fear and sorrow;
To fret the soul with crosses and with cares;
To eat thy heart through countless tedious cares;
To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

PORTRAIT OF A COMPOSER, BY HIMSELF.—Dalayrac, an artist of the school of Gretry, has left the following description of his own character among his papers—"I am of a sensitive but easy nature; extremely susceptible of pleasure and pain; I easily exaggerate fear and hope; I do not know how to wait; I give my confidence blindly; I also sometimes suspect on very slight appearances; I am soon transported with rage; injustice, wherever I see it, revolts and maddens me." Dalayrac supplied the French opera with about fifty-six works.

BREVITY BEING THE SIGN OF GREATNESS.—A man of high talent, he was a man of severe principles and rigid propriety.

POVERTY AND IMPERFECTION.—Cold in the stomach is a figurative expression, meaning either hunger or despair, or both. "Sir," says a Spitalfields weaver, in reply to his friendly adviser, "all that you say is true. The more gin we drink the more we want; but also the less gin we drink the more we feel the want of something else. Give us bread, meat, beer, and a good fire; then we should feel warm without gin."

BARBERS OF PUBLICK MEN.—I remember M. once drooping off observing, (says Lord Brougham, in his Dissertations,) when I said no man could tell how base men are till he came into office. "On the contrary, I never before had such an opinion of human virtue; for I now find that no man ever drops the least hint of any motive but disinterestedness and self-denial; and all ideas of gain or advantage is the only thing that none seem ever to dream of."

REMINISCENCES OF A GOOD-NATURED MAN.

BY H. O. Z.

ORATOR HENLEY was accustomed to say that cut-down boots made the best shoes. I am sure this remark will apply to the frequent transformations that take place in character. Who has not seen an enthusiast tamed into the completest worshipping—a youthful spendthrift dry into the finest specimen of a miser—and a good-natured man sour into a perfect Sir Benjamin Backbite? In proof of the possibility of this last change, I offer myself as evidence. I commenced life—existence I mean—with what is termed “a sweet disposition.” I had flaxen hair, an innocent-looking face, and large pale blue eyes, that looked as if all the colour had been washed out of them by crying; nevertheless, I was not prone to tears, and even when a baby cried quietly. I was the delight of my nurse and mother, for I could always be allowed to give up my own will by a piece of sugared bread and butter; I could wear my white frock and trousers twice as long as my sister; I loved to sit in my little chair better than to scramble about the nursery; I believed everything that was told me, and I sucked my thumb. Yet imposition on my good nature and namelessness commenced before I was out of the cradle. My sister and I were twins, but not in disposition; she was a bright, lively, voracious little thing, pretty and mischievous as a fairy—the reverse of myself, except in similarity of feature; and, though younger by half an hour, was my master, and everybody’s master about the house. She neither sucked her thumb, nor loved to sit in a little chair; she would be nursed, and nursed well—which, in nursing language, means being tossed up to the ceiling, talked, shouted, and bullied to, from morning till night. Our double arrival had not been anticipated; and if it had, two nurses, or even one and a half, could not in our household have been afforded; so that as my mother had very delicate health, my share of attention was somewhat scanty: in fact my lady-sister got it all, because she would have it: my thumb nursed me, and to such purpose, that it is to this day the only thing that has ever done me any good. As my babyhood passed away, and I learned to walk and talk, my passive temper remained the same, and increasing liberties were taken with it; I had always the least pieces of gingerbread, was the last dressed in the morning, and the first put to bed at night. It was I who was to surrender a plaything, give up my seat, make the apology in case of a quarrel, and bear the blame on the occurrence of any juvenile iniquity; all because I was “such a good-natured little creature.”

As a school-boy my character and condition remained unmodified—fagging was not allowed, but by this I gained nothing; for instead of avoiding serving one master, I served five—and twenty, the entire number of boys at school. A fatality, as if by bringing, hung over me, in two days my lively, voracious, mischievous nature was discovered, and as speedily worked upon and cheated on all all hands. I was very vain of my good-nature; and flattery on this head would induce me to do or almost suffer anything, no matter whether in a right or wrong cause. It supplied the place of sugared bread and butter; and I was ever anxious of my obedience, the schoolmasters were certain of my love in addition. The scrapes and sins that I were wheeled into, are past enumeration; and, by some chance, the chief of the blame, and most of the punishment, always fell on me, even when others were concerned; whilst in our petty perambulations or purchases, it equally occurred that the share which fell on me was the largest. However, then, by my stealing from my companions, and then being flogged for it by the master, I had my reward in the universal admission, that I was “the most good-natured boy in the school!”

School-days passed, and I became a member of that larger seminary—Society; calculated in its construction to harden, strengthen, subvert, and embitter; but I received from it no such change in me. It strikes me now with amazement, but so it was; for years I remained the same obliging, complying, assenting creature that I had been in the nursery and at school; ready to help every one, prone to believe every one, anxious to reconcile every one; in my conversations a stream of assents, in my intentions harmless, but in my actions certainly not so. I had no discrimination—there lay the flaw. My amiability was extended to every one alike; and without any thought of consequences, my praise was so universal, that as it cost, so it was worth nothing—my peace-making was often effected at the expense of truth, my courtesy was apt to trench upon sincerity, my charity as often gratified impudence as real want—and of my justice, it might frequently be said,

Voix ne justice ten injuste.

I am sure I was very amiable; but for want of being under the government of a strong understanding, I was perpetually involved in trouble, and did my friends little good. I had a horror of unkindness in thought, word, and deed; but I had not an equal dread of injustice: it annoyed me personally to hear scandal; and with throwing its golden arrows on all sides displeased me, if coupled with malice, however gay. It positively made me uncomfortable to hear people abuse each other, or try to make each other ridiculous; and I laugh now to reflect on the sober good faith with which I long to set myself against the current. Circumstances mixed me up pretty largely with society of various kinds. I had an immense and heterogeneous assemblage of friends and acquaintance; and circumstances also placed me in positions where I had an extensive power of expressing my opinions. I do not think there is any possible combination of laudatory words with which I am not acquainted—which I have not in some shape applied to every living creature I know; and what was my reward! All made use of me, and yet scarcely considered my services worthy of thanks; and at last a time when I had puff, even to the last puff, remained in an ass’s snout, to be audible, that if my words could be distilled and bottled, they might be hung against peach-trees to catch wasps with, instead of honey-water! In private, my good nature equally, or even more signally failed. From my multitudinous connexions, I had the mortification of hearing every one I knew and cared for, severally and soundly abused. It was in vain I disapproved, proved, and reprov’d—the more I tried to stop the scandal, the faster it moved—it was Myrrhe Von Wodenblock’s enchanted leg. Surely I was a true friend! How I travelled from circle to circle the perfect genius of laudation, and the personification of Thomson’s “eternal mildness.” I am afraid there was a little alloy in my generous springing from the timidity of my nature; hating and dreading to offend myself, I supposed every one else hated and dreaded it equally; and I hoped, that if I was so generous in administering praise, others would be as generous in making a return. I found out at last, that the majority of persons in the world—persons, rather, who live before the world—do not care what or how much is said of them; and that the major part of the ill nature in the world is offered them of wit and idleness, than of sheer malice and intention. But three painful moods of mind are long since past; I no longer vex my memory to carry to this friend the compliment I heard him say by that; I no longer transmit to one author the eulogy penned upon him by another; I can join in a laugh at my neighbour’s expense; and instead of discreetly forgetting a witty libel, I can help to affix it to the back it was meant for. It was in self-defence that I suffered my transcendent good-nature to ooze from me; I found that I was invariably reckoned on as a sure man; I found that not more than a few did justice to my real kindness of heart; I found that, with all my sparing of others, I was never spared myself; or, if spared, was laughed at; I found myself slighted in public and passed over in parties; no one asked my opinion, and no one listened to my remarks—

Augusta sings, but no one hears her;
Augusta sings, but no one cheers her!

I was such “a good creature” that every one treated me badly, till self-love would bear it no longer, and I determined to amend. Since I altered my tactics, it is astonishing how much my position in society is improved—how much more attention I gain—and how much better I am thought of. I can now harp an epigram with the best, and am in time come to dip the point in poison; I can twist a meaning, suggest a motive, strike a tendering, add wings to a personal joke, snort in print, talk scandal in private, and cut throats in my dreams. And I am better liked—have gained a character for being clever, whilst my personal comfort is increased. People who ventured to slight me in my good-natured days, are paragons of attention to me, now that I am good-natured no longer. I am listened to when I speak; and if I promise a service, it is no longer considered a right, but a favour. The only danger is, that I may go too far; and in my escape from an excess of complimentary, obliging, officious desire to please, may become really spiteful—as indiscriminate in my sarcasms as I once was in my praise. I sometimes fear that I may prove, that very sour vinegar can be made from very sweet sugar.

CHOICE OF DEATH.

The count of Lannoi, one of the most brilliant ornaments of the court of the treacherous Louis XI. of France, was condemned to death by that monarch on a wrongful charge of having carried off the daughter of the celebrated painter Fouquet. To add to the torture of his situation, the king, by an exquisite refinement of cruelty, sent his barber, Oliver le Dain, (so familiar to the readers of Quintin Durward), to announce to him, as a special favour, that the king allowed him to choose whatever mode of death he might prefer. Lannoi was a man of courage; he knew, too, that the king himself loved, loved to see that same quality in others, he therefore did not lose heart, but announced his choice in the following letter:

“SIR—I am penetrated with gratitude for your majesty’s extraordinary kindness, and for the anxiety you testify on the subject of my punishment. You will believe me when I say I had far rather have lost my life in your majesty’s service than on such a charge as this; but since my death is determined, I send you that purple chain of gold you wore at the battle of Quesnoy, and placed yourself on the neck of my father, Roi de Lannoi, in the thickest of the danger, with these memorable words—Papez Dain, my friend, you combat too fiercely; you must be chained up, for I do not want to lose you, but want you to serve me many times more.” With this chain, sire, I wish to be hanged at the foot of the Tower du Nord, where I was wounded by an arrow meant for you on the night you went the rounds, I carrying a torch before you.”

This appeal was such as not even Louis XI. could resist, and Lannoi’s punishment was delayed until time proved his innocence. —Translated for the Mirror.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE FOUNTAIN.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

FOUNTAIN, that springest on this grassy slope!

Thy quick cool murmur mingles pleasantly,
With the cool sound of breezes in the beech,
Above me in the noontide. Thou dost wear
No stain of thy dark birthplace; gushing up
From the red mould and slumy roots of earth,
Thou fallest in the sun. The mountain air,
In winter, is not clearer, nor the dew
That shines on mountain blossom. Thus doth God
Bring, from the dark and foul, the pure and bright.
Thou tangled thicket on the bank above
Thy basin, how thy waters keep thy green!
For thou dost feed the roots of the wild vine
That trails all over it, and to the twigs Ties fast her clusters. There the spice-bush lifts
Her leafy lances; the viburnum there,
Palat of foliage, to the sun holds up
Her circle of green berries. In and out
The chirping sparrow, in her coat of brown,
Steals, silently, lest I should mark her nest.

Not such thou wert of yore, ere those old woods
Bowed to the white man’s axe. Then hoary trunks
Of oak, and plane, and hickory o’er thee held
A mighty canopy. When April winds
Crew soft, the maple burst into a flush
Of scarlet flowers. The tulip-tree, high up,
Opened, in air of June, her multitude
Of golden chalcids to humming-birds
And silver-winged insects of the sky.

Frail wood-pinkies clustered round thy edge in Spring.
The liverleaf put forth her sister blooms
Of faintest blue. Here the quick-footed wolf,
Passing to lap thy waters, crushed the flower
Of Sanguinaria, from whose brittle stem
Thou dost drop fell like blood. The deer, too, left
Her delicate foot-prints in the soft moist mould,

And on the fallen leaves. The slow-paced bear,
In such a solitary summer noon as this
Stopped at thy stream, and drank, and leaped across.

But thou hast histories that stir the heart
With deeper feeling; while I look on thee
Thy rise before me. I behold the scene
Hoary again with forests; I behold
The Indian warrior, whom a hand unseen
Has smitten with his death-wound in the woods,
Creep slowly to thy well-known rivulet,
And slake his death-thirst. Hark, that quick fierce cry
That rends the utter silence; ‘tis the whoop
Of battle, and a throng of savage men
With naked arms, and faces stained like blood,
Fill the green wilderness; the long bare arms
Are heaved aloft, bows twang and arrows stream;
Each makes a tree his shield, and every tree
Sends forth its arrow. Fierce the fight and short,
As is the whirlwind. Soon the conquerors
And conquered vanish, and the dead remain
Gashed horribly with tomahawks. The woods
Are still again, the frightened bird comes back
And plumes her wings, but thy sweet waters run
Crimson with blood. Then, as the sun goes down,
Amid the deepening twilight I desecrate
Figures of men that crouch and creep unheard,
And bear away the dead. The next day’s shower
Shall wash the tokens of the fight away.

I look again—a hunter’s lodge is built,
With poles and boughs, beside thy crystal well,
While the meek antler stains the woods with gold.
And sheds his golden sunshade. To the door
The red man slowly drags the enormous bear
Slain in the chestnut thicket, or flings down
The deer from his strong shoulders. Shaggy fells
Of wolf and cougar hang upon the walls,
And loud the black-eyed Indian maidens laugh,
That gather, from the rustling heaps of leaves,
The hickory’s white nuts, and the dark fruit
That falls from the gray butternut’s long boughs.

So centuries passed by, and still the woods
Blossomed in spring, and reddened when the year
Grew chill, and glaucous in the frozen rains.
Of winter, till the white man swung the axe
Beside thee—signal of a mighty change
Then all around was heard the crash of trees,
Trembling awhile and rushing to the ground,
The low ox, and shouts of men who fired
The brushwood, or who tore the earth with ploughs.
The grain sprang thick and tall, and hid in green
The blackened hill-side; ranks of spiky maize
Rose like a host embattled; the buckwheat
Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers
August winds. White cottages were seen
With rose-trees at the windows; barns from which Swelled loud and shrill the cry of chautier;
Pastures where rolled and neighed the lordly horse,
And white flocks browsed and bleated. A rich turf
Of grasses brought from far o’er thy bank,
Scattered with the white clover, mallow-eyed girls
Brought pails, and dipped them in thy crystal pool;
And children, ruddy-cheeked and flaxen-haired,
Gathering the glistening cowslip from thy edge

Since then, what steps have trod thy border! Here
On thy green bank, the woodman of the swamp
Has laid his axe, the reaper of the hill,
His sickle, as they stooped to taste thy stream.
The sportsman, tired with wandering in the still
September noon, has bathed his heated brow
In thy cool current. Shouting boys, let loose
For a wild holiday, have quinity shaped
Into a cup the folded hidden leaf,
And dipped thy shining crystal. From the wars
Returning, the plumed soldier by thy side
Has sat, and mused how pleasant ‘twere to dwell
In such a spot, and be as free as thou,
And move for no man’s bidding more. At eve,
When thou wert crimson with the crimson sky,
Lovers have gazed upon thee, and have thought
Their mingled lives should flow as peacefully
And brightly as thy waters. Here the sage,
Gazing into thy self-replenished depth,
Has seen eternal order circumscribe
And bind the motions of eternal change,
And from the gushing of thy simple font
Has reasoned to the mighty universe.

Is there no other change for thee, that lurks
Among the future ages! Will not man
Seek out strange arts to wither and deform
The pleasant landscape which thou makest green!
Or shall the veins that feed thy constant stream
Be choked in middle earth, and flow no more
For ever, that the water-plants along
Thy channel perish, and the bird in vain
Alight to drink? Happily shall those green hills
Sink, with the lapse of years, into the gulf
Of ocean waters, and thy source be lost
Amidst the bitter brine! Or shall they rise
Upheaved in broken cliffs and airy peaks,
Haunts of the eagle and the snake, and thou
Gush midway from the bare and barren steep!

ROWLAND HILL.—On an occasion of his preaching a charity sermon he said, “I once got a thousand pounds by a charity sermon. I hope I shall get as much to-day. But observe, if any of you are in debt, don’t put any money on the plate. Recollect—take time—deliberate. If any of you owe money, be just before you are generous. Stop, though! On second thoughts, those who don’t give will be pointed at, ‘Oh, he or she is in debt,’ etc. On another occasion he said:—“I do think a young idle clergyman will be numbered among the most wicked upon earth; and to tell you the truth, I should have been ashamed to have lived so long (eighty-eight years) if I had not worked hard, and used all my strength in God’s service. I am now in the valley; but in all my travels, I could never see the top of the mountains, until I got into the valley.”

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE following lines, from the pen of a young lady of Edinburgh, were called forth by a landscape by Horatio McCulloch, an artist of great promise, and whose productions have been enlarged by Professor Wilson, for their exceeding beauty and truth to nature. A friend of the author has obligingly sent us these stanzas.

THE HIGHLAND LOCH.

It bursts upon my raptured sight,
In all its stern magnificence;
A glorious vision of delight,
Filling my soul with joy intense.
Mountain, and glen, and clustering wood,
And the pure lake that dreaming lies,
Rejoicing mid the solitude
Of glowing earth and laughing skies.
Entranced I gaze—the torrent's roar
Seems hoarsely in my ear to speak—
I almost think I feel once more
The mountain breezes fan my cheek.

The wizard, Fancy, sweeps away
The stranger throng that round me stand,
And blissfully my footsteps stray
Within thy shades, my mountain land!

Oh! how my gladden'd spirit leaps,
To drink thy free and cloudless air;
That throng thy cells so freshly sweeps,
Chasing all gloom that linger'd there!

* * * * *
A friendly voice has burst the spell—
Back to reality once more!
Yet not less rapt my musings dwell
On the theme to which they soar.

Oh, genius! new brightest of the bright!
Of heaven's high gifts the most divine!
What soul has never felt thy might?
What witchery can vie with thine!

Amid the city's noise and glare,
To call up silent hills and streams,
And breathe upon the world's hot air
The freshness of our early dreams.

To bear us on thy swift bright wing
Back to the fairy realms of youth,
When life had no discordant string,
And all was beauty, love and truth!

Such is thy power, oh gift divine!
Though far beyond all human praise,
I leave before thy lofty shrine
The offering of my simple lays.

INEX.

FROM CORRESPONDENTS AT HOME.

The difficulties on the border appear to be at an end, but there has been so much inquiry after the fate of the young volunteer, John Smith, that we cannot withhold the following letter from publication, notwithstanding it relates to matters somewhat passé.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

SMITHVILLE, Down East, in the state of Maine, March 30, 1899.
DEAR GENTLEMEN.—I've got another letter from my son John down to the boundary war; and as I 'pose you like to have 'em pretty well by your putting of 'em in your papers, I make haste to send you a copy of this by the first post. It is as follows.

Our Disputed Territory, pretty near the Lane, on Fitzherbert's farm, March 25th, 1899.

DEAR FATHERS—We stick by here yet, takin' care of our disputed territory and the logs; and while we stay here, the British will have to walk as straight as a hair, you may depend. We aint had much fighting to do since my last letter; and some how or other, things seem to be getting cooler down here a little, so that I'm afraid we aint going to have the real scratch, after all, that I wanted to have. A day or two after we took the logging camp and brought the men and oxen off here prisoners of war, we was setting in the fort after dinner and talking matters over, and Sargent Johnson was a wondering what a plague was the reason the British didn't come up to the scratch as they talked on. He said he guessed they wasn't sich mighty fairer fellers for war as they pretended to be, after all.

"Well," said Colonel Jarvis, "I got some despatches from Governor Fairfield this morning, that says Sir John Harvey seems to be a little inclined to haul in his horns; and I don't believe they'll try to drive us out of our disputed territory, or come near us. But still the governor says we must hold on and look out sharp, for he don't know how 'twill turn out; and we must keep possession of the territory, and not let anybody come into it, nor any logs go out of it, till we have further orders."

"Well," says Sargent Johnson, "I don't like this staying about here doing nothing; I aint use to it. If them British are any notion of coming here and having a tug with us, I wish they'd come and have it over. Why don't they go clear to the line, colonel? How do we know but what they'll get over this side on't sometimes, if we aint there to see to it? And besides, I want to see that boundary line, that I've heard so much tell of; and I'm determined to see it before I go home, if I have to march down to it all alone; so I can have it to tell my children of, when I get to be an old man, and can say to 'em, I have seen the boundary line myself, and marched clear down to it and stood on it."

Here I couldn't help putting in a word tu; and says I—
"So do I, colonel, I want to see that are boundary line, and go right up to it, and toe the mark; I never was dared to toe the mark yet, but what I did it, let who would stand t'other side. And I should like to go right up to this line, and put my toes on to it, and look over on to the British side, and stump them to come up to it if they dared."

At that Colonel Jarvis turned round and looked at me, and haw-hawed right out; and, says he—

"Well done, John, you are growing quite wolfy. I like your spirit any how; but you are young and inexperienced, and don't understand all the turns of the game exactly. You hain't seen so much war as your old great grandfather has; you must try to keep cool and feller your officers."

"But, colonel," says I, "do you know grandfather?"
"Yes, I do," says he; "I have heard him tell his war stories many a time. Didn't he give you no good advice when you come away?"

"Nothing," says I; "only he charged me not to be in too much of a hurry to fire."

"Well," says the colonel, "you'd better remember that advice, and feller it. And it's a pity Billy Wiggins hadn't a grandfather to advise him."

At that Billy Wiggins rolled up his little gray eyes at the colonel, and fairly looked red; and says Billy, says he—
"Well, colonel, my gun goes too easy, and I can't help it. I've been a squarrel hunting with it so much, it'll almost go off itself, before you think on't."

"But this ain't what we was talking about," said Sargent Johnson; "and I don't see as it brings us any nearer the line. As I said afore, colonel, I don't like this staying about here and doing nothing; and if things are getting cooler down a little, so as like as not we shall have to go off home pretty soon, I think the sooner we take a peep at that boundary line the better."

The colonel said, the boundary line wasn't but a few miles off, and we was as near to it now as 'twas prudent to have our headquarters. We'd got a good strong place here on Fitzherbert's farm for a fort, and we must stick by it and keep it well manned and guarded. And he said, bein' Sargent Johnson and his company was so good on a scouting-party, and did so well t'other day when we took the logging camp, he didn't keer if we tried it again the next day. We might go out and scour round awhile, and see if we could find any more trespassers, and go down as far as the line if we'd a mind to; only be careful and not get over on t'other side of the line; for if the British nab'd us there, we should be lawful game, and it would be hard work to make 'em give us up.

So we was all alive in a minute, fitting out for a new campaign. We went to work and rubbed up our guns, and put new flints into 'em, and got 'em so they'd go as quick as a stream of lightning.

And the next morning we was up by times and got our breakfasts, and filled our knapsacks, and started off. We hunted round most all the forenoon to find some more trespassers, but we couldn't find hide nor hair of a single one. We thought we must be pretty near the line, and sometimes we begun to feel a little skittish for fear we might get across and not know it, and the British might hop up behind some of the old logs and trees and nab us before we could have time to take aim at 'em. Bime by Billy Wiggins started on ahead of us and run like a two-year-old, up to a little hill there was a little ways ahead; and then he begun to climb a slim, tall pine tree, and he hitched and scrambled up as fast as a young bear.

"What upon earth," said Sargent Johnson, "is Billy arting now?"

"A squirrel, I guess," said I; "I'll bet a potato, Billy has treed a squirrel."

When we got along up a little nearer, Sargent Johnson called out to him to know what he was doing up there.

"I'm jest a looking off here to see if I can see the line," said Billy, stretching his neck away to the eastward, and looking with all the eyes in his head.

"Well, do you see it?" said Sargent Johnson.
"See it! no," said Billy, "I don't see nothing but woods, and woods, as far as I can see."

Sargent Johnson told him he guessed he would see it quicker if he was down on the ground, than he would up there. So Billy come down again, and we jogged along. Bime by we come to a tree that had some old marks and spots on two sides of it. And we looked along north and south of this tree, for Sargent Johnson said the line runs due north from the monument, and we found some more trees marked and spotted jest like it.

"Ah," says Sargent Johnson, "we've found it. This is the boundary line we've heard so much tell of; we've got it at last. Now look and see if you can see the British on t'other side of it; and let every man hold on to his gun and be ready to fire, if I say the word."

We looked across the line, and looked and looked, but we couldn't see nothin' but trees, and bushes, and woods, and swamps. We hollered across the line as hard as we could holler, to see if we could raise any of the British, for we all felt as if we wanted to have a brush. And we thought at first they answered us; but when we come to holler again, we found it was only the echo of our own voices, that come back from the hills a little ways off. So we marched along on the line two or three miles, but we couldn't see nor hear nothin' of nobody. At last we set down and got the victuals out of our knapsacks and eat our dinners, and rested awhile. When we got ready to start again to go back to our fort, Sargent Johnson said we should give the British one broadside before we left 'em, jest to let 'em know what the Yankee boys are made of. So he told us to see that our guns was all right; and then he ordered us to stand up all in a row, and toe the line, facing to the British side; and then he give us off the word—

"Make ready, take aim—fire."

"There," says Sargent Johnson, "now I can go home contented, war or no war; for we've poured one good grist into their own territory, and they may help themselves if they can."

Then we put on our knapsacks and shouldered our guns and started back towards the fort. We fit our way along through the bushes and swamps two or three miles, till we come out a little more into the upland, and as we was walking along and talking and telling how we guessed the British wouldn't dare to come up and toe the line as we had done, all at once we come across a great track in the snow. We stopped and looked at it awhile, but we couldn't tell what sort of a track it was. Some guessed it was a bear, and some guessed it was an ox, and some guessed it was a horse, but they all said it didn't look like nary one of 'em. At last Billy Wiggins said, he didn't believe but what it was the British lion got over on to our side of the boundary line. At that we all had a good laugh, and Sargent Johnson said, if that was the case we'd have a hunt for him, for no British lion had a right to set his foot in our disputed territory. So we turned off and follered the track. Bime-by we looked ahead a little ways amongst the trees, and there we see it. 'Twas a great critter, that looked some like an ox, only 'twas about as tall and as long as a horse; and he had a great mess of horns sprang out both sides of his head like a great bunch of dry hemlock knots.

"There," says Billy Wiggins, "didn't I tell you it was the British lion? Don't you see his horns?"

"But, taint the lion that has horns, it's the unicorn that has horns, according to my book," said Jonathan Downing; "and I guess it's a unicorn."

"No," says I, "taint a unicorn; unicorns don't have but one horn, and this feller's got a dozen."

He stood with his head up, exiting the bark off the limbs of the trees. And as soon as Sargent Johnson got 'so near he could have a fair sight of him, he sung out, "it's a moose—it's a moose; now we'll have some fun; now for a moose chase."

As soon as the moose see us he jumped his whole length, and started to run. He threw his head back on his shoulders, and tipped it one side so as to bring one bunch of his horns over his back, while t'other bunch pined forward so he could run between the trees and bushes, and he jumped and run like a young ox, and we arter him as tight as we could spring. We couldn't fire at first, for we had forgot to load our guns again arter firing our broadside on the line; and Sargent Johnson said it was no matter about stopping to load, for, if we could get him into a good stout snow-bank, we could take him alive. So we pulled foot arter him as hard as we could go. Some of the way the snow was pretty deep, and so hard we could run on the top of it. But the moose broke through almost every step, and he had sich hard work jumping and floundering along, he couldn't gain ahead of us hardly a bit. At last he got kind of wedged up between some high rocks on one side and some old trees that was blowed down on t'other side, and there he was in as bad a fix as Billy Wiggins was, behind the great pine log that I told you about in my last letter. There was no chance for the poor moose to get away, but to turn right back and make his way right through among us. He looked round at us, and shook his head a few times, and bime-by he turned round and fetched a spring and come right at us full chisel. We sprung, some one way and some t'other and give him a chance to go by, and Jonathan Downing fetched him a lick across his nose with his gun and broke his gun stock. But poor Billy Wiggins couldn't spring out of the way so quick as the rest of us, and the moose run right against him, and knocked him head-over-heels, as much as a rod, and the next jump he stepped on to one of Billy's legs and broke it off as short as a pipe-stem. We run and helped Billy up, and found he wasn't hurt much, only his leg was broke; so Sargent Johnson told one of the men to stay by him, and we took arter the moose again. Arter we chased him about half a mile further, he got into sich a deep snow-bank, it stopped him. He jumped and floundered round, but he couldn't get out, and only got deeper and deeper into it, till at last he was all covered in the snow-bank, but his head and horns, and there he stuck, pretty well tired out. We walked right up to him. His eyes looked as wild as if he'd eat us up; but he couldn't help himself. We took some strong lines that we had with us, and tied 'em to his horns on both sides of his head, and took a slip-rope round his nose, and trod the snow down, and got him out of the bank. We found by trying him round a little, that we could manage him so as lead him and drive him to the fort alive. So we sent two hands back to bring Billy Wiggins up, and they brought him along, and we took and set him straddle of the moose, and told him to hold on to the horns. Then Sargent Johnson took command of the ropes one side and I on t'other, and each of us took a hand to help us hold on, and Jonathan Downing took hold of the line that had the slip-rope round the nose, and went ahead to pick out the best path; and the other five went behind with sticks and whipped us. When we got all fixed, we started off and made pretty good headway. Poor Billy Wiggins begun to cry some, and said he would never get home, now his leg was broke; but Sargent Johnson comforted him up, and told him "to never mind, for if he hadn't his leg broke he might never have had a chance to ride home to the fort in triumph on the British lion." At that Billy laughed, and seemed to be in pretty good spirits the rest of the way. We'd got out pretty near the fort before we ketched the moose, and a little before sunset we got out into the opening, and was marching up the hill towards the fort.

When we got up pretty near, Colonel Jarvis come running to meet us, and says he,

"Sargent Johnson, what sort of a prisoner have you got here?"

"Why, this is the British lion," said Sargent Johnson; "we took him this side of the line, and, therefore, he's fairly our prisoner."

"You are the boys for me," said the Colonel; and he went back and told the men, and they give three the loudest cheers for Sargent Johnson's company that ever I heard. The Colonel had supper for us in a few minutes, and took Billy Wiggins into the hospital, and had his wounds dressed, and he bids fair to do well, and took the mouse and tied him in the barn. Colonel Jarvis says we must keep him alive, and carry him home as a grand trophy of the war.

P.S.—I want mother to send me down two pair of stockings and a pair of trousers, for we get 'em torn out terribly down here among the bushes. So I remain, your loving son, — JOHN.

DEAR GENERAL—Peter Smith, Esquire, Henry W. Smith, Esquire John Smith, John Smith the fourth, Ischabod Smith the second, Sam Smith the third, John Smith the ninth, and old Mr. Zebadiah Smith and all his children, all wants you to send 'em your paper, beginning with the one that had my first letter in it. Your friend and subscriber, JOHN SMITH, ESQUIRE.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE ABBE CHATEL AND HIS CHURCH.

BY CHARLES CONSTANTINE FISE, D.D.

HAVING observed in "Galignani's Messenger," that on a certain evening, at seven o'clock, the Abbé Châtel was to deliver a discourse on the subject of Religion, in the Eglise Catholique Française, I determined to attend the service, and inform myself of the nature of the system which he has established. Accordingly, at the appointed time, I walked to the Faubourg St. Martin, and was directed to the place of worship, which is situated, number fifty-eight, in the rear of a large Magasin. Over the gate-way, the tri-coloured flag is displayed, and the name of the church inscribed. The building is low, narrow, old, and dark; and appears to have been erected for a storage-house, or, possibly, for some theatre of the commonest kind. Over the entrance, stands a cross, which is placed there for the purpose of exciting in the people the impression, that this church, like every other church in Paris, is in communion with the christian religion. But this, the reader will see, is a mere delusion. The interior presents a most extraordinary aspect. The altar seems arranged in the usual manner: a crucifix rises over the tabernacle, three lofty candles glimmer on either side. The chalice, covered with a rich veil, is displayed; and two altarcards (as at a distance they appeared to be), stand, one on the right, the other on the left. On the left of the altar, the tri-coloured flag streams over the inscription "GLOIRE"—on the right, another over the inscription "PATRIE." Over the altar, there is a large painting, badly executed, representing an angel, holding in one hand a cross, and with the other pointing to heaven, having under her feet a withered female with a tiara on her head. This represents the Genius of Reform trampling down the ancient institutions, religious and political. The sanctuary is small, and arranged like that of our poor country churches. On approaching to examine more minutely the altar, I discovered that what seemed altar-cards, were pictures—one representing St. Vincent de Paul, and the other Fenelon. On the walls, several other pictures, of the Blessed Virgin, our Saviour, Fenelon, St. Vincent de Paul, and a bust—I believe of Socrates—are displayed.

The congregation collected—a motly assemblage of the canaille of the city—they ranged themselves on each side of the church, leaving an aisle of about four feet in width between. The number of persons might have amounted to about four or five hundred, all of whom, with the exception of some visitors whom curiosity attracts to this singular place, were evidently the dregs and refuse of Paris. A Suisse, with cocked hat and mace, directed me to a seat, not far from the pulpit.

The clock tolled seven—a little parlour-organ was struck by a young man with mustachios, beard, and streaming hair—when, lo! two individuals, both robed in purple cassocks and capes—and one decorated as a bishop, with a golden cross hanging on his breast, and a ring sparkling on his finger—made their appearance in the sanctuary. The latter was the Abbé Châtel, who styles himself Primate of the French Church:—the former, a priest of his own construction. The Primate was originally a Catholic clergyman, and chaplain in the French army. He is of ordinary height, stoutly built, common in his bearing and appearance, and about forty-eight years old. After standing an instant before the altar, (I believe it is a part of their religion never to kneel,) they took their seats on two old-fashioned arm-chairs, lined with purple, and placed on a platform covered with a carpet. The vespers were then intoned by the Primate: he was instantly responded to by all the congregation, accompanied by the abovementioned organ, the tones of which screeched shrilly through the rough vociferations of the heterogeneous singers. The service is performed in the French language. Instead of the psalms and hymns, verses and songs of a patriotic and profane character, are substituted, all of which are pregnant with deistical and anti-catholic sentiments. As an instance of these songs, I select two verses, which are stentoriously shouted forth every Sunday evening by the Primate and his disciples:

"Et toi, O vierge, fuyante la monastère Deviens une chaste et respectable mère!"

This is sung to the tune of Dixi Dominus, etc.

Chatel ascended the pulpit; and after casting around the temple a solemn and magisterial look, broke the silence with these words: "Au nom du Père, et de Jésus Christ notre Frère et Legislateur." This is the form of what he styles the sign of the cross, which sign he does not, however, make upon his person. He spoke on the subject of religious belief—condemned all denominations; and by name, Protestants of the Church of England, Methodists, Presbyterians, and, above all, the followers of the Pope of Rome. Still, he eulogized Vincent de Paul, (he would not deign to give him the title of saint,) Fenelon, Louis IX., Turenne, etc.—admitted that all sects had produced examples of great virtue, especially the Roman Catholics—denounced, in one breath, the luxury of the churches and the lives of the clergy; and, in the next, acknowledged that it was religion that inspired men to erect those immortal monuments to the faith of Jesus Christ, and poured forth a stream of eloquence in favour of the monks who preserved literature and science from the desolation in which everything else seemed to be involved. He spoke of the gods of Rome, and the gods of Greece; the god of the first century of religion, and the God of the middle ages. He then apostrophized the divine Socrates—Et toi divin Socrate, etc., and concluded, by exhorting all his hearers to purchase La Code de l'Humanité, of which he himself is the author.

Before leaving the pulpit, he reminded the people, that on the twentieth of December, they were to celebrate la fête des vieillards, which was to be very imposing and interesting. He recommended them to select twelve boys and twelve girls, for the purpose of introducing the aged men to the altar, etc. He regretted that the unfavourableness of the weather would not permit, at present, the celebration of the fête de démolisseur; but that should take place in the month of May. He then descended from the pulpit, and, amid the chanting of the men and women, accompanied by the Suisse, went through the church, collecting with his own hands, the donations of the people.

Never did there exist a more inconsistent and heterogeneous system, than that of the Abbé Châtel. I could not restrain my feelings on the subject.

"Why," said I, to a person sitting by my side, "since the Abbé is so opposed to the Roman Catholic religion, and the priests, why does he robe himself in purple and appear like a bishop?"

"Oh, Monsieur, he is the Primate," was the reply—and he continued straining his throat with the songs. I turned to another, who seemed rather of a better order.

"Does the Abbé say mass?" I asked.

"Mais, certainement, il dit la messe," he answered. "Don't you see the altar, the chalice, and the book. But he will do all this away, as soon as possible. He cannot effect all that he desires as yet." This explained the whole. All these remains of the Catholic church he displays to the poor ignorant people, merely to dupe them. Were he to throw them aside, the old women would recognise no religion in his temple; and the young, who, particularly in France, delight in all that strikes the eye, would soon abandon him. Hence his pompous dress, his ceremonies, his vespers—hence his mock-mass, which is composed of heathenish appeals to the deity, and songs of liberty—hence the sacrilegious elevation of the host, while boys, robed in white, ring the bell, and swing the censor, but during which, all remain seated—hence the benediction chanted by the minister, and imparted, as in orthodox churches, with the sign of the cross.

After the service, following a number of persons who pressed into the sacristy, I ventured to direct my way thither, to converse, if possible, with the soi-disant Primate. Finding a good opportunity, I drew near him, and extending my hand, remarked that I was a stranger, attracted from curiosity to his church, and that it would afford me satisfaction to ask a few questions concerning his creed.

"From what country do you come?" he politely asked, taking my hand.

"From the United States of America," I returned.

"Bien; from New-York—things go on well there."

"Perfectly well, thank God," I answered—"I come, you see, from a protestant country, and am in quest of information wherever I can find it—and I should not like to return home without deriving, from its very source, a true notion of the system you preach."

"We are Deists, sir," he emphatically said, "Deists in the widest acceptance of the term."

"You do not, therefore, admit the Scriptures, Monsieur l'Abbé?"

"Not the Scriptures of men."

"I mean what is commonly styled the Bible."

"They have no divine authority for me," he replied.

"You do not believe in eternal punishments, sir, if I understood your discourse, this morning?"

"Parbleu!" he exclaimed, with much emotion, "do you think that God can be forever angry with his creatures?"

"But you admit a temporary purification after death?"

"Yes—but all shall ultimately be saved—Mahomedans, Christians, Jews, and all without distinction."

"Would it not be more consistent, Monsieur l'Abbé," I asked, "to deny any punishment whatever? because God cannot be angry at all—either for time or eternity. He knows no passion—"

"It is well I am not discussing the subject with a Roman priest," he interrupted me—"with protestants we can reason, (imagining me to be a protestant)—but there is a funeral service to be performed, and I beg you to excuse me."

I requested him to pardon me for having intruded on his time and his duties; assured him that my idea of his religion was now formed—derived from his own assertions—and bade him bon soir.

Before my visit to this church, and my interview with the Abbé Châtel, I was under the impression that he was a mere innovator and a schismatic, adhering to the ancient forms, though performing the service in the vernacular tongue. Many persons, also, with whom I have conversed, believed this to be the fact. But I have convinced myself, in the most authentic manner, that he is anti-christian, and what the French significantly style a Farceur. Nor is there much danger of his gaining many proselytes. In spite of all his efforts, and writings, in the space of six years, he has been able to establish but three temples in all France. One in Paris, which I have just described; one at Mont Rouge, and one at Nantz. The French people look upon him with contempt—and notwithstanding all the difficulties it has had to contend with, the ancient religion of France still holds her glorious sway over the hearts of the nation. To be convinced of this, one need but visit, on Sundays and festivals, the churches of St. Roch, l'Assomption, and, above all, that splendid and beautiful bijou, Notre Dame de Lorette.

ORIGINAL LETTERS FROM THE WEST.

LETTERS FROM DETROIT.

The stranger who approaches Detroit in one of the thirty fine steamers which visit her wharves—a boat, perhaps, of the first class, with cabins draped as magnificently as Mrs. —'s boudoir, will scarcely believe that twelve years ago the mail was brought in once a week on horseback, and sometimes through the famous, or infamous, Black Swamp, on a man's shoulders, while one single small brig was the ordinary means of getting to Buffalo, via Lake Erie. Now two important railroads, already in operation through a portion of their length, terminate in the city; abundant means for the rapid transition deemed so desirable in these flying times, meet the traveller at every turn, and thronged hotels offer ample provisions for his comfort while he sojourns in the queen of the north-west.

One is apt to forget that Detroit is almost as old as Quebec and Philadelphia. The present aspect of the place is rather that of one of the mushroom cities of western New-York. The sight, however, chosen with the peculiar sagacity of the French settlers of this region, is much finer, and more adapted to the erection and display of splendid buildings, than that of any one of those newly dignified imitations of Babylon the great. The village of Geneva, on Seneca Lake, is a sort of Miniature of Detroit, and I know of no other place which resembles it. There is the elevated plain overlooking the water—the noble street which runs parallel with its edge—the pretty houses embosomed in trees which continue dotting the bank far beyond the busy and closely built part of the avenue—but Detroit, on further inspection, shows some traces of its more ancient origin. Not that Fort Pontchartrain has left any vestiges—not that Wawatonong still bristles with pickets, though I believe some fragments of that primitive defence may yet be found; but in traversing the thronged thoroughfares of this modern, well-built town, one comes suddenly upon a cottage of the most antiquated, old-world structure, or a log-hut which looks as if it might have sheltered one of those devoted Catholic missionaries who were the indomitable pioneers of this lacy wilderness. And one meets at every turn, fair ladies, in such gear as fair ladies ever love, reclining on cushions in carts of the most ordinary construction, carts which conveniently, and let me add, most rationally back up to the doors, and (unless they dump by mistake, as sometimes happens) deposit their precious freight, without deranging a curl or soiling a tiny slipper.

The Roman Catholic cathedral appears at first view, like a fragment of olden time, though it is in fact scarcely more than a score of years since its foundation was laid. It is an odd-looking building—a curious compound of stability and fragility—of coarseness and parsimony. Its walls of heavy, hammered granite, are surmounted in front by an oblong wooden tower which sustains two wooden steeples, and the cupola over the nave, and two pepper-box belfries behind it, are also of wood and of very mean construction. The interior of the building presents similar discrepancies, save that poverty there predominates more strikingly. The large size of the church is rather imposing, but the woodwork is entirely unpainted—the ornaments and religious emblems are like children's toys—the figures of the Virgin and Child on the inferior altars are the common dolls of the shops, enshrined among faded artificial flowers; the high altar is surmounted by wretched pictures, and one would conclude the priests to be, one and all, brothers of the order of St. Francis, so unfeignedly poverty-stricken are most of their vestments. I am told that there is no provision for warming the building, in the severest weather; and I recollect witnessing a wedding there, in very cold weather at eight o'clock in the morning, when the poor elbows of the pretty bride and her maids, unclad in having selected evening dresses for the chilling ceremony, loomed indigo blue through the blond veils which were their only covering, while the groom looked as if he wished himself anywhere else. Yet with all this apparent lack of means, the Romish bishop is reported by those who watch with pious dread everything which threatens to extend the influence of the Catholic church, to be immensely rich, and to be supplied annually with large sums from European sources. Be this as it may, he is now erecting very large additions to the dilapidated episcopal residence—additions which seem preparing to swallow up the old rookery entirely, and which are supposed to be intended for the use of a theological seminary or college of priests. The Catholics have another church here, an old shattered building, which is to be pulled down some day, and replaced, we are told, by a splendid edifice.

The Protestant Episcopal Church is a pretty specimen of "mediocre gothick," the entire building, inside as well as out, having been subjected to a thorough refacimento within a few years. The interior is well arranged and in good taste, save the awkward height of the new galleries and some little lawdreness about the pulpit. I have heard that the disproportioned length of the house makes it rather difficult to the speaker, but Bishop McCook fills it with his clear, ringing tones, without any apparent effort.

The Baptists and Presbyterians have each a large and commodious brick house of worship, and the Methodists and German Lutherans wooden ones, of very ordinary character; and these comprise, I believe, all the provisions made in Detroit for the public service of the sanctuary; very sparing, certainly, for a city which boasts ten thousand residents.

The other public buildings are in the usual plain style, well adapted to their several purposes, but not particularly ornamental to the city; though the State-House, well situated and graced with a pillared portico, is rather an imposing object. The Town-Hall is placed somewhere near the centre of an immeasurably odd triangle, called, in Judge Woodward's plan, the Campus Martius, now the terminating point of the great central rail-road, and partly occupied by the erections necessary to so busy a depot.

The convent, which is generally inimical by far strangers, at least young lady strangers, might be passed an hundred times without exciting the least suspicion that its low and dingy yellow walls veiled

"Vigil and penitence austere."

It looks as if it might be a row of supplemental bed-rooms to some hotel, or a corner fragment of some ancient barracks of Fort Shelby. There is nothing Radcliffian about it, certainly. The good sisters of St. Clare are neither young nor handsome, and they are buried in the thankless and (vide Sir W. Scott and Charles Lamb) "Herodian" occupation of teaching little girls, all which is rather unromantic. But they are reputed to be the kind and self-denying friends of the orphan and the homeless, and it is said that when the cholera ravaged Detroit in 1835, these humble recluses, with a Romish priest or two, were to be found at the bedside of the sick, the dying and the dead, while many of their neighbours deemed it necessary or convenient to absent themselves from the city entirely. The county poor-house remains to this day under their care, from having been thrown upon their mercy at that season of desolation. And this establishment is reported to be conducted in a manner and spirit far different from that which marks many of these professed refuges of the destitute, while the excellent baths which are provided there are thrown open for the advantage of the public, and the small revenue accruing from this source appropriated with religious scrupulosity to the benefit of the poor.

It may with strict truth be said of Detroit, that it abounds with resources for the suffering and the needy. A general "Benevolent Society," composed of females of all Protestant denominations, is unremitting in its labors of love, and the children of poverty never apply in vain for its aid. Two associations for the relief and education of the orphan, one Catholic, the other Protestant, are in full activity and widely useful; some half dozen free-schools supported by the different religious societies, and one of forty scholars by a Catholic lady, are among the most valuable aids of the poor; and Sunday schools are maintained in all the churches by the most persevering—I might say self-sacrificing—efforts of a comparatively small portion of the members.

The wise and good are anticipating, with fervent hope, the beneficial influence of these kindly exertions upon the rising generation at least; trusting that those who visit their goodly city, in time to come, may less frequently encounter the revolting evidences of reckless profligacy—the little shivering child of wretchedness, bearing under her tattered cloak the paces which is to destroy the parent—the poor lost drunkard, skulking in by-ways to shun the un-moving finger of scorn—the pale faced libertine, young in years but aged gone in sin and misery, ever ready, with nosem-hidden dirt or fanciful sword-cane, to avenge a construed insult or defend a profligate associate. May their pious wishes be fully realized, and Detroit delivered from these and all other blots upon her fair escutcheon!

EXTRACTS FROM WORKS IN THE PRESS.

ROBIN DAY.

The following is an extract from "The Adventures of Robin Day," by Dr. Bird, to be published by Lea and Blanchard.

I was as wretched and hopeless a creature as could be, when the business of my master carried him, one summer's day, to a certain great town in New-Jersey, situated upon a river, where we cast anchor in the morning; and I, without troubling myself with any thoughts of shore, which was seldom my lot to visit, fell to work at my vocation in preparing my master's dinner; in the course of which, I had occasion to murder a venerable old gander that had been squalling in the coop, in expectation of his fate, for the last two days. This execution being over, and not without five or six heavy cuffs, which my patron gave me for performing it bunglingly, I snaked away to town, where, perched upon the bowsprit, I began, in the process of plucking the animal, to distribute a shower of feathers over the tide.

This operation, as it chanced, attracted the attention of a knot of schoolboys who were playing, some of them on the wharf hard by, while three or four others were busking about in a bateau, to which they had helped themselves; and, whether it was that there was something more than usual of the ludicrous given to my employment by my uncouth appearance, or that the urchins were ripe for mischief, they forthwith began to salute me with a battery, first, of jokes and sarcasms; to which they afterwards added an occasional volley of pebbles and oyster-shells. This was the proceeding that caused me no surprise, for I had been too much accustomed to unkindness all my days to expect anything else; and, I may also add, that such was the indifference to bodily pain into which I had been beaten, and so stupefied within me were all the ordinary instincts of self-preservation, that although I was once or twice hit by the missiles cast at me, and in danger of faring still worse, I neither removed from my perch, nor interrupted a moment in my task.

My insensibility, or want of courage, as it doubtless appeared, gave additional edge to the malice of my persecutors; and those who were in the bateau, having taken in a sufficient supply of small shot—that is to say, of the pebbles and shells as aforesaid—ventured to rush into the stream, for the purpose of attacking me nearer at hand, which they did with infinite zeal and intrepidity; and one little fellow of ten years old, that seemed the greatest imp of all, the most voluble in railing, and the most energetic in attack, succeeded in planting upon the top of my forehead the ragged edge of an oyster-shell, by which I was cut to the bone, and my face in a moment covered with blood. This, indeed, stung me to resentment, for the anguish of the wound was very great; but so sluggish were the movements of all my passions, that I had scarce proceeded to a greater length in the expression of my rage than by turning a haggard look of reproach upon the assailant, when an accident happened which changed the current of my feelings. The little rascal, who had immolated himself by so capital a shot, had given such energy and strength to the cast, that he lost his balance, pitched forward, and the very moment he looked down upon him, he plumped, with a dismal swirl, into the river, which was deep, and the current strong. It was evident, the tide could not swim; and such was the terror which the catastrophe caused among his companions, that they lost the only oar that they had in the boat, and were incapable of rendering him any assistance.

In the meanwhile, the hero of the scene, whose dastard I regarded with sentiments of complacency and approbation, as seeing nothing more than he deserved for the unprovoked injury he had done me, sank to the bottom, whence in a moment he came whirling and gasping to the surface, and was swept by the tide against the sloop's cable, which he attempted to seize, but without success; for though he was strong, it was for an instant, he was not able to maintain his grasp. In this state of the adventure, the little fellow was immediately under me where I sat on the bowsprit; and as the tide swept him from the cable, he looked up to me with a countenance of such terror, and agony, and despair, mingled with imploring entreaty—though being on the point of strangling, he was neither able to speak nor to cry out—that I was suddenly struck with feelings of compassion. They were the first humane emotions, I believe, that had entered my bosom for years. And such was the strength of them that, before I knew what I was doing, I dropped into the river—gander and all—to save the poor little rascal from drowning.

Such a feat did not appear to me either very difficult or dangerous, for I could swim like a duck, and had had extraordinary perseverance in the art of saving life in the water; not indeed, that I had ever performed such service for anybody but myself; but, in my own case, I had almost daily occasion; for nothing was more common than for Skipper Duck to take me by the nape of the neck and toss me overboard, even when on the open sea, except when my mate always threw me a rope to help me on board again, except when we were becalmed, or at anchor; in which cases, he left me to take care of myself. In the present instance, however, as it proved, the exploit was not destined to be performed without difficulty; for dropping down with more hurry than forecast, right before the stem, and with a force that carried me pretty deep into the water, I was swept under the sloop's bottom, which, in the effort to rise to the surface, I managed to strike with my head, with a violence that would undoubtedly have finished me, had not that noble excrescence been in those days of unusual thickness. The shock was, however, sufficient to stun and confound the small quantity of wits I possessed, and to such a degree that I lost my hold of the gander, which, up to this moment, I had clutched with instinctive care. Besides which, I was swept, before I had time to recover myself, along the whole of the sloop's bottom; and this being pretty well studded with barnacles, young oysters, and the heads of old nails, I had the satisfaction of enjoying a complete and thorough scalp-hauling as I was ever administered to any "ragged whelp" my jack, shawl, and back being scratched all to pieces. Of this, however, as I was full of the loss of the gander, I was for a time quite unconscious, being confused by the shock my head had suffered; and the moment I succeeded in passing the rudder, and reaching the surface, I had all my thoughts engaged in rescuing the boy, who had now sunk two or three times, and was, I doubted not, sinking for the last time; for he was quite insensible, when it was my good fortune to reach and seize him by the collar.

The bateau had, by this time, been borne by the tide against a projecting wharf, whither I easily swam with my charge; and then giving him up to his companions, who had now, by dint of yelling, brought several men to their assistance, I took to my heels, hoping to regain the sloop before Captain Duck, who had gone ashore, should return and discover my absence. My only way of getting on board was that in which I had departed, namely, by swimming; and so to this I betook me, by running a little up the stream, and then leaping again into the river.

My haste, however, was vain; the worthy skipper reaching the vessel an instant before myself; and when, having clambered up by the hawser and bobstay, I succeeded in jumping on deck, I—who was in such a pickle, what with my clothes torn to shreds, and dripping with water, and the blood trickling down my face, as the reader cannot conceive—found myself confronted with my tyrant in face to face. He gave me a horrible start of surprise, and I stepped forward so as to bring me within reach of his arm, and exclaimed—

"You draggle-tailed tadpole! where have you been?"—which question he accompanied with a cuff on the right cheek that tossed me full a fathom to the larboard.

"Please, sir," said I, in as much terror as my stupidity was capable of—"overboard, sir."

"Overboard, you son of a tinker's cowbell!" cried my master, giving me a cuff with the other hand, that sent me just as far starboard; "what have you been doing overboard?"

"Please, sir, saving boy's life, sir," returned unhappy I, beginning to be conscious of the enormity of my offence.

"Saving boy's life, blast my fish-hooks!" ejaculated Skipper Duck, knocking me again to the larboard; and here I may as well observe that this was his usual way of conversing with me, or rather of pointing his conversation; his stops being usually but three, a cuff to the right and a cuff to the left, which he alternated with extreme regularity, at every other speech; and a full period, used at his close, by which I had as good as a fagstone. "Saving a boy's life!" cried the skipper, boxing me as aforesaid. "I wish all the boys were in old Nick's side-pocket, roaring!—Where's the gander?"

The gander! ay, where was the gander! The question froze my blood; I remembered the loss; by this time the gander was a mile down stream, if not dead, surely lodged, in divided morsels, in the capacious jaws of a hundred catfish.

The skipper noticed my confusion, and his face of a sudden became small, being puckered by an universal frown, that began at the forehead and chin and the two ears, and tended to the centre, carrying these several parts before it, till all were blended in a knot of wrinkles scarce bigger than his nose. He stretched forth his hand and took me by the ear, of which I saw the mop-pall as big as my whole body; and giving his arm a slow motion to and from him, like the crank rod, or whatever they call it, of a locomotive, just as it is getting under way, and making my head, of course, follow in the same line of traverse, unattended in my ears—

The gander! you two-born of a horse-mackerel! where's the gander?"

"Please, sir," I spluttered out, in a confusion of intellects that was with me extremely customary—"boy was overboard—jumped overboard to save him—"

"D—n the boy!" quoth my honest master; "where's the gander?"

"Please, sir, jumped overboard," I repeated; "got under the keel; knocked head—seizes out, and—"

"And the gander? blast my fish-hooks! the gander!"

"Please, sir, couldn't help—most drowned—lost it!"

The skipper's eyes rolled in their sockets, and he turned them to heaven, as if to invoke thunderbolts of vengeance on my guilty head. Then taking a quid of tobacco, to compose his nerves, he made me a speech, unprompted, first, that he had bought me of old Mother Moll at the price of a ten-gallon keg of rum; secondly, that I was not worth the tenth-part of a sous-marine, or ten scales of a red herring; thirdly, that I was the ugliest wall-eyed, shock-headed son of a ship's monkey he had ever laid eyes on; fourthly, that he had always said I would come to the gallows, without even the grace of arriving at the yard-arm; fifthly, that he had borne with many of my dog's tricks as mortal man could; sixthly, that the loss of the gander was the most atrocious piece of cold-blooded knavery he had ever heard of, for which hanging was too good for me; and seventhly and lastly, that as it was his duty to take a father's care of me, he would forthwith proceed to give me the handsomest round-up he had ever had in my whole life, in his fish-hooks. And this oration, which was interlarded with more profane execrations than I desire to repeat, being ended, he kicked and dragged me along into the cabin; where, seizing up a rope-end, he fell to work upon my half-naked body with a vigour that, I think, would have ended in his killing me outright; had not fate sent me assistance in the person of a friend—it was the first one I ever had—whom the accident of the morning had gained me, all unknown to myself.

The little boy whom I had saved from drowning, was, as it happened, the son of a worthy and wealthy gentleman, a physician, of that town, who chanced to be night at home, when I landed the little fellow on the wharf; and being drawn thither, among others, by the cries of the children, had the happiness to find me almost restored to his senses, and suffering no inconvenience from the catastrophe, except a good ducking and a hearty-fright. He took pains to inform himself on the spot of the particulars of the accident, which a little inquiry among the boys soon put him in possession of, including all the circumstances of the attack, as well as of my instrumental aid in saving the graceless urchin; and he was pleased to express as much approbation as surprise, at what he called my magnanimity—a word, by the by, which, when he afterwards delivered it into my own ears, filled me with consternation, as, from its bigness, I supposed it must mean something very horrible. Nay, my feelings becoming more generous, when he discovered from what a wretched looking little imp (for it seems I had passed him, while running up the wharves, and he had noticed my squalid appearance,) the good act had proceeded, he determined to visit the shallop on the instant, to do me reparation for the injuries I had received, as well as to reward me for my humanity—which word also, when he pronounced it, struck me as a very terrible one, though not so awful as "magnanimity." He accordingly procured a boat, and, in company with several other persons, immediately came on board, the visit being for me the most opportune in the world, as the honest skipper was threatening me, as he himself expressed it, "with an inch of my life," and was, indeed, so enraged in the business, that he was entirely unconscious of the entrance of the visitors into the vessel and the cabin, until my new friend, shocked and enraged at his brutality, brought it to an end by suddenly knocking him down with his cane.

My miserable, wretched appearance—besides my starveling looks, the blood was still streaming over my face—and the inhuman tyranny to which he thus saw me exposed, operated to such a degree on the benevolent feelings of this most excellent man, that he determined to release me from my skipper's clutches altogether; which he immediately effected, by carrying me ashore to his own house, where he dressed my wounds, and had me washed and clothed in decent attire.

Nor did his good offices rest here; for having questioned me, and discovered what a endless creature I really was, and how much I had suffered from the cruelty of the skipper, his indignation was raised to such a pitch, that he proceeded to engage information before a magistrate, who immediately granted a warrant for Duck's apprehension, and he was in a few hours laid by the heels in the common jail; when, being tried, he was sentenced in a heavy fine, and punished with a month's imprisonment. And this punishment not seeming severe enough to certain worthy citizens, whose choir had been exceedingly inflamed by the developments of his cruelty that took place at the trial, the skipper was no sooner released from prison than they carried him aboard his own vessel, where, after subjecting him to the process of keel-hauling, administered in a much more regular way than had happened in my case, they shaved his head and tarred and feathered him from top to toe, and then ordered him to get under way, never to appear again in their waters, under pain of being hung from his own cross trees—an injunction which, I believe, the scornful yet faithfully observed, for I never heard of his being again seen in that neighbourhood.

LITERARY NOTICES.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"LE SINAI, IMPRESSIONS DE VOYAGE, PAR ALEX. DUMAS." New-York: De Behr. 1839.

We have already noticed in the Mirror the translations of this very entertaining work, by Mrs. E. S. Gould, and should be guilty of a great oversight, did we omit to express our pleasure at seeing the work republished in this city in the original language. There is too little attention paid here to the modern literature of France, and Mr. De Behr, in thus bringing to our knowledge the last work of one of the most popular and pleasing of living French authors, has entitled himself to the thanks of all who read the language. The style of the work is easy and eminently readable, and there is a quiet vein of satirical pleasantry running through it that is a new feature in a book of eastern travels. Most voyagers have contented themselves with showing us the grave and serious side of oriental character and adventures: Dumas has an eye to the comic and whimsical, likewise. A French journal, of distinguished literary character, finds fault with M. Dumas for indulging his turn for merriment even at the foot of the Pyramids, and on the top of Sinai; but we cannot agree in the justice of this severe criticism, belonging, as we do, to that large party of readers who had rather have an author good-humoured and mirthful than grave and dull, selon les règles. Our business is at present with the original, and not the translation; but we cannot refrain from adding, that Mrs. Gould's version possesses another merit besides those we have mentioned already, namely, that she has omitted or altered a few passages which, in the original, are too freely expressed to suit the severity of our American manners. Attached to the book, is an account of the celebrated inroad of St. Louis into Egypt, which is derived, in a great part, from the curious, but little-known chronicles of the Saut de Joinville, and gives a most lively and graphic picture of the great strife between the French chivalry and Moslem warriors, which resulted so unfortunately for the brave but ill-starred monarch of the Christians.

"NEW-YORK REVIEW." No. VIII. April, 1839. New-York: Published by the Proprietors, 592 Broadway.

One excellent trait in this ably-conducted review, is its devotion to American literature and subjects of national interest. Why should our magazines and reviews extend their surveillance over the authors of Great Britain, to the neglect of our own? One would think that Lockhart, Wilson, Jerdan, Dilkes and Co., were quite able to dispose of the cases brought to their critical tribunals, without the co-operation of transatlantic Radamantus. In the present number of the New-York Review, out of thirty-six notices of new works, more than thirty are of native production. This is as it should be, and the plan, if persevered in, will elevate this work to a higher and more influential position than has yet been attained by any periodical publication in the country. The article on the "National Portrait Gallery of distinguished Americans," contains much interesting information on the subject of the fine arts in this country; and the defence of the proposed international copy-right law gives evidence of great ability and research. We sincerely trust that the New-York Review, devoted as it is to the interests of American literature, will be liberally assisted by the public.

"SELECT MINOR POEMS."—Translated from the German of Goethe and Schiller, with notes, by John S. Dwight: Boston. 1839. Hilliard, Gray and Co. 12mo. Pp. 429.

Several of the pieces in this collection have appeared in the Magazines of the day, and among them we notice the admirable translation of Goethe's "Vanitas, vanitatum vanitas" published a few weeks since in the Mirror. It is rendered with remarkable spirit and fidelity. We do not remember to have seen a better version of Schiller's celebrated "Song of the Bell," than that furnished by Mr. Dwight. The measure of the original is very successfully preserved. The "Ideal," and the "Dignity of Woman," are capital, and the same may be said of the "Artist."

"BIANCA VISCONTI." A Tragedy in five acts. By N. P. Willis. New-York: Samuel Colman. Pp. 108.

The merits of this beautiful play were first made known to the public through the medium of the Mirror, and we welcome its appearance in its present elegant form with much pleasure. Upon the stage its success has been complete. As the readers of this journal are already acquainted with many of the most exquisite passages in the piece, we should run the risk of repetition in making any quotations. In the last act Mr. Willis has made material alterations, and the play has evidently undergone a thorough and unsparring revision. It deserves, and will occupy, a place among the standard productions of the stage.

THE LITTLE FRENCHMAN AND HIS WATER LOTS, WITH OTHER SKETCHES OF THE TIMES. By George P. Morris. With etchings by Johnston. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard. 1839. Pp. 155.

It may not become us to speak in terms of eulogy of the literary production of this beautiful volume, but we may be permitted to say that the typography is extremely neat, and the illustrations by Johnston spirited and appropriate. Without passing judgment on the work, we will, however, cordially recommend the reader to possess himself of it at once, believing that, unlike the "Little Frenchman," he will not have cause to repent of his bargain.

THE MONTHLY MISCELLANY OF RELIGION AND LETTERS. Boston: William Crosby and Company.

From the prospectus of this work we learn that it is to assume the position of a "conservative reformer," and that it is to be made up as much as possible in reference to the passing times. The editorial department will be conducted by Professor Palfrey.

The author of the essay entitled "True Greatness of Character," will perceive by examining the plan of the Mirror, that his communication is hardly suited to our columns. It is a little too didactic; but only written, and characterized by the "noblest sentiments."—"The Tall Man's Apology," is a very good and polished essay, and we regret it is not of our power to find room for it.—"The inquiry of Pindarus," we can reply that the bust of Max Tree may be seen at the Mirror Office, or at the office of the "Ladies' Companion." It is admirably executed, and is without a very good likeness. The artist is Mr. Decker of Boston, a self-taught sculptor, and one who gives ample promise of excellence in his profession. The engagement of Mr. Sinclair at the Park will not affect Mr. Frazee's engagement at the National.—"Ode to the contrary notwithstanding."—"To R. D." no, no.—"We must decline the communications of 'Javouille, junior,' 'Ariel,' and 'C.Y.D.'—The account of Mademoiselle Rachel has already been anticipated in the Mirror.—Charles Keen is, we believe, engaged at the National, and "Thespis" is informed that we have heard nothing of the report to which he alludes.—We are indebted to the United States Magazine and Democratic Review, for the beautiful poem by Mr. Bryant, on our third page.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1839.

Packet-day.—Of the many exciting scenes that transpire in our busy metropolis, one of the most interesting and characteristic is that which occurs on the occasion, known to our citizens as "packet-day." It is a day full of bustle and business to the brokers, the banks, the passengers, the friends of the passengers, and to all who have any communication with the "old world." Taking advantage of the earliest breeze that may be propitious, the packet-ship spreads her white wings to the wind, and drops down our noble harbour, towards the Narrows. The passengers and their friends are on board, and for awhile all is conviviality and good-fellowship. If there is a brisk breeze, a few of the more delicate of the company may be a little "seasickish," but their situation detracts not from the gaiety of the rest. At length, they have reached the "Narrows;" and the steamer, which is to bear the "friends of the passengers" back to the city, is puffing and wheezing alongside of the packet-ship. Now all is hurry and excitement. "Passengers for New-York will please quit the ship," is the stentorian exclamation. "Friend grasp the hand of friend, and a hasty 'God bless you' is their parting greeting." "Farewell—take care of yourself—give my love to Victoria—don't be sea-sick—let alone that baggage—stop the steamboat—take care of the plank, Miss—mind your footing—good-by, good-by." Such are the exclamations now poured forth with a volubility which language cannot express. At length the passengers for New-York and Liverpool are divided. The steamer swings off gracefully from the side of the larger vessel, hats and handkerchiefs are waved, as a few faint buzzes mingle with the "good bys" and "farewells" of friends. The proud ship, careering to the breeze, bows her white sails and taper masts to the wind, and spreads away over the unfathomed deep. Soon she fades and dwindles to a speck in the distance, and the steamer, regardless of wind or tide, glides back to the city, and lands her passengers.

Launch of the Decatur.—The launch of the United States sloop of war, Decatur, at the navy-yard in Brooklyn, on the ninth instant, was a glorious sight. At the concerted signal, the blocks which detained her were knocked away, and she sprang to her destined element like a proud courier to the battle-field. Never before did we experience so fully the force of Byron's celebrated verse—

"She walks the water like a thing of life."

As she floated, in queenly beauty, the imagination could almost invest her with human attributes, there seemed such a conscious pride and power in her movements over the subject waves. And then the question occurred, what will be her future fate? Will she carry the stripes and stars triumphantly to distant seas, or will she be dismantled by the ruthless storm, and dashed with her devoted crew upon the craggy shore? May such a disaster be averted from the gallant Decatur. She is truly a beautiful craft, and worthy to bear the name of one of the noblest of naval heroes. "We rejoice," says the American, "to see the name of a man so justly dear to our country and navy, thus renewed in one of our noble ships of war. We predict that she will always be a favourite with seamen, and ill betide him who lets her fall an easy prey to the enemy. The law requires that the sloop of war shall be named after towns of the different states. There are at least six or eight considerable towns in the western states called Decatur—therefore Mr. Paulding has shown his good taste and sense in thus paying a just compliment to those patriotic settlers who adopted the name of the gallant hero, as well as to the name itself. She is constructed on a model furnished by Samuel Hart, Esq., principal naval constructor at this station, and will, it is not doubted, prove a fast sailing ship. Her equipments are all on the most approved plans, combining economy with efficiency. Prosperity to the good ship Decatur, wherever destiny may lead her."

New music.—Atwill has published a new song from Balfe's celebrated opera of the "Maid of Artois," beginning, "The rapture dwelling," also, a comic song, sung by Mr. Latham, entitled "Who'd have thought of seeing you." From Millet, we have received a beautiful song—the words by Leitch Ritchie, and the music by Knight—entitled "Calmly rest, my bonnie bairn." Messrs. Hewitt and Jacques have published the following—Go, forget me; the music by Knight and the words by Wolfe. The Birth-day.—The fair rose of Killarney—Come, gang awa' wi' me.—The long lost strain—I would not be forgot.—The Moorish drum—Oh, lovely is the forest shade—I cannot dance to-night, (poetry by Bayly)—and "The rapture dwelling," by Balfe. All these songs are well deserving the attention of amateurs.

American statuary.—A writer in the last number of the New-York Review says:—It is a striking fact, illustrative of the difference in the degree of attention paid in our country to painting and sculpture, that while the former has here been cultivated to the extent we have just seen, and produced so many and such eminent artists in all branches of the art, the latter has been almost entirely neglected. Mr. Frazee is, we believe, the only sculptor in this great city capable of executing any piece of statuary of higher order than a Galen head for an apothecary, or a figure of Grief for a grave-stone, and we know not of his having attempted any grand work of art. We have seen several fine busts by him, and some bas-reliefs for architectural ornaments, so well executed, that had they been imported from Italy they would have been exceedingly admired.

From what he has already done, we may fairly expect some lasting monument of his genius; for to that character he is entitled by the extraordinary skill he has acquired in this enchanting art, by his own unaided tuition." Concurring, as we do, in this well-merited compliment to Mr. Frazee, we think that the writer will qualify his remark as to that artist's being the only sculptor in this great city, when he shall see the beautiful statue of Victoria recently executed by Mr. J. V. Stout, and now offered to public exhibition at the Stuyvesant Institute. We know that Mr. Stout, in this single production of his chisel, has shown talents, which, if duly cultivated, will give him a lasting reputation among the sculptors not only of this country but of the age.

Picture of a shabby-gentle man.—The following picture of a shabby-gentle man, is given by a favourite satirical writer:—"If you see hurrying along a by-street, keeping as close as he can to the area-railings, a man of about forty or fifty, clad in an old rusty suit of threadbare black cloth, which shames with constant wear as if it had been bewaxed, the trousers tightly strapped down, partly for the look of the thing, and partly to keep his old shoes from slipping off at the heels; if you observe, too, that his yellowish white neck-cloth is carefully pinned up, to conceal the tattered garment underneath, and that his hands are encased in the remains of an old pair of kid gloves—you may set him down as a shabby-gentle man." Such a one did we see yesterday in Broadway, walking, apparently in the forlorn hope of meeting some one who would invite him to dinner.

"We pitied him, for he was poor;
We loved him, for he was alone;
The man who wears a tattered coat
Is seldom sought and little known."

Sandwich Island criticism.—The Honolulu Gazette remarks, in relation to two of the most popular of American poets—"Tepepiti ahim Bryant toai Halleek usuman making Raungia tepletu pung." We dissent entirely. We are in the regular receipt of this journal, in the columns of which we find many extracts from the New-York Mirror. The following bit of intelligence is from a late number of the "Honolulu Gazette":—"CATASTROPHE.—Walking near the sea-side the other day, we saw a man running towards us, with great celerity, grasping in his hand, what, at first sight, we took to be a stone or fragment of brick; the appearance of the individual immediately seemed to justify the belief that he had a design upon us. Fearing disagreeable consequences, being a small man, and feeble, we raised our cane to avert any suddenly impending attack, and examined our attenuated supporters to judge of their capacity for bearing us out of the reach of danger; the man came up—raised his clenched fist—recoiled with impetuosity, 'Here is six dollars for the subscription to your Gazette, please to give me a receipt!'"

Phrenology and Mr. Combe.—The distinguished phrenologist, Mr. George Combe, commenced a second course of lectures on his favourite science, at the Stuyvesant Institute, on Saturday evening last. It is to be continued on Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday evenings till the seventeenth of May. We are glad to perceive that these lectures attract large and respectable audiences. Mr. Combe has devoted the energies of a strong mind, and years of laborious study, to the subject on which he discourses, and no one can hear him without deriving new facts and ideas relative to the moral and physical education of man.

New periodicals.—A new penny daily paper is announced by Mr. H. Hastings Weld, (late co-editor of the Sun), to be entitled "The Despatch." Mr. Weld is a gentleman of fine abilities, and of great experience as an editor. "Colman's Monthly Miscellany," is the title of a new monthly periodical, to be issued the first of June, by Mr. Samuel Colman, under the superintendence of Grenville Mellen and William Cutter, both men of talent, and able to secure competent assistance. Success to the undertaking.

Down with the dust.—The promenade of Broadway has been much inconvenienced during the late dry weather, by the simooms of dust which eddy through the great thoroughfare of this metropolis. The Khamreen of the Arabian desert is not to be compared to this stifling atmosphere. The corporation must see that the streets are more thoroughly sprinkled. "Down with the dust," has become the universal cry.

Anelli's paintings.—The private exhibition at No. 74 Chambers street, of Mr. Anelli's historical paintings and portraits, will soon close. These paintings are of more than ordinary merit, and no lover of the art should miss the opportunity of seeing them.

Life in New-York.—The first number of this periodical has appeared, full of satire, humour, and interest. Its tone is severe, but free from all ill-natured references; and we have no doubt of its meeting with eminent success.

OH! CAST THAT SHADOW FROM THY BROW.

A FAVOURITE BALLAD—COMPOSED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR—REPUBLISHED BY REQUEST.

Oh! cast that thy brow, My dark eyed love be glad a - while— Has Lie-la's song no music now? Is there no spell in Lie-la's smile! There are wild ro - ses in my hair, And morn are on their bloom, of their fra-grant air, As cold va-pour from the tomb! I took my lute for one sad song, sang it though my heart was wrung, The wild sad loved so long; You ne-ver smiled though Lie-la sang, Nay, not now, it my heart, Ah! how can love is o'er! I on - ly, now that we must part, I on - ly feel we meet no more, I on - ly know that we must part, I on - ly feel we meet no more.

MISCELLANY.

NEW WAY OF GETTING A CANE.—An English gentleman was recently walking under the Arcades of the Rue di Rivoli, in Paris, holding in his hand a gold-headed cane, of splendid workmanship; a man supported by two crutches came up, and asked for alms in a mysterious manner and pitiful tone. The gentleman, moved to pity, gave the beggar a small silver coin. At the same moment, a person near him suddenly exclaimed, "How can you, sir, allow this rogue to deceive you! Please to lend me your cane, and I will show you that the rascal runs better than I can." The Englishman, taken unawares, without reflecting, lent his cane; the beggar, the moment he perceived it in his detractor's hands, threw away his crutches, and took to his heels as if his satanic majesty in petticoat was running after him, and was followed by the man with the cane, whilst the spectators, and the Englishman particularly, remained in convulsions of laughter at the sight, and exclaiming alternately, "Oh, he will be caught!" "No, he will not be caught!" But both the racing heroes disappeared at the next opening in the street, and the good Englishman remained waiting for his splendid cane, which cost five hundred francs.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.—"I never," said Sir Walter Scott, "could eat the flesh of any creature I had known while alive. I had once a noble yoke of oxen, which, with the usual agricultural gratitude, we killed for the table; they said it was the finest beef in the four counties, but I never could taste Gog or Magog, whom I used to admire in the plough."

BRITISH RULE IN INDIA.—Young men govern there without society, and without sympathy with the native. An endless, hopeless prospect of new flights of birds of prey and passage is for ever passing before the eyes of the people. The cries of India are given to seas and winds, to be blown about in every breaking up of the monsoon, over a remote and unhearing ocean.

THE LOVER'S LEAP.—Two lovers at Chalons-sur-Saône, about to be parted by a forced marriage of the girl to another and a richer suitor, held a few nights ago, says a Paris paper, a last interview on the roof of a house, where they were accustomed to meet. The young man proposed an elopement, but, meeting with a positive refusal, he, in a moment of passion, took his sweetheart in his arms, and, exclaiming, "Then there is nothing left for us but to die together!" sprang from the parapet, which was upwards of sixty feet from the ground, thinking to carry her with him. He fell on the pavement, and was taken up most severely crushed; but the young woman snatched at a projection of the wall and was saved. One of her arms, however, was fractured in two places.

PLEASURE AND BUSINESS.—A late Parisian police report says, that on the previous evening, one of the police arrested in the rue de la Peupière, one of those intrepid sportsmen who pass the night in hunting cats in the narrow streets of the capital. He was accompanied by two boule-dogues (bull-dogs) whom he had trained to the sport, and who brought the game to his feet with the neck neatly broken. His game-bag was already full of gnomkins and kittens. It is not necessary to say for what purpose they are purchased by certain restaurateurs. He made also an additional profit by the sale of the skins. The offender was convicted of violation of the peace, and of pursuing the pleasure of the chase without the necessary permit.

ECONOMY.—A correspondent of the Bay State Democrat tells a good story in illustration of this commendable virtue. Here is the anecdote:—A miserly man would often say to his children, "Now, my dears, which of you will have a cent and go to bed without any supper?" Answer—"We all will, father." The next morning he would say, "Will you all give a cent, and have warm cakes for breakfast?" "Yes! yes!" they would reply, with one accord. Thus he would get his money back again, and cheat them out of one meal worth double the amount.

JOHN KEMBLE.—Perhaps no man ever acted so completely up to a character as Kemble. For the time he almost imagined himself to be the very thing he represented. The example to the above role happened one night at a provincial theatre, when John performed the character of Brutus. The unfortunate wight who that evening represented Marc Antony, fatigued by his exertions, sought behind the scenes refreshment from a tankard of cool porter. John, making an exit from the stage, caught the noble Antony in the very act! He shrank aghast from the horrid sight! Marc Antony drinking porter! Kemble struck the offending paw-pot from the actor's hands, ran to his string-room, threw himself on a sofa, and much time elapsed before his brother actors could prevail upon him to continue the performance.

SUETT'S LANDLADY.—Suett had at one time a landlady who exhibited an inordinate love for the vulgar fluid, yeapt gin, a beverage which Suett himself by no means held in abhorrence. She would order her servant to get the supplies after the following fashion: "Betty, go and get a quarter loaf and half a quarter of gin." Off started Betty: she was speedily recalled: "Betty, make it half a quarter loaf and a quarter of gin;" but Betty had never got fairly across the threshold on the mission ere the voice was again heard—"Betty, on second thoughts, you may as well make it all gin."

CIRCULATION OF MONEY.—Rothchild's two sons, who have managed the business of the house since the old man's death, are said to be spendthrifts of the first water. Thus it is: the covetous rich man is generally a sponge for his heirs to squeeze.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

MEANWHILE, however, the men of Massachusetts-Bay, had so multiplied, that all the neighbourhood was tributary to them. Already were they strong enough to spare six hundred, seven hundred, nay, a thousand at a time of their native youth, year after year, to struggle with Philip of Mount Hope—a royal barbarian, who made war, as the man of Europe would make war now—like a savage—and without mercy—if he were beset on every side, like Philip, the warrior-king of the great western world, by a greatly superior foe, whose hatred was a part of his religion—a part of his very nature—a part of his immortal hope; as the man of Europe would make war, and be justified by the law of nations for so making it, if his dominions were ploughed up and laid waste by such a foe—the very wilderness about him, the burial-place, the sanctuary of his buried fathers, fired; their form of worship scouted; every deep grave, and every sacred place of prayer, laid open to the light, with all their treasures and all their mysteries; every temple not made with hands, every church built by the builder of the skies, and roofed as the skies are, demolished or profaned.

At last, in the year 1691, the prophecy of Mary Dyer began to be accomplished, and the children of those, who had been her judges and her destroyers, were afflicted in their turn by misery, torture and a cruel death. A part of the curse, which that other woman of power, the celebrated Mrs. Hutchinson, alone alluded to, had pronounced upon the magistrates and the people, when they drove her forth into the dreary wilderness, there to perish, with all her young household, began to be remembered, with a secret and a thrilling fear. She was the dearest friend of Mary Dyer. They were sisters in life and sisters in death, although not after the flesh—sisters in spirit only.

Sir John Phips, a native New-Englander, of "low birth," as the chronicles of that age take care to inform us, though a man of remarkable energy and wholesome strength of character, was governor, when the sorrowful transactions of our story occurred. He was a very shrewd, honest, wilful, uneducated man, who had acquired a large property, and a title, by a course of mercantile adventure, it was believed, until it came out, strangely enough, that his great wealth had been fished up out of a Spanish wreck, which a friend of his, Matthew Paris, a minister of Salem, had met with some account of, in a scrap of an old newspaper, that fell in his way. There were facts enough in corroboration of the story, which, indeed, was never doubted, until the rage for wizards, and witchcraft, and witches, took possession of the people; after which they did not scruple to wag their heads, in passing, nor to insinuate rather bitter things to the prejudice of their governor and Mr. Paris, to whom he was indebted for the information, thus accidentally obtained by the latter, which led, after many trials, and a long course of disappointment and misrepresentation, to a discovery of the treasure on the coast of La Plata.

Matthew Paris lived about four leagues from Boston, at Nauskeag, near Salem; occupying a remote lonely house on the edge of a thick wood, in which were many aboriginal graves, and a large flat rock, in the midst of a haunted hollow, which was held in great awe by the wild men, and always avoided by the whites with especial care, from a belief that human sacrifices, or devil-worship, had been offered there—perhaps to Hobbamockoo, or Rawayantweet—and perhaps to Ritechuan, their great invisible father. It happened that Mr. Paris, the preacher, had lost a young wife about a twelve-month before these troubles broke out; a wife whom he had married, not because of her youth and beauty, but in possession of both; and everybody saw and acknowledged, when he lost her, that he would never hold up his head again—his white venerable head, which went with a blessing, and carried with it a blessing, whithersoever it went. He was a broken-hearted man, weary of life—a grasshopper was a burden to him; and, but for his duty as a preacher of the gospel, and as a father, he would have shut himself up in that primitive age, and kept away from the sight of the world for ever. Still, he had one hope—one earthly hope, and one earthly comfort. A sweet child had been spared to him, the image of its mother, who was like a child from the day of her birth up to the day of her death: and yet his grief would have been despair, but for his piety. It was the sorrow of old age—that unsupportable sorrow, which comes of unexpected bereavement, just upon the threshold of another world; the sorrow of one who is ready to cry out in the desolation of a widowed heart, whenever he draws up to the fireside, or the supper-table, or wakes in the dead of night—from a cheerful dream, perhaps—to the frightful truth; finding the heavy solitude of death about him, the darkness of death weighing upon him, his bridal-chamber quiet as the grave; his marriage-bed—his home—his very heart—which had been occupied with a blessed and pure love, uninhabited, and for ever!

His family consisted of this dear child, about nine years of age, a niece about eleven; a male and female Indian, who did all the drudgery of the house, in-doors and out, and were treated little better than slaves—inasmuch as God had promised the heathen, and the "utmost parts of the earth," to them, who were certain of being in the right way; a small white boy, and a wretched creature, who having deserted his tribe in a season of war, and betrayed a chief, to whom he owed a sort of allegiance at the time, had become a by-word, a hissing, and a reproach, throughout all the neighbouring tribes, among whom, by way of showing, in the fiercest possible words, all their hatred for his treachery, and their contempt for his cowardly temper, he was called the Praying Chief; and every other wild man, who forgot himself so far as to live under the protection of the whites, or in the neighbourhood of a white man's village, or about his hearth, or his door, except for mischief, a Praying Indian, a sort of he-squaw, whom it was a dastardly thing for the native red man to wage battle with, or destroy, or even to punish, by trampling him into the soil he disowned and polluted.

The preacher was a good man. He had read much and thought much; but he had faith in witchcraft, and was grievously afraid of Indian sorceries. It was the fault of the age, however—the wisest and the best of the mother-country; believed in witchcraft also, and hereafter people may wonder at our credulity, in other matters, or it may be, at our incredulity in these, just as we now wonder at our strong-hearted, and clear-minded, wise and brave progenitors.

It was in the fall of 1691, that he first began to perceive within his own household and about his own hearth alarming indications of what he regarded as the handwork of beleaguering spirits, a foretaste of the invisible world. His daughter Abby, and her little cousin, Bridget Pope, a child of singular beauty, and very tall of her age, began to behave in a strange way, so as to terrify all who saw them—being full of mischief, and acting as if they were possessed. They had been remarkably quiet, and loved each other so entirely, that if a neighbour met with one he always knew, no matter where he was, in the depth of the wilderness, or along by the desolate seashore, that the other could not be far off. Now, they were noisy and spiteful; continually apart, or hiding away from one another, and from everybody else, creeping into holes and corners, or employed in mischief, at whatever began their age. They would crawl under the bed, as if they were pursued by something visible only to themselves, and lie there for a whole day together, snapping and snarling at everybody that came near. They would shriek, with a preternatural voice, in the dead of night, so as to waken the preacher, and frighten the whole house. They would fall down of a sudden, as if struck to the heart with a knife, while they were hearing the Bible. All that could be said or done appeared to be of no use. They grew more and more troublesome, less and less like themselves, every day. They would grow pale as death in a moment—drop away in a sort of stupor—awake with dreadful cries—and, upon examination, would be found covered all over with marks and spots, like those which are left by pinching the flesh. They would be taken speechless, while trying to repeat the Lord's prayer, and all their innocent features would be distorted with a savage and hateful expression. The preacher himself grew afraid of them—yes, even afraid of his own child, the living picture of his poor dead wife. The best medical men were consulted, but no one of the whole had ever met with anything of the sort, either in books or practice. Many days of prayer and fasting were held, till Mr. Paris began to believe that he wanted the courage to pray for the poor children—for, it was observed, that during the time of prayer, the afflicted were very quiet; but, in the intervals of duty, they would fall into fits, and act, and speak very ridiculously; nevertheless, it began to be whispered about in the neighbourhood, that they were under an "evil tongue;" and straightway, a multitude of inquiries were on foot respecting their habits and behaviour, before they were afflicted, or possessed rather, for within a few days after the first outbreak of their malady, they were looked upon with a sort of horror, instead of pity, and believed to be not only bewitched, but actually possessed by the evil one.

Bridget Pope, the elder of the two, and quite remarkable, as I have said before, on account of her beauty and stature, had shown a remarkable aptitude, from the age of six or thereabouts, for every sort of learning. Her habits were unlike those of a child. She was fond of her book, but was never seen to study in school, nor when other children were studying. She was a favourite everywhere, and with everybody; for she had such a quiet, serious, gentle way with her, and was, in fact, so good a scholar, that when she appeared to merit reproof, as who will not in her youth! and kept away from her slate and copy-book, or sat for whole hours together at school, without lifting her eyes, or turning away her head from the little window of their log-hut, which overlooked a part of the new town, a part of the aboriginal woods of the country, and a broad, beautiful approach from the high sea, it was quite impossible to reprove her, except in a low voice, and with, at the most, a very affectionate word or two. Speak softly to Bridget Pope at such a time, or look at her with a look of love, and her quiet eyes would fill, and her childish heart run over, with a burst of sorrow; but if you spoke sharply to her, if you took her by surprise, when her thoughts were away—away—nobody knew where—in search of her own dead mother, it might be—so unaccustomed was the poor child to unkindness, that she would appear quite beside herself with terror. It would require a whole day, after such a reproof, to restore the dye of her sweet lips. At every sound, at every step, she would grow pale as death, and her eyes would fill to running over.

But Abigail Paris, or Abby—for so she was called by her father and Bridget—was a very different creature; noisy, cheerful, and very talkative. Before Bridget Pope came to live with her, when she began to alter, by little and little, until, after a few months, she would go about the house a tip-toe and holding her breath as if she were in a sick chamber; and up to the period of their affliction, they were never apart, by night or by day. They slept together, they played together, they studied together, and they rambled about in the woods together under the superb trees and beautiful shrubbery.

"Where the wild grape hangs drooping in the shade
Or unfledged minstrels that beneath are laid."

where the scarlet barberry glittered among the sharp green leaves on every side of their path, like the old branches of coral; where, at every step, the more brilliant ivory-plums, or branch-berries, rattled among the dry leaves, or rolled about their feet like handfuls of beads—where, to say all in a word, young as the little creatures were, they had the courage to go, even while they were afraid to speak above a whisper, and peep, and wonder and trembling in the haunted spot, nay, even to touch the terrible rock, so that they might not dream of it after they had got back to the house. And such was their love! Together all day and all night—going to sleep together, and waking up together; feeding out of the same bowl, and sleeping on the same pillow, month after month, and year after year, till the period of our story.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

Meanwhile, just when there appeared to be no hope left, and the preacher himself was beginning to give up in despair, a fresh discovery was made, which threw the whole country, far and near, into a paroxysm of terror. The savages, who had been for years in the habit of going to the house of the preacher in a familiar way, now kept aloof, and were more than usually grave; and yet, when they were told of the situation of the family, they showed no sort of surprise, but shook their heads, very much as if they were prepared for it. Mr. Paris being told of this, and having observed one day that immediately after he had spoken harshly to the female Indian, his daughter had gone off in a fit so alarming, that she grew black in the face, and appeared to be almost beyond the reach of hope, for half an hour, now bethought himself of another course; and after watching Tituba, the female Indian, for three nights in succession, became satisfied, from what he saw with his own eyes, that she had to do with the evil-one. A part of what was revealed to him, he was afraid to speak of; but he declared on oath before the magistrates of Nauskeag, that he saw sights, and heard noises which made his very flesh creep, and took away his senses for a while: that one sabbath evening, about an hour after dark, he heard a great whispering, as if a multitude were in consultation together in the grave-yard, by which he happened to be passing; that he hurried home to look for Tituba, but being unable to find her, went full into the woods, where he found her at last concealed in the bushes near the grave-yard, and sitting there doubled all up together, like some wild animal crouching for its prey and just ready to spring at his throat. He testified also that at another time he found her whispering with a great black shadow in a still, starry night, in the Haunted Hollow, and by the Rock of Death; and employed in a way that he trembled even yet to think of, for between her and the large dark shadow, there lay what appeared to him the image of his own dear child, stretched out underneath the old trees, and lying as if either dead or asleep. He was unable, or perhaps afraid, to say more, but they observed that his lips were white, and that big drops of sweat were upon his forehead when he finished; and so, they lost no time in securing Tituba and her associates who lived in the house with her. They were hurried off together, and after a few days of inquiry and a severe investigation by torture, both were put upon trial for witchcraft.

Being sorely pressed by the testimony of the afflicted children, who, with two more, charged her and Sarah Good—a miserable woman, who lived a long way off and spent most of her life by the sea-side, or out in the open air, nobody knew how—with tormenting their flesh at all hours, when they were awake, and when they were asleep, Tiruba acknowledged before the people and the judges, that she was in fact and in truth a witch, and that with two or three of her sister witches, of great power, she had been persecuted by the Black-Man, to plague and bewitch these poor little creatures. But the words were hardly out of her mouth, before she herself went off in a fit, which lasted nearly an hour, and so changed her looks, that when she came to herself she looked like another person, and so continued from that hour up to the day of her death.

But Sarah Good, when she was brought up for trial, would not confess to the charge; but persisted in reproving her accusers, who were collected from all parts of the country, were of all ages, and swore to circumstances, which, if they ever happened at all, had happened years and years before. Aged and poor and miserable though she was, her behaviour was full of courage and full of composure to the very last. After the trial was over, and up to the last hour and last moment of her life, it was the same.

"You are a liar! as God is my judge," cried she, to a man who called her a witch, and would have her confess and live, a minute or two before she was turned off. "You are a liar! as God is my judge! I am no more a witch than you are a wizard, Micajah Noyes; and if you, ye people of easy faith! if ye take away my life, He will give you blood to drink—even to you and yours!"

"He! who?" The Evil-One! hey!" groaned and shouted the by-standers.

"No, fool, no!" she replied; "but God—God the father—he will baptize you and your children's children's children, with blood for spilling the blood of the innocent!"

"So will He! and with fire!" cried another, and a strange voice, like that of a silver trumpet from the midst of the crowd; a female voice which no one there had ever heard before, and might never have heard again, if a poor girl had not been led forth after a time, chiefly on account of these very words, to prepare for a similar fate.

Within two years from the day of Sarah Good's death—so the story goes—her terrible words were verified, letter by letter, upon the very individual to whom they were addressed; for being carried off, or "captivated" by a war-party of the Pequot savages, with whom he had long associated, and whose habits of warfare he was well acquainted with, but whom he had nevertheless charged with eating roasted human flesh—they compelled him to do so; and after he had actually swallowed a mouthful of the detestable food, in the hope of being permitted to escape, or at least of being treated with much less rigour than his brave, resolute, rough companion, who refused with horror and loathing, they fell upon him with their ponderous war-clubs, and beat him to death, and having buried the body with fire and scattered the ashes to the four winds of heaven, they let his companion go free with a kick, telling him to keep better company, and "always speak true."

SELECTIONS FROM NEW PUBLICATIONS.

ANECDOTE OF A SICILIAN NOBLE.

The Prince Butera was one of those splendid examples which modern history seldom affords. He was a relic of ancient Sicilian nobility, chivalrous and bold as the Normans, from whom their order sprang. Hercules was he called, and his fine athletic figure seemed formed upon the model of his mythological namesake. He could fell to the earth a resist horse with one blow of his fist, break across his knee a bar of iron an inch thick, and bend a pinstriped between his fingers.

One striking specimen of his coolness in the midst of danger, had rendered him extremely popular with the inhabitants of Palermo. In the year 1770, there was a great scarcity of bread in that city—a violent insurrection was the consequence. The government was compelled, in self-defence, to have recourse to the uffimis ratio; a cannon was planted in the streets. The people rushed forward towards the gun, and the artillery-man who held the match was about to fire it upon the mob, when the Prince Butera seating himself on the mouth of the piece as calmly and as carelessly as if throwing himself into an arm-chair, addressed them in a speech so reasonable, and so eloquent, that the mob fell back, the cannon was withdrawn unfired, and the blood of the people was unshed. Nor was this the sole cause of the prince's popularity.

It was his custom to walk every morning on the terrace which overlooks the Marina; and as the gates of his palace were always open to the public at day-break, he usually found congregated about him a very large assemblage of poor people. Upon these occasions he used to wear a buckskin leather waistcoat, the excessively roomy pockets of which were every morning filled with carlins and half carlins, by his valet, every one of which disappeared before he returned to the palace. But his dispensations of charity were made in a manner at once peculiar and unnatural to him, inasmuch as he outwardly appeared very much disposed to knock down every poor person who ventured to implore his benevolence; an appearance which, considering his highness's bulk and capabilities, was anything but agreeable or soothing to the mendicants.

"Prince," says a poor woman, surrounded by her infant-family, "have pity upon the poor mother of five children."

"Go along, you foolish fellow!" replies the prince, feigning to give him a blow with his fist, which would have been enough to feed him for a week, "how can I help that? I don't make bread. Why don't you go to the baker?" affording him at the same moment, ample means to follow his advice. The consequence was, that the Prince Butera was received by the people wherever he went with every mark of affection and respect.

One person, however, complained bitterly of his highness's liberality, and that was his maître d'hôtel, who by no means approved of his indiscriminate admission of guests of all ranks and conditions to his illustrious master's table. The prince's dinners were of the first order, and notwithstanding their luxury and magnificence, his highness literally kept open house, his parties seldom consisting of less than twenty or thirty, of whom seven or eight were generally strangers; while the greater number of those who were not, dined as regularly with his highness, as the most punctual customers of a most popular table d'hôte.

Among this latter class, was one Captain Altavilla, who had obtained his rank in the army by following Cardinal Ruffo from Palermo to Naples, and who had returned from Naples to Palermo, with a pension of a thousand ducats. Unfortunately, the captain, like many of his betters, was sadly addicted to play; his ill-luck at which would have rendered his income wholly inadequate to his expenditure, had he not hit upon two plans, the execution of which rendered his quarter's pay the least important branch of his revenue.

The first of these plans was to dine every day at the prince's table, which, as we have already seen, was no very difficult object to achieve, since it was free to all; but the second was something a little more perilous, and not quite so venal. Every day after he had dined, the captain contrived regularly to carry off the silver fork and spoon, which he had used at dinner. This very gentlemanly proceeding went on for some time without detection and even without the diurnal abstraction of the articles being discovered; but profusely as his highness's sideboards were furnished, the diminution of stock at length became evident to the major-domo, and having, as servants sometimes will, taken a strong aversion to the captain, his suspicions fell upon him; he began to watch his movements carefully; two or three days only were required to convert those suspicions into certainty, and having established the fact to his entire satisfaction, the vigilant domestic proceeded forthwith to inform his illustrious master of the fact.

The prince having heard the story, paused for a moment, and then said very quietly, "I don't know—I am very sorry for it—but as long as the captain pockets only his own fork and spoon, I have nothing to say—when he begins to walk off with those of his neighbours, I must make up my mind to do something," and in consequence of this extraordinary show of lenity, the captain, to the great discomfiture of the major-domo, continued one of the constant guests at the palace of his excellency the Prince de Butera.

THE UNINVITED GUEST.

The wedding-feast was at its height. Gaetano, according to the established Sicilian custom in such matters, prepared to open the ball with the interesting Teresa, whose beauty and grace of manner, had been the subject of general admiration throughout the day. He approached her with the finished air of third-rate gracefulness—a sort of lively caricature of the best Sicilian cavaliers; and, in the highest possible spirits, solicited the honour of her hand. At that moment, a stranger presented himself on the esplanade, and stood in the midst of the company gazing upon the scene. The looks of the whole assembly were turned towards the new-comer, who was dressed in the Calabrian costume, wearing pistols and a dagger in his belt; his jacket slung over one shoulder, like a burza's pelisse, left open to view his other sleeve stained with blood. Teresa saw him—she gazed on him a moment—uttered a faint cry, and remained pale and motionless, as if she had seen a spectre. It was Pascal Bruno. Every eye was fixed on the uninvited guest; a dead and awful silence reigned. Every one present felt assured of the approach of some terrible catastrophe.

Pascal, apparently unmoved by the sensation he had created, walked directly up to Teresa, and standing before her, folded his arms, and fixed his piercing eyes on her pale countenance.

"Pascal," said Teresa, in a faltering voice, "can it be you?"

"Yes, Teresa," said Bruno, in a deep hollow voice, "it is I. I heard at Beuso, where I sat out, and confidently waited your return, that you were to be married at Carini; so I came hither, and I hope am in time to dance the first tarentella with you."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Gaetano, coming up to him with a mingled air of anger and of gaiety, "that is the bridegroom's right."

"It is the right of the affianced one," said Pascal. "Come, my beloved Teresa, this is the least you can do for me after all I have suffered for you."

"Teresa is my wife," said Gaetano, stretching forth his arm.

"Teresa is my betrothed," said Pascal, taking her hand.

"Help! oh, help!" said the wretched girl.

The appeal was irresistible—the effect instantaneous. Gaetano seized Bruno by the collar—they struggled for a moment—that was all—in another instant Gaetano uttered a piercing cry, and fell dead at his feet. Pascal's dagger was buried to the hilt in his breast. Some of the men, who were nearest him on the instant rushed towards the murderer to secure him. Bruno stood unmoved, and drawing one of his pistols from his belt, waved it over his head as a signal to the musicians to strike up the tarentella. They obeyed as it were mechanically. The rest of the company, paralyzed by what had happened, remained motionless.

"Come, Teresa, come, let us begin," said Pascal.

Teresa was no longer in possession of her faculties, she had become a creature demoralized by fear. She unconsciously yielded to his guidance, and this horrible dance, close to the corpse of the in-offensive murdered young man, was continued by the musicians to the last strain. Incredible as it may appear, no one stirred—no one spoke—it was something too terrific—something so unnaturally horrid that nature itself seemed palsied. The moment the music ceased, as if it had been all that had excited and sustained her, the wretched Teresa fell fainting on the body of Gaetano.

"Thanks, Teresa," said Pascal, "that is all I wanted; and now, if any man wishes to know me here, that he may find me elsewhere, I am Pascal Bruno."

"The son of Antonio," ventured one voice, "whose head is exposed to public view at the castle of Beuso."

"The same," said Pascal; "but if you wish to see that sight again, you had better make good speed. I promise you, whomever you may be, it shall not be there long."

Saying which Pascal disappeared; and, amongst the many who were bidden to the wedding feast, not one of the guests felt the slightest desire, or exhibited the least inclination to follow him; they turned their thoughts and attention to Gaetano and Teresa. The one was dead, the other senseless.

A FEW THOUGHTS ON PUFFS AND PATRONAGE.

In an Epistle from Thomas Moore to Samuel Rogers.

WHAT, then, my friend! a man of rhymes,
And, better still, a man of guineas,
To talk of "patrons," in these times,

When authors thrive, like spinning-jennies.
And Arkwright's twist and Hulver's page
Alike may leugh at patronage's page
No, no—these times are past away.

When doom'd in upper floors to star it,
The bard inscribed to lords his lay—
Himself, the while, my Lord Mountgarret.
No more he begs, with aid dependent,
His "little bark may sail attendant!"
Under some lordly skipper's steerage;
But launched triumphant in the Row,
Or 'a'en by Murray's self in tow.

Cuts both Star Chamber and the Peerage.
Patrons, indeed! when scarce a sail
Is whisked from England by the gale,
But bears on board some authors, shipp'd
For foreign shores, all well equip'd
With proper book-making machinery,
To sketch the morals, manners, scenery,
Of all such lands as they shall see,
Or not see, as the case may be—
It being enjoined on all who go,
To study first Miss M.

And learn from her the method true,
To do one's books—and readers, too.
For so this nymph of now and nerve
Teaches mankind "How to Observe!"
And, lest mankind at all should avert,
Teaches them also "What to Observe."
No, no, my friend—it can't be blink'd—
The Patron is a race extinct;
As dead as any Megatheron

That ever Buckland bled a theory on.
Instead of harping, in this age,
Our praise for pence and patronage,
We, authors, now, more prosperous elves,
Have learned to patronize ourselves;
And since all-potent Puffing's made
The life of song, the soul of trade,
More fragrant of our praises ground,
Puff no one's merits but our own.
Unlike those feeble gales of praise
Which critics blew in former days,
Our modern puffs are of a kind
That truly, really raise the wind;

And since they've fairly set in blowing,
We find them the best trade-winds going.
'Stead of frequenting paths so slippery
As her old haunts near Aganippe,
The Muse, now, taking to the till,
Has opened shop on Ludegate Hill,
(Far handier than the Hill of Pincus,
As seen from bards' back attic windows.)
And swallowing things without reseason
Large draughts (at sight) of inspiration,
Touches the notes for each new theme,
While still fresh change comes o'er her dream!"

What Steam is on the deep—and more—
Is the vast power of Puff on shore—
Which jumps to glory's future tenses
Before the present ev'n commences;
And makes "immortal" and "divine" of us
Before the world has read one line of us.
In old times, when the god of Song
Drove his own two-horse team along,
Carrying inside a bard or two,
Book'd it for posterity "all through;"

Ther luggage, a few close-packed rhymes,
(Like yours, my friend), for after-times—
So slow the pull to Fame's abode,
That folks oft slept upon the road!—
And Homer's self, sometimes, they say,
Took his nightcap on the way.
Ye gods! how different is the story
With our new galloping sons of glory,
Who, scoring all such slack and slow time,
Dash to posterity in no time!

Dash but one general blast of Puff
To start your author—'that's enough.
In vain the critics, set to watch him,
Try at the starting-post to catch him;
He's off—the puffers carry it hollow—
The critics, if they please, may follow.
Ere they've laid down their first positions,
He's fairly blown through six editions!
In vain doth Edinburgh dispense
Her blue and yellow pestilence—
(That plague so evil in my time
To young and touchy sons of rhyme.)
The Quarterly, at three months' date,
To catch the Unread One, comes too late;
And nonsense, littered in a hurry,
Becomes "immortal," spite of Murray.
But bless me! while I thus keep fooling,
I hear a voice cry, "Dinner's cooling!"
'That postman, too, who, (truth to tell,
'Mong men of letters bears the bell.)
Keeps ringing, ringing, so infernally,
'That I must stop—

Yours, sempiternally,

T. M.

SPIRIT OF THE ENGLISH JOURNALS.

LONDON AND OXFORD.—To a thoughtful eye even external appearance is very full of meaning, and there can scarcely be a contrast more pregnant with serious reflection than is presented by a rapid transition from the metropolis to Oxford. It must be familiar to every one who has travelled in England. London itself is one of the most remarkable phenomena in the world. Its vast size, its dense population, its boundless and multifarious wealth, lying open in the midst of want and vice; the splendour of its palaces contrasted with the misery of its hovels; the eager, restless faces, marked deep with anxiety or vice, that throng its streets; its crowds, where each man is unknown to the other, and every one is struggling to rise upon the shoulders of his neighbor: even the daily supply of its public works, secured with a wonderful accuracy, through the instinctive rapacity of private selfishness—altogether form a spectacle of melancholy and painful interest, most fit to prepare the mind for receiving deeply the impressions produced by the sight of Oxford. From noise, and glare, and brilliancy, the traveller comes upon a very different scene—a mass of towers, pinnacles, and spires, rising in the bosom of a valley from groves which hide all buildings but such as are consecrated to some wise and holy purpose. The same river which, in the metropolis, is covered with a forest of masts and ships, here glides quietly through meadows, with scarcely a sail upon it—dark and ancient edifices clustered together in forms full of richness and beauty, yet solid as if to last for ever; such as become institutions raised not for the vanity of the builder, but for the benefit of coming ages—streets, almost avenues of edifices, which elsewhere would pass for palaces, but all of them dedicated to God—thoughtfulness, repose, and gravity, in the countenance and even dress of their inhabitants; and, then to mark the stir and the business of life—instead of the roar of carriages, the sound of hourly bells calling men together to prayer. And the contrast would be still more striking, and the comparison more just, if before the traveller entered Oxford, he would be carried from the splendour of London through some of those vast manufacturing towns which in reality constitute its suburbs, and supply the wealth which it displays at the cost of men's bodies and souls. Birmingham and London are separate indeed locally, but they are one city—a city of Mammon. And to see the whole mystery of the metropolis, we should place by the side of its palaces, in the midst of the parks and squares, the miserable lanes and hovels, the noisome factories, the filthy atmosphere, and the squalid degraded population from which England, and the metropolis of England, draw their boasted resources. It would be a very touching and a very humbling sight—but men would then understand better the contrast between a city in which life is created for man, and one in which it has been lavished, and still is expended, for God.

LEGAL CURIOUSITIES.—The law and police reports of large cities, such as London and Paris, abound with the queerest exhibitions of character; and it is somewhat wonderful that more frequent resort is not made to these sources for the use of the drama. Here is a police affair, for example, translated from a French paper, out of which a good scene might be fashioned by a Matthews or a Hackett.—An unclean, an unclean, and sinister-looking man, of a man, who gave his name Peter Ory, was placed at the bar of the Tribunal of Correctional Police, charged with guilting the Parisian Cockneys, by selling ballads under false pretences. On being questioned by the president as to what papers he was selling when he was taken into custody and carried before the commissary of police, a few days previous, Ory declared in a tone of voice which was intended to be quite melting: "Hear me, Monsieur le Magistrat! I am a married man—the father of a family—with children hanging at their mother's breast—Monsieur le Magistrat! have you no bowels? The innumerable Rhadamanthuses of the bench repeated his question. Defendant: You may rest assured that I am not a mauvais sujet brought to compromise the honour and happiness of my interesting family by committing the fault which the mechant commissary imputes to me. I earn my bread in an honest way. I am a public crier—authorized—patented—and altogether legitimate. I wear a medal: la voila. President: Your medal will avail you little if you do not conform to the law. What papers were you selling on the day in question? Defendant: On the day in question, I was selling the deux Portées, your worship, surrounded by a crowd of attentive listeners, and selling my papers like shot; that I was, your worship—I have got the knack on! (Here the defendant smirked towards the bench in a manner that was intended to be quite irresistible.) I have a voice (he continued) that would have lured the white-lutes out of your own purse, if your worship had been there—loud, but not shrill; a voice, in fact, your worship, doucement sonorous. I sung it out thus (elevating his voice with a peculiar nasal twang, and much laughter.) "Programme of all the fêtes and public rejoicings on the occasion of the Princess Helen's marriage." Why, your worship, that happy event would have made me a little fortune, but for this commissary's malicious intention. Saints and angels! If there was only one princess to be married every week, it would be the making of me; I would soon turn banker! President: The accusation states that what you cried was—Here are, the verses sung by the Princess Helen on the occasion of her marriage!" Defendant: (gesticulating most emphatically) Lord love your worship! For me to suppose that a princess would ever sing in public, all as one as a natural person! I have too much respect for her august majesty to proclaim such a piece of folly. Lord love you, I know a trick worth two of that. Peter Ory, indeed! I'm not a fool, although I am a married man, and the father of six children. President: Are you quite sure that you did not announce your songs as being the same which had been sung by the duchess? Defendant: Bless your worship's good heart! It is Peter Ory, the father of a rising family, to be guilty of une telle sottise! Upon inquiry, it was ascertained that the police-officer might have been mistaken, and the victorious Peter, being forthwith emancipated to resume his vocal avocations à fresco, tossed his "casquette" in the air, and exclaimed, in a voice rendered stronger by practice:—"Long live the king! Long live the Princess Helen! Long live the emperor! and long live M. le Président to pull up all the méchans commissaires!"

THE "CHILDREN OF THE ALHAMBRA."—As I sat one morning in the hall of the Two Sisters, carrying my thoughts back to the days of Moslem splendour, and trying with ball-shut eyes to re-people the palace with its ancient inhabitants, the gentle notes of a guitar, accompanied with a silvery voice, stole upon my ear. It did not disturb my reverie, for fancy pictured it as the soft strains from the adjacent Harem, and not till it had ceased was I fully assured of its reality, and behought to look for the invisible performer. Stepping into the court of Lions, in which the echo seemed still to linger, I discovered the fair songstress at an open Moorish window over the entrance to the hall of the Alhambra. My first thought was that of surprise—how she came there; the next was to address her, and beg her to continue her song. The wonder was easily explained. She lived in an adjoining cottage, which communicated with the upper floor of the palace, with a number of chambers which are not accessible from the halls below. To my request she replied by a coquettish shake of her head, and a frown of her fan, which she had resumed on laying aside her guitar. She had soft, languishing hazel eyes, pretty features, and an interesting expression, and, being fairer than the generality of her countrywomen, laid claim to the title of rubia, though in England she would have been considered a brunette.

Another damsel now appeared at the window, the elder sister of the songstress, but not so engaging, and of much darker complexion, though she would only allow herself to be a castana, or chestnut, a shade deeper than the rubia. On my repeating my request for a song, the younger modestly said that her sister could sing much better than herself. This the other denied, affirming that "Augustina sang so charmingly that it gave her a thousand pleasures to hear her." I confirmed this, and Augustina, in compliance, commenced the following song, accompanying it with her guitar and speaking eyes.

THE MAIDEN'S SONG.

"Tis true that I'm living
In maidenly leisure,
With nothing to vex me,
Or cross in my pleasure.
But oh! a good husband much better would be!
A nice little husband's the treasure for me!"

"Tis true that I'm mistress
Of house and of stores;
Papa loves me dearly,
Mamma quite adores:
But oh! a nice husband far better would be!
A sweet little spouse—what a treasure for me!"

And who were this pretty pair with whom I had made acquaintance in such a spot? They were—oh, what a damper to every feeling of romance!—the daughters of the overseer of the galley-slaves employed in the fortress! Had they would often sit during the heat of the day, busied with their frames of embroidery, relieving the silence occasionally with a song, or conversing with me as I sat sketching in the court below.—Bentley's Miscellany.

FROM THE PERSIAN.

"Tell me, gentle traveller, thou
Who hast wander'd far and wide,
Seen the sweetest rivers glide,
And the brightest rivers glide,
Say, of all three eyes hath seen,
Which the fairest land has been?"

"Lady, shall I tell thee where
Nature seems most blest and fair,
Far above all climes beside?
Tha where those we love abide,
And that little spot is best:
Which the loved one's foot hath press'd.
Though it be a fairy space,
Wide and spreading is the place:
Though 'twere but a barren mound,
'Twould become enchanted ground,
With thee, you sandy waste would seem
The margin of Al Cawthar's stream;
And thou couldst make a dungeon's gloom
A bowser where new-born roses bloom."

CONJUGAL HARMONY.—A man in Germany advertised that he had an organ that would play any tune out of an enumerated set at the command of any one of the audience; this made a great noise at the time, and puzzled all the conjurers and philosophers of the place. The organ was placed on a table, its back against the wall, the company were invited to examine it, then ask for a tune which was immediately played, and if any one desired it to stop it was instantly silent! This went on for a long time, and the ingenious inventor was making a rapid fortune, and the secret would have been buried with him, had he not behaved most inharmoniously towards his loving wife one day, just before the performance was about to commence. The room was crowded, as usual, and a tune was called for, but not a note was heard; the owner became uneasy, and said, in a soothing coaxing tone, "do play, my cool organs; still not a sound was heard: he got out of patience, and threatened to smash the instrument to pieces, when a hoarse female voice was heard to growl out—Ay, do, you tyvel, speak de organs, as you proke my head dis morning!" This was too much for the choleric herm; he took a chair, and gave the instrument such a whack, that it drove it through a paper partition in the wall, carrying with it another organ, which had been placed close at the back of the sham one, at which sat the obstinate grinder—his wife!

LOTTERY-TICKET ANECDOTE.—In the early part of the reign of King George II., the footman of a lady of quality, under the absurd infatuation of a dream, disposed of the savings of the last twenty years of his life in two tickets, which proving blanks, after a few melancholy days he put an end to his life. In his box was found a plan of the manner in which he would spend the five-thousand-pound prize, which his mistress preserved as a curiosity. "As soon as I have received the money I'll marry Grace Forrester; but as she has been cross and coy, I'll use her as a servant. Every morning she shall get me a slug of strong beer with a toast, nutmeg and sugar in it, then I will sleep till ten, after which I will have a large sack posset. My dinner shall be on the table by one, and never without a good pudding; I'll have a stock of wine and brandy laid in; about five in the afternoon I'll have tart and jellies, and a gallon bowl of punch; at ten, a hot supper of two dishes; if I am in good humour, and Grace behaves herself, she shall sit down with me. To bed about twelve."

HEROISM.—A Lacedemonian mother had five sons in a battle that was fought near Sparta, and seeing a soldier that had left the scene of action, eagerly inquired of him how affairs went on? "All your five sons are slain," said he. "Unhappy wretch!" replied the woman. "I ask thee not of what concerns my children, but of what concerns my country." "As to that, all is well," said the soldier. "Then," said she, "let them mourn that are miserable; my country is prosperous, and I am happy."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE WEeping WILLOW.

Original.

Willow, sweet willow, drooping low,
With slight branch waving to and fro,
Enwreathed and free!
Thy tender leaf first welcoming
The genial, balmy breath of spring;
Romanuick tree!
Of all the dark wood stretching wide,
Thou art the glory and the pride—
The poetry,
Of th' dense forest; seen afar
With sweeping train—like a single star
On th' stilled sea.

Memento, o'er the hallow'd dead
Thou art: with kind limb gently led
For o'er the grave:
For blighting sorrows not thine own,
In tenderness thou'lt weep and moan;
Or mutely woe.

I love thee! I meditative tree,
Thus bending in humility!
The pride of mind;
Replete with reverence and love;
Yet bending but to heaven above,
In the roughest wind! W.

THOUGHTS FOR THOSE WHO THINK.—BY THE REV. W. COLTON, U.S.N.

The destinies of a nation depend less on the greatness of the few, than the virtues or vices of the many. Eminent individuals cast further the features of her glory or shame; but the realities of her weal or woe lie deep in the great mass. The curling tops of lofty waves are the crest of the ocean, but from its depths flows the overpowering strength of its tides.

A lady of fashion will sooner excuse a freedom, flowing from admiration, than a slight, resulting from indifference. The first offence has the pleasing apology of her attractions; the last is bold, and without an alleviation. But the mode in which she disposes of the two only shows that her love of admiration is stronger than her sense of propriety.

He who maintains the right, though countenanced by the few, must forego all expectations of popularity till there shall be less to censure than applaud in human conduct; and, when this is the case, the millennium will have dawned.

A giant mind may be held in suspense, but that suspense must be brief, and the action which follows it will be more decided and energetic in consequence of that detention; just as a stream rushes with greater force for a temporary obstruction.

A man of a weak, complying disposition, whom no one fears, no one will be at the trouble to oppose; while a man of strong and fixed character will be liable to opposition, at least from those who expect to derive a certain kind of importance from the dignity of their adversary. But he will compel even this opposition into subservience to himself; just as the mariner obliges the wind that opposes him to help him forward.

The three, or rather four most helpless things in the world are: a ship in a dead calm, a whale thoroughly stranded, a race-horse with his hind broken, and a politician in bad odour. Lucifer himself would have nothing to do with either, unless it were the last. He seldom utterly forsakes a political game-cock.

But keeps him at the battle, or the drill.
To work his master further mischief still.

The influence of the good man ceases not at death; he, as the visible agent, is removed, but the light and influence of his example still remain; and the moral elements of this world will long show the traces of their vigour and purity; just as the western sky, after the sun has set, still betrays the glowing traces of the departed orb.

POETRY.

The poetry of the imagination, although it may glitter more, is neither so rich nor so glorious as the poetry of the heart. We have very few poets of the latter description. In childhood, and sometimes in youth, we are alive to the poetry of the heart. While the mind is pure and artless, devoid of everything that can be termed sinful—free from anxious and corroding care, all nature appears to us very much as Eden appeared to our first parents. Everything upon which we gaze seems to be good, and lovely, and beautiful. Our hearts claim acquaintance with all that meets the eye, and we feel deeply impressed by every little event which takes place around us. To such poetry as this, the beatified inhabitants of another world are no doubt awake; and as they touch the golden harps, their living souls seem to leap along the strings, and float on the harmonious notes, as they rise like incense to the great fountain of love and joy. In this world, poetry does not always mingle with devotion, though I believe that a poetical soul is generally impressed more easily with devout sentiments, than those minds which are of a more earthly cast. But I believe, that in the world to come poetry and devotion become melted into one—that we are rendered lively and acutely sensitive to all with which we hold intercourse, and thus our bliss becomes heightened into continual rapture. Indeed, the representations of heaven, which we have in the Scriptures, appear to favour such an opinion.

A GOLDEN RULE.

Industry will make a man a purse, and frugality will find strings for it. Neither the purse nor the strings will cost anything. He who is always to find a useful penny at the bottom of it. The servants of industry are known by their ivory; it is always whole and wholesome. Idleness travels very leisurely, and poverty soon overtakes him. Look at the ragged alms of idleness, and judge which is the best to serve, industry or idleness.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

SOME ACCOUNT OF MY GRANDFATHER.

The family from which I am descended was settled a century ago in Virginia. Walter Overton, my paternal grandfather, some years before the war of the revolution, exchanged his rich plantations in the south for a barren but extensive tract in New-England. The inducements which led him to enter upon this emigration were long unknown to me. The circumstance was rarely mentioned in his presence, and when it was—he exhibited symptoms of anger and impatience, which plainly evinced that unpleasant associations were connected with the subject. As the old gentleman is no longer among the living, there can be no harm in my letting the reader into the secret.

One evening in autumn, while yet a resident of the Old Dominion, my grandfather returned home from a ride over his extensive estate. He was wearied and in ill-humour. The crops of tobacco, which, the early part of the season, promised to be plentiful, had proved scanty and of inferior quality. The old gentleman, though sometimes lavish to a fault, was subject to periodical fits of avarice, if the term is not too harsh, when the passion of aquisition was paramount in his heart. He was labouring under one of these temporary hallucinations when, on the evening which I have mentioned, a stranger stopped at the house, and claimed hospitality for the night. The new visitor announced himself as "Comfort Timms, Esq. from the north," and he was received in a manner which accorded with the propriety of his cognomen. The individual soon made himself at home, and his observations were marked by a singular freedom of manner, and a spirit of investigation, which the minutest articles of furniture or apparel would call forth.

Mr. Timms, among other "notions," brought with him sundry specimens of granite, which he confidently asserted was gold ore. He stated that the precious mineral was found in abundance upon his land at home, where "it only required leisure and capital, neither of which he had, to open mines of inexhaustible wealth." With all the blind eagerness of a first adventurer in the new world, did my grandfather listen to the representations of the wily speculator. The bait took, and, strange as it may seem, a month had not passed away, before Comfort Timms, Esq. found himself master of the estate of the Overtons, while my grandfather and his family were on their way to New-England, in search of an El Dorado which did not exist.

The tract of land which Walter Overton now looked upon as his own, could offer no very alluring prospect to an agriculturist. A considerable portion of it was level, and overspread by a thick growth of oak and chestnut trees. The greater part, however, was hilly and diversified—often presenting scenery of a bold and imposing character. Rocks, up the precipitous sides of which it was dangerous to climb, looked down upon thickly-wooded ravines, where the axe of the woodman had not yet resounded. From the summit of these cliffs, the broad Atlantic might be seen at three miles distance, foaming, glittering, and roaring, as it broke upon a wide circling beach of white sand.

The site which my grandfather fixed upon as the location of his house was picturesque and commanding. It was the side of a hill which sloped down to the road, and was met at its base by a grove of pines. The old mansion rises before my mind's eye now, as I used to see it in the days of my childhood. Lifting its white-painted front above the tufted elms which wave their masses of foliage in bold relief around it, it looks proudly forth upon the surrounding fields, and forest, and lakes. The sunshine breaking suddenly forth, bathes with dazzling splendour its fair proportions. The heat is excessive, but beneath the arch of those tall oaks, through which you may catch narrow glimpses of the blue sky, you will find a cool and delightful resting-place. The song of the birds is pleasant, and the rustling leaves discourse a soothing music. Wandering among the purple and shadowy aisles formed by these natural columns, I hear the sound of voices as of children at their sports. Putting aside the stooping bough which impedes my view, I behold two brothers and two sisters gathering wild flowers from the fragrant turf. At every new acquisition an exclamation of delight bursts from their lips. One of the boys—it is the youngest—on seeing me, suddenly stops, and fixes his earnest eyes full upon my face. His youthful form is proud and erect. Dark ringlets wander over his white forehead. The light breeze lifts them aside. The flowers drop from his grasp, and he stands motionless as stone.

A mirror hangs before me. The momentary reflection of my features has dispelled the delusion. How changed is my aspect! How distinct was the phantom which memory conjured up! Why—why do I weep!

But I was speaking of my grandfather. After building his house, laying out his grounds and gardens, and improving parts of his estate, he sat down with the intention of reaping a golden harvest at his ease. An assayer was sent for, a costly apparatus was procured, and preparations were made for mining on an extensive scale. Dreadful was the downfall of my grandfather's hopes. Bitter was his disappointment, and boundless his indignation and rage when he saw the full extent of his infatuation. He cursed the chuckling Yankee who had juggled him out of his patrimony. He raved against himself for his folly, his stupidity, and his avarice. For many weeks he shut himself up in his library and refused to see any one. At last, however, like a sensible man, he resolved to make the best of his situation. He became fond of agriculture, and could boast that his breed of cattle was the best in the country. He was always, however, extremely sensitive on the subject of his emigration from the south, and became extremely irritable at the mention of gold mines.

There was one source of annoyance, which sometimes called forth all the irritability of his temper. His nearest neighbours lived at a distance of five miles. They were the most studious and uncompromising of puritans. They laboured hard for the conversion of the master of Overton Place to their peculiar doctrines, and showed a disposition to persecute him till they compassed their end. My grandfather, who numbered a bishop among his ancestors, was warmly attached to the church of England. He impatiently repelled the attacks of the dissenters, and commanded them to desist from their importunities. Baffled on this tack they perseveringly tried another. An old female slave of the family was taken ill. They saw their advantage, and following it up they so frightened the poor invalid that they drove her mad.

My grandfather learned the circumstance, and confronting the honest enthusiasts with a horse-whip, he swore with an oath, which made them throw up their hands and groan audibly, that he would cut off their ears if they again appeared on his premises. The day after this hasty and unphilosophical ebullition of wrath, the select men of the neighbouring village, which was one of the strongholds of puritanism, came in a body to reprimand the old gentleman for his profanity and unseemly display of anger. It chanced that he was engaged in a small building, which was appropriated to the smoking of bacon and herrings, and which was known in the family by the name of the smoke-house. The village representatives sought him out in this place, which they entered with very little ceremony, and some of the foremost of them straightway began to hold forth upon the enormity of his sin. Without replying to their harangues, my grandfather quickly withdrew himself from the room, which was hardly three feet by two, and closed the door fast. The "select men" had hardly time to recover from their surprise, when, to their horror, a thick smoke began to issue from below. There was neither crack nor creak above through which it might escape into the ambient air. It settled thick and stifling around them, forming upon them the same office which had been intended for the hams and the herrings. A noise of expostulation, and sneezing, of prayers, and threats, of scuffling and pounding, was now heard among the ill-fated inmates of the smoke-house. The victims in the Black Hole of Calcutta could hardly have suffered more. At last the building, which was raised upon square blocks of stone lying above the surface of the earth, fell from its foundation, and came with a crash to the ground. The "select men," without much distinction of persons, scrambled out from the ruins as speedily as possible. The wofulness of their plight was aggravated by the fact that their mission had proved worse than fruitless. My grandfather, in most irreverent glee, was shaking with laughter at their discomfort. Turning a grim and sidelong glance upon him, they inhaled a few draughts of fresh air, and departed on their way. This adventure cured them of any wish to be sent ever again on a similar embassy; but it added wonderfully to my grandfather's stock of good humour. It did his heart good to relate the story, and was to him long a source of satisfaction and self-gratulation.

At the age of three-score and ten, the old gentleman departed this life. His demise was somewhat sudden, and was occasioned by meeting in the streets of Boston with Mr. Comfort Timms, who had the audacity to approach him, and poking him under the ribs with one hand, while the forefinger of the other was placed significantly on the side of his nose, to exclaim—"I say, old boy, how are gold mines!"

ACTED CHARADES.

We hesitated some time whether we should publish the following singular communication, as we feared it might contain some personal satire or allusion; but, upon a reconsideration, we conclude to give it to the world lest it might get into the hands of those who would use it to the disadvantage of the real dramatis personæ, if such there be. The article was handed to us by a man in a cloak, with a comforter tied high about his chin. He coughed most suspiciously as he committed the manuscript to our care, and when we asked from whom it came, he remarked that it was a very cold day, and suddenly departed. We give the communication as we received it, without alteration or curtailment.

MISS AZURE'S CONVERSAZIONE.

PERSONS PRESENT.

MISS AZURE,	FRANK AZURE,
MRS. CERULEAN,	CAPTAIN FIRAWAY,
MRS. SNOB,	MR. SNOB,
MISS BELINDA BELFURT,	MR. CUTTUP,
MISS TIMID,	MR. PONDOR,
MR. B. BAHAM,	MR. SHOWERMUP.

SCENE—Miss Azure's Drawing-room.

Cuttup.—Talk of American literature! Fish! Paw! No such thing. Bah!

Baham.—But, my dear sir, you must admit—

Cuttup.—Bah! We must admit nothing. We assert. We know, sir. We are as sure, sir, as we are that we are bringing down our fist upon the table at this moment.

Miss Azure.—My young friend was merely going to venture a suggestion that—

Cuttup.—Humbug, Miss. We hate suggestions. Give us facts, Miss, facts. Figures and facts! Facts and figures!

Miss Timid.—Surely, sir, you do not mean that—that—

Cuttup.—But we do, though, young lady.

Miss Timid.—What! that we can boast of no poets, no novelists, no literature!

Captain Firaway.—The gentlemen will think twice before he ventures that assertion. Or if he intends his remark as a personal affront to any one of the present company, there are ways of settling the question, which it might not be prudent to intimate before ladies.

Mrs. Snob.—La, captain, you don't mean to say that you will challenge him to fight a duel. Snob, my dear, can't you interfere and reconcile the gentlemen!

Cuttup.—From the feeling manifested by the captain, we should suppose he had been an author himself!

Firaway.—Do you mean it, sir, as a double insult, to pretend to be ignorant of that fact!

Cuttup.—Upon our word, no. We do not recollect ever—heem—reviewing any of your books, captain.

Firaway.—Ha, ha! And you profess to pass an opinion upon American literature! Pleasant, I faith. Sir, did you never read my novel of the "Innocent Assassin, or the Bloody Bread-bag!"

Cuttup.—We have never had the good fortune; indeed we have not.

Miss Azure.—Not read the "Innocent Assassin?" Fir, sir.

Firaway.—Well, sir, it has only passed through fifteen editions as yet. And the inconsiderable sum of thirty thousand dollars is all I have received thus far from the Messrs. Harpers.

Miss Azure.—And how much do they offer you for your remaining interest in the copyright?

Firaway.—Ah, that was but a shabby offer on their part, my dear Miss Azure. Will you believe it! They proposed to me to dispose of my entire claim for fifty thousand dollars! Of course, I rejected the offer.

Frank Azure.—That was about the time—was it not, captain!—that I refused the embassy to the court of St. James!—(Aside to Miss Belfurt.)—Miss Belinda, suppose we leave this circle of solemn humbugs, and enjoy a snug tête-à-tête behind the window-curtains.

Belinda.—With all my heart. I have been terribly ennuyée. Even your conversation would be a relief.

Frank Azure.—Thank you kindly. I owe you one.

Mrs. Cerulean.—What are you reading, Mr. Baham!

Baham.—"The Scalping-Knife and Independent Oracle"—edited—edited by Aristarchus Cuttup!

Cuttup.—Yes, sir. That is our name, and that, sir, is our paper—our paper, sir.

Firaway.—When I was wounded in Florida—

Mrs. Snob.—Bless me, Mr. Baham! What makes you turn so pale! What do you see in the paper to disturb your nerves!

Baham.—Mr. Cuttup, I call upon you, sir, to say, if you are responsible for the attack which I find in this dirty little sheet!

Cuttup.—Attack, sir! attack! What attack!

Baham.—This notice, sir, of my "Musings in Solitude!" Did you write it, sir!

Cuttup.—Do you ask us to give an answer on compulsion, or do you put the question in—in—

Mr. Snob.—In a Pickwickian sense, Mr. Baham!

Baham.—No trifling, sir. But this is no place, and no presence, in which to show my resentment. You shall hear farther from me. Ladies and gentlemen, I am under the necessity of bidding you a very good evening.

Frank Azure.—(Looking out from the curtain.)—Good evening, Baham, if you must go. Better wait for the champagne and pâté de foie gras.

Belinda.—(Aside.)—Let go my hand, impudence!

Baham.—Thank you, Mr. Azure, pistols and coffee would suit better with my mood. Good evening. (Exit Baham.)

Ommes.—Ha, ha, ha! Haugh!

Firaway.—There goes—

"A poet, who has sown some scores of verses, And reaped one sorry sentence of damnation."

Mrs. Cerulean.—Poor fellow! Really, though, Mr. Cuttup, I think you are a little too hard upon the young man.

Ommes.—Read it, read it.

Mrs. Cerulean.—(Reading.)—"Musings in Solitude, by B. Baham." We have no fault to find with the paper, printing, or binding of this volume. As for the contents, the only comment of which we find them deserving, after squandering two whole minutes in skimming through the trash of Mr. Baham, may be significantly expressed in this familiar couplet: "Sweet sensibility! oh, la! I heard a little lamb cry baa!"

Ommes.—Ha, ha, ha!—Excellent! good! very fair.

Firaway.—Will nobody hold my sides!—Capit! Ha, ha!—Why don't you laugh, Mr. Editor!

Cuttup.—Oh, we will laugh. Hu—ha—t—t—t—humph.

Mrs. Cerulean.—The ha, ha, "stuck in his throat." It shows to me that you also are growing pale.

Cuttup.—Pale! impossible. You don't imagine we are at all alarmed, madam! Of course, it will all end in smoke—eh, captain! Ha, ha!

Firaway.—I really fear it will end in smoke, but begin in fire.

Cuttup.—Eh! How! What! Nonsense, sir. What do you mean!

Firaway.—Baham has been unfortunate of late in his duels. In his two last affairs of honour, his antagonists apologized after the first fire.

Cuttup.—Bless us; has Baham ever fought a duel!

Firaway.—Oh, yes, several. But never but once has he succeeded in killing his man. However, he has improved in his aim since. Let me see.—There was Count Fitzfuzz, whom he challenged for picking his teeth before the ladies—Young Bandbox, who offended him by choosing a vest of the same pattern with his.

Cutitup.—Had we known he was so bloodthirsty an individual, we would—

Fibaway.—You would have puffed his book—ah, Cutitup! No matter; you shall fix his flint for him. I will be your second. Don't shake that vase off the table. By the way, Mr. Showemup, what are you about there with your pen and ink! Scribbling sonnets in Miss Azure's album, or etching caricatures on the blank leaf of "The Knickerbocker."

Showemup.—Indeed, sir, I haven't been to the theatre since Amilie was played last at the National.

Mr. Snob.—That is what I should call a "categorical answer." But, Cutitup, you are not going, surely!

Cutitup.—Indeed, we must bid the company good evening, or we shall be too late for—ahem—aha. Good evening, ladies—gentlemen, good evening—Where is our hat? Ha! thank you, Miss. Good evening, Mr.—Where is Mr. Azure?—Oh, there you are, behind the curtain.

Frank Azure.—Good evening, Cutitup.—Sorry to part with you—very, ahem!—Good night. Is this your glove, you have dropped!

Cutitup.—Ah, thank you.—Good night, good night. (Exit Cutitup. Omnes.—Ha, ha, ha. Ha, ha, ha. Ha, ha, ha. Ha!)

Mr. Snob.—Does his anxious mother know that he is out!

Fibaway.—Poor Cutitup is frightened out of his wits. Now will he go home and dream of blunderbusses, bum-buliffs, and bullets through the thorax

Miss Azure.—Shame upon you, Fibaway, for quizzing him so preposterously. Mr. Showemup, why so taciturn! How do you like Amilie!

Showemup.—Excellent well; but the music sometimes reminds me too much of the Samambala and other pieces, to strike me for its originality, and the libretto is trashy beyond measure. Have you seen Miss Martineau's abolition tirade in the last Westminster Review!

Miss Azure.—Yes, and a very pretty romance she makes of it. Showemup.—Her exaggerations are truly laughable; nay, contemptible.

Fibaway.—She is certainly shockingly given to fibbing—a habit I abhor. When I last dined with the duke of Wellington, the conversation turned on—

Mr. Snob.—What noise was that! It sounded just like a kiss.

Mr. Snob.—A regular smack, and no mistake. Holloa, Mr. Azure; if you and Miss Belinda are going for to bill and coo in that way—

Frank Azure.—Hang this window!

Mr. Snob.—It is very well hung. What is the matter? I say it is all gammon about the noise being made by the window.

Frank Azure.—I have been—trying—to shut this—plaguy—window—ow. (Throws down.)

Mr. Snob.—Oh, my corns! I tell you what, Mr. Frank, I don't see the sense of your bringing down your iron heel on my toe in that way. Cries!—It kill my foot for a week.

A servant enters and opens the folding-doors.

Frank Azure.—I am sorry for you, Snob; but let us into supper. Mr. Fibaway, hand in my sister. Mr. Ponder, find a chair for Miss Timid. That is right, Mr. Showemup, take care of Mrs. Cerulean. Snob, give Mrs. S. your arm. Come, Belinda—let me expiate my offence in a libation of champagne. (Exeunt omnes.)

DRAMATICK CRITICISM.

BULWER'S NEW PLAY.

Bulwer's new play, "Richelieu; or, the Conspiracy," has been published by the Messrs. Harper. "It is of all things the most instructive," says Burke, "to see not only the reflection of manners and characters, at several periods, but the modes of making this reflection, and the manner of adapting it at these periods to the taste and disposition of mankind." The stage may be considered as the republic of active literature, and its history as the history of that state.

That we enjoy an opportunity to feel the truth of this passage, we owe to the talent which has produced Richelieu in the closet, and the skill which has embodied it on the stage. The instructive reflection of manners and characters is excellently displayed in both instances. We are not going to debate any minute points of biographical or historical accuracy in this play, which even in history always admit of dispute, but which are sufficient for the drama if they preserve similitude and probability; it is enough for us that the poet has wrought out his own ideas in a way to give delight to the spectator and gratification to the reader, without failing in those qualities of consistency that ally his characters and events closely to what they are represented to have been by the annals of the age to which they belonged. The more popular parts of Richelieu's dialogue we have heard critically objected to, and in one instance, perhaps, we join in the objection—i. e. where the cardinal dismisses the capuchin with the following words:

"In my closet

You will find a rosary, Joseph; ere ye tell
Three hundred beads, I'll summon you. Stay, Joseph—

I did omit an eye in my matins—
A grievous fault!—stone it for me, Joseph:

'There is a scourge within; I am weak, you strong;
It were but charity to take my sin
On such broad shoulders. Exercise is healthful."

Not so where he thus praises De Mauprat:

"Beh! the mate for beauty
Should be a man, and not a money-cheat!

When her brave sire lay on his bed of death,
I vowed to be a father to his Julie—
And so he died—the smile upon his lips;—
And when I spared the life of her young lover,
Methought I saw that smile again! Who else,
Look you, in all the court—who else so well,
Brave, or supplant the favourite;—balk the king—
Beside their enemies? I was tried him—He has honour
And courage,—qualities that eagle-plume
Men's souls,—and fit them for the fiercest sun,
Which ever melted the weak waxen minds
That flatter in the beams of gaudy power!
Besides, he has taste, this Mauprat!—When my play
Was acted to dull tiers of lifeless gapers,
Who had no soul for poetry, I saw him
Applaud in the proper places: trust me, Joseph,
He is a man of an uncommon promise!

The last passage we consider a fine characteristic trait, which hints at all we have read of Richelieu's jealousy of Corneille, and his own want of dramatic success. Indeed, Sir E. Bulwer has sought out many similar features in the cardinal's recorded memoirs, and interspersed them very aptly and ingeniously through the general portraiture, to which they impart a very pleasing degree of life and reality.

Though there are many poetical passages in Richelieu, and also of happy touches which win rounds of applause from the audience, the latter are too brief to be separated from the context and introduced into a literary notice; and of the former, we shall be content to adduce only a few examples. Thus, when De Mauprat boasts of his gallant bearing, we have the following:

"Richelieu. Your words

Are bold.
De Mauprat. My deeds have not belied them.

Richelieu. Deeds!
O miserable delusion of man's pride!
Deeds! cities sacked, fields ravaged, hearths profaned,
Men butcher'd! In your hour of doom behold
The deeds you boast of!—I speak showers of blood,
And the red light of blazing roofs, you build
The rainbow glory, and to shuddering conscience
Cry—Lo, the bridge to heaven!

De Mauprat. If war be sinful,
Your hand the gauntlet cast.

Richelieu. It was so, sir.
Note the distinction:—I weigh'd well the cause
Which made the standard holy; raised the war
But to secure the peace. France blid—I groan'd;
But look'd beyond; and, in the vista, saw
France saved, and I exulted. You—but you
Were but the tool of slaughter—knowing nought,
Pursuing nought, nought hoping, nought lamenting,
And for nought fit,—save cutting throats for hire.
Deeds, marry, deeds!"

And again, this impressive lesson:

"You have outrun your fortune;
I blame you not, that you would be a beggar—
Each to his taste!—But I do charge you, sir,
That, being beggar'd, you would coin false money
Out of that crumble, called debt.—To live
On means not yours—be brave, like and laces,
Gallant in steeds—splendid in banquets,—all
Not yours—ungiven—unherited—unpaid for;—
This is to be a trickster; and to fitch
Men's art and labour, which to them is wealth,
Life, daily bread,—quitting all scores with 'Friend,
You're troublesome!—Why this, forgive me,
Is what—when done with a less dainty grace—
Plain folks call 'Thief!'"

In one of his scenes, Richelieu thus apostrophizes the Pen:

"True,—this!
Beneath the rule of men entirely great
The pen is mightier than the sword. Behold
The arch-enchanter's wand!—itself a nothing!—
But taking sorcery from the master-hand
To paralyze the Cesars—and to strike
The loud earth breathless!—Take away the sword—
States can be saved without it!"

In another, there is a fine soliloquy at midnight, from which we select a few lines:

SCENE.—Richelieu's castle at Ruille—A Gothic chamber—Moonlight at the window, occasionally obscured.

Richelieu.—(Reading.)—"In silence, and at night, the conscience feels

That life should soar to nobler ends than power.
So sayest thou, sage and sober moralist!

But wert thou tried!—sublime philosophy,
Thou art the patriarch's ladder, reaching heaven,
And bright with beck'ning angels—but, alas!

We see thee, like the patriarch, but in dreams,
By the first step—dull-slumbering on the earth.
* * * * *

"Yet are my sins not those of circumstance,
That all-pervading atmosphere, wherein
Our spirits, like the unsteady lizard, take
The tints that colour, and the food that nurtures!"

Oh! ye, whose hour-glass shifts its tranquil sands
In the unext'd silence of a student's cell;
Ye, whose untamed hearts have never tosed
Upon the dark and stormy tides, where life
Gives battle to the elements,—and man
Wrestles with man for some slight plank, whose weight
Will bear but one—while round the desperate wretch
The hungry billows roar—and the fierce fate,
Like some huge monster, dim-seen through the surf,
Waits him who drops;—ye safe and formal men,
Who write the deeds, and with unfeeling hand
Weigh in nice scales the motives of the great,
Ye cannot know what ye have never tried!

History preserves only the fleshless bones
Of what we are—and by the mocking skull
The would-be wise pretend to guess the futures!

Without the roundness and the glow of life
How hideous is the skeleton! Without
The colourings and humanities that clothe
Our errors, the anatomists of schools
Can make our memory hideous!"

We shall only add the conclusion, when De Mauprat and Julie are made happy, and Richelieu preceeds:

"See, my liege—see through plots and counterplots—
Through gain and loss—through glory and disgrace—
Along the plams, where passionate discord rears
Eternal Babel—still the holy stream
Of human happiness glides on!"

Leus. And must we
Thank for that also—our prime minister!

Richelieu. No; let us own it: there is One above,
Sways the harmonious mystery of the world,
Ev'n better than prime ministers.

Alas!
Our glories float between the earth and heaven
Like clouds which seem pavilions of the sun,
And are the playthings of the casual wind;
Still, like the cloud which drops on unseen grass
The dew the wild flower feeds on, our ambition
May from its airy height drop gladness down
On unsuspected virtue,—and the flower
May bless the cloud when it hath passed away!"

To the play, Sir Edward has appended three odes, on the last days of Queen Elizabeth, Cornwall, and the death of Nelson. They are, we think, too narrative for this class of composition, with too much of historical reference and classical illustration. But there are brilliant and powerful passages. For instance, in the description of Elizabeth, commencing with a lament over the fate of her unfortunate sister-victim, Mary Stuart:

"Rise, from thy bloody grave,
Thou soft Medusa of the faded line,
Whose evil beauty look'd to death the brave!—
Discrowned queen, around whose pæstionate shame
Terror and grief the palest flowers entwined,
That ever veil'd the ruins of a name
With the sweet parasites of song divine!
Arise, sad ghost, arise,
And, if revenge outlive the tomb,
Thou art avenged—behold the doomer brought to doom!"

Lo, where thy mighty murderess lies,
The sleepless couch—the sunless room,
And, quell'd the eagle eye and lion mien,
The wo-worn shadow of the Titan queen!

There, sorrow-stricken, to the ground,
Alike by night and day,
The heart's blood from the inward wound
Ebb'd silently away.

And oft she turns from face to face
A sharp and eager gaze,
As if the memory sought to trace
The sign of some lost dwelling-place

Belov'd in happier days!—
Ah, what the cline supplies
In the cold vigil of a hireling's eyes!

Ah, and in childless age to weep alone,
And start and gaze, to find no sorrow save our own."

We conclude with the closing lines on the hero of Trafalgar:—

"But where was he—the noblest son
Of the triumphant isle;
Where—England's loftiest victory won—
Her hero of the Nile!

Lo, on his couch, the victor-victim lying,
Save to the few, the fatal stroke unknown—
Above—his gladsome crew—his pennon flying,
And he, with that dark angel—Death, alone!

But ever as the loud hurra
Timed with triumphant peal his latest day,
By each new conquest o'er the scattering foe
Flash'd on the stern cheek the flickering glow.

And, like a star that pales beneath the morn,
When gradual broadening o'er the solemn sky,
So life grew dark as glory drew more nigh!
Vain on that gentle heart the levain came;

Nor bays nor mingling myrtle there uporn;
And thoughts, like echoes in a shrine, repeat
Familiar memories indistinctly sweet,
That blend his England's with his Emma's name.

The last guns heard that famous day
Along the deep were dying;
No flag, save ours, within the bay
On a single mast was flying;

When the captain came where Nelson lay,
The chaplain by his side;
His hand he press'd—his cheek he kiss'd,—
"Look up," the captain cried;—

"Twenty have struck, and the rest have fled—
We have won the victory!"
"Thank God—thank God," then feebly said
The Sydney of the sea!—

My duty is done,—so the race was run,
And thus our Nelson died."

THE AWFUL PLUNGE.—The St. Catherine's (U. C.) Journal of the sixth, states that five men went over Niagara Falls on the previous Thursday. The Journal says, "The only particulars which we have been able to learn are, that just before sunrise on Thursday morning last, a boat with two men in it was discovered in the middle of the river, above the falls, vainly endeavouring to make their way through the ice, with which they were encircled, to the Canada shore. Their utmost exertion proved unavailing, and in a short time they were seen to enter the cascades, when they disappeared in half an hour after, another boat, with three men in it, was discovered in the same awful situation, and trying too to gain the Canada side; but in a few moments shared the melancholy fate of the other. Yesterday the body of a man was picked up in the whirlpool, supposed to be one of these unfortunate men, having about his person two hundred dollars, and a valuable gold watch."

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

MAY-DAY—OR MOVING-DAY.

Finer of May—clear the way—
Baskets—barrows—trundles;
Take good care—mind the ware!
Betty, where's the bundles?
Pots and kettles, broken victuals,
Feather beds, plaster heads,
Looking glasses, tow mattresses,
Spoons and ladles, babies' cradles,
Cups and saucers, salts and castors,
Hurry, hurry—grave and gay—
All must trudge the first of May.
Now we start! mind the cart!
Shovels, bedclothes, bedding;
On we go—soft and slow—
Like a beggar's wedding.
Jointed stools, domestic tools,
Chairs unbacked, tables cracked,
Gridiron black, spit and jack,
Trammels—hooks, musty books,
Old potatoes, ventilators,
Hurry, hurry, grave or gay,
On we trudge the first of May.
Now we've got to the spot—
Bellows—bureau—settee;
Rope untie—mind your eye—
Pray be careful, Betty!
Look! what's there? broken ware?
Decanters dashed, china smashed,
Pickles spoiled, carpet soiled,
Sideboards scratched, cups unmatched,
Empty casks, broken flasks,
Hurry, hurry—grave or gay—
Get you gone the first of May.

LIFE IN LONDON.

We help ourselves, without ceremony, to another graphic sketch of a London hon, together with the literary gossip of the day, from the correspondent of the Evening Star.

GREENROOM LOUNGERS—EPHRAIM BOND.

One of the most constant attendants behind the scenes and in the greenroom of Drury-Lane theatre, is a tall, well-made man, who is dressed with great propriety, that is, whose costume is of the best, in material and make, put on with elegance, but not aping the ultra Brummelsian of Tom Duncombe (Madame Vestris's old friend) or Count D'Orsay. This man, of the kind usually called "well-looking," is one whose features, if examined, show how much the animal preponderates. It is the general aspect of the man which shows this, for the features are good enough taken separately. The forehead is high, though narrow—the eye keen, though small—the nose prominent—the whiskers large—and the mouth, though sensual, extremely well cut. But view the face, taking in all these features together, you must confess that it is a very animal one. The owner of this face is the famous (some put an ix before the epithet) Ephraim Bond, a very intimate friend of Bunn, to whom he has often given great pecuniary aid, and the only man who has kept up anything like a successful rivalry with Crockford, the great gambler.

I believe that Bond and his brothers belong to the Jewish persuasion. About thirty years ago they used to get their living by selling walking-wax, penknives, walking-sticks, pocket-books, sponge, etc., in the streets—chiefly in Leicester-square, a great thoroughfare. By dint of sheer industry they scraped together two or three hundred pounds, and got into partnership with the capital, with the owner of a gambling booth at Epsom race-course. They spread their connexion, enlarged their capital by husbanding their profits, and soon became sole proprietors of a distinct establishment of their own. This they conducted in a very stylish manner, and as fairly, I believe, as such an affair is conducted. There were reports that, more than once when a player who had won, was walking off with his gains, they forced a quarrel upon him, and the elder Bond (Ephraim) used then to beat him. That Bond is a match in a boxing fray with the general run of men is very true, but, as all the beating in the world was not the way to bring the lost money from the pockets of the winners, I doubt that they ever did "try it on" in this manner. In fact, it was the excellent and stylish manner in which they carried on matters that made them friends. On the race-course they had a few speculations on horses, and—having the ear of the jockeys—made money by it. They soon gave the out direct to the gaming booth on the race-course, and having amassed ten thousand pounds, took a house of play in St. James's-street. Either crowds of people who would not or could not go to Crockford's, were glad to resort, and here the Bonds made and are making a princely fortune. It is not pretended that there is any unfair play at Bond's. There is none at Crockford's, and the chief difference between the two houses is, that Crockford's costs its proprietor a great sum every year for wines, feasts, etc., while Bond's is much less costly.

The building of Crockford's cost sixty thousand pounds, and the furniture and wines came to nearly forty thousand pounds more. It is one of the best built and handsomest houses in London; but its interior is more like a place than is Buckingham House, where the queen resides. Carving, gilding, sculpture, make the rooms quite a show to visit. There are not less than eight hundred subscribers, paying ten guineas a year and twenty guineas entrance, and this eight thousand pounds or ten thousand pounds a year, never pay half the cost of the wine actually given to the members. There is in fact, little deep play until "the wine is in" and "the wit is out." Then the play is sure to commence in earnest. Such suppers! Ude is the cook, or rather the director, for he rarely operates himself. The actual value of the wines in Crockford's cellar, which runs under and across St. James's-street, is now eighty thousand pounds! This cellar is nearly three hundred feet long, and contains nearly half a million bottles of wine. I do believe that at Crockford's and Bond's there is no unfair play. What is called the "turn of the table" yields the profits. This must be large, as the expenses at Crockford's are a thousand pounds a week, and about five hundred pounds at Bond's. The "points" in favour of the bank (i. e. of the owner of the corner) are one hundred percent per stake each hour, on French hazard. If one thousand pound stakes were risked each time, one thousand pound per hour would be lost by the players, without their having a shadow of chance against it. Say that the play was thirty hours per week, the bank would, on this ground alone, win fifty thousand pounds a week.

The Bonds could scarcely read or write—even after they had amassed a fortune. They then took lessons in both branches, and are able to read a bill and sign a check. Ephraim Bond is the best informed of the three. It was he who in 1834, became lessee of the Queen's theatre, and then of the Adelphi. The management of the first was very curious. All the pretty (vicious and pretty I should say) actresses in London were engaged at heavy salary. To act!—no, at least not in public. They were merely engaged to draw all the loose "young men upon town," and then the transition from the green-room to supper at the gaming-house, with play (by way of défilé) was very easy. The Adelphi, at the same time, was managed in the same way. The leader of the female corps was the notorious Mrs. Honey; and under her regime, the pieces were got up which displayed women almost naked on the stage with only a thin gauze between them and the audience. The town was placarded with announcements relative to "beautiful women," and never before was decency more outraged on the stage. Little Keely, with a proper sense of propriety, refused to let his wife act with such a crew.

The bell kept by the Bonds in St. James's-street was called the Athenium. The expenses are said to be from five hundred to a thousand a week; the profits average from five thousand pounds to ten thousand pounds a week. It is said that Crockford is worth half a million sterling, and that the Bonds are worth half that. At their private tables are peers and commoners. But it is time I should wind up this sketch. And so good by to Mr. Ephraim Bond!

The success of Bulwer's play is decided. It has fine situations, and the language is extremely poetical. The Queen has been twice to see it. Macready's acting is said to be extremely fine, and this I can easily imagine.

Power is at Dublin, doing well. It is odd that since the Lord Lieutenant (Normanby) went away, the theatre has been better attended for months. The conservative nobility and gentry avoided a place of amusement at which they were likely to be insulted, if they did not swell the "hurra for Lord Normanby, Dan O'Connell's Lieutenant."

The Adelphi closes on Saturday. Yates lost money by the Bayaderes, but Jim Crow, Bahio, (the giant), and the monkeys have made immense profits to him. Mr. and Mrs. Yates, with some more of the company, go to Bath for a few weeks.

The English Opera opens on Monday. Mrs. Sterling is engaged, and the Woods will appear there.

Charles Keen at Bristol, but Macready is too great a favourite there for Keen to take. Duvernoy is at Birmingham. Mrs. Weylett at Sheffield. Mrs. Fitzwilliam at Cork. Templeton at Exeter, the greatest favourite since the days of Ince. Dowton's son is managing at Canterbury. Ranger is at Edinburgh. Buckstone at Glasgow. Sheridan Knowles at Greenock. H. Phillips concert-singing at Liverpool. Mrs. Honey at Manchester.

Persiani, Gisi, Pauline Garcia, Robini and Labache, are to be at Queen's theatre after Easter. Tagliani, Condon, and the Esters will head the ballet corps. Deshayes is busy on a new ballet, to which Costa puts the music.

Lover's Opera, with music by Balfe, is rejected by Bunn, as it would cost too much to bring it out.

Rooke's new Opera, the scene in Spain, comes out next Thursday. H. Phillips heads the cast.

Bulwer gets five hundred pounds for his new play. This is doing well.

The news from Maine has set our politicians on the qui vive. We believe and hope there will be no serious quarrel.

Sir Thomas Harvey goes out, once, in place of the late Sir C. Paget, as naval commander-in-chief of the West India and North America station.

Lace continues much worn in ladies' attire. Flowers are also in vogue. On ball dresses they are profusely scattered. Fans are become indispensable. Velvet hand-dresses are the ton: they fall low at the sides, and the hair shows through the velvet bands which form them, and cross each other from side to side. Pearls, gold-lace, or gems, invariably embellish them.

La Gitana is a new head-dress, made of a petit-bird of velvet, with long barbs of silver-lace at the side. Rouleaux of gauze, tastefully fixed on the dark velvet ornament the top.

Turbans of black velvet are worn. They are ornamented with diamonds, and at the side a diamond agraffe.

The hair is now low behind, and round the knot is a cord of pearls or flowers.

Flounces are coming in—but not large ones. Embroidery is the vogue—especially an organdi. But the spring fashions are not fixed, because the bad weather retards what is called "The Siam."

SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.

BY A LADY.

I have met with a very few unmarried ladies, who have not appeared to me to feel, after the age of thirty, that their existence was thoroughly comfortable and wretched. Many have I heard express it openly; and that such is the fact, even very easily be discovered by an accurate observer of the human countenance. It is also certain that three out of every five of the young English ladies of the present day must remain unmarried, because no man can exist on less than two thousand a-year when married; and how few young men there are with two thousand a-year, compared with the number of young ladies! Five, six, eight, sometimes in one family, generally tolerably pretty, and most of them pleasing and accomplished women—many possessing talents of no ordinary order—are completely neglected by the other sex, "because" (I must repeat the sentiments I have heard from thousands of young men of fashion), "I never take to girls—I do not pay attention to unmarried women, because I am not a marrying man—my friend

—dirted with so and so, and was accused of behaving ill—I don't like to excite false hopes—I shall never marry unless I can find a wife with at least two or three thousand a-year. It is of no use to quarrel with the state of society as it is at present constituted, for we cannot alter it; but I think it might be beneficial to give a few hints on the education of women, which might perhaps be useful in procuring them, in a state of single blessedness, as it is very falsely called, a greater share of happiness, or a less load of misery, than they at present appear to possess after the awful age of thirty.

A girl at thirty is called an old maid—she goes to a ball, and generally sits neglected all the evening, or dances with some gentleman who has been often asked to dine at her father's house, and who, perhaps, remarks, "Miss— is rather passée—a good old girl—and I must do no duty there; and now I shall dance with the beautiful Miss—." My heart always bleeds for the mortifications I see endured by these poor old girls continually. There are certainly some single women whose talents have made them as much considered in society as they ought to be; but then I have generally observed that they have fortunes, or have had advantages above others to bring into notice, and are given to the natural ambition of the human species some scope of action. I will suppose a case in which there are four girls—a moderate fortune in one family—and two sons; and I will suppose their father possessed of fifteen hundred a year. The estate, of course, goes to the eldest son; the second must be a clergyman, if his relations have any profession; or he must be some professional; of course, he can never marry without a large fortune; unless, at the age of forty-five, he has made one for himself. The eldest son, having been to Eton and Cambridge, has learnt that fifteen hundred a year is nothing, and, in all probability, determines (not to be taken in) not to marry any lovely girl, without, at least, forty or fifty thousand pounds. I now come to my four young ladies. I will suppose one very pretty, and the other three rather plain. They have been educated, in all probability, as the greater proportion of English girls are. First of all, they go every Sunday to church; and are, as I conceive all, or nearly all, the class of moderately rich English gentry to be, perfectly honourable, upright, and well-principled. It is only for their own happiness that I would propose any change in the education of a class for which I have so high a respect. To return to the four young ladies. They have all been brought up with the idea that they will become wives and mothers, and are taught to cherish those natural affections which, if by some remote chance one out of the four ever does marry, make them so amiable and lovely as such. They are all allowed to read modern novels, at least all such as are considered to have a moral tendency. Now, I maintain that there is scarcely one of these works which does not impress any young woman with the idea that happiness can alone be found in love and marriage. The heroine is very amiable and perfect, surrounded with admirers, all contending for the honours of her last notice; but where is the novel which represents four poor, pretty, unmarried girls, who are destined to pass their young years without, perhaps, so much as one admirer amongst them! Year after year passes—their bloom and beauty fade—and my four lovely and accomplished warm-hearted beings, having seen all their youthful castles fall one by one, become listless and unhappy. They have little in life to interest them; one dies of a complaint in the saline; another lives many years on arrow-root and calfs-foot jelly, and is enveloped in flannel even in July; a third is under the care of Doctor S. for indigestion; and perhaps the fourth, who is made of tougher materials, and born with less feeling than the others—or perhaps from having something to occupy her mind in preparing the arrow-root for one sister, and ordering the hard dumplings, prescribed by Doctor S. for the other—quivers her rows and disappointments; and if she takes an interest in her brother's children, or a share in their education, or in something which gives vent to those affections which are implanted by nature in the breast of woman, she becomes happy. This, then, appears to me to be the secret to most neglected in female education. Teach them, by all means, that one great source of happiness consists in the indulgence of virtuous affection; but do not teach them that there is no affection capable of producing this happiness, except such as may be felt for a lover or husband. If the heart be properly regulated, it may take a warm and sufficiently engrossing interest in many objects less intimately connected with it. Marriage is a lot and lottery, and, at the best, is a state full of cares and anxieties. Freedom and independence ought not to be lightly parted with, or set down as possessions of little value.

WASHINGTON.

Few columns rose, when Rome was free,

To mark her patriot's last repose;

When she outlived her liberty.

The emp'ours' manacles rose;

And Trajan's shaft was read at last,

When freedom from the Tiber pass'd.

"Better than Trajan," lowly lies,

By broad Potomac's silent shore,

Hallowing the green declivities

With glory, now and evermore.

Art to his fame no aid hath lent—

His country is his monument.

YOUNG WIVES.—A writer in Queen Anne's day, speaking of young brides, says it is usual with young wives before they have been many weeks married, to assume a confident look and manner of talking; as if they intended to signify, in all companies, that they were no longer girls, and consequently, that their whole demeanour, before they got a husband, was all but a constraint upon their nature, whereas, I suppose, if the votes of wise men were gathered, a very great majority would be in favour of those ladies, who, after they were entered into that holy state, rather chose to double their portion of modesty and reservedness. Avoid the least degree of fondness for your husband before the very made of your chamber. Your nearest relations, or the very made of your chamber. This proceeding is so exceedingly odious and disgusting to a who have either good breeding or good sense, that they assign two very unamiable reasons for it: the one is gross hypocrisy, the other has too bad a name to be mentioned. Conceal your esteem and love in your own breast, and reserve your kind looks and language for private hours, which are so many in the four-and-twenty.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE CABINET MINISTER. By the authors of "Mothers and Daughters," "Mrs. Armitage," "The Heir of Ledwood," etc. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

As may be conjectured from the title, this is a republication of an English "fashionable novel." It is from the pen of Mrs. Gore, a writer of some celebrity and of undoubted talent. The following aphorisms we find scattered through the pages of the work.

DELUSIONS OF THE YOUNG.

Of all the lunacies and oversights afflicting human nature, none is more worthy of indulgence than the wifely self-delusion inducing two young persons, mutually attached and unversed in the ways of the world, to fancy that difficulties disappear before the courage and patience of those who find in mutual affection a consolation for vulgar privations.

Van are the sermons of experience; vain the examples cited for their enlightenment. "Unexampled is the love which places their position above all comparison. Their fortune defies misfortune; their reliance on each other supercedes all necessity for reliance on the world."

VICE AND VIRTUE.

Virtue rarely passes unrecognized by the world. A few distorted optics may fail to recognise her features; but it would be as easy to conceal the face of the noonday sun under a mask, as her resplendent features. The dark face of vice is far easier of disguise. Not a vizard-shop but supplies a hundred varnished faces, smiling and serene, to conceal her deformities from the unwary.

In the familiar scenes of society, when man passes through life, not only with his errors unsuspected, but disguising his very faults in the semblance of virtues. There is a sort of stupid equanimity which is invariably taken for good temper. It listens unmoved to reviling—it supports the crosses of life without murmur—it resembles good temper as powder resembles silver. Obstinate in the same manner dignifies itself by sporting the Roman toga of firmness. Charles I. and George II. were honoured by their parties with the name of "Firm," till posterity reversed the judgment and applied a truer epithet.

SHERIDAN.

It was said by one of Sheridan's most intimate associates, that he "wanted only to be in easy circumstances to become a man of the highest honor and integrity." To become a man of integrity is a singular progress to predict of a bosom-friend; nevertheless, such was the exact state of the case. The cautious observer of after-times, when none survive to be grieved by animadversions on one whose talents have added such brilliant gleams to the sunshine brightening our epoch, will probably enter more fully into the causes of this disastrous fact, pointing out the corrupt and contemptible state of a society where a man, so splendidly endowed as Sheridan, dared not be himself—dared not be a poor man of talent; but was compelled to have recourse to the false glitter of equipages, diamonds, and dinner parties, in order to maintain, in the estimation of the horse-apparent and the circles of fashion, the admiration he had conquered as a wit, a poet, and an orator.

THE FATE OF THE GIFTED.

Few lessons are more ripe with instruction than the examination of factions and coteries at successive epochs. By tracing effects to their causes, and following up causes to their effects, we learn to assign a true value to human pretences; and since "the boy is father to the man," it is good to scrutinize the boyhood of men whose words are before us, to know that we may infer wisely from the boyhood of boys. But, to perfect our knowledge, the strange eventful history of life must be traced to its close; and it is a lesson worth a thousand homilies, to record that Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the adulated and adulating of royalty, the darling of noble pleasure-seekers and boon-companions of the great, was abandoned in his latter days to the iron grasp of penury—arrested on his death-bed—arrested in his coffin!

Had the high faculties of this memorable man—

Who, born for the universe, narrowed his mind,

And to "fashion," gave up what was meant for mankind—

been applied to some professional career consistent with the sphere of his birth, he might have attained as a legislator, the overgrown opulence of a Stowell or an Eldon; as a divine, of a Norampton or a Barrington. But it was his rash choice to flutter, an idler among the great; converting the sterling ore of his genius into glittering trinkets, rather than current coin. Regardless whether the tree of fame had taken permanent root, he amused himself with snatching flowers from the bough; destroying the germ of future fruit and solid prosperity. The noisy promises of pompous patrons overpowered at once the still, small voice within, and nullified the glowing exhortations of the Muse, by whose hand he had been raised from obscurity and guided on the road to glory.

SOUTHEY'S LIFE OF COWPER. In two vols. London: 1839.

Any work put forth under the sanction of Robert Southey's name commends itself at once to the confidence of the public. The volumes before us are worthy the author of the "Life of Nelson." They are deeply interesting, and the subject is handled in a candid and liberal manner. The work should be enrolled among the classics of the age. We wonder that no American publisher has yet condescended to furnish it to the American public. O, do the trade mean that we shall have nothing but Nicholas Nickleby and Jack Shepherd?

The following stanzas, from the German of Tieck, are published in the Boston Monthly Miscellany of Religion and Letters, a notice of which was given in our last number.

TO A WAVE.

Whither, thou turbid wave?
Whither with so much haste,
As if a thief wert thou?
I am the Wave of Life,
Stand with my margin's dust;
From the rushing and the strife
Of the narrow stream I fly
To the Sea's infinity
To wash from me the slime
Of the muddy banks of Time.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Thespa's account of the Wallace benefit is well done, and if we had received it earlier it should have been inserted.—We have not heard what arrangements the manager of the National has in view for the ensuing season, in his visit to England.—The song, to which I Panatola alludes, has already appeared in the Mirror.—It was published some six months ago.—A correspondent complains, and we think with justice, of the want of a good public library in this city. The Athenaeum, though a creditable institution in its way, cannot be compared to the establishments with the same name in Philadelphia and Boston. We trust that the deficiency will be supplied, when the building for the reception of the old "New York Library" shall be completed opposite the Athenaeum Hotel.

We agree with our dramatic correspondent L. in his eulogistic comments upon the acting of Mrs. Sloman in "Isaolla." She displayed talents in the part inferior to those of no actress of the present day. We trust that her engagement at the Park will be renewed the next season.—We know nothing of the justice of the "Midshipman Easy's" remarks in regard to the Great Western and her commander.—V. S. is informed that we already have "original poetry" enough on hand to sink a "seventy-four;" and we cannot encourage him to send his threatened stanza.—If amateur writers would but consider what a mortally drug in the literary market is accidentary poetry, they would be more reasonable in their submissions.—We must decline the "Follies of the Season," "Lines to General Scott," and the critique upon a "recent publication."—We thank H. for his communication.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1839.

A new commentator on Shakespeare.—A writer in a late English magazine, whose remarks have at least the merit of originality, has discovered that the literary world have been labouring under a great mistake during the last three centuries, in admiring the fidelity of Shakespeare's delineations of characters.

"Let us ask," says the critic, "where in real life we shall find such characters as Hamlet, Ophelia, Lady Macbeth, King Lear, Regan and Goneril, Touchstone, Sir Toby Belch, Falstaff, and many—we may say most—others which our great dramatist has depicted! Nowhere! There never was such a weak-minded, fretful, whimsical and capricious creature as Hamlet, nor such a miserable, milk-and-water piece of female absurdity as Ophelia. Lady Macbeth seems to us to be a creature grossly out of nature—not in point of wickedness, but so markedly wickedness. She has more mental courage than we ever heard or read of among the most daring of her sex. Her mind is masculine in the extreme; and had Shakespeare studied more truth, and not dramatic effect, he would have portrayed Macbeth exactly as he has done Lady Macbeth." The ineffable dunces! The biography of the last century will furnish examples of hundreds of such "creatures as Hamlet."—There is Cowper, whose character was somewhat analogous—and, to pursue the alliteration, there are Colins and Chatterton, all of whom exhibited, in their mental organization, many of the traits depicted by Shakespeare. "As for Ophelia, her parallel may be found in every boarding-school; and as to the assertion relative to Lady Macbeth, history gives the lie to it, in thousands of instances. We need only mention Queen Elizabeth, Catherine of Russia, Charlotte Corday, and to come down to our own times for an example of female heroism and intrepidity—Grace Horeley Darling. We suspect that this Shakespearean critic is the same who found fault with the falls of Niagara because they were "out of nature." We feel bound to add, however, that he afterwards had the generosity to admit that it was a very fair cataract for a new country, and one under a republican form of government.

Love and lunacy.—The English papers have teemed, since the accession of Queen Victoria, with accounts of hapless gentlemen arrested for attempting to gain access to her majesty, not with treasonable designs against her life, but with tender hopes of gaining her royal affections. In them loyalty has been sublimated, it would seem, to amatory madness. They love their queen so well that nothing will content them short of making her all their own—together with her majesty's civil list, diamonds, and other unconsidered trifles. We learn from a Paris correspondent that Frenchmen, too, are occasionally found excited by the same loving aspirations. He says there is much talk in our higher circles about the frequent arrests made at the Tuileries, of persons who come up from all parts to speak to Louis Philippe. In the last six months above twenty of these troublesome visitors have been apprehended and conveyed to the Bicetre or to Maisons de Santé, after undergoing minute examinations. These facts have been ascribed by some prints to political causes and criminal designs. Such is not the case. These arrests have all the same causes, with different circumstances; they are all or almost all connected with a sort of monomania, which one might take to be epidemic, and which exhibits itself in a chimerical love for Princess Clementina of Orleans, whom most of these poor creatures have never seen. They come up from the provinces to Paris, their hearts full of their mad passion, in order to demand her highness's hand of her father. The personal attractions and fortune of Louis Philippe's daughter would justify enough the affection of those pretenders, if romantic passions for princesses were not a common disease. Poor Maria Antoinette was long importuned by a worshipper of that description, who was known at Versailles under the name of "L'Amoureux de la Reine." The Duchess de Berry was the object of a chimerical passion of the same description.

Our painters.—We understand that the approaching exhibition of the American Academy of Fine Arts at Clinton-Hall, is to be one of the most attractive ever offered in this city. Where there is so much genius for painting in our country, is it not deplorable that it has such a limited opportunity for complete development, through a deficiency of encouragement! We trust that our princely merchants and retired millionaires will look in upon this exhibition of American paintings, and avail themselves of the chance of procuring some of the best productions of our artists.

"The play's the thing."—An English paper says that during the performance of the drama of "Oliver Twist," lately at the Surrey theatre, a scene occurred which fully exemplified what philosophers call the doctrine of human sympathy. When the play reached that point at which Oliver is threatened fiercely by Sykes and Toby Crackit, previous to the attempted burglary, a sailor rose from the crowded benches of the pit, and, with many a sailor-like oath, declared to the unutterable astonishment alike of actors and audience, that he would not see a poor boy ill-treated, and pulling up his jacket-sleeves, he was about to rush single-handed to the rescue of the apparently misused child, and he was only arrested in his progress to the stage by the forcible interference of those about him. It was some time before the honest jack tar could be persuaded, "it was all a sham;" and some preparations were made for removing him. The audience, however, delighted with his ebullition of naval feelings, loudly vociferated that he should remain, which was agreed to. Through the remainder of the play he continued to gaze on the acting with breathless attention, more than once showing no inconsiderable restlessness.

Forest scenery.—Never were our forests arrayed in a drapery of more beautiful verdure than at the present season. There is a delicacy in the half-unfolded foliage of spring, which to our eyes is far more inviting than the luxuriant green of summer. What a picture of forest scenery is given us by Miss Mitford, in these few simple lines:

"How the indented leaves
Of bright green cut clearly the blue sky
And the small clouds: And how this tiny spring
Bubbles and sparkles round the moss-grown roots,
Winding its silver thread along the short
Elastic turf, so thickly set with flowers,
And mixed with fragrant herbs, till it is lost
Amongst the lowly thickets! Not a spot
In all the forest can compare with this,
Nature's own temple!"

Canine fashions.—A correspondent of the National Intelligencer, furnishes the following libellous gossip:—"It is now the mode for ladies in high life, to drive through Broadway, accompanied by pet puppies, (not human, but canine), of every description. You cannot imagine how picturesque the scene; a carriage, with escutcheon hammercloth, servants in rich livery, most unexceptionable horses and harness, and containing two or three inmates, besides a dog of Charles the Second spaniel-breed, his fore-paws on the edge of the window, and his head loling forth most inquisitively, returning the nods of the passers-by on the parade, as they make their salams at the fair occupants of the coach! Such is the custom, and the dog-sellers are reaping a rich harvest." We have seen "many puppies" looking out of carriages in Broadway, but do not remember seeing any of the Charles the Second breed.

Every one to his taste.—It is said that there is a gentleman in London who—in the confident expectation that Van Amburgh will sooner or later be made a meal of by one of the tigers—goes to Drury-Lane theatre every night, lest he should miss witnessing so interesting an exhibition. Is it not very selfish of Van Amburgh not to gratify the gentleman in his amiable desire! The tigers are, no doubt, willing to do their part in rendering the spectacle effective, and we have no doubt the announcement would attract a crowded house.

Dahlia's.—We see it stated in the English papers, that seedling dahlia's have been sold in London for a price as high as sixty guineas, or three hundred dollars. If they increase in value at such a rate, says the Boston Post, perhaps we may see a dahlia mania in England, which will equal the tulip mania in Holland, in the seventeenth century.

Growth of France.—A late Paris journal remarks, that within the last one hundred and thirty years, the population of France has been doubled; the total revenue has become six times, and the total imposts five times, as great as they were; while the average revenue and imposts for each individual have, in the same time, been tripled.

Shade trees.—This is the season for setting out fruit and shade trees, and it may not be amiss to repeat the excellent advice which Sir Walter Scott puts into the mouth of the prudent Laird of Dumbiedykes, in his death-bed admonition to his son:—"Jock, when ye hae naething else to do ye may be aye sticking in a tree; it will be a growing, Jock, when ye are sleeping. My father tauld me see forty years sin', but I never found time to mind him."

Clubs.—A correspondent complains of the introduction of the English fashion of clubs, as calculated to encourage celibacy. As the assertion is purely theoretical, we shall wait for our correspondent to substantiate it by suitable proofs. How would it do to form an anti-club club?

Flattering.—A London paper attributes the authorship of "Jim Crow," to "those celebrated American poets, Messrs. Bryant and Halleck." We should suppose it would require the union of two great intellects to produce such a chef-d'œuvre in the lyrical art.

Curious conjunction.—The new law in Mississippi against gambling, prohibits betting upon "the result of any cockfight or duel." The framers of the law was right, undoubtedly, in giving to the fowl duellist precedence over the man duellist.

Fraternal liberality.—An orator at a recent political meeting is said to have thundered forth this "noble sentiment":—"Mr. Chairman, if I was a Siamese twin, and my brother was on 'tother side, I'd cut the rascal off!"—Overwhelming applause.

MISCELLANY.

CULTIVATION OF FLOWERS.—The cultivation of flowers is an employment adapted to every grade, the high and the low, the rich and the poor; but especially to those who have retired from the busy scenes of active life. Man was never made to rust out in idleness. A degree of exercise is as necessary for the preservation of health, both of body and mind, as food. And what exercise is more fit for him, who is in the decline of life, than that of superintending a well-ordered garden? What more enlivens the sinking mind? What is more conducive to a long life! The cultivation of flowers is an appropriate amusement for young ladies. It teaches neatness, cultivates a correct taste, and furnishes the mind with many pleasing ideas. The delicate form, and features, the mildness and sympathy of disposition, render them fit subjects to raise those transcendent beauties of nature, which declare the "perfections of the Creator's power." The language of flowers is so elegant an amusement, that we select a few of the most interesting emblems for the gratification of our fair readers.

Beauty—The Rose.—This queen of flowers is considered the pride of Flora, and the emblem of beauty in every part of the globe.

Calumny—Madder.—This plant, so essential to dyers and calico printers, is made the emblem of calumny, since it leaves so permanent a stain on the purest cloth.

Coquetry—The Yellow Day Lily.—This fragile beauty is made to represent coquetry, as its flowers seldom last a second day.

Courage—The Black Poplar.—The poplar was dedicated to Hercules, in consequence of his destroying Cacus, in a situation where these trees abounded.

Declaration of Affection—Tulip.—The tulip has, from time immemorial, been made the emblem by which a young Persian makes a declaration of his attachment.

Diffidence—Cyclamen.—As modest diffidence adds attraction to beauty, so does this graceful flower engage our notice by its unsunning carriage; for the cyclamen, although it expands in an upright direction, never rears its head to the sun. The Romish church has dedicated this flower to St. Romanus.

Docility—The Rush.—This plant, so proverbial for its pliability, is the most applicable symbol of docility.

Durability—Dogwood, or Cornet Tree.—The firm and lasting nature of this wood has caused it to be made the type of duration.

Fidelity—Wall Speckwort.—This beautiful plant, which attaches itself to old walls, is the symbol of fidelity. This plant is dedicated to St. Simon of Jerusalem.

Forgetfulness—The Lilack.—The Eastern nations, from whence this beautiful shrub was originally brought, use the lilack as the emblem of the forsaken, as it is the flower the lover offers to his mistress if he abandons her.

JUST REWARD OF TREACHERY.—Tarpeia, the daughter of Tarpeius, the keeper of the Roman capitol, agreed to betray it into the hands of the Sabines, on this condition, "that she should have for her reward, that which they carried upon their left arms," meaning the golden bracelets they wore upon them. The Sabines having been let in by Tarpeia, according to compact, Titus, their king, though well pleased with carrying the place, yet detesting the manner in which it was done, commanded the Sabines to give the fair traitor her promised reward, by throwing to her all they wore on their left arms; and therewith unclasping his bracelet from his left arm, he cast that, together with his shield, upon her. All the Sabines following the example of their chief, the traitress was speedily overwhelmed with the number of bracelets and buccles heaped upon her, and thus perished miserably under the weight of the reward which she had earned by the double treachery to her father and to her country.

THE WIFE'S PRAYER.

HEAR me—Oh! hear me now!
By the red flush upon thy wasted cheek,
By the deep tracery o'er thy marble brow,
HEAR me!—Bless with me, husband, while I speak!

I've mark'd thee, day by day—
Thine hours are all of anxious, vague unrest—
Thine eye hath caught a stern, unwonted ray—
Thy lip hath lost all memory of its jest.

Thine wakeful ear hath heard
Thoughts nursed by thee in solitude apart;
Which, like the young of the devoted bird,
Feed on the burning life-blood of thy heart.

Thy wife sits pale beside—
Thy child shrinks back appalled from thine embrace—
Thy menials quail before thy mien of pride—
Thy very dog avoids thine altered face!

Oh! for poor Glory's wreath—
Casting from thee all tenderness and gladness—
Thou track'st a phantom on, whose fiery breath
Drieth the way-founts, till thou thirst to madness!

My prayer is all for thee—
My life in thine:—by our remembered bliss,
By all thy watchful hours of misery,
What need hath Fate to render thee for this?

If thou yet lovest me, hear!
Now, while thy feet press onward to the goal,
Turn thee, oh! turn thee, in thy stern career,
And thrust this mad ambition from thy soul!

REMINISCENCES OF BYGONE TIMES.

NEW-ENGLAND WITCHCRAFT.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

It was at the trial of Sarah Good, that a circumstance occurred which, though hardly noticed at the time, led at last to a series of horror and suffering never to be forgotten by that part of the world. One of the afflicted gave a loud scream while the face of Sarah Good was turned away, and fell upon the floor. Being lifted up, she declared upon oath that she had been stabbed with a knife by the shape or spectre of the accused, while she, the accused, Sarah Good herself, was pretending to hide her face; for, at her look, the glance of her eye only, the wretched sufferers would go distracted, as it were, and foam at the mouth and tear themselves; and then again, at her touch, they would instantly recover. For proof, the accuser plucked forth from her flesh the blade of a knife, declaring that when the blow was made by the spectre, the blade broke off, as it was on the way to her heart. All the judges were thunderstruck—the people mute with terror. The poor woman herself, who had been locking her hands and bowing her head in prayer, started up with a cry of anguish, and flung her arms abroad, and looked about her on every side as if she had no longer any earthly hope. The accuser echoed her cry, as if struck to the heart anew, and fell forward her whole length upon the floor of the church, and lay there for a while as if entirely overcome with sleep or approaching death. Not a breath could be heard in the whole house, not a murmur—there was a dead preternatural quiet everywhere till she stirred of herself; they were even afraid to touch her. The trial was over, the evidence through, the charge itself had been made; and the foreman of the jury stood up to render the verdict of death. But before he could speak, a tumult was heard afar off, growing louder and louder every moment, and nearer and nearer; the multitude swayed this way and that—a bustle followed at the very door, and straightway appeared a small, swarthy man, with a fierce look, dragging in a large boy by the shoulder, lifting him along as if he were a shadow, and making his way through the crowd like a giant.

"What ho!" cried he to the judge. "What ho!" to the foreman of jury, as they quailed and trembled at his approach, "why speed ye thus in the work of death? And you the baily, and you, Doctor Mather, and you, Captain Sewall! who are sitting there to judge the quick and the dead, how dare ye? Who gave you power to measure and weigh such mystery? Are ye of the gifted and the powerful—specially gifted from on high—with power to see spirits, and able to take the Prince of Darkness himself by the horns?"

"Who is it!—who is it? Whom have you there?"

"Master Burroughs, I believe," said one of the judges.

"By what authority are you abroad again?" asked another. Much whispering followed:—"It's Burroughs!—Burroughs!" "Can it be!" "How altered he is!" "How old he looks!" "I shouldn't have known him, I declare!" said another and another of the trembling multitude.

"By what authority! judges of Israel! By the authority of the Strong Man who broke loose when the Spirit of the Lord was upon him! By authority of one who hath endowed me with great power—power that no man here will have the hardihood to question!"

"But why are you here?"

"I am weary of being a hostage for you, ye men of little faith! What! am I to be fooled, and thwarted, and betrayed at every step of my life, that you may be left free here to lord it over the church, and waste the heritage of the widow and the fatherless!"

"Who is that boy?"

"Ask him! Behold his beauty! Set him face to face, if you dare, with her that told the story of the knife."

"And wherefore?" asked one of the judges.

"Wherefore, Andrew Elliot! wherefore! wait and you shall know. There is no hurry. It may be time enough a week hence, or a month, or a whole year, for such as you to throw away again immortal hopes—your very souls, by spilling the blood of the innocent!"

"Oh, sir! sir!" cried the poor woman at the bar. "God for ever bless you! Why did you go away from those who knew you, and loved you, and trusted you? Why did you ever leave us? and why, to the tender mercies of men who have no bowels, even for their own mothers, nay, even for their own offspring?"

"Be of good faith, Sarah! The Lord thy God shall be nigh to thee, and comfort thee. Have courage, and put all thy trust in them that hath power to deliver thee."

"Ah, sir, I have! I do! and pray that His will may be done, sir—on earth as it is in heaven."

"Have courage, Sarah." And then turning to the judges, he asked if the boy might be heard.

"If he know aught of this matter, certainly. What say you, brother Willard?" asked Judge Sewall, turning to a minister of the church on his right.

"Certainly, Captain Sewall, certainly, by all means. We are never too late, I hope, for mercy and truth. Let the boy be sworn."

The boy having stepped forth, uplifted his right hand according to the law of that people, with his fine yellow hair blowing about his head like a glory, and swore by the everlasting God, the searcher of hearts, to speak the truth. All eyes were upon him; for he stood face to face with her who had sworn to the spectre-knife; and his beauty was terrible. Near him, with her young eyes lifted up to his, and her lips apart, stood Bridget Pope, leaning forward as if holding her breath and just ready to fall—such was the eager intensity of her attitude, the passionless, motionless, and statue-like expression of her countenance.

After a short pause, the boy declared that only the day before he had broken a small knife and thrown away a part of the blade while the accuser was with him; that he knew her well, and that being outside the door when he heard her story, he suspected how the matter was and strove to get in, but was prevented by the pressure, and would not have had the courage to speak out, when he saw the people so quiet all about him and so wedged together, but for the help of a stranger whom he saw afar off, and to whom he told the story, whereupon, said the boy, he lifted me up with one hand, as if I had been a little child, and brought me here, making his way through the people there, with only two or three sweeps of his arm. Here is the other part of the knife! he added, reaching up to the judge who was nearest, a handle with a part of the blade. You may see, Mr. Judge, it's the very same. Bridget Pope, there—you may ask her, if you don't believe me; she knows that are knife well enough, don't you, Bridget?

"That I do!" she whispered in reply, the tears running down her pale cheeks. "That I do, Robert Evelett, but I never expected to see it again, nor you neither, after you were cast away."

The two parts of the blade were diligently compared by the judges, and found to agree; the boy was treated with favour, the accuser, a large girl, was rebuked for lying, and poor Sarah Good put to death according to law.

Out of this affair grew a multitude of other accusations. The afflicted were sent for from all parts of the country. Their numbers augmented every day; prayer and fasting preceded every step of their progress—their progress itself was a triumphal march—and whithersoever they went, witches and witchcraft were sure to be discovered. A pious theologian of that day, Cotton Mather, and a very learned writer, was employed by the proper authorities to draw up an account of the whole affair; and he says of the poor creatures that were afflicted, all of whom he personally knew, and most of whom he saw, perhaps, every day of his life, that when the fit was on, they were distorted and convulsed in every limb; that they were pinched black and blue; that pins were found stuck into their flesh by invisible hands; that they were scalded as with hot water, and blistered as with fire; that one of the afflicted was beset by a spectre with a sharp spindle, which nobody could see, till in her agony she snatched it away from the spectre, when it instantly became visible to everybody about her; that another was haunted by a shape that wore a sheet, which none but the afflicted were able to see till she tore a piece of it away, on which everybody was able to see it; that poison was offered by invisible creatures, which poison, if but a drop of it touched the lips, or even the flesh, made the body swell up to bursting;

"And this juice of hell,
Wherever it fell,
To a cancer burned the floor!"

that burning rags were forced into their mouths, leaving incurable sores; that they were branded with a hot iron, so that marks were left upon their foreheads for life; that the spectres were careful to personate such as were known to the afflicted; and that, in such case, the shape or spectre was hurt by the afflicted, the person represented by the spectre was sure to be hurt in the same way;—as, for example, where one of the afflicted charged a woman of Beverly, Dorcas Hoare, with tormenting her, and pointing to a distant part of the church where they were assembled, cried out—there, there!—there she goes now! whereupon a man that happened to be near, whipped out a rapier and struck at the wall with it; and the afflicted told him that he had given the spectre a scratch over the eye; it was found very soon after this to be true, for when they apprehended Dorcas Hoare, she pleaded guilty to the charge of witchcraft, and acknowledged, that in troubling the accused, she had actually received a scratch over the eye, and a cut in the side from a rapier; that, after a while, if the accused but glanced her eye at the afflicted, though they were looking another way at the time, the afflicted would swoon away and only come back to life at the touch or bidding of the accused; that oftentimes the afflicted were bitten with a peculiar set of teeth, corresponding precisely with those of the accused, whether old or young, large or small, broken or regular; and that after a few days of torment, most of the accused were able to see their tormentors; and among the others a devil of a diminutive stature and a sort of tawny colour, with fierce black eyes, who carried a book which he kept offering to the sufferers and persuading them to touch, thereby to acknowledge the power and authority of the Black Man—a mighty shadow, with whom two or three of their number had actually slept—if they were to be believed upon their oaths, while under sentence of death, and no other way of escape left for them, but that of telling the truth.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH

But in reply to these astonishing and dismal facts, which appear on record in the grave, elaborate chronicles of that age, we have the testimony of George Burroughs, himself, a preacher of the gospel, who died like a dog—in the discharge of his duty; died by the rope! while striving with more than mortal courage to stay the destroyers in their headlong career.

"Man! man!" shouted he to the chief judge, on hearing a beautiful woman, a wife and a mother, acknowledge that she had lain with Belzebub himself. "Man! why do you not send her instantly to death! Why spare ye the miserable few that confess, and put to death all who refuse? Would ye bribe them to lie and live! Would you encourage them to swear away the life and character of whomsoever they will! Put her to death—put her to death, I say! and you will hear no more of these horrible confessions. To the gallows with her! and there will be an end of such blasphemies—and for ever! They lie, and ye know it—and wherefore! Because they have no other hope. Ye have left them no other chance of escape. Having belied themselves, the poor unhappy creatures are driven to belie others, lest their sincerity may be questioned."

"Why, brother Burroughs—why, brother Burroughs, do we not read in the Scriptures of truth, that of old, a woman had power to raise the dead. Were that woman personally on trial here, would you not receive her confession?"

"No, Doctor Mather, no!—not without proof that she had such power."

"Proof—what proof could we have?"

"What proof! Command her to show that power! to raise the dead before you! Ah, you are holding a consultation together: I can see that you pity me—that you wonder at my fool-hardiness. Yet I do not shrink, nor shall I. I repeat my words. I say that if these women be witches, they should be made to show it by proof. I, for one, am ready to have it—and then to set all their power at defiance. Why look ye at me, as if I were beside myself! And why is it,

I pray you, that ye yourselves are not moved by the eyes of that wretched woman there! and why are the accusers—and the accusers only—disturbed by her look!"

"Brother Burroughs, brother Burroughs!"

"Brother Moody, brother Moody!"

"Be quiet Master Burroughs!"

"I will not be quiet, master judge; and hereafter, as sure as you are now sitting there, you will remember my words and be thankful for yourselves that I was not quiet at your bidding, nor frightened by your portentous looks!"

"Have done, Master Burroughs—officer!"

"No; I will not have done! Touch me if you dare.—Begone, sir!—what I have to say shall be said. By our sovereign lord and master and Mary his queen, I charge you to hear me! You are shedding the blood of the innocent! You are driving away the brave and the good, the wise and the gentle, by scores, from your borders. Out upon you!—you are saying to people of no courage, as to that woman there, confess and ye are safe!—deny and you perish. Out upon you!"

"To the point, Mr. Burroughs."

"To the point, hey!—I will I proved before you the other day, that an accuser had shamefully perjured herself in open court; nevertheless you gave judgment of death on the accused. I see that accuser now. What will be said of your justice at home, if you permit her to escape! Will the judges of England forget you, or the majesty of England forgive you! The torn sheet which has so disturbed your imagination, even like the base forgery of that knife, was a—nay, pardon me—(stooping towards a pale woman that was near and urging her to come forth)—nay, nay—although I have no doubt of the fact; although, as I hope to see the face of my Redeemer, I do believe that story of the sheet and that of the spindle to be a trick and a forgery, even like that of the spectre knife; yet am I not now permitted to say upon what my belief is founded."

"Judges of Israel! They talk of their teeth, and of whole sets of teeth, being discovered by the prints which appear in their flesh. But how does it happen, I pray you, that all these marks are in such parts of the body as can be most easily reached by the teeth of the accusers themselves! And how does it happen, I pray you, that instead of corresponding teeth, or sets of teeth being found in the accused, you have sometimes found her without a single tooth in her head! Nay, how does it happen that poor Abigail Paris and Bridget Pope, who are indeed sufferers by a strange malady—babes that are innocent as the dove, I am sure—how does it happen that of all the accusers they only escape this peculiar mark, the print of the teeth—and we are unable to see, or even to name their tormentors! Because they speak the truth; although against themselves—poor things—they are not trying to deceive others. I have done."

"It is well you have," whispered one of the judges.

That very speech cost George Burroughs his life. The unhappy allusion he made just before he went forward, as if to encourage the pale woman, Elizabeth Dyer, the prophesy of whose grandmother, Mary Dyer, was in everybody's mouth; and perhaps to show her that he had been surprised into saying thus much, and meant no further to betray her, to whose holy regard for truth he was indebted for the knowledge—and as was knowledge—though he was not permitted to say so; that as the knife-blade was, even so were the spindle and sheet, a devilish artifice; even these few brief words he whispered to her, accompanied as they were with a look of deep solicitude, sorrow, and love, which in his anxiety to quiet her alarm, for she had buried her face when he mentioned the shirt, were fatal to him—fatal to one that loved him with a most heroic love; and would have been fatal to Elizabeth Dyer, herself, in spite of her beauty—may, because of her beauty—but for the wonderful courage of her sister, the stout-hearted Rachael Dyer, whose behaviour throughout the scenes that followed, deserves to be chaptered in marble.

Before the sun went down that very day, the conspirators were at work: before the sun rose again, the snare was laid in mystery and power; and before three months were over, the work was accomplished. But before we enter upon this narrative, a word or two as to the character of Burroughs himself.

He was a man, it will appear, of great moral courage, enthusiastic views, of eloquent speech, and a superior genius—a genius far beyond the people about him, and far above that of the age. He came into the world, if ever man did, a full century too soon. He was of small stature, but his activity and strength were prodigious. He went about much, was for ever in peril, and his every-day adventures, at one period of his life, would be thought extraordinary by those who live and die now in search of adventure. He grew up in warfare, trial and vicissitude, such as we meet with only in the history of a people who make war, every man for himself, by night and by day, and all their lives long, as the New-Englanders did, for about one hundred and fifty years; putting swords upon the thighs of their preachers, and bibles into the hands of their soldiers. He grew up to the church—a messenger of peace and goodwill on earth; he should have been a leader of armies. He was a beautiful writer—he should have been a great chieftain. He was a poet, a scholar, and a martyr; he should have been a law-giver, a statesman, a deliverer, a discoverer. Had he appeared a hundred years later, he would have been all this, and the nations would have risen up, and shouted after him, and called him blessed!

At the age of eighteen, he was a widower. At the age of twenty-two, he was a widower again—with a new love at his heart, a love which cost him his life, for, till the name of Elizabeth Dyer came to be associated with his, the wretched woman who had acquired such awful power—the power of life and death over all that stood in their way—by their pretended afflictions, paid little or no regard to his inquiries or reproaches.

He had been first associated with Mr. Paris at Nauskeag; who, after awhile, he left that neighbourhood, and betook himself to Falmouth, now Portland, where being led away by his warlike temper, in repelling a sudden attack of the French and Indians on the little town of Casco, which they afterwards burnt; and his party having fired away all their powder, he was taken captive, led off to the great lakes, and became a sort of adopted Moquis—a voluntary hostage for the whites, for whose faith he undertook to answer with his life. It appears, too, that he had magnificent views on the subject of a coalition; that he grew to be a favourite with Big-Bear, the great northern chief, who went so far as to offer him his daughter in marriage; that he had begun to meditate seriously on the offer, when the whites, for whom he stood in pledge, were guilty of something which he regarded as a breach of faith—whereupon, he bethought himself once more of a timid girl, Elizabeth Dyer, who, when the shadow of death was upon all that he cared for, when he was a broken-hearted, miserable man, had pursued him with her look, till, turn which way he would, her eyes were before him day after day—night after night—as if she trembled for his everlasting welfare; not as if she loved him, but more as if she were afraid of him, and for him—and having thought of her, he arose, went to the lodge of council, and walked up to the great northern chief, and stood in the circle of death, and offered himself up for the treachery of his countrymen. But no—no! The Big-Bear would not have the blood of a brother and a warrior. He stood up, and spoke in his turn.

"You know the Big-Bear, who is there to harm a cub of the bear? Behold your chief!—who is there to harm the child of your chief? Behold my daughter!—who is there to strike her husband? He is no longer the foe of our tribe—he is a brother—who is there to touch his life! White man! behold these arrows—their plumage is dripping with blood. White man! feel the edge of this knife—that blood is the blood of our tribe—their knife is a weapon of war."

The white man spoke

"Big-Bear! father, I must go away. Your people and my people are ever at war. I cannot strike a brother in battle. I must go away. I cannot be on either side, when the Big-Bear and the Long-Knives are at strife. I cannot marry Pawteewa now."

"Why not, brother?"

"Because Pawteewa should be wife to some warrior, who will strike at every foe of the tribe, without stopping to ask who or what he is."

"Good."

He went away from the Moquis, and arrived, as we have already seen, at a period of universal distress and terror, just in time to see a poor melancholy creature, whom he had known for twelve years, on trial for witchcraft. He could hardly believe his own eyes. He knew not whither to go, or how to approach the grave authorities of the land of white; nor could he promise himself that they were serious—altogether serious—in their belief, until he saw this poor creature, who not many years before had been like a mother to the wife he had lost, hung up for a witch—hung up with brutish outcries, between heaven and earth, for the very children to hoot and pelt, by the hour.

From that day, he was another man. His heart was alive with a new sense—the dark, desolate chambers thereof were no longer as they had been. There was, to be sure, neither light nor music there, neither love nor passionate beauty; but, if they were not as they had been years before, in the spring-time of his youthful hope, they were not as they had been for five years, altogether uninhabited, or perplexed with apparitions, that were enough to drive him, or any other man, crazy; the apparition of buried love—the apparition of his babe—the apparition of hope—for hope herself was no longer a reality there.

He was now a messenger of watchful retribution. Every facility was on the stretch, by night and by day, all night and all day, for many a month, to entrap and expose the conspirators. He began with public prayer in the market-place, for they would not suffer him to go up into the house of the Lord. He besought his Maker, the searcher of hearts, the father of spirits, to stay the destroyer; to make plain the way of the judges; to speak in the dead of night—and with a voice of thunder to the doers of iniquity; to comfort and support the souls of the accused, and to strengthen their hearts; and, if consistent with his Almighty pleasure, to speak as with the noises that shook Sinai—

"When blasts of unseen trumpets long and loud

Swelled by the breath of whirlwinds, rent the cloud."

The terrible words—Thou shalt do no murder—Thou shalt not bear false witness!

These prayers had well nigh brought him before the twelve for blasphemy. But he was permitted to escape, for a time; and one day having departed for the habitation of Matthew Paris, the preacher, his old associate in grief, where the frightful delusion first broke forth, he was tracked thither as to a snare.

He had resolved in his own soul, whatever might come of it, life or death, shame or dishonour, to the family, to Bridget Pope, or Abigail Paris; or even to the preacher himself, that aged servant of God, to search the terrible mystery to the bottom, and to bring the guilty to judgment; nay, every accuser who had begun to waste the heritage of the Lord, whether young or old, beautiful or otherwise, as flowers of hope or not, before the ministers of the law; every accuser in whom he should be able to detect a sign of bad faith, or so much as a look of alarm at his inquiry; every afflicted one, whether male or female, in whose language or behaviour he should perceive aught of a nature to justify him in doing so. Of a truth he was in earnest.

SPIRIT OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

The following advertisement which appeared in a London newspaper, we give as a specimen of true laithos—"If this should meet the eye of Emma D—, who absented herself from her father's house on Wednesday last, she is implored to return, where she will meet with undiminished affection by her almost broken-hearted parents. If nothing can persuade her to listen to their joint appeal—should she be determined to hang their gray hairs with sorrow to the grave—should she never mean to revisit a home where she has spent so many happy years—it is at least expected, if she is not lost to all sense of propriety, that she will without further delay, send back the key of the tea-caddy."

To the month of January our ancestors gave the significant name of Wolf-month, because the severity of the season usually brought down the wolves from the woods and mountains, among the villages and enclosures, where they committed frequent ravages. Hence we may infer that the tenor of the weather was the same twelve centuries ago; for now, if we have any heavy frosts, they generally fall in January. If this month is not rigorous, it is either obscured with deep fogs or heavy rains; so that it may fairly be said to be the most uncomfortable of the whole year.

A curious specimen of mechanical ingenuity is at present exhibited in London. It is a carriage for travelling without horse or steam, propelled solely by the traveller's own weight, and is the invention of Mr. Nevis, a native of Cambridge. Its structure is light and elegant, and persons may, on common roads, propel themselves at the rate of between twenty and thirty miles an hour, and on the railroads it might be worked with incredible velocity.

The Indicator, a semi-official journal, published at Gotha, relates the following fact which took place there, and would be totally incredible did it not come from an eye-witness, and attended with strong reprobation on the part of that journal.—On February eighteenth, immediately after the decapitation of a criminal condemned to death for murder, several persons, subject to epileptic fits, ascended the scaffold with permission of the authorities, and each, filling a glass with the blood of the victim, drank on the spot."

"Agriculture," says Socrates, "is an employment the most worthy the application of man, the most ancient and the most available to his nature; it is the common nurse of all persons, in every age and condition of life; it is the source of health, strength, plenty, and riches; and of a thousand solid delights and honest pleasures. It is the mistress and school of sobriety, temperance, justice, religion, and in short of all virtues, civil and military."

Vaudivilles were originally invented by a feller of Vau de Vire, on the valley by the river Vire, and were sung by the men to amuse themselves as they spread their cloths on the banks of the river. They were songs composed on some incident or adventure of the day. At first these gay playfellow songs were called the songs of Vau de Vire, till they became known as Vaudivilles.

It is astonishing how little of life there is when you come to abstract. Infancy or childhood can only be called vegetation; then, when you add to this sleep, dressing, and undressing, to how little it is reduced! How important, then, to use that little!

A RAILROAD—BY A NOVICE.

When we arrived by the Blue-Bottle coach at the Basingstoke station, forty or fifty miles from the metropolis, there was an intuitive sense of being already at our journey's end. We felt that we had virtually arrived in London, and that all remained to do was simply to get into an omnibus, and give up the time of an ordinary hackney-coach fare, in proceeding to Piccadilly.

The influence of the scene upon a novice observer is ferociously impressive. First, a string of horseless coaches, like the line of kings in Macbeth's vision, glided with phantom smoothness by me, propelled by the magic touch of a material imp of Vulcan, to take their places in the train; meanwhile, under a shed at a short distance, were certain other imps, harnessing, or otherwise preparing the fiery dragon that was to carry us off. Then forth the monster came! a hideous tangle, with a double body like a wasp! with a whistle as loud as the screech of a tortured elephant; spitting fire and spouting smoke, and looking more like an enraged demon of Vesuvius vomiting destruction, than a docile devil, subdued to the service of man! It began by showing off a series of gratuitous movements to and fro, answering to the gambols and courtvetings of an impatient blood-horse, and then darted past all the coaches, as though determined to run away from them. anon, returning, the first coach in the train was hooked to its tail; and the lengthy mass began to move a chain of one class, followed by a second, and the second by a third, like Fleet-street running after Ludgate-hill, and the Strand after Fleet-street. To add to the effect of the scene, it was dark—or, rather, "darkness" made "visible" by the lamps of the station-house, and the fire of the steam-carriage.

Like the first drops of a shower-shower,"

as Byron has it, were our first movements, and accompanied by a painfully deliberate clank of cough on the part of the engine, which appeared, to our uninitiated senses, to the sorely broken-winded. As we proceeded, however, the cough became quicker, and less perceptible, till at length it lost its lugubrious character, and left us happy in the assurance that the demon's lungs were not affected. They who have travelled in one of the carriages nearest the engine, will know well how to rectify the following:

"Chikongh!—ekongh!—kough!—kough!—kou!—ku!—ku!—kuku, kuku, kuku, kuku, kuku, kuku," and away we go at the rate of thirty miles an hour, with little to amuse us, save the rapid alternation of milestones and policemen (who look like finger-posts), as thus: 10—policeman—9—policeman—8—policeman—7—policeman—6—policeman—5—policeman—4—policeman—3—sleeping donkey on the rail, cut in two—2—engine off the rail, blown to atoms—engineers hurried out of danger into a horsepond—the first-class coaches crushed by the second, and the second jammed up by the third, like Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, and the Strand, as aforesaid, all crammed together in St. Paul's churchyard. But this last is a mere chance, we will not say how likely; and therefore we will take up the train again at 3—policeman—2—policeman—1—policeman—a whistle! O, mercy! such a whistle! a shriek, rather; like that of a million "mandrakes torn from out the earth!" Gentler—slower—moderate—slow—softly—stiller—still—Vauxhall Terraces.

As now comes the most melancholy part of the proceeding. After thirty miles an hour, a dead stop for as long a time as it would take you to go fifteen miles more; while your coach is worked by hand off the rail on the common ground again; and two sorry-jades of horses (instead of the four you left behind you at the other Terminus), with a still more sorry-looking, disinterested luxury coachman, for a driver, conduct you with tedious deliberation to the Bear in Piccadilly. This is as "lame and impotent a conclusion" as ever the "march of mind" and mechanics has arrived at. It is, however, due to say, that I only speak from experience of one coach and one railroad, viz. the Blue Bottle Unicorn, and the Southampton line. Now, a really strikes me that this must be instantly and imperatively reformed; and I would at once suggest, that a set of balloons should be in readiness, all inflated, and "straining upon the start," with patent, any-way-sailing wings, to wait you up—carry you over as the crow flies—and alight you, as the crow alights, upon a lead flat at the top of the hotel to which you are bound; and so much for railroads.

THE YANKEE BOY.

An American brig, belonging to Portsmouth, N. H. was once in Demerara, discharging her cargo, when she was boarded by a boat from a gun-brig, lying at anchor at no great distance. The crew were mustered, and their protections examined, and one New-Hampshire boy, of a noble and fearless spirit, and though young in years, of a vigorous frame, was ordered into the boat. He peremptorily refused to obey the order. The officer, in a great rage, collared the youthful seaman, but was instantly, by a well-directed blow from his fist, laid sprawling on the deck. The boat's crew rushed to the assistance of their officer, and the young man was finally overpowered, pinioned, thrown into the boat, and conveyed on board the British brig. The lieutenant complained to his commanding officer of the insult he had received from the stalwart Yankee, and his battered face corroborated his statement. The commander at once decided that such insolence demanded exemplary punishment, and that the young Yankee required on his first entrance into the service a lesson which might be of use to him hereafter. Accordingly, the officer was lashed to a gun, by the inhuman satellites of tyranny, and his back was bared to the lash. Before the blow was struck, he repeated his declaration that he was an American citizen, and the sworn foe of tyrants. He demanded his release, and assured the captain in the most solemn and impressive manner, that if he persisted in punishing him like the vilest malefactor, for violating his rights as an American citizen, the act would never be forgiven, but that his revenge would be certain and terrible. The captain laughed at what he regarded an impotent menace, and gave signal to the boat's crew to depart. The white skin of the young American was soon cruelly mangled, and the blows fell thick and heavily on the quivering flesh. He bore the infliction of his barbarous punishment without a murmur or a groan; and when the signal was given for the execution to cease, although the skin was hanging in strips on his back, which was thickly covered with clotted blood, he showed no disposition to falter or faint. His face was somewhat paler than it was wont to be; but his lips were compressed, as if he were summoning determination to his aid, and his dark eyes shot forth a brilliant gleam, showing that his spirit was unabashed, and that he was bent on revenge, even if his life should be the forfeit. His hands were loosened, and he arose from his humiliating posture. He glared fiercely around. The captain was standing within a few paces of him, with a demure grin upon his features, as if he enjoyed to the bottom of his soul the disgrace and torture inflicted on the poor Yankee. The hapless sufferer saw that smile of exultation; and that moment decided the fate of the oppressor. With the activity, the ferocity, and almost the strength of a tiger, the mutilated American sprang upon the tyrant, and grasped him where he stood, surrounded by his officers, who, for the moment, seemed paralyzed with astonishment; and, before they could recover their senses, and hasten to the assistance of their commander, the flogged American had borne him to the gangway, and then clenching him by the throat with one hand, and firmly embracing him with the other, despite his struggles, he leaped with him into the turbid waters of Demerara! They parted to receive the tyrant and his victim, then closed over them, and neither were ever afterwards seen. Both had passed to their long account.

"Unappointed, unanealed,
With all their imperfections on their heads."

But a brighter day has dawned upon the British navy. The odious system of impressment is abolished, never again to be adopted.

THE MYSTERIOUS MELANCHOLY OF MATHEWS.

On my assurance that I could not be so pleasantly disposed of as in his society, we entered the carriage. He threw himself into a corner, and remained perfectly silent. On reaching a portion of our road which, from being undisturbed, permitted conversation the more easily, I ventured to inquire—

"Has anything happened to annoy you this evening? A more delightful or congenial audience I never saw, and you appeared in very rare spirits."

"No, nothing has occurred to worry me to-night; it must have been this morning before I was up—I am sure of it, I know it, it can be no other than those infernal—!" And here he relapsed into silence.

After passing the turnpike, I again essayed to lead him into conversation, and observed that he must often find the road home lonely, although not dangerous, as I believed it was well patrolled.

"And you think that renders it safe, do you? Of course it does—everybody says so, except one mistaken individual—clever fellow you are—good soul—I know nothing—I'm nobody—"

"Poo! why not tell me what has happened?"

"Why, but mind, don't say a word at the cottage. I want to conceal—to pretend having given away—"

Again he was lost in reverie, and I determined to let him alone, and patiently await the return of his good humour.

At this moment the footfall of a horse was heard, and a figure, well wrapt up in a cloak, as he approached the carriage, signified his propinquity, by giving out, in a deep tone, the announcement of his calling—"Patrol!"

At the same instant, Mathews let down the glass, popped his head out of the carriage, so as nearly to touch the face of the horseman, and, in a tone of the bitterest rage, exclaimed—

"Chickens!"

"Then, drawing up the glass, he fell back in his corner, saying—'Now, my mind's easy—if that has not astonished him, I'm no judge.'"

This was unintelligible to me, and I imagined that the stalwart equitation might deem the craven phrase of my friend somewhat inappropriate to the body of road-side guardians. The honest highwayman I feared would doubt the sanity of the carriage traveller, who popped forth his head merely to cry "chickens," and then vanish.

Luckily I can't laugh audibly, and the darkness prevented the visibility of my risibility. As soon as I could compose my voice, I asked Mathews to explain.

"I'll tell ye," said he. "I had the most beautiful set of hantams I ever beheld, feathered down to their toes—and Mrs. Mathews was very fond of them, and Charles liked them—and everybody liked them; but, however, they were stolen this evening, and I feel persuaded that it must be those fellows on horseback, who pretend to protect your property. One of them—that very one, I'll swear—has put all my pretty chickens and their dam into a sack, and sold them in Covent-Garden market, before anybody but rogues are up in a morning, and it's natural I should be vexed, until I found an opportunity of carrying conviction home to the beast who bagged my birds."

From the moment when he had thus so strangely given vent to his feelings he had become an altered man. His conversation was more than usually brilliant—his supposed triumph had quite consoled him for his real loss.

ORIGIN OF STERNE'S MARIA.

By some unpublished letters of Sterne, it appears that early in life he deeply fixed the affections of a young lady, during a period of five years, and for some unknown cause suddenly deserted her and married another. The young lady was too sensible of this act of treachery; she lost her senses and was confined in a private mad-house, where Sterne twice visited her. He has drawn and coloured the picture of that madness which he himself occasioned! This fact adds only to some which so deeply injured the character of this sentimental writer, and the whole sponorous race of his wretched apes. His life was loose and shandean—his principles unsettled; and it does not seem that he carried a single attribute of personal attraction about him; for his death was characteristic of his life. He died at his lodgings with neither friend nor relative by his side; a hired nurse was the sole companion of the man whose wit found admirers in every street, but whose heart could not draw one by his death-bed.

NAPOLEON AND FOUCHÉ.—It is well known that Napoleon had a penchant for a female whom he visited clandestinely, and who lived in a street which was so indifferently lighted at night as to be dangerous to those who had occasion to pass through it. Napoleon made a complaint to Fouché, the then prefect of police. Fouché whose eyes were everywhere, was ready with his reply. "I can cover," said Fouché, "under the circumstances which have led your majesty to be so well acquainted with the street, it could not be otherwise than agreeable to your feelings to be concealed from the eyes of your faithful Parisians."

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE following ode is said to have been written in the time of the American Revolution. The author of the piece was the late Judge Niles, of Vermont, father of Dr. Nathaniel Niles, who has recently made a treaty for our government with Sardinas. There is, says the United States Gazette, a strength in the diction which almost makes one tremble, when it is sung by one of the good old white oak voices of New-England, cultivated among the waterfalls, and in imitation of a young earthquake. It is a sort of granite among the polished marble of the present time—bar iron to Unsel.

THE AMERICAN HERO—A SAPPHEIC ODE.

Why should vain mortals tremble at the sight of Death and Destruction in the field of battle,
Where blood and carnage clothe the ground in crimson,
Sounding with death-groans?

Death will invade us by the means appointed,
And we must all bow to the king of terrors;
Nor am I anxious, if I am prepared,
What shade he comes in.

Infinite goodness teaches us submission,
Eds are quiet under all his dealings,
Never repining, but for ever praising
God our Creator.

Well may we praise him; all his ways are perfect;
Though a resplendence, infinitely glowing,
Dazzles in glory on the sight of mortals,
Streak blind by lustre.

Good is Jehovah in bestowing sunshine,
Nor less his goodness in the storm and thunder.
Mercies and judgment both proceed from kindness,
Infinite kindness.

O then exult that God for ever reigneth;
Clouds which around him hinder our perception,
Bind us the stronger to exalt his name, and Shout louder praises.

Then to the wisdom of my Lord and Master
I will commit all that I have or wish for,
Sweetly as babes sleep, will I give my life up,
When call'd to yield it.

Now Mars I dare thee, clad in smoky pillars,
Bursting from bomb-shells, roaring from the cannon,
Rattling in grape-shot like a storm of hailstones,
Torturing Ether.

Up the bleak heavens let the spreading flame rise,
Breaking like Etna through the smoky columns,
Lowering like Egypt o'er the falling city,
Wantonly burn down.

Let oceans waft on all your fleetest castles,
Fraught with destruction horrible in nature;
Then, with your sails fill'd by a storm of vengeance,
Bear down to battle.

From the dire caverns, made by ghostly miners,
Let the explosion, dreadful as volcanoes,
Heave the broad town, with all its wealth and people,
Quick to destruction.

Still shall the banner of the King of Heaven
Never advance where I am afraid to follow;
While that precedes me, with an open bosom,
War, I defy thee.

Fame and deaf freedom lure me on to battle;
While a fell despair, grimmer than a death's head,
Stings me with serpents, fiercer than Medusa's,
To the encounter.

Life for my country and the cause of freedom,
Is but a trifle for a worm to part with;
And if preserved in so great a contest,
Life is recouped.

ANCIENT DANISH CUSTOM.

In Denmark an extraordinary custom prevailed of burying a live animal, a horse, a lamb, a pig, and sometimes even a child, at the commencement of a building. It is strange that a similar custom appears, from the Servian ballads, to have prevailed among the Sclavonians. A lamb was generally entombed in the foundation of a church; a horse in a churchyard. This horse, the peasants say, appears again, and goes round the churchyard on three legs; when he meets any one, he displays grinning teeth, and death accompanies him. He is, therefore, called the hæckest—the death-horse; and it is usual for a person, on recovering from a fit of sickness, to say, "I have given death a bushel of oats."

BUSINESS.

After all, there is nothing like business for enabling us to get through our weary existence. The intellect cannot sustain its sunshine flight long; the flagging wings drop to the earth. Pleasure palls, and idleness is

"Many gathered miseries in one name."
But business gets over the hours without counting them. We may be very tired at the end, still it has brought the day to a close sooner than anything else.

EARLY RISING.

There is no time spent so stupidly as that which inconsiderate people pass in a morning, between sleeping and waking. He who is up as early as he can, or amusing himself; he who is asleep, is receiving the refreshment necessary to fit him for action; but the hours spent in dozing and slumbering are wasted without either pleasure or profit. The sooner you leave your bed the seldomer you will be confined to it.

MODERN FRENCH LITERATURE.

PRINCE SCHWARTZENBERG'S FETE.

We have translated for the Mirror, an account of the celebrated fete given by the Austrian ambassador, Prince Schwarzenberg, to the Emperor Napoleon. In July, 1810, in honour of his marriage with Maria Louisa. The melancholy result of this festival is well known, but we have never before seen a minute description of it by an eye-witness. This account is taken from the memoirs of Varnhagen, a German, who is best known as the husband of the celebrated Rahel, whose reputation was so high on the continent, and whose eloquent letters, meditations, etc., have been recently published by Varnhagen. We have been told (we have not yet had time to look at it) that there is a brief notice of Varnhagen and his distinguished wife, in one of the late English Magazines, from the pen of the celebrated Germanist, Thomas Carlyle.

THE FETE.

The emperor and empress having accepted the invitation, the fete was finally set down for the first of July.

At this time, the ambassador lived in the old Hotel Mompesson, rue Montblanc. Though this building, with its court-yard in front, and garden behind, was sufficiently extensive, it was thought too small for the great occasion; so the next hotel was hired, and proper communications opened between the two. On a lawn in front of the first, was to be erected the chief saloon. Following the fashions then in vogue in Paris, the walls and ceiling were covered with magnificent hangings, and decorated with enormous mirrors, candelabras, and costly ornaments. The pillars that served to support it, and likewise to separate the inner space from a kind of gallery, that wound round the whole, were twined round with the finest stuffs, and united by innumerable wreaths of artificial flowers and festoons of muslin, gauze, and other transparent substances; immense crystal chandeliers hung overhead, supported by ropes of flowers, intermixed with gold and silver chains, and connected with the other decorations by ribands and festoons. At the lower end of the room, were placed, on a slightly elevated dais, covered with carpets worked in gold, two superb seats, the floor in front of which was prepared for dancing.

The saloon had three entrances; one, at the lower end, close to the seats reserved for the emperor and empress; which led into the interior of the hotel, and was only intended to facilitate the necessary communications of the family and domestics; in front, on the side of the garden, there stretched on the left a long and wide gallery, built and decorated like the saloon, running along the hotel, between which and the garden it presented many avenues of communication; on the right, opposite the gallery, half way up the saloon, was a gallery for the musicians, which could only be reached by a staircase. The main entrance of the saloon, a splendid portico, opened about the middle of the apartment, and led, by broad and spacious steps, to the garden, the nearest parts of which had been enlarged and thrown open, to give room for the ebbing and flowing of the crowd. At last the great day arrived. Nothing had been omitted which could tend to beautify the hotel, or to prepare a suitable reception, for the illustrious guests that were expected. The variety and richness of the Austrian uniforms, eclipsed everything that had been seen in Paris; and the train of servants, always numerous and richly clad, was increased for the occasion, to several hundreds. While it was yet broad day, the hotel, offices, and garden, were lighted up by an illumination of magical brilliancy. Carriages began to roll up, and deposit their precious freight. The crowd increased rapidly, and the saloon was soon filled. It was hard to say whether the guests of that night were more distinguished for beauty, grace, rank or political importance. Half a dozen kings and queens had been already presented; but they, like all the rest, were waiting for a still more august visitor. At last, the sound of the word of command, the rattle of muskets, the roll of drums, and the flourish of trumpets, announced the arrival of the emperor and empress; whose state carriage advanced, surrounded by a numerous escort, in the lane formed by the troops on duty. The illustrious guests were received at the foot of the entrance stairs, by the families of Schwarzenberg and Metternich. The ambassador made a short address, and the ladies presented exquisite bouquets, which the emperor accepted and handed to his wife, giving her at the same time his arm to lead her into the saloon, where the ambassador joined him for the evening. At this moment I was very near the emperor, and eyed him closely. For the first time, I was struck with the beauty, but not less so with the power of his stern features. His face was serious, immovable, almost angry; his look cast carelessly forward, without a trace of kindness.

The emperor, amid the flourish of music, traversed the first apartments and the gallery before described, to enter the great saloon, where he remained a few minutes glancing over it with a rapid but observing eye. He declined the refreshments that were offered, and addressed a few isolated words carelessly to the persons around him. When the Prince Schwarzenberg invited him to take a turn in the garden, he followed with the empress, and, of course, everybody went after them. In the brilliantly-illuminated alleys and clumps of trees, were stationed troops of musicians and singers, who commenced in turn as the emperor drew near them, so that he found himself attended by perpetual homage. Other flattering surprises, emblematic pictures, and allegories, were prepared all over the grounds.

The company stopped before a wide, carefully levelled lawn, where seats had been prepared for the imperial couple, and some other personages of rank. Their eyes fell straight on the chateau of Luxemburg, illuminated with striking accuracy. To flatter still more the natal reminiscences of the empress, a part of the garden had been transformed into a rural scene, lined with hedges and briars, from which emerged the dancers and danseuses of the opera, in Austrian costume, who executed, with exquisite skill, many national dances, and a pantomime got up for the occasion. Of this latter, it is hardly necessary to say, that war and peace were the principal characters in it, the first, of course, leaving glorious trophies behind him, and the latter bestowing on them his abundant blessings. This spectacle was hardly ended, before the smacking of a whip, and the clatter of horses' hoofs were heard, and a courier, covered with dust, urged his way through the brilliant audience to the emperor, to whom he delivered his despatches, with an eager and important air. A rumour of great victories, gained in Spain, arose in the crowd; but the emperor, who was in the secret, said with a smile, that it was despatches from Vienna, and handed the empress a letter from her father, written expressly, and kept back till this important moment. Next to this well-imagined little scene came a display of fireworks, in which all the powers of the art, and all sources of expense, seemed to be exhausted. In the very midst of these artificial fires, real flames were seen to rise from a scaffolding that had caught fire, the appearance of which caused great alarm for a moment, but the firemen mastered the flames in a very few minutes. This success was received with congratulations, and great praise was awarded to the precautions taken against fire, and the zeal of the firemen; no one dreaming, that in one minute more, there would be far more pressing need of their aid, and that this aid would then be wanting, or at all events, helpless.

The brilliant cortège had begun to move a second time, and gained the saloon by different paths. Above the great portal sparkled a German inscription in honour of the imperial couple, which was read and interpreted. It was said that the emperor was at first surprised at the use of a foreign language, and afterwards smiled contemptuously. There was no want of French commentaries on the German text. As soon as the emperor and empress had resumed their seats in the saloon, music and dancing began; it was then near midnight. The most arduous and most brilliant part of the fete was over, the rest in progress, and with ball and banquet there was every prospect of prolonging this most dazzling fete till morning. The queen of Naples opened the ball with Prince Esterhazy, and the vicereine of Italy, Eugene Beauharnais, with the Princess Schwarzenberg, the ambassador's sister-in-law. After quadrilles an écossaise was danced, during which the emperor and empress traversed the saloon on opposite sides, addressing many persons they knew and had others presented for the first time. The empress soon ended her walk, and had resumed her place while Napoleon was standing at the other end of the saloon, where Madame Pauline de Schwarzenberg, born d'Ahrenberg, the ambassador's sister-in-law, was presenting her daughters to him. He conversed with different persons, when all at once, near where he stood, not far from the empress, in the great gallery behind the columns, that led from the saloon to the hotel, the flame of a candle, casually met by a puff of air, was driven upon a piece of light gauze, which, as soon as it took fire, burned with a clear light, and disappeared almost in an instant, leaving only a few scattered cinders. At this time the thing was so trifling, that Count Bentheim put out one of these little burning strips by flinging his hat against the wall, and Count Dumaunoir, one of the emperor's chamberlains, climbed up one of the pillars, tore down the burning drape and trampled it out. Unfortunately one of the flying cinders had set fire to some hangings placed so high as to be out of reach; the flames broke out, and in a single instant rose from several different points, travelled along the cornice till they reached the saloon, and then spread over the ceiling. The music stopped, and the musicians quitted their pulpit, which the fire began to threaten. One of the doors which led to the outside stairs, admitted a strong current of air which redoubled the fury of the flames. The dance was broken up, and all huddled into a frightened crowd, anxious to know both what had happened and what might happen.

Napoleon, having seen the origin of the affair, was of course free from any groundless alarm; he drew near the empress and stood by her, calmly watching what was passing, while many of his friends who dreaded perfidy and treason, hurried round him, brandishing their swords in his defence. The Austrian ambassador, who was equally collected, when he saw the flames spreading so rapidly, begged the emperor to quit the saloon, the destruction of which was now inevitable. Napoleon gave the empress his arm, and slowly followed the ambassador to the garden gate, briefly exhorting the crowd on each side of him to conduct themselves with order and judgment; and in fact, all behaved reasonably as long as the emperor was present, but as soon as he left, all order ceased and the crowd hurried confusedly to the portal.

As soon as the ambassador learned that the emperor wished to depart at once, he sent an aide-de-camp to bring the carriages round from the great gate of the hotel, where a tumult was feared, to a quieter street that bordered on the garden, and proposed to the emperor to enter his carriage there unperceived, to baffle any attempt on him, if any was to be made. But Napoleon, as soon as he saw that he was taking another course, stopped short and wanted to know where they were conducting him. He did not agree in opinion with the ambassador, but told him briefly and firmly, "No, I wish to go the main entrance," turned about and ordered the carriages to return to their former station. This caused a great loss of time which the ambassador was forced to submit to with a smiling face, though suffering the greatest anxiety. The emperor, on the other hand, was perfectly calm; perhaps he felt safer at the main gate than in the little by-street back of the garden.

The oppressive heat, increased by the crowd that filled the saloon, had driven me out into the garden, when all at once the noise of the festival was changed into a confused tumult; first a few outcries, then loud shouts reached me; I tried to enter the saloon, and saw in it bright flames rising and spreading, but could neither distinguish anything, nor advance a step. A swain tide of men and women met me and forced me back; I there were cupulents generals crying at the top of their voices, "Mon Dieu! mon Dieu! the emperor is not saved!" there others crying loudly for water, fairly carried me off with them three rooms farther, before I could shake them off and visit the scene of the disaster. And where it was. The greater number of the players had escaped into the garden by the gallery; the porticoes were no longer crowded, but the whole saloon was a mass of flame, while the portal was choked up with a compact mass, striving for the garden with cries of terror and agony.

In the interior, the flames spread with fearful speed; huge columns of smoke rose in spiral wreaths, lustres and candelabras turned white with heat, and fell crashing to the ground; beams and pillars tumbled one by one—in a word, destruction was everywhere. One might almost have supposed it a gigantic artificial firework; so fierce was the combustion of the dry planks, varnish, and other combustibles. The water poured upon it turned to vapour in a second. All was done in less time than it takes to read it in these pages—during the few minutes it took me to come up from the garden, and look around me, the flames above—along the ceiling—had advanced far beyond where I stood, beams, and lamps, and chandeliers began to fall around me, and I had barely time to escape to the garden. But here the spectacle was equally melancholy. On one side, the festal building transformed into pillars of fire; on the other, all that Europe could boast of wealth, beauty, distinction, and elegance, crowded in confusion together. One engrossing feeling, that of personal danger, and fear for beloved ones, had taken the place of easy grace and stately dignity. Every one was looking for his relatives—his friends; bursting furiously through the crowd, pushing aside, trampling down whatever opposed him—here, husbands seeking their wives; there, mothers separated from their daughters whom they had been forced away from in the struggle. None knew what had become of the rest; some were weeping with grief, some howling with rage, some flung themselves in transport into the arms of their rescued friends; here was one carried off fainting, another wounded. The steps of the portico gave way with the weight of the flying multitude, and many who fell were crushed by their neighbours, or injured by the flames. The queen of Naples fell, and was saved by the grand duke of Wurzburg. The queen of Westphalia was saved by her husband and Count Metternich. The Russian ambassador, Prince Kourakin, scorched and fainting, was dragged from out the crowd by Doctor K—, by the help of some French and Austrian officers; some kind bystander put out the fire of his clothes with water from the gutter, while some other kind friends were employed in easing him of the diamond buttons of his uniform coat. Many ladies were severely burnt. To complete the picture, add to it the servants and workmen of every class; the firemen leaving their liquor, and making room forcibly for their somewhat tardy aid, the opera dancers and figurantes driven from a splendid repast, and mingling with curiosity amid the pomp and splendour of the courtiers, who were forced by the general confusion to submit quietly to this system of universal equality. Prince Joseph Schwarzenberg was embracing with tears his rescued but severely wounded daughter, and then would turn to look for his wife. The daughter was by the mother's side till a burning beam fell between them; since then, she had lost sight of her. What next passed is thus described in the memoirs of Major Brokesch.

"The prince, after having shown Prince Eugene and his wife a side-door, by which both escaped, hurried up and down looking for the princess. He was told in the garden that she was there—"Here she is!" cried one. He hurried to the spot pointed out, and found only a lady that resembled her. At this anguish seized him, and his sinister forebodings, which had been gradually gaining strength, became conviction! He returns to the saloon—the staircase has fallen—his child is brought to him half-burned—he sees his brother's wife carried off, her head-dress and hair left beneath the feet of the crowd—his glance fell on a moaning figure, whose dress was half-burnt off, and whose forehead was deeply seared by her red-hot diadem. It was the Princess de la Leyen. A Swedish officer, who had borne her out into the garden, told him that he had seen, walking in the middle of the flames, a figure at once beautiful and terrible! Prince Joseph hurries to the entrance—he strives to ascend the blazing steps, when the whole floor of the saloon falls in at once, vomiting up fire and smoke—and all is lost."

All this happened in less than a quarter of an hour from the time the fire broke out.

The Moniteur stated that the princess spoke outside the saloon to the king of Westphalia, Prince Borghese and others, but this is incorrect. M. Baupet, former prefect of the palace, in his memoirs, describes a young beautiful woman, who rushed from the saloon, uttering the most piercing cries. For this he is indebted solely to his imagination. No one ever saw the unhappy princess in the garden; indeed, it would have been impossible for her to have returned. Besides the crowd that encumbered the avenue, the violence of the flames was so great that it was impossible to come within ten paces of the conflagration; the eye could hardly bear to dwell upon it. The truth is—the princess was at first supposed to be in safety. Meantime, the saloon and gallery was burnt down, and the fire was spreading to the hotel. It was all important to save the archives, and the Austrian officers flung off sash, sword, and uniform to handle the axe and fire-bucket. All strangers had disappeared one by one, and their place was filled by soldiers of Napoleon's guard, who arrived—a thousand or so—and were soon followed by the emperor. He had only accompanied the empress as far as where her escort was stationed, and returned suddenly among its, attended by an aide-de-camp, dressed in his gray surcoat. He ordered all strangers to leave the spot, lined the approaches with troops, and directed in person the efforts making to subdue the fire; during which he was struck and nearly knocked down by the stream of one of the engines. The poor prefect of police, Count D—, was in an awkward situation—Napoleon's rude sternness cowed and silenced him; he could only whisper out hesitating excuses, and show his zeal by hurrying about from place to place, returning every moment to the emperor to receive with all humility the harsh words and reproaches that had been gathered up for him in the interval. The commander of the firemen was still more unfortunate. One of the generals, to show his zeal, or perhaps to furnish the emperor with a subject on which to discharge his anger, fell on the poor fellow, struck him repeatedly, and fairly kicked him off—pursuing him with a torrent of blame and abuse—the emperor looking on with stern and angry aspect. The unlucky commandant was finally carried off to prison, and after a long confinement dismissed from office. He had doubtless been somewhat careless; no aid was at hand at the first and most essential moment; but even at the time many voices were raised in his defence, and there was a general feeling that even as early as when the emperor quitted the saloon, no earthly power could have saved the building.

Meantime, all efforts to discover the Princess Schwartzberg, proved fruitless. Her husband traversed all the apartments and the garden incessantly—ready to drop with exhaustion, yet refusing to give up the search. The emperor, wearied with the delay, returned to St. Cloud. H's grenadiers prepared to pass the night on the spot; and certainly no bivouac ever enjoyed such rations. The rarest wines, the most costly viands, intended for the banquet, were distributed to it in profusion. Soon a storm, which had long been threatening, burst upon us in fury; the whole sky seemed on fire with lightning; peal after peal of thunder followed—the houses fairly trembled—the rain fell in streams, and finally quenched the conflagration. Just as the storm had spent its fire, the first rays of day were seen breaking through the clouds, and we determined to make another search among the ruins. There were but few of us left, and we were soon separated from each other. I, for my part, made my way into the scene of the conflagration—a melancholy mass of smoking ruins, of charred beams, wrecks of furniture and ornaments, and in the deepest places—of pools of fool and stagnant water. I picked up bits of lustres, swords bent round, bracelets and other jewelry so changed by the action of the fire that they could scarcely be recognised. Not far from me, Count Hulon and Dr. Gall were attentively examining the ruins. Suddenly the count stopped, and said in a low voice, "Doctor, come this way, I see a human body." The horrible impression these words produced, I shall never forget. The doctor came up, and we looked round us anxiously, and in silence. By slow degrees our eyes were enabled to distinguish a corpse blackened by fire and smoke, half-buried under beams and cinders, and so disfigured that nothing but fancy could trace in it a human shape. Only a part of the breast was unchanged, having rested in a little pool of water—and its dazzling whiteness formed a horrible contrast with the rest of the body, which was reduced to a perfect mummy. Accustomed to scenes of death and bloodshed, as I had been from childhood, I recoiled in spite of myself, while Doctor Gall descended into the cavity where the corpse was lying, and fancied he recognised the princess; he brought away a collar and some rings which he found on the body, and we showed them to her brother-in-law, the ambassador, who was in the garden. There was now no room for doubt: on the collar were the cyphers of her children—she had eight—a ninth perished with her. The position in which the body was found, encouraged us to hope that at least she had not been burned alive. In all probability, the princess, seeing the main exit cut off, or wishing to avoid the crowd that was thronging to it, had tried to gain a side-door leading into the hotel, and had fallen on the way, and been suffocated by the smoke.

All Paris was in an uproar, partly from alarm—partly from curiosity. The news of the fire spread rapidly, and with it the suspicion of some attempt on the emperor's life, or some great conspiracy. The idea that the fire was caused by design, and intended to destroy, by one bold stroke, a hated despot—his family, and his most faithful adherents, was, for a time, general; and for a long time afterwards, it was difficult to remove it wholly.

A succession of melancholy days ensued. The funeral of Princess Pauline of Schwartzberg took place, with all the usual ceremonies; afterwards came the interments of the Princesses de La Leyen—of the lady of General Trezard, and of several other ladies of rank who died at short intervals, after enduring great agony. There were, in all, more than twenty persons killed, and more than sixty wounded, more or less severely. The young princess of Schwartzberg lay dangerously ill for many weeks, as did also the Russian ambassador, Prince Kourakin. The valuable lost, it was computed, amounted to several millions of francs.

THE DARLING FUND.—The following is an accurate statement of the sums of money raised in the various towns to reward Miss Grace Darling and others who exerted themselves so heroically in behalf of the survivors from the wreck of the Forfarshire.—Received for rewarding the Darlings and the North Sunderland fishermen, three hundred and sixty pounds; ditto received by Miss Darling for her own use, two hundred and fifty-four pounds; ditto Mr. William Darling, for his own use, fifty pounds;—in all, about three thousand dollars.

INKLINGS OF IDEAS.

THE UNKNOWN GOD

PAUL, preaching at Athens, beat the cunning Athenians with their own weapons. They had a law, that no one preached strange gods, should suffer death. When this was urged against the apostle, he pointed to the altar "to the unknown god," and said—"For, as I passed by and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, 'to the unknown god,' whom, therefore, ye ignorantly worship, I declare I unto you." He could not be prosecuted under the law, for he preached a god to whom he found an altar. This circumstance, I have always regarded as a sort of providential interposition in favour of the Christian religion, as well as an instance of Paul's extreme aptness in taking advantage of everything that would tend to the advancement of his cause. Although, at several other places in Greece and Asia Minor, there were altars "to the unknown god," at no other, I believe, was there such a law as that at Athens, prohibiting the setting up of strange deities.

COMPLIMENTS

Pope is celebrated, and deservedly, for the great elegance and delicacy of his compliments. Their merit seems to me to consist principally in that they are indirect. Those that are direct, are apt to savour somewhat of the fulsomefulness of flattery; and at least there is always room to doubt the sincerity of him who utters them. On the contrary, when they come in indirectly and inadvertently, as it were, they carry with them evidence that they flow from the heart. Thus we say commonly of Cæsar, that he was "the greatest warrior, historian, and statesman of his age;" and this, certainly, is as much as can be said in commendation of any one.

If we say of Douglas, that he was a brave warrior, it is no more than might be said of a thousand others, prime and peasant; but if we say,

"How did he fall?"
"Sure 'twas a bloody day when Douglas died;"

it is something farther, and rises into the loftiest praise.

DRAMATIC TRUTH.

One thing that shows the almost infinite superiority of Shakespeare, is, that he habitually speaks of his characters as real personages. We do not set up the character here and nature there, and comment upon the likeness; it is nature itself—not a copy. Another author would have made Hamlet mad or sane, so that there could be no doubt whatever. Suted, however, to the dubious circumstances of his situation, his sanity is questioned and discussed as that of one suspected of lunacy would be before a court of chancery. In a vast majority of works purely fictitious, the characters are either mad or not mad, cowards or not cowards, villains or not villains; and all readers agree on these points. But we see how remotely, this approaches the truth of nature, and how entirely Hamlet reaches it, when we recollect the difference of opinion among men in regard to the temper, etc., of any particular individual.

Moreover, in dramas, we usually conceive nothing of a character except what is represented before us. It begins with the play and ends with it, and exists only on the stage. There is in fact no more of it; and we can as little follow it in our mind's eye, as we could a ghost or a vision that appeared for a moment and then vanished. This, also, is not at all in accordance with things as they are transacted in real life. But it is not so with Shakespeare's plays. In them, as in reality, we know that what comes under our own observations is a very small part of the whole; and it is as easy to imagine the absent as to see the present doings of any of the characters.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

THE GAY WORLD.

PARIS, FEBRUARY 27, 1839.—On Thursday last, the eminent American banker, Mr. Wells, gave a grand ball in his noble hotel in the Place St. George. Eleven rooms, some of them very spacious, were opened for the enjoyment of the company—in number from five hundred to five hundred and fifty in the course of the evening. The conservatory of the accomplished hostess, which is rich in the rarest and most brilliant plants, and the Chinese boudoir, furnished from the Celestial Empire, were particularly admired. All the apartments were lighted in a way to give the finest effect to the whole scene. Among the guests were titled dignitaries, financial notabilities, English and French of the various degrees of fashion, and about one hundred and fifty Americans, certainly not inferior—especially the ladies—either in appearance or manner, to any denizens of the Europeans. The band consisted of thirteen of the best musicians, led by one of the brothers Strauss, immortal, you know, by both the composition and performance of their waltzes. The dazzling gala was opened as early as nine o'clock, and broke up at three in the morning. Every one had reason to be satisfied; every part of the arrangement proved entirely successful. In short, the affair "went off" perfectly well—which is understood to be the main recompense of the taste and liberality exercised on such occasions by the hosts. In order to teach you how different is the situation of a Paris party-giver from that of Mr. Washington Fette, so happily related by Miss Leslie, I will mention that the directions for this splendid entertainment were prepared and distributed in the space of an hour; and that all was duly achieved, according to my narrative above, without further trouble or anxiety. The machinery here is so well contrived and so familiar by incessant use, that the results come like those of the summons of Aladdin's lamp.

Monsieur and Madame Schiff, from New-Orleans, resident in the Chaussée D'Antin, issued at the beginning of last week their cards for a ball on the ninth proximo. Two years ago, they regaled two thousand acquaintance with a like festival. This now offered is limited to a thousand, a number not sufficient to fill their elegant apartments.

Yesterday, the thirty-first instant, the stated soirée of General Cass was uncommonly brilliant. The number of French and foreigners of distinction present was larger than usual. It included Lord and Lady Granville, the Turkish ambassador and suite, and the heads of most of the embassies. The report of an American in the company fell short, owing to the attraction of Colonel Thor's grand ball given on the same evening. I have not the honour of a personal acquaintance with the New-York magnifico. As a street saunterer I am familiar with his matchless equipages. One of his guests of yesterday evening, who had witnessed here, in Great Britain and in Italy, similar glories in the most fashionable private mansions, informs me that Colonel Thor's ball transcended them all in every respect. I like to record the legitimate triumph of an American abroad, when he does undertake to live in the highest style.

The two great charity balls, one for the Polish refugees, (of which Galcut, once the favourite married mistress of Lord Byron, is a fond patroness,) the other for the pensioners of the Restoration Civil List, were announced a fortnight ago, with promise of a splendid display. For the latter, application was made for three hundred tickets more than could be conceded. Strangers are eager for this annual pageant eleemosynary, because they expect the presence of most of the nobles of the old régime with their grand airs of traditional haughtiness. On Monday, the twenty-eighth ult., it was given in the sumptuous saloons lately opened, in the Rue de Richelieu, of the new Club of the Two Worlds, (Des Deux Mondes). The reception rooms of the Tuileries are scarcely more magnificent. Every thing in the ball harmonized with the decorations of this fairy palace; "pyramids of flowers; walls of mirrors; suns of tapers; arabesque galleries of orange, citron, and myrtle; an intoxicating orchestra; an exquisite picturesque supper," etc. etc. These terms are not exaggerated, if I may credit some of my American friends, who thought the price of each ticket (four dollars) moderate for the splendour of the scene. You know that nothing curious, gorgeous, or oddish, is to be seen here, that the Americans do not hasten to enjoy at any cost—whatever may be the "tears of the purse," the inclemency of the weather, or the protraction of the vigils. The chords of benevolence are moved in France chiefly by those of the violin. I have just read, in a paragraph of intelligence from the provinces, that three bishops had sent their subscriptions to balls undertaken for the relief of the neighbouring poor.

Besides the dance mania, there prevails here, what is termed in one of the newspapers, a musical neurasthénie. In the jokes of the day, I find the statement that the Royal Academy of Medicine have appointed a committee of their body to inquire into the evil and devise a neiphetic. Every day, every hour, from noon until midnight, are its public concert; and private musical borders are beyond calculation. Foreign performers flock hither at this season, to make a short and lucrative campaign; and all the topping domestic performers look for a benefit, with the aid of their special colleagues and admirers.

The names of some of the Germans whose concerts or particular exhibitions are advertised, appear to me of terrific sound and aspect, such as Messrs. Schläpfer and Schweitzerhoff, Madame Isabelle Heimfeller, etc. We are promised an early visit from Madame Sophie dell'Occa Schoberlechner, prima donna of the Italian opera at Vienna, who is represented to possess a voice of extraordinary compass, sonorosity and melody, and to be capable of executing with equal facility the tasks of prima soprano and prima contralto. The London papers seem to be struck with the name of Baron Von Grumppenberg Pottnies, husband of the princess of Bavaria; but this appellation is quite euphonious by the side of a few that figure in our concert bills. I would rather have to declaim the twenty or more names of Louis Philippe's god-son, the born of the queen of Portugal, than to be compelled to articulate those of the Chef de Chant at the grand Opera, and the chief editor of the Gazette Musicale, who gives to his subscribers, into the bargain, a very rich weekly morning concert.

PEARL-STREET—THE MILLINERS' QUARTER.

Leave me the hurried tread of the mixed multitude threading the masses of the main artery of the metropolis, to linger within a sphere of more quiet, but not less fascinating enjoyment.

Broadway, with its palanx of cosmopolites—the turbaned Turk—the agile Greek—the sunny Italian—the fair-haired German—the dun East Indian—the fierce Kalmuck—the mustachioed Spaniard—the bronzed Arab—the sable Ethiopian—is already in the distance, and the echo of the thousand voices is lost in the wilderness of the past. Turn we to the right, from the bustle of Chatham-street into Pearl, at a point where the curve of its crescent gracefully inclines to the embrace of the East river, although, like a male coquette, it dallies but for a brief space by its side, and then stealthily glides to the bosom of the Hudson.

More gently, my friend, while we pass these neat bijoux of shops, with their parti-coloured wares suspended along the easement. Tread lightly, lest you disturb the fair occupants of these miniature palaces in the rear of each shop, plying their needles so industriously.

Reflect for a moment on the heart aches which will follow disappointment, should these blooming artistes fail to accomplish their allotted tasks in time! Madame Chatham is a lady of taste. With this timely caution, I will introduce you to an array of as lovely groups as ever clustered in the gardens of the Palazzi Pitta, when Florence poured forth the pride of its beauty and chivalry to grace the grand duke's triumph. We will cross the street for an instant, and take a survey of the brilliant show of millinery, flaunting at every step from Chatham to Vandewater street. 'Tis a rare sight, and will be a subject for calm reflection when we retire to our sanctuaries, and think over the myriads of hands whom these fragile gauds continue to employ; while a philosopher might worthily tax his ingenuity in divining the nature of the thousand and one emotions which these female decorations will excite in the bosoms of their purchasers.

Beautiful as is the exhibition viewed from this distance, I could introduce you to scenes within the domestic sanctuaries of these graceful vendors of bonnets, caps, and artificial flowers, which would cause you to forget the taste and fitness of their creations, in the more exciting details of their new-born affections. You observe that neat two-story building opposite, with bow-window and glass-door, in which the fanciful wreath of artificial flowers is festooned along the window-pane.

Ah! I perceive that your attention is enlisted; but whether by the black eyes of the little roguish milliner peeping through the half opened door, or the expected interest of my embryo Astorette, is questionable.

The little parlour in the rear of the shop I have pointed out, was, some few months since, graced by the presence of as charming a sylph as ever glided through the mazes of a fairy dance.

Slightly formed, tall and symmetrical, her fawn-like step arrested the notice of the most indifferent, while the most susceptible hearts of the dry-good's clerks opiate, beat double quick time whenever her laughing blue eye threw one of its witching glances in the direction of their wisecracks. In sooth, she was as gay as a lark, and nothing delighted her more than to vouchsafe a smile of encouragement for the especial gratification of the more timid of her admirers—merely, as she said, to set their hearts a palpitating, and furnish them with a subject to dream of. But the merriest maiden that ever displayed a faultless set of teeth, will be winged by the blind archer despite her buoyancy of spirits, and Adelaide I.—one day became pensive—the next night, and on the third day, stole away silently from the shop, when her daily task was accomplished, without deigning one friendly glance of approbation to either of the numerous beaus who stood rank and file awaiting her advent. From this time forth the once cheerful Adelaide became silent and thoughtful, and in a few weeks the roses began gradually to fade from her ruddy cheek, and a tear would occasionally roll unbidden from its unseen fountain.

Her young companions made kind inquiries as to the cause of her gloom, which she attributed to ill-health, but which they surmised originated in her change of worldly circumstances—her parents having once moved in the most elevated circles—until misfortune came to blight their prospects, and ultimately consign them to a premature grave. At length, increasing debility prevented her attendance at the shop—and day by day the ravages of the canker at her heart became more distinctly visible, until the benevolent and kind-hearted leech, who ministered to her disease, deemed it necessary to apprise her, that his skill was exhausted—he could do no more. This announcement was not unexpected, and she evinced that resignation and fortitude which this world is not competent to bestow. On the evening of the same day, just as twilight flung its veil of gauze over the city, a young gentleman was announced who earnestly desired an interview with the invalid.

On communicating his name, the feeble girl fainted; but after being restored to consciousness, requested a private audience with the stranger. To the surprise of her nurse, more than an hour elapsed before she was summoned; and on her return, the hand of the young gentleman was placed on that of her charge. From that hour her recovery was rapid, and in a few short weeks the daily chronicles duly announced the marriage of the wealthy and talented Selim W.—to the amiable and accomplished Adelaide I., all of New-York.

For the sympathizing companions of her girlhood, Adelaide still evinces a deep-seated regard, and her praises are the theme of many a tongue, whose owner has been relieved by her benevolence. This is but one of the many incidents in the history of these female artists which might be worthily chronicled. But she! our romance writers are occupied in the regions of fiction, and overlook the beautiful gems that lie at their feet. From sundown until dark, the apprentices and journey-men depart for their several residences, and many a smiling veil of bright-eyed girls, with gipsy bonnets, Mous-de-Lane dresses, silk aprons, and snow-white kerchiefs, may be seen at that hour, issuing from the milliner-shops, and tripping gaily along, "the observed of all observers," the mirror of fashion in their own circle, and the forbidden fruit of the upper ranks, lovely to the eye, and doubly alluring from the circumstance that prudent fathers and match-making mamas have placed their anathema between the fruit and its enjoyment.

Division, between Chatham square and Market-street; William, in the vicinity of Fulton-street; sections of Greenwich, Hudson, and Bleecker streets, and a part of the Bowery, are occupied also by milliners; and as an impartial historian, it is becoming to say that fashionable bonnets, beautiful caps, artificial flowers exquisitely finished, and medallions with eyes-like gazelles and forms of matchless loveliness, are the characteristic of each quarter dedicated to the sale of millinery.—Madisonian

THE PARTICULAR MAN.

Our esteemed acquaintance, Mr. B. is a very worthy person; we have every reason to believe he is an honest and upright character, but alas for his friends and intimates, he is a particular man. There are, doubtless, many methodical persons in the world, and everybody knows that method is the soul of business, but there are some original dashes in my friend's character, which, in the limited intercourse, as a solitary fisherman, I have had with mankind, I have never seen equalled.

Mr. B. is scrupulously attentive to the attiring of the outward man; and that he is in the least foppish in his apparel, by no means, but a crease in his vest, or a spot upon his pantaloons, would be the subject of serious annoyance to him; and the same attention to minutiae is observable throughout all his actions.

There is one thing in which my worthy acquaintance is not at all particular; I believe it is the only point on which he can be accused of departing from his acting principle, and that is of making use of his friends. In this respect his fable is most inordinately conspicuous. I shall suppose, for example, that he has requested me to perform some little commission for him; and after repeating his instructions till I have every word, may every syllable, as firmly fixed in my memory as my own christian and surname, I turn for relief to another topic—the very midst of a sentence he will interrupt me with, "You'll have the goodness, Mr. Sniggle, not to forget that little matter for me—I shall feel extremely obliged to you if you will call," etc. etc. Of course, I assure him that I will attend to his wishes, and again take up the subject on which we were conversing, if I happen to remember it—but in less than five minutes he will exclaim—"I believe I mentioned Mr. Tenpenny's number, did I not?" it is three hundred and seventy-nine and a half; and if you'll tell him to send me those articles at three minutes past nine o'clock to-morrow morning, I shall be very much obliged to you." "Oh dear," I inwardly ejaculate, in weakness of spirit, "I will remove myself from this audience as fast as possible," and accordingly take a hurried leave of my entertaining companion—"Good-by, my dear Sniggle, good-by, glad to see you well. I say, Tenpenny knows what I ordered, an extra large dust above, as ours is quite worn out—twopenny worth of brads, four curtain pins, and—" "Yes, yes, yes, you told me all that five or six times over," I reply, out of all patience—"Well, my good friend, but you know I am such a particular fellow!"

The particular man is a great quierist, and if you are relating any circumstance to him, will interrupt you every instant to ask some trifling question, that is either totally unimportant, or which perhaps if he would only allow you to proceed with your narrative, would appear in the right place. I was exceedingly amused on one occasion with a little scene which occurred between him and a legal friend—who, as well as most of that respectable body to which he belonged, was not sorry to have an opportunity of relating the particulars of a tough cause which he had gained, who thought he had got an excellent listener in Mr. B.—as the latter, declaring his eagerness to hear the account, planted himself before the narrator, putting on a scrutinizing and sagacious look, that would have done credit to a Thurlow or an Eldon—thus ran the conversation:

"Well, sir, and how did you get over the opposite parties? do tell us all about it."

"Why, sir, my client the plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount."

"What court did you bring your action in, sir, King's Bench—Common Pleas or Exchequer?"

"Common Pleas, to recover the amount."

"Where was the cause tried, sir—London or Westminster?"

"In London, I generally lay the venue in London; as I live in the city, I saves the drag to Westminster."

"Very good, sir, and how, if you please?"

"Well, sir—I was observing that my client brought his action to recover the amount of—"

"I beg your pardon—but was it a special or a common jury?"

"A common jury," replied the attorney, somewhat shortly, who began to get rather tired of the repeated interruptions of his cross-examiner—"A common jury," he repeated, endeavouring to bring to his recollection whereabouts he had left off.

"Yes, a common jury," reiterates Mr. B.; "but you have not yet told me the cause of action."

"Oh, sir, I was to recover seven hundred and forty-four pounds, five shillings, and—"

"Tried before the chief-justice, Sir Nicholas Conyngham Tindal, I suppose?"

"Yes—and in summing up he said—"

"Who were your counsel?"

"I did not stop to hear the reply; unable to stand it any longer I rushed out of the room, and whether the story was ever finished I am unable to say."

I very much fear Mr. B.'s malady, for such it appears to me, is incurable, reason him out of it you cannot, ridicule has little or no effect upon him. I have seen him laughed at repeatedly, without effect, manifesting the least consciousness that he was the subject of the joke. How true is the oft-repeated maxim, "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise."

THE TALKING CANARY.

We have paid a visit to this extraordinary young gentleman, and verily we were delighted with him! He is truly a most accomplished individual—elegantly dressed in a suit of brilliant yellow, and possessing manners the most agreeable and polite! His conversation rapid, his words clearly enunciated—the subject matter of his discourse being chiefly the business of his own person and the pretty compliments to others. So accomplished, is it a wonder that the ladies call him a "charming little fellow," and a "sweet creature!" Sometimes he entertains his visitors with the sweetest music, and suddenly breaking off, he commences a series of enigmata, thus, "Sweet pretty Dickiee!" "Pretty Dickiee dear!" "Pretty Mary!" "Come along, Mary," etc. Our young friend is a man of taste—"Pretty queen!" "Pretty, pretty queen!" he exclaims, and then again he warbles the sweetest sounds imaginable. Our readers must not suppose that the bird's enunciation is thick and husky, like that of a parrot—it is perfectly clear and distinct, as if some unseen Tiana or Oberon were mocking human speech. He lays great emphasis on the syllable "Dickiee." The bird is three years old; he is the property of a lady; and his capability of uttering articulate sounds was discovered by his repetition of the visitors when announced by the servant. We are not aware of any peculiarity in the conformation of this bird, except that the larynx is somewhat larger than usual. Were Mr. Devile to examine his skull, it would probably be found that the initiative organs were more than usually developed. He is certainly an anomaly in the feathered creation; that the canary is capable of instruction we are aware—witness Pratt's account of the German bird of this species, which could go through the manual exercise with extraordinary precision; but this bird differs in this particular, that he has taken up his new profession as a matter of taste on his own part. This interesting little creature is exhibited at the Cosmorama room in Regent-street, to numbers of delighted visitors. The lady proprietor, we are informed, has refused two hundred guineas for him: indeed she would not have allowed him to be exhibited, but that her house was a state of siege from morning to night, by friends bringing with them their friends and relations, to witness one of the most elegant young gentlemen of the reign of our beloved Queen Victoria.

FASHIONABLE SOCIETY.—It is far beyond our power, and we believe much higher powers than ours, to penetrate the secret motives and latest causes that govern the different phases, aspects, and changes that influence the orbits of fashionable society. Why one star is to-day to be lord of the ascendant, and to-morrow struck from its course; why one dignitary is all powerful in one act, and totally powerless in another; what rivalries are occasioned by what causes;—wit, taste, politics, party warfare, birth, and precedence, court favour, to say nothing of beauty and mental accomplishments—all these have their influence, and divide the world under different chiefs. One great lady is touchante; another is piquante; another a poetess; another a blue; most of them fine. Among the gentlemen, there is the high courtier; the high whig; the giver of dinners; the sayer of nothing; the lady's man; the talking man. Among all these, both men and women, there may be acquaintance, but no amity, intercourse, but no identity: they are separated by jealousy, avoid intimacies, avoid the fine class, covet, or, as the case may be, have a horror of introductions.

LITERARY MACADAMIZATION.

NO WOMAN WITHOUT HER VALUE.—A poor peasant of seven children born to him in marriage, had but one daughter left, and she was of a form so truly hideous, that it might be said, "the cars barked at her as she halted along." There are other alliterations to enter into the wedded state, however, than those of the figure. A showman, in his way through the village in which she lived, saw her, and asked her in marriage. "Sir," said the honest rustic to the suitor of his daughter, willing to take advantage of any man, "have you observed the unseemly form of my daughter? Are you aware that I have nothing to give her?" "These," replied the other, "are of no weight to me." "But she is both hunch backed and hunch breasted." "O! that is precisely what I want." "Her skin is like shagreen." "I am rejoiced at it." "You cannot afford to flatter myself with the hopes of hiding such a one, I am now happy beyond my hopes. She fully corresponds with my idea of perfection. How rare it is in these days to meet with so accomplished a figure!" "But, my good friend," interrupted the father, "I cannot conceive what you propose to do with a wife who is so ugly, and so deformed, and who is always sickly, and hath not a penny." "Do with her! why, I will travel the country, and get my bread by exhibiting monstrosities. I will put her in a box: I will carry her about with me; and, as for a fortune, let me alone for the acquisition of that."

FOX HUNTING.—I like horse racing, cock fighting, sports of the turf, and sports of the ring—on paper. When I was a young fellow, I went once on a fox chase, over Schuyllkill bridge, with a batch of sportsmen—wore boots and buckskin breeches; my horse ran away on the sound of the bugle, jumped over hedges and ditches, and tumbled me into the mud, since which time I have only attended Jockey Club and Sporting Dinners, being the least dangers of the two, where the only fat that can happen would be a fall under the table. Folks may say what they please of racing at dawn, sweeping the dew from the green sward, wading creeks for wild ducks, taking the partridge on the wing, shooting snipe in swamps, and coming back at night worn out, wet and hungry; give me the birds nicely cooked, with feet under the mahogany, a good sea-coal fire, and a glass of old hock, and we leave all the romance of shooting and snaring, with pointers and ponies, to those who admire such rural sports.—Nash.

BAD AXE.—The Illinois Galenian, in an article on this battle, relates some circumstances, attendant on the death of an Indian squaw, the arm of whose child was perforated by a bullet which passed into the mother's heart, and caused death. In falling, she tumbled on her babe, and confined it to the ground. No notice was taken of the cries of the child, while the battle raged—but after its cessation, and the dispersion of the Indians, a lieutenant of the U. S. army, extended the little girl from under its dead mother. The arm was found to be broken, and amputation necessary. During the time of operation, the daughter of the "Great Spirit," never uttered a shriek, or shed a tear, but calmly looked on, eating, with eager appetite, a piece of hard biscuit!

SALE OF BACHELORS.—It is rumored that the legislature of Tennessee has passed a law making it the duty of the sheriff of each county, annually, to make out a list of the bachelors in his county, and notify all of said bachelors who are in a healthy condition, that the law requires them to get married within two months from the time of their notification, and at the expiration of this time, all of said bachelors who have failed to comply with the requisitions of this law, shall be set up and sold at public auction by said sheriff to the highest bidder; and if no person shall be allowed to bid but old bachelors, it is furthermore provided that a sale was recently held at Jonesborough, under this law, at which forty old bachelors were sold.

BALANCE OF GOOD AND ILL.—The Persians held of old this very charitable maxim, that to be good, it was not necessary never to do amiss, but to do for the most part that which was right. When a person accordingly was accused of any breach of the laws, and even if this proved to be guilty, they did not immediately condemn him to be punished, but intimated to make a scrupulous inquiry into the whole course of his life, in order to see whether the good or evil actions in it predominated; if the good weighed heaviest in the scale, he was acquitted: and it was only if otherwise that he was condemned.

LITERARY TRANSLATION.—The London Literary Gazette, a short time since, in noticing a production of George Crunkshank's, in order to distinguish that artist from his brother, said, "This is the real Simon Pure." In an extensive biographical dictionary, since published in Germany, the compiler has taken the hint, and in his notice of this distinguished artist, says, "He is called George Crunkshank—but that is not his real name—his real name is Simon Pure."

ONE OF NORBURY'S.—Lord Norbury having accidentally met Counsellor Speer, who had recently purchased a horse, was asked by his lordship how he approved of the animal. "Not at all, my lord," replied the barrister, "for he trots very high, and is very uneasy." "Then," replied the judge, "if you have not yet named him, I would advise you to call him Skinspear."

THE PLEASURES OF MEMORY.—A lady of fashion at Paris said lately to her chambermaid, who was dressing her, "How weary I am of this darning—I have worn it fifteen days! Apropos, Rosine, tell me for whom I am mourning?" "For a very high and a very uneasy." "Then," replied the judge, "if you have not yet named him, I would advise you to call him Skinspear."

HOW TO RENDER OURSELVES UNDESIRABLE.—The sweet way of rendering ourselves agreeable to others, is by seeming to think of no one. If we appear fully sensible of their good qualities, they will not complain of them in us.

NEW FASHION.—The Philadelphia Spirit of the Times, says—"The Parisian fashion of pantaloons without pockets is all the go with our Chestnut-street boys, just now. Why should it not be? They have nothing to put in them."

MONUMENTS.—Those only deserve a monument who do not require it; that is, those who raised themselves one in the minds and memories of men.

A PROLIFRIC NUT.—An old gentleman by the name of Nut, in Ohio, can number one hundred and thirty-six nuts, in the shape of children, grand-children, great-grand-children, and one great-grand-child—quite a field of nuts from one tree.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"PAUL BRUNO" AND "THE ATONEMENT." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The first of these tales is a translation from the French of Alex ander Dumas, and is a very graphic and interesting sketch of the adventures of a real personage. As for the "Atonement," which is from the pen of Mr. Theodore Hook, it is an incongruous and incomprehensible tale of horror—and we are puzzled to know whether the author means it to be farcical or tragic. In either case he has failed to make it amusing or impressive.

"HORACE VERNON, OR, FASHIONABLE LIFE." In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

We have little partiality for this style of fiction, but must admit that "Horace Vernon" is written with decided talent, and that many of the scenes are in a high degree spirited and well-managed. It is far superior to most of the "fashionable English novels" which swarm from our press, crowding out of the market all works of native manufacture, or illustrative of American life and character.

"THE FURTHER WEATHER." Consisting of select passages from the works of English poets, from Chaucer to Wordsworth. A poetical arrangement. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard. 12 mo. Pp. 370.

This is a republication of an English work. The selections are well made, and arranged in a manner the most convenient for reference. The work is an appropriate one for presents.

"A PEEP AT CHINA IN MR. DUNN'S CHINESE COLLECTION," with miscellaneous notices relating to the institutions and customs of the Chinese and our commercial intercourse with them. By E. C. Wines. Philadelphia: Printed for Nathan Dane. Pp. 162.

All who have seen or heard of Mr. Dunn's Chinese collection, will read this well-digested little work upon China with much interest. It gives us, as it professes, a peep into the curiosities of the "Celestial Empire," and is written in an agreeable and vigorous style. We learn that Mr. Dunn's collection is soon to be exhibited in this city. In the meantime, we select the following passages from the work of Mr. Wines.

CHINESE LITERATURE.

The Chinese are a reading people, and the number of their published works is very considerable. In the departments of morals, history, biography, the drama, poetry, and romance, there is no lack of writings, "such as they are." Of statistical works the number is also very large. Their novels are said to be, many of them, excellent pictures of the national manners. The plot is often very complex, the incidents natural, and the characters well sustained. China has had, too, her Augustan age of poetry. It is remarkable that this brilliant epoch in Chinese letters was during the eighth century of our era, when almost the whole of Europe was sunk in gross ignorance and barbarism. We subjoin a single specimen of their poetry, in a touching little piece, published in the second volume of the Royal Asiatic Transactions, and written three thousand years ago. Besides the pleasure its intrinsic beauty affords, it offers a convincing proof of the substantial identity of human feelings in all times and countries. The piece betokens the fate of a maiden, betrothed to an humble rival, but compelled to become the bride of a rich and powerful suter:

The nest you winged art'st build,
Some robber bird shall tear away;
So yields her hopes the affianced maid,
Some wealthy lord's reluctant prey.

The fluttering bird prepares a home,
In which the spoiler soon shall dwell;
Forth goes the weeping bride, constrained,
A handied cars the triumph swell.

Mourn for the tiny architect,

A stronger bird hath torn his nest;
Mourn for the hapless, stolen bride,
How vain the pomp to soothe her breast!

The Chinese Collection occupies the lower saloon of the noble edifice recently erected in Ninth-street by the Philadelphia Museum Company. This apartment is one hundred and sixty-three feet in length, by seventy in breadth, with lofty ceilings, supported by twenty-two neat and substantial wooden pilasters. Behind each column has been fitted up a spacious case, which has been enclosed by plate-glass windows of the purest transparency. The interior is thus arranged: on each occupied by two cases exactly in width of the pilasters, in like manner enclosed with plate glass. Not far from the entrance are two octagonal glass-cases, occupying a portion of the ample space between the two ranges of pilasters, one of which is completely filled with a superb Chinese state lamp, of huge proportions, gorgeous materials, and rich workmanship. At the extreme end of the saloon, are a large pavilion, a silk draper's shop, and a Chinese street, nearly filled up by palanquin and its bearers. So ample is the space, and so capacious and numerous the receptacles of this grand apartment; and yet such is the extent of the collection of curiosities gathered by Mr. Dunn, during his nine years' residence in China, that a large room remains in the store-rooms, for want of sufficient space in the hall for their convenient display. It is no longer necessary to measure half the circuit of the globe, and subject one's self to the hazards and privations of a six months' voyage on distant and dangerous seas, to enjoy a peep at the Celestial Empire. This is a gratification which may now be enjoyed by the citizens of Philadelphia, for the trouble of walking to the corner of Ninth and Sanson-streets, and by citizens of other parts of the United States, at no greater peril of life and limb than is connected with locomotion by means of our own steamboats and railroads. The collection is a splendid pageant, no doubt; and many, probably, will look upon it merely as such. To those it will be a mere nine days' wonder; an object to be stared at with idle curiosity, and remembered only as a useless gawdaw. For ourselves, we see it with far other eyes, and linger long among its strange and multitudinous variety of objects for a widely different purpose. To us it is a volume redolent of instruction; the best we have ever seen on the Celestial Empire. It is, in fact, China in miniature. It almost realizes, in reference to the manners and civilization of that remote, unique, and interesting empire, the fable of the woods moving to the sound of the lyre of Orpheus.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The tale of New-England Witchcraft, by John Neal, will be completed in two more chapters. It will be found to contain many curious particulars in relation to a period perhaps the most remarkable in our annals.—The performances of Mr. Burton at the National have been all that our correspondent "T." has described. We wish that one of our theatres could secure the services of this admirable comedian for the coming season.—The article "on our hotel" is a little too highly spiced with personalities for our taste, and we disagree with the writer in many of his strictures. Blanchard's new establishment promises to be one of the most convenient and unexceptionable in the country.—We must decline the verses by "X.," "Y.," "Z.," "Solima," "A. T. T.," and "Vincent."—An "impostor" is informed that the title of the new novel, the announcement of which has excited his curiosity, has not yet transpired. It will be published by the Messrs. Harper.—We cannot comply with the request of "Beau Shatterly." He must be a very unreasonable and extortionate old gentleman.—The communication of "H." shall have a place the earliest opportunity.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1839

Charles Mathews vs. the United States.—We learn from the newspapers that Major Gatchell, the secret agent sent out by our government last winter to blow up Madame Vestris and to disfigure her with everlasting pepper, by means of an infernal machine, has failed in his attempt, and that the whole plot has been disclosed through the timely vigilance of Charles Mathews. The object of the movement on the part of Congress, it will be remembered, was to deter that gentleman from publishing his menaced attack upon the people and institutions of this country. The friends of republican liberty throughout the world cannot but feel mortified at the failure of the patriotic scheme, by which the United States were to be shielded from the effects of the displeasure of Madame Vestris and her husband. If the directions of Congress (adopted in secret session) had been strictly attended to, we do not doubt but that the result would have been all that we could wish; but it appears that Gatchell, instead of employing one of Jackson's patent-revolving, perpetual-expanding percussion locks for the assassination, foolishly adopted for the purpose a box of combustibles similar to the infernal machine, by which the life of Bonaparte was attempted. Nay, so far was the major wanting in ordinary prudence and circumspection, that he actually confided his scheme to two gentlemen, whose names we have not heard, who appear to have been mainly instrumental, not treacherously, but indiscreetly, in bringing about the discovery of the plot. We trust that Gatchell will be arrested immediately on his return—tried by a court-martial, and hung without benefit of clergy. Our minister, Mr. Stevenson, we regret to say, much to blame in not lending his co-operation to a greater extent. Why couldn't he, if he were disposed to do his country a service, shoot Madame Vestris from a side-box at the Olympic, and end by tomahawking Mathews? It would make a very pretty diversion for the audience, besides relieving the people of the United States from their present apprehensions. However, although our first attempt has failed, there is no occasion to despair. There are more ways than one of killing an actress. The first Brutus was not the only one who could drive home a dagger. To Mr. and Mrs. Mathews we need only say, be wary! In the meantime we give from a London paper the following account of the development of the plot—a plot, which had it been carried out according to the plan originally proposed by Mr. Van Buren, would infallibly have been crowned with triumphant success.

Diabolical attempt on the life of Madame Vestris.—A person of the name of Lancaster, passing through Lincoln's Inn fields on Tuesday, heard two persons in close converse. One said, 'Well, Jack, have you sent it?' Jack said he had: the first then said, 'Did you direct it to Charley?' the other replied, 'No! I have directed it to Madame,' adding that 'his (Charley's) time was not yet come.' Mr. Lancaster, suspecting that the conversation applied to Charles Mathews and Madame Vestris, followed the conspirators, when one took a letter from his pocket and read it to his companion, and then returned it to his pocket; and shortly afterwards, in taking his handkerchief from his pocket, the letter fell on the ground, which Mr. Lancaster picked up. The letter disclosed a plot intended to 'tattoo' the countenance of Madame Vestris, and 'disfigure it with everlasting pepper.' Mr. Lancaster then proceeded to the Olympic theatre, and communicated with Mr. Mathews. The next morning Mr. Mathews went to Bow-street, and laid the circumstance before Sir F. Roe. The letter purports to be written by 'B. G. Zatchell.' The 'Z' in the name is not distinctly written, but it appears more like that than any other, although it might be taken for 'Y' or 'G'; and as Gatchell is an American name, Mr. Mathews thinks the writer intended the indistinct mark for 'G.' Mr. Mathews is perfectly well persuaded that this felonious outrage was the plot of certain Americans, to revenge themselves upon him for 'daring to speak against a free country!'

Marrying in haste and repenting at leisure.—A curious fact, in relation to the marriage of John Kemble, is told in Bannister's memoirs, lately published. One of the daughters of a noble lord, formerly holding high office, but then living in retirement, had fallen in love with the graceful and showy actor, merely from seeing him on the stage. Kemble was sent for by the father, and, to his astonishment, acquainted with the circumstances. The noble lord told him further, that it was in his power to do him either a great evil or a great favour; and, that, if he would do the latter, by relieving him from all apprehension of the lady's indulging her fantasy, and relieve him effectually, by marrying any one else for whom he might have an attachment, his wife should receive a dowry of five thousand pounds. Kemble immediately proposed for Mrs. Brereton, a pretty actress in the company, and the marriage took place without delay. But the amusing part of the tale is, that the afflicted and magnanimous father instantly recovered his spirits, and lost his memory. On being applied to for his thousands, he declared that he had no recollection whatever of the compact, nor, indeed, any of the idea, further than some general conversation on such matters with the "very intelligent person in question;" adding, that if he was to pay five thousand pounds for every whim of his daughters, he must soon be a much poorer man than he ever intended to be." It is certainly believed that Kemble never got a shilling from this very sensitive nobleman, and that, for the rest of his life, he attached a new value to the vulgar etiquette of signing and sealing beforehand, even with the most plausible of mankind.

The Theatres.—At the Park, Mr. and Mrs. Sloman had quite a successful engagement, and Mr. Sinclair is, we believe, now to occupy the boards until the stars, who have been irradiating the south, shall take their way northward. The spring business of the Park promises to make up, in a degree, for the slim houses which were consequent on the engagement of Mr. and Mrs. Mathews. The opera at the National has been as welcome as ever during the present week; and the new piece of the "Mountain Sylph" has been received with decided favour. Burton, the imitable Burton, kept the town in excellent humour during his too brief stay amongst us. Wallace is expected back with the return of the Great Western, with Charles Kean. His arrangements for the ensuing season will undoubtedly be of a character to add to his reputation as a manager, and to the well-deserved success of his theatre. The Bowery is risen from its ashes in redoubled splendour. The interior is elegant and commodious, and withal extremely capacious. Hamblin intends to produce a succession of novelties—not among the least, a succession of dramatized novels, fresh from the press. To effect this purpose he has engaged a well-known and competent pen.

Concerts.—The past season has been distinguished above all others in New-York for the number and variety of the musical entertainments which have been offered to the publick. Mr. Knight's concert, which took place on Friday evening last, was, we presume, the concluding one. It was well attended, and the performances went off with much clat. Mozart's requiem was performed in a brilliant manner at the church of St. Barclay-street, on the morning of the same day. It was produced with fine effect under the direction of Mr. Benson. While on the subject of music, we cannot but remark the extraordinary number of new and original songs which have been published in this city during the last year. Messrs. Horn, Russell and Knight, have kept the "musical market" constantly supplied with a succession of brilliant melodies, which will bear a comparison with the best of foreign production during the same period.

Zerah Colburn.—"So young so wise, they say, do ne'er live long." Every one has heard of the celebrated calculating boy, Zerah Colburn, who astonished the publick both in this country and Europe, some twenty years since, by his astonishing facility of numbers, and solving, by an intellectual process incredibly brief, the most intricate problems in arithmetick. We learn from the Vermont papers that he died recently at Norwich in that state, where he was officiating as professor in a literary institution. He appears to have subsided into a very common-place individual, notwithstanding the extraordinary promise of his youth. He is said to have lost his peculiar talent as he attained years of maturity, but his attainments in literature were respectable.

Hogg's Garden.—If you would obtain a bountiful supply of rich spring flowers, look in upon Hogg's garden in Twenty-Second-street, and you will see much in array that is rarely to be witnessed.

There is religion in a flower;
Its still small voice is as the voice of conscience
Mountains and oceans, planets, suns, and systems,
Bear not the impress of Almighty power
In characters more legible, than those
Which he has written on the tiniest flower
Whose light bell bends beneath the dew-drop's weight

Spring prospects.—The spring has burst upon us most propitiously, whether we regard the business prospects of the country, or those general influences of weather and climate, which cheer the labours and multiply the hopes of the husbandman. The promise of an abundant harvest is ample, while our crowded streets and busy thoroughfares will testify to the returning tide of prosperity which is felt through every vein and artery of our great metropolis.

Literature and office.—We are gratified to learn that Mr. T. C. Grattan, the author of the very agreeable work entitled "Highways and Byways," and also of an excellent "History of the Netherlands," has received the appointment of British Consul at Boston. Mr. Grattan is an Irishman and a man of genius, and we doubt not that his appointment will be welcomed by the intelligence of the trimontane city.

Fay's new novel.—We learn that the new novel by our esteemed colleague, Theodore S. Fay, is completed, and that it will be published by the Messrs. Harpers in the course of the summer. It is entitled "The Countess of Ida," and the scene is laid in Berlin. We doubt not that it will be of a character to increase the high reputation of the author of "Norman Leshe."

Lozenge Warehouse.—There is an establishment at 106 Nassau-street, where is the principal manufactory of lozenges in the United States. More than seventy varieties are to be obtained here—some impregnated with medicinal virtues, and others with all the flavours that can gratify the sense of taste.

We observe by the London Herald that the injunction obtained by Mr. Colburn, the publisher, against Captain Marryat, regarding the purpose of the latter to publish his Phantom Ship, in France or America, of which Mr. Colburn purchased the copyright, has been sustained by the decision of the vice-chancellor.

We have much pleasure in presenting the following exquisite melody to the lady-readers of the New-York Mirror. It was first sung by Mrs. Horn at the Musical Soirées of Charles E. Horn, by whom it was arranged, expressly for her. It was received with universal applause; and, before the lady could leave the pianoforte, she was obliged to repeat it. We esteem it an especial favour, that, through the politeness of Messrs. Davis and Horn, we are enabled to enrich this number with a musical gem of no ordinary value. It will be seen that the song is a copyright, and we presume, of course, that this right will not be infringed. It may be had, beautifully printed, of the publishers, 411 Broadway. We may mention here, that frequent applications are made to us, couched in the persuasive terms so well understood by that sex, to whom this department of the paper is especially dedicated, for the republication of favourite melodies, which have already appeared in the Mirror; and, in a few instances, we have complied with these requests, when the song could not otherwise be procured. But we are constrained to give notice here, that we must, in future, be more chary of our space, as we have made arrangements with a well-known amateur in London, by which we shall receive all the new and popular melodies by the principal composers of Europe. As these will be selected with great care and taste, we hope to present, in our coming volume, a selection of new, rare, and beautiful music, which, of itself, will be a feature in this periodical, that will render to its subscribers more than a full equivalent for the amount of subscription for the entire volume. That this has always been the case, however, we think will be cheerfully admitted by the accomplished class of readers, who weekly place the Mirror upon the desk of their pianofortes. The selections made by Messieurs Berkeley, Horn, Russell, Knight, and other amateurs and composers, have given to this page a character and popularity, which will suffer no diminution, while they continue to contribute, not only their own beautiful compositions, but various morceaux from the new operas and lyrical treasures, to which they have access. But we will not longer detain the fair reader from the enjoyment of the musical repast prepared for her this week.

WHERE ZEPHYR DWELLS.

A POPULAR FRENCH MELODY—ARRANGED EXPRESSLY FOR AND SUNG BY MRS. C. E. HORN AT THE PUBLIC CONCERTS, AND RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED TO MISS GALE—THE WORDS BY J. A. W. ESQ.—THE SYMPHONIES AND ACCOMPANIMENTS BY CHARLES E. HORN.

ALLEGRETTO CON MOLTO SEMPLICE.

Where Ze-phyr dwells at noon-tide hours, Cool ing his wings in the dew of the flow'rs, There we will go, nor think of times, Now all for-got for hap-pier climes; And there with his own dewy breath, That's at some caught young ro-ses I'll sing, love, to thee, I'll sing, love, to thee— Oh! come there, by the foun-tains, Or glen deep in the moun-tains, Happy, hap-py death. Ad lib.
 thou'lt dwell with me. Happy, hap-py thou'lt dwell with me.

SECOND VERSE.—Come where no wind chills the young flow'r,
 Where all is one sweet summer hour—
 Here, ev'ry tear comes but for grief—
 There, even tears are joy's relief.

Oh! come to this land of delight,
 And, there, from the day-break till night,
 I'll sing love to thee!
 I'll sing love to thee!

Oh! come, if earth can show thee,
 One joy, I will bestow, thee—
 Happy, happy thou'lt dwell with me!
 Happy, happy thou'lt dwell with me!

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

It was dark when he arrived at the house of the preacher; and his heart failed him as he walked up to the door and set his foot upon the broad, rough step—a stone which rocked and trembled under his tread; for the windows were shut and secured with heavy wooden bars, running from corner to corner and bolted through the frames, and, what appeared very surprising, there was no light, no sound of activity, neither life nor motion, within nor without the house. He knocked, but there was no answer, nothing but a heavy, dull echo within; but as he withdrew his hand he heard a noise within, and a heavy, black shadow moved stealthily athwart his way, and he felt as if he had been pursued up to the very door. And for what?—and by what? Brave though he was, a slight thrill ran along his arteries, and he caught his breath; and the next moment his heart leaped with a joy he was half ashamed of, as a light flashed through a single pane of glass along the damp step, and the voice of the preacher himself answered the summons by bidding him wait in! as he fumbled within at the heavy door. "I will, sir," said Burroughs, lifting his foot—and then half-recalling—"I will, though when I passed over your threshold three years ago, this very month—nay, this very night, as I live! Strange I should not have remembered this till now! I had well nigh determined never to re-cross it while I breathed;" and he stood for a moment as if debating with himself whether to go forward or back.

"Ah, brother Burroughs! ah, is that you!" said his aged friend; "why, man, how pale you are!" lifting up the candle so as to see the face of Burroughs, while he shadowed his own eyes with a trembling hand, as if not altogether satisfied with himself or his visitor. "You are tired, maybe—yes, yes, I see how it is—very tired; you have come a long way, haven't you? But why do you stand there? Why do you hold back, as if unwilling to enter? Walk in, walk in, I pray you, and make yourself at home, brother."

"No, no," said Burroughs, talking to himself in a low voice, and without appearing to heed the preacher. "No, no, it is too late now; I cannot go back if I would; but of a truth, it is very strange, that I should not have recollected my bad wish, till my foot had actually overpassed that rocky threshold, which I made a vow never to cross again while I breathed—never, never—under the penalty of death! Pray, forgive me, brother," entering as he spoke—"but how is this? You appear less cordial than of yore."

"Less cordial, brother!—I hope not. I did not mean to receive you less kindly; but your visit was rather unexpected, though I knew of your being in the neighbourhood; and in short, brother, after what happened at the court-house—to tell you the truth, I—I was taken a little by surprise. But I have a right now, I think, to complain of you. You made no answer when I called to ask who was there; and when you saw me after I unbolted the door, you hesitated and half drew back, and appeared as if unwilling to trust yourself beneath my roof."

"Did I? well, that is strange! But I did not hear you ask who was there, and stood wondering at the stillness after I knocked."

"Pray, walk in, you are evidently much disturbed; something must have happened to you. There, there, let us fasten the door," and they entered the house together.

"Did I?" exclaimed Burroughs, after they had seated themselves; "did I, indeed? How wonderful! Pray, give me a drop of cold water and allow me to rest myself. Are the children up?"

"Ah, brother, brother, you have not forgotten the dear child, I see."

"Which dear child?"

"Which? ah, ah, I took it for granted your inquiry was about my poor little Abby, the image of my dear departed wife; you never had a truer friend, brother."

"Is Bridget Pope with you still?"

"Why, George Burroughs!" looking at him with a mixture of pity and astonishment, "that poor child has never been out of your head. I dare say, from the day you first gathered her, as it were, among the thistles and rocks. Were she six or eight years older, I do believe in my heart you would almost—may, nay, forgive me, I did not mean to speak lightly of her resemblance to your wife, nor of your astonishing partiality for her. Poor things! poor things! they are no longer the happy little creatures that you saw about my table three years ago; but I begin to have a hope now, some little hope, that we may yet see them as they have been; for within a day or two, Bridget has begun to look more cheerful, and to go about the house in that quiet, graceful, easy way which used to bring the water into your eyes whenever you saw her gliding, as you called it, from one part of the room to another. I do wish you had come earlier; why didn't you? We have been expecting Robert Evelett here, and if we can but persuade the children to play together, and be noisy and cheerful as they were wont. I have a notion that both will get over their melancholy ways. Their health is much better; but they are too much alone, perhaps. Why, what ails the man! what is the matter with you, my friend! I believe in my heart you haven't heard a word I've been a sayin' all this time."

"Did I?"

"Did you what? Really, I don't understand you."

"At any rate, I should like to see the children."

"Very well, they have but just done their supper; and we shall find them getting ready for bed." Saying this, he opened the door, and walked into a room, which appeared to be the kitchen, though there were no less than three beds in it—one a turn-up.

Burroughs followed—and great, indeed, was the consternation and sorrow he fell on seeing the poor children. They were so pale, so wasted, so full of care, so unlike what they should have been at their age—the age of innocent looks and cheerful hearts. They started up as he entered—and Abigail ran away into a far corner and hid herself; and as for Bridget Pope, though she stood still and stared at him with a steady look, she made no reply when he spoke to her, but grew paler and paler, till she seemed just ready to drop, in the changeable light that issued from the kitchen fireplace, upon which an armful of hemlock brush had been heaped, as if to extinguish the fire and fill the room with smoke, and the chimney with a rush of sparks whenever the wind swept through it.

"Father! oh father! oh my!" cried the little Abby, peeping out from between her fingers at Burroughs, and speaking with a sort of impatient peevish whine. "There—there—there it goes! don't you see it now, father?"

"See what, my dear?"

"Burroughs—Burroughs—there—there—there it goes! there it stands!—it's looking at me now. Oh, father! father! I never saw him before; but I've seen all the rest—in my sleep, father—oh my! I can't you see him now, father?"

"See him! to be sure I do, my child."

"Gracious God! Father of mercy! what is the meaning of this?" cried Burroughs, locking his hands with terror, and lifting them in vehement supplication.

"There, father! Didn't you hear that? Oh, father! if it ain't makin' believe pray!"

"Why, Abby, don't you know me?—Me, your old friend Burroughs?"

"There, father, that's just the way he used to speak! Anybody might know that shape anywhere. Why, as sure as you are alive, father, that's your Burroughs himself."

"To be sure it is, and most happy am I to see you, my dear child," he answered, in a soothing voice, and moving a little nearer.

"What ails you? Why do you tremble so? Don't you know me yet, Abby? nor you either, Bridget?"

"Oh, sir! sir! it is you, it is only yourself, Mr. Burroughs!" cried the poor girl, gasping for breath, and huddling up into the shadow as to avoid his touch.

"To be sure it is! Why, what on earth can possess you both? What is the matter with you? What are you afraid of? Who else can it be?"

"Who else—I do not know, sir—I dare not say, sir—I—I—I never happened to see you before, sir," said the poor girl, catching her breath at every word.

"Never saw me before! what do you mean by saying that, after the affair at the court-house no longer ago than—"

"No, sir—never, sir, never! Your spirit, I mean—your shape—you that stand there, looking just as if you were alive—yourself I saw—to be sure I did—but, oh mercy! mercy! don't touch me!" But he did touch her, nevertheless; he took her hand in his for a moment, and she let it go before she had time to be frightened out of her senses; and instantly—instantly!—she stood before him, and the creature completely reassured and happy!

"Oh, Abigail! Abigail!" she cried, on finding herself again at liberty. "Oh, Abby! Abby! as sure as you're alive, it is Mr. Burroughs himself! Speak to it, Abigail—don't be afraid—what can you be afraid of? I don't believe he's one of the crew, after all; they may say what they like, but I'm not afraid now, and I won't be afraid again, so there!" And her lips had something of the beautiful petulance you would look for in a spoiled child. "You'd better come out and speak to it, Abby."

"Speak to it yourself, Bridget Pope, you're the oldest!"

"Well, an' you're the youngest!"

"Ah, but you're the nearest, Bridget!"

"Yes, and you're the furthest off, Abby!"

"Well, now, an' if you aint afeard, speak to it Bridgy. Let me see you touch it, if you dare."

"If I dare! Well, there, Abby, there! I did touch you, didn't I, sir! and I aint afraid of you, am I, sir? and I never mean to be afeard of you again, do I, sir! never! till I see your ugly, wicked shape with my own eyes and the light of the kitchen fire shining through and through you, as I thought it did a minute or two ago. Come out, Abby, you'd better, and take a seat on the bed with me."

After much persuasion, the poor little thing began to creep out of her hiding-place, to feel her way along by the two beds; and by little and little got courage enough at last, holding on by her father's coat-tail, however, to sidle up to Mr. Burroughs, who sat buried in sorrowful thought, lift up her innocent face, and say to him in a faint whisper, just loud enough to reach his ear, "You be Mr. Burroughs, then—aint you?"

"Yes, dear, yes; am I so much altered, then, that you do not know me?"

"You are a good man, sir, aint you?"

"I hope so, dear," drawing her up to his heart so gradually as not to alarm her.

"You never torments the people, do you, sir?"

"I! no indeed, I hope not; I should be sorry to torment anybody."

"There, Bridget Pope, did you hear that? He says he never torments the people; didn't you, sir?"

"Yes, dear."

"Then Elizabeth Hubbard tells a great lie; don't she, father?"

The preacher made no reply till Burroughs kissed her forehead, when he smiled mournfully and turned away. "Well, I declare, if that aint as much like father as ever you see!"

Having now passed a whole hour in a careful examination of these poor little sufferers, Burroughs bade them farewell—farewell for ever! and went away utterly confounded by their behaviour, and with a hope of reaching the truth; for if Abigail Paris and Bridget Pope were altogether innocent, and free from evil thought and mischief, as they certainly were, how could he say, after all, that they and others were not bewitched?

Still there was a hope. It might be disease in them, or fright, because of their loneliness; through cruel treachery in others of the afflicted. Anxious to follow up the inquiry, without losing an hour, he set off in search of Rachel and Elizabeth Dyer, knowing that under their quiet roof, he should certainly find peace, and, perhaps, obtain further knowledge of the miserable creature, who, in the story of the sheet, had abused the faith of the judges and people, with a tremendous forgery.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

He was not altogether disappointed. Rachel Dyer knew much of Elizabeth Hubbard, whose bold audacious temper and great beauty had made her terrible, and was only waiting for proof that could not be questioned, to impeach her, face to face, before the people. Rachel Dyer had proved her courage before—again and again had she proved it—she was frank and fearless, and everybody acknowledged it; and yet, was there a something mysterious about her, which even her tried and faithful friend, Burroughs himself, was never able to fathom. She knew, that as a grandchild of Mary Dyer, the quaker-prophetess and martyr, she was regarded with awe and terror by the multitude. She knew also, that, because of her behaviour in the seasons of great public peril, when, though she was one of that people, who keep away from war and strife, in every possible shape, she had gone forth twice by herself—yes, thrice—a young, helpless woman, without a companion or a guide—unsold and alone, into the thick of the wilderness, to plead for them that had been carried away captive by the Indians; prevailing where there was no hope, in every case, and saving at one time four human creatures, three of whom were the descendants of those who had been foremost in putting Mary Dyer to death; risking her life at night, in the great awful woods of the north, when they were beset and beleaguered with prowling savages, to rescue the grandchildren of a man, who had been the destroyer of her grandmother. She knew that, because of these things, they regarded her, not merely with awe and terror, but with love, and a sort of affectionate veneration. Still, however, there was that in her lofty carriage, whenever Burroughs and Elizabeth were nigh, which neither was able to account for, though it might proceed, he thought, from a consciousness of great power and authority, and a wish to conceal that consciousness.

He found the two sisters at prayer. They gave him a hearty generous welcome. Though Rachel, who was actually chiding Elizabeth for shyness, appeared whenever he spoke to her, as if she knew not whither to look nor what to say. He was preparing to ask what troubled her, what had so changed her, and why she held him so aloof with her stately carriage, when a whisper was heard at the door by which he had just entered, a sweet low voice, like that of a frightened woman, saying, "sir, sir!—you are wanted!"

"Ah, I could swear to that voice!" he cried, starting up and running to the door.

"Let me in, I pray you, quick!" quick!"

Elizabeth was ready to drop out of her chair; but Rachel, staying Burroughs with a look, as he was hurrying toward the door, went to it, and flung it wide open, without a sign of terror. It was Robert Evelet.

"Oh, sir!" cried he—his neck all open, his hat off, and his hair flying loose; oh, sir! I have run up here, just to tell you that they are a goin' to have you taken up to-morrow."

"Me—"

"Yes, sir—and you—and you—and all the rest of 'em. Bridget Pope told me to run for my life. There's Mary Walcott and Lizzy Hubbard, they've just ben over to persuade Bridget and Abby how't you are one of 'em shapes; but they don't believe a word on't, and so—and so—I've brought you up father's gray stallion, and hitched him jist back of the orchard there—an' you'd better be off, lickity-split, I tell you, about the quietest; an' you too, Elizabeth, for they'll swear through thick and thin against you; and as for—a—hem—a—hem—I bring up the horse!"

Burroughs made him repeat the particulars, and becoming satisfied in his own soul, that if they undertook to destroy the poor terrified girl, there would be no possibility of her escape, he turned to her, and bidding her be of good courage, added—"If you think as I do, Rachel, we have not a moment to lose."

"I do think with thee, George—Robert, go to the barn, please, with thee—and lead up the black mare. There will find her on thy left hand as these enter the door, with a side-saddle and a pillion by her crib. There—go, go, and look well to her girths—she must carry double to-night."

"Why double? We have another horse, or even two more, if need be," said Burroughs.

"No, George—my sister and I go together. Miriam will carry us both, I dare say—she has carried both a longer journey, and at a swifter pace by far, than we shall need go now, I trust. Get thee ready, sister. George, I was not altogether prepared for this, though I had waged my life against here—not for my own sake, however, but for the sake of others; but I shall not weary now, I promise thee; and hope, through divine assistance, to stay the mischief yet, and, if possible, without the destruction of Elizabeth Hubbard. But, what is to become of thee, George?"

"I shall remain here."

"Here?" said Elizabeth, trembling, as that she could not fasten the belt of her wrapper.

"Yes—here. It is my duty."

"Then, it is our duty, also;" and she seated herself in apparent despair.

"No, Elizabeth—no. I am a preacher of the gospel—a man; able to bear that, which you, as a woman, would not be able to think of. What may be very proper for me, might be improper; nay, actually impossible for a young and fair—"

"George Burroughs!"

"Forgive me, Rachel—I was carried away by my anxiety."

"What shall I do, sister?" said Elizabeth.

"Thou hast my opinion already."

"Well, sister, be it so—but then—"

"Well, what then?"

"If this could but persuade him to go with us, why, then, sister, we should be safe."

"Safe, Elizabeth Dyer! Our safety is not in George Burroughs, I hope; nor in the arm of flesh."

"No, no, sister—I didn't mean that; but—but—we shall find our way through the woods better—Shouldn't we?"

Rachel made no reply; but stood looking at them both; first, at one, and then at the other, as if about to speak, until her colour changed and her eyes filled; then stepping aside into a small room, she disappeared for a few moments, while they were getting ready; but the door stood open a little way, and a kneeling shadow fell upon the white sandal floor, and shot along the wall. On her return, she spoke to Burroughs, with a profounder earnestness and greater composure. "Thee will go with us, I hope, George," said she. "It will give thee time to deliberate; and I see thee's taken a little by surprise. It will be a great help to—to—to Elizabeth and me; and if thee should come, after all—why, so much the more would be thy merit, having once got clear."

"I shall go far enough with you, to see you in safety; and then I shall come back, if I live."

"Make no rash promises, George. The Lord may open a different path for thee."

"All ready, sir!" cried the boy, putting his head into the door.

"I say though, Mr. Burroughs, a word in your ear; she's a goin', I hope, sinst she," looking at Rachel.

"Why should she go, Robert?"

"If you'll speak a little lower, and stoop a little more, I'll give you reason enough, I guess, for what I say. Hush, hush—Barbara Shaw and Liz Hubbard, when they came over to see Bridget and Abby, jist now, they told 'em how't you came to their bedside, only jist afore last, with a witch that nobody ever see before—a freckled witch, with red hair, and a hump on hys back."

Burroughs clasped his hand over the boy's mouth and interchanged a look of dismay with Elizabeth, whose heart ached to hear that beloved sister so spoken of; and the more, because of the bitter truth of the words, and the innocent guerdness of the poor boy to keep it, from her sharp, sensitive ear. But Rachel was not like her sister.

She took the boy's hand with a smile, gave him a hearty kiss, and without more ado, prepared for the journey.

They were on their way immediately. It was a cool, clear night, and the vast wilderness, through which their path lay, appeared to overshadow the whole earth, and to shoot up a multitude of branches into the very sky; so dim was it underneath and about, so bright and motionless overhead. Rachel and Elizabeth were mounted upon a powerful and free-spirited creature; and Burroughs upon the very animal he would have selected for that occasion. At every step he threw up his head, and shook his magnificent mane, and planted his foot, as if he knew that he was the hope of the whole party. The moon was up. The great highroad, by which they were to escape to Rhode Island, was before them—a path only at the best.

"Hush!" whispered Burroughs. "Rein up, and steal into the shadow. I hear the tread of horses afar off—another—and another—oh, there is no time to be lost, now. Farewell!"

"No, no, George—no!—do not leave us yet, I pray thee."

"But it must be so. I shall throw myself in their way, by an opposite path. For your lives do not stir from the shadow, till you hear me pass that hill yonder at a gallop. If I do not return, after waiting half an hour, make the best of your way along that left hand opening. Farewell! and be of good courage! Saying this, he set off to join the pursuers at a place where three roads came together, near the bottom of the hill. He had not gone far, when he caught a glimpse of six or eight horsemen, riding at a furious rate, in the very direction he wished. He reined up with a gush of thankfulness; but his charger grew restive, and on seeing the other horses, and hearing their heavy tramp, which rang through the still night air, like a charge of cavalry, he threw up his head into the air, and sprang off, with a long loud neigh, which was immediately answered by two or three horses of the troop, and then by that on which the poor girls were mounted.

(To be concluded in our next.)

GAETIES AND GRAVITIES.

THE AVARICIOUS FATHER.

The following anecdote of the meanness and ingenuity of a Russian father is almost too contemptible to allow us to laugh at it!—A marriage had been arranged between two families in the trading class at Moscow. The father of the young lady was rich, and it was agreed that he should provide her with a handsome trousseau, and that he should pay his son-in-law her fortune of two hundred thousand roubles, about eight thousand pounds, on the morning of the wedding. The happy day at length arrived, the trousseau or prédanie was, according to custom, packed in handsome chests, placed on cars, and paraded through the streets to the bridegroom's house, to display the wealth of the family; it having been already, with the same laudable object, exhibited to usually by the bride's apartments to all who chose to come, either to criticize or to admire. Before the wedding, the father of the lady presented her intended husband with the promised dowry of his daughter; as, however, it was now time to proceed to church, he remarked to the young man, "You can't carry such a sum of money as this about you, so you had better leave it with me, and you can take it home with you at night." To this proposal the other readily assented; the wedding was duly solemnized, and was, as usual, celebrated afterwards by a vast deal of eating and drinking; and when the happy couple went home at night, the bridegroom, unsuspecting from wine and love, was easily persuaded to leave his money in his father-in-law's care till the morning. The next day he was hardly dressed, when he was told that there were some men inquiring for him; he at first refused to see them, saying, "It was not a moment for business, and he would attend to none that day;" the people, however, persisted in their demand for admission, and were at length let in. On seeing the bridegroom, they immediately told him they were come for the chests. "What chests?" was the reply. "Why, the prédanie," to be sure. "Pooh!" said the young man, who supposed that the ornamental chests had been hired for the occasion, "you shall have your boxes, but you are in a great hurry; my wife has not had time yet to unpack her things, and put them in their proper places." The lady, who was standing by, looked very foolish at this, while the men replied, that they must have not only the chests, but also their contents. Upon this the bridegroom got in a rage, and asked if they meant to carry off his wife's wardrobe. "Don't talk nonsense about your wife's wardrobe," said the intruders with a provoking laugh; "you don't really suppose all those things belong to her; the old gentleman only hired them for the occasion, to make a show, and we are now sent to fetch them back." The bride, on being appealed to, was obliged to admit that all the men had said was true; and accordingly, they carried off the handsome furs, silks, jewels, and other valuable articles of a Russian trousseau in that class of life; while the husband betook himself in no good humour to his father-in-law, to complain of his deceit, and to get the money which he had left in his charge. "What money?" said the old man, in pretended surprise. "Why," said the other, "the two hundred thousand roubles which you paid me yesterday as your daughter's dowry, and which I left in your care last night." "Ah!" said the father-in-law, laughing, "you can't pretend to be serious. I gave you the money yesterday to make a show before the company, and you gave it me back afterwards, as it was always understood between us that you should." In vain the young man denied the assertion, and claimed the payment of the money, and the fulfilment of the contract; argument and entreaty proved alike useless, and he was obliged to go home, with the satisfaction of having been cheated out of his wife's fortune, as well as her wardrobe, by her own father.

A REQUEST FOR AN ARTIST.—A nobleman, who painted remarkably well for an amateur, showing one of his pictures to Poussin, the latter exclaimed—"Your lordship only requires a little poverty to make you a complete artist."

EXTRACTS FROM BULWER'S RICHELIEU.

POLITICAL DISTRESS.

At our stateroom houses
The very walls do play the eaves-dropper.
There's not a sunbeam creeping o'er our floors
But seems a glance from that malignant eyes
Which reigns o'er France; our fatal greatness lives
In the sharp glare of one relentless day.

FRIENDSHIP.

Confide in me! our young days rolled together
In the same river, glazing the same stars
That smiled in the heaven of hope; alike we made
Bright-winged steeds of our unformed chimeras,
Spurring the fancies upward to the air,
Wherein we shaped fair castles from the cloud.

LOVE AND ITS OBJECT.

The thoughts of lovers stir with poetry
As leaves with summer wind.—The heart that loves
Dwells in an Eden, hearing angel-lutes,
As Eve in the First Garden. Hast thou seen
My Julie, and not felt thee forthwith dull
To live in the common world, and talk in words
That clothe the feelings of the frigid heart?
Upon the perfumed pillow of her ease—
As on his native bed of roses flushed
With Paphian skies Love smiling sleeps: Her voice
The blent interpreter of thoughts as pure
To her sweet sisters every art motion
Or fancies dip their changelings! In the maze
Of her harmonious beauties—Modesty,
Like some severer grace that leads the choir
Of her sweet sisters every art motion
Attunes to such chaste charms, that Passion holds
His burning breath, and will not with a sigh
Dissolve the spell that binds him! Oh these eyes
That woo the earth—shadowing more soul than ink
Under the lids of Psyche!

DESPAIR AND MIRTH.

There is a brotherhood, which calm-eyed Reason
Can wot not of, betwixt Despair and Mirth.
My birthplace mid the vines of sunny Provence,
Perchance the stream that sparkles in my veins
Came from that wine of passionate life which, erst,
Glow'd in the wild heart of the Troubadour!
And danger, which makes steeper courage wary,
But fester me the earth—shadowing more soul than ink
Under the lids of Psyche!

RUDE OF RICHELIEU.

What class of men, whose white lips do not curse
The grim, insatiate, universal tyrant?
We noble born—where are our antique rights—
Our feudal seignories—our castled strength,
That did divide us from the base plebeians,
And made our swards our law—where are they?—Trod
To dust—and o'er the graves of our dead power
Scaffolds are monuments—the kindly house
Shorn of its beams—the royal sun of France
Clipped by this blood-red comet. Where we turn,
Nothing but Richelieu!—Armies—church—state—laws—
But mirrors that do multiply his beams.
He sees all—acts all—Argus and Briarbus—
Spy at our boards, and deathsmen at our hearths;
Under the venom of one lady's nightshade,
Withers the lilacs of all France.

POLICY.

Bah! in policy
We foil gigantic danger, not by giants,
But dwarfs. The statues of our stately fortune
Are sculptured by the chisel—not the axe!

POWER OF THE PEN.

Beneath the rule of men entirely great
The pen is mightier than the sword. Behold
The arch-enchanter's wand!—itself a nothing!
But taking sorcery from the master hand
To paralyze the Cæsars—and to strike
The low earth breathless!

FACTS AND SCRAPS.

"Ven you arrive at the dignity of sawin' wood, Lafayette, if you is elevated to that 'ere profession, mind an' always saw the biggest staff, 'cause y' you'll only have the little uns to saw ven you gets tuckered out. Ven you eats pus, as I 'opees you may, if you lives to be a man, alwuz eat the crust first, 'cause the crust int a good thing to top vith, 'specially if it's tough and thick as sole leather. Ven you piles up wood, alwuz put the big 'uns to the bottom—alwuz, Lafayette, 'cause it's mighty hard exercise to lift 'em to the tip of the pile. The wits at the Garrick were the other day discussing the question of the interference of ministers in preventing the performances at Drury-Lane. "It is, indeed, too bad," remarked Hook, "to cross Don the whole of Lent, when Good Friday is the only day properly set apart for that process."

The general impression is, that Madame Vestris has not managed the infernal machine plot with half the dexterity that she manages her plots on the stage: the part well filled, it appears, was the box.

T. Cook having an obstinate cigar the other night that would not light, declared that he was just in the same situation as Charles Kean, "for," says he, "I have been puffing and puffing for a long time, but curse me if I can draw."

When poor Edmund Kean first appeared at Drury-Lane theatre and excited the admiration of the metropolis by his great tragic powers some one said to Jack Bannister, that he was an excellent Harlequin. "Yes," replied he, "he leaps wonderfully; he has already jumped over the heads of those who stood highest in the joys of the theatre."

The remark of Sir W. Curtis might be applied to many of the enjoyments of life as well as eating—that after all, the rich and the poor are equally ill off. The one can seldom find a dinner for an appetite, and the other can still seldom find an appetite for a dinner.

Formerly in France a great foot was much esteemed, and the length of the shoe, in the fourteenth century, was a mark of distinction. The shoes of a prince were two feet and a half long.

KATE.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

I know her by her angry air,
Her bright black eye, her bright black hair,
Her rapid laughter, wild and shrill,
As laughter of the woodpecker

From the bosom of a hill,
"The Kate—she saith what she will:

For Kate hath an unbridled tongue,
Clear as the twanging of a harp.
Her heart is like a throbbing star,
Kate hath a spirit ever strong
Like a new bow, and bright and sharp
As edges of the ciner.

Whence shall she take a fitting mate?
For Kate no common love will feel;
My woman-soldier, gallant Kate,
As pure and true as blades of steel.

Kate saith, "the world is void of might,"
Kate saith, "the men are filled with fire;"
Kate will not hear of lovers' sighs,
What could he mean?"

I would I were an armed knight,
Far famed for my well-known emprise,
And wearing on my swarthy brows
The garland of new-wreathed boughs;
For in a moment I would pierce
The blackest files of clanging fight,
And strongly strike from left to right,
In dreaming of my lady's eyes.

On! Kate loves the fight of bold and fierce;
But none are bold enough for Kate,
She cannot find a fitting mate.

JOHN KEMBLE'S MARRIAGE.

In our last, we published a curious fact in relation to John Kemble's marriage. The fact, which we procure from the same source, is highly characteristic of that singular man.—One evening, Mrs. Brereton addressed Mrs. Hopkins:—"My dear mother," she said, "I cannot guess what Mr. Kemble means: he passed me just now: going up to his dressing-room, and chucking me under the chin, said, 'Ha, Pop! I should not wonder if you were soon to hear of something very much to your advantage.' What could he mean?" "Mean," the sensible mother answered, "why he means to propose marriage; and, if he does, I advise you not to refuse him; you will not meet with a better offer." Thus the matrimonial galley was launched; and the voyage proceeded rapidly, merrily, and to a joyous conclusion, although not unmarked with some peculiar circumstances. When the lady's consent was obtained, and the happy day fixed, Mr. Kemble was living purely en garçon, the elegancies of female life never thought of, in a lodging in Caroline-street, Bedford-square. His intimacy with Jack Bannister, and the true regard he felt for him, rendered it natural and easy to request Mr. Bannister's attendance at the ceremony. This was readily agreed to, and on the appointed morning, the eighth of December, Mrs. Hopkins and Mrs. Brereton, presenting themselves at Bannister's abode in Friar-street, all repaired to the bridegroom's dwelling. Whether he had been late over-night, or whether "dreaming of golden joys," he had been unwilling to shorten his morning slumber, certain it is that, when the ladies arrived, there was not the slightest sign of preparation for breakfast. A number—they could not be termed a set—of tea-things at length appeared, the meal was discussed, the parties reached the church in proper time, and the ceremony was completed by an intimate friend of Kemble, the well-known Parson Este. They were departing in separate coaches, the gentlemen in one, the ladies in another, when Mrs. Bannister said:—"As you do not seem to have made any preparations, suppose you dine with us; but, as both Mr. Kemble and Mr. Bannister play to-night, the dinner must be early and punctual." This good-natured and considerate offer was readily accepted; the ladies went to Friar-street, and, having waited to the utmost extremity of time, were obliged to dine without the newly-married man. Bannister and Mrs. Kemble had departed before his arrival; dinner was served up again, and at a proper hour Mrs. Bannister left him to his wine, expecting continually that he would appear at the tea-table; at last he did come, but not until it was full time that he should escort his wife home from the theatre. Thither he repaired in a hackney-coach; his wife popped in, and from that moment was installed mistress of a new abode.

EARLY HISTORY OF STEAM NAVIGATION.

In 1785, John Fitch, a watchmaker in Philadelphia, conceived the design of propelling a boat by steam. He was both poor and illiterate, and many difficulties occurred, to frustrate every attempt which he made, to try the practicability of his invention. He applied to Congress for assistance, but was refused; and then offered his invention to the Spanish government, to be used in the navigation of the Mississippi, but without any better success. At length a company was formed, and funds subscribed, for the building of a steamboat, and in the year 1788, his vessel was launched on the Delaware. Many crowded to see and ridicule the novel, and, as they supposed, the chimerical experiment. It seemed that the idea of wheels had not occurred to Mr. Fitch; but instead of them, oars were used, which worked in frames. He was confident of success; and when the boat was ready for the trial, she started off in good style to Burlington. Those who had sneered began to stare, and they who had smiled in derision looked grave. Away went the boat, and the happy inventor triumphed over the skepticism of an unbelieving public. The boat performed her trip to Burlington, a distance of twenty miles; but unfortunately burst her boiler in running to the wharf at that place, and the next day floated her back to the city. Fitch persevered, and with great difficulty procured another boiler. After some time the boat performed another trip to Burlington and Trenton, and returned in the same day. She was said to have moved at the rate of eight miles an hour; but she was not long in coming back, and the unhappy projector only conquered one difficulty to encounter another. Perhaps this was not owing to any defect in his plans, but to the low state of the arts at that time, and the difficulty of getting such complex machinery made with proper exactness. Fitch became embarrassed with debt, and was obliged to abandon the invention, after having satisfied himself of its practicability. The ingenious man, who was probably the first inventor of the steamboat, wrote three volumes, which he deposited in manuscript, sealed up, in the Philadelphia library, to be opened thirty years after his death. When, or why, he came to the west, we have not learned; but it is recorded of him, that he died and was buried near the Ohio. His three volumes were opened about five years ago, and were found to contain his speculations on mechanics. He details his embarrassments and disappointments with a feeling which shows how ardently he desired success, and which wins for him the sympathy of those who have heard enough to mourn over the blighted prospects of genius. He confidently predicts the future success of the plan, which, in his hands, failed only for the want of pecuniary means. He prophesies that, in less than a century, we shall see our western rivers swarming with steamboats; and expresses a wish to be buried on the shores of the Ohio, where the song of his boatmen may enliven the stillness of his resting-place, and the music of the steam-engine soothe his spirit. What an idea! Yet how natural to the mind of an ardent projector, whose whole life had been devoted to one darling object, which it was not his destiny to accomplish. And how touching is the sentiment found in one of his journals:—"The day will come when some more powerful man will put mine and riches from my invention; but nobody will believe that poor John Fitch can do anything worth of attention."

THE BRITISH QUEEN.

We copy the following notice of the youthful Queen of England, from a letter recently published in the Richmond Enquirer, and said to be from the pen of the American minister at that court:—"Of the Queen I suppose you will expect me to say something, and express my opinion. The press in both countries give the most flattering accounts of her beauty, wisdom, etc. Indeed, it is the fashion here to represent her, as I suppose they do all queens, as something short only of divinity. Now I will tell you very frankly what I think of her, and I have had a fair opportunity of judging. As to her person and face, they are pretty fairly represented in many of the numerous paintings and prints, some of which I suppose you have seen. Sully's I think as good and pleasing a likeness as any that has been taken. It has been sent to Philadelphia. None of them, however, do justice to the expression of the face. It is certainly not the sort I should call beautiful—but when lighted up by animated conversation, the face is full of expression and sweetness, and strongly indicative of character. Her manners are bland and unaffected; indeed, there is a simplicity and frankness and engaging affability about her quite remarkable for a queen. Another striking thing is, the total absence of all ambitious display or desire for admiration, which might be expected from such a person, and she a sovereign. No one can approach the present Queen without being struck with admiration and surprise, not only with her easy and charming deportment, and that peculiar softness of disposition and temper, for which she is so remarkable, but the entire self command and repose of manner, which might be expected to guard a sovereign of more advanced years and experience. She has, besides, all the characteristics of her nation and good temper of the English. In relation to the Queen's personal habits, I understand she rises between eight and nine o'clock, breakfasts at ten, devotes herself to business till two, then exercises, generally on horseback, and that at a rapid pace, going at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour. Of her horse-manship I had an opportunity of judging, having myself been present in one of her excursions of twenty miles in about two hours; and I can assure you, if she does not ride like Caesar, or hunt like Diana, she is yet one of the boldest and finest female riders I ever saw. Her attention to business is such, that I understand if a despatch comes while she is at dinner, she commonly rises and attends to it. She has a turn and capacity for business, and will, as she advances, doubtless take even a deeper interest in affairs of state than she does at present."

I HAD A HOME.

I had a home wherein the wearied feet
Found sweet repose;
And Hope led on laborious day, to meet
Delightful close:
A cottage with broad eaves, and a thick vine;
A crystal stream,
Whose mountain-language was the same as mine;
It was a dream!
I had a home to make the gloomiest heart
Alight with joy—
A temple of chaste love, a place apart
From Time's annoy:
A moonlight scene of life, where all things rude
And harsh did seem
With pity rounded, and by grace subdued—
It was a dream!

WHEN TO LEAVE OFF.

It is the standard of complaint against jokers, and whist-players, and children, whether playing or crying—that they "never know when to leave off." It is a common charge against English winters and German winters—that is occasionally hinted of rich and elderly relations—it is constantly said of snuff-takers, and gentlemen who enjoy a good glass of wine, that they "do not know when to leave off." It is the fault often found with certain preachers, sundry poets, and all prosers, school, Parliamentary orators, superannuated story-tellers, she-gossips, morning calls, and some leave-takers,—"that they do not know when to leave off." It is insinuated as to gowns and coats, of which waiting-maid and waiting-women have the reversion. It is the characteristic of a "Change-alley speculator; of a beaten boxer—of a builder's row, with his name attached to it—of works in numbers—of buyers and sellers on credit—of a romp, all Murphy's frosts, showers, storms, and hurricanes—and the Wandering Jew, in the same predicament.

THE ANTHEM AND INCENSE OF NIAGARA.

BY T. ORINFIELD.

AN ANTHEM, "like the sound of many waters!"
The Prophet heard it, as in wondrous visions
He lay entranced upon the cliffs of Parnassus;
And wouldst thou hear its emblem, go and listen
In deep and dread delirium—Niagara!
That everlasting anthem, which has peal'd,
Nor paused a moment, from the birth of ages!
And there an offering of eternal incense
From Nature's altar—in the vapoury column
Which the rainbow beams the smile of mercy.)
Has risen to heaven, well nigh six thousand years,—
In union with that astounding chorus
Of multitudinous and white-robed waters,
How glorious in the fury of their rapture!
And still the thunder of the ceaseless anthem,
And still the column of attendant incense,
Shall greet the far-off pilgrim's ear and eye;
Till the "great globe, with all that it inheres,"
Shall vanish with a crash—like Niagara's.

NOTES.

See a very eloquent description of the Falls, in C. J. La Trobe's "Rambler in America," 1833.

The name Niagara, is said to be composed of two Indian words, denoting "Thunder of Waters"—it is correctly pronounced with a long sound on the penultimate syllable, as in the line of Goldsmith's "Traveller."

"Where Niagara stuns with thundering sound."

Line 10.—"On which the rainbow beams the smile of mercy."

"From the abyss below the Great Fall, a host of pyramidal clouds rose majestically, one after another; and each, when it had ascended a little above the edge of the cataract, displayed a beautiful rainbow, which in a few moments was transferred into the bosom of the cloud, which immediately succeeded. The spray had extended itself through a wide space directly over me; and, receiving the full influence of the sun, exhibited a magnificent rainbow, which continued to overarch and irradiate the spot where I stood in enthusiastic contemplation of the indescribable scene."—Hawes's Canada, 1831.

Professor Dwight states that "the red, orange, and yellow colours, were the brightest he had ever seen in a rainbow: the others more faint."

Line 18.—"Shall vanish with a crash—like Niagara's."

It is remarkable that the word rendered "with a great noise," II. Peter, ch. iii. 10. (βοῆς) alludes to the rushing of waters; being derived from βῆω, fluo.

THOUGHTS ON MATRIMONY.

Great disparity in matrimony is an evil in many particulars; and what is more unnatural than to see a young man wedded to a man old enough to be her father? He ought to have sense enough to know, that unless she is an eccentric character, she never married him for love; and she ought also to know, that in consenting to marry him, she in all probability consented to make herself a wretched slave—to put herself in the power of a man who had already expended his first and warmest love upon others; and who, by his superior age, his matured habits of pleasing himself and of having his own way, and the self-importance which property gives, was well qualified to act the part of the tyrant, rather than that of the husband. If a young man has property, he may of course marry at a suitable age, and adopt the style of living which is justified by his means. But if he is destitute of property, he has three alternatives, and he can take his choice between them. Selecting a prudent and industrious person for his wife, he may marry young and live in the style of simplicity adapted to his income; or he can wait till he has acquired a property, so as to be able to support a family in the more modern and fashionable style; or he can marry at any rate, launch fearlessly out into all the expenses of a fashionable establishment, and run his chance of bringing his wife and children to want. The first is the best, the second is next, the third is too bad to be thought on.—Wm. Law.

OPPOSITE CHARACTERS.

Mole-catchers are a singular class of men—what one would call characters—with a considerable share of low wit, and a sly, cunning look, slow and deliberate in all their movements and parts of speech. They are silent and stealthy in their walk, as if the very success of their operations depended on their not giving the alarm to the little animals they wanted to entrap. I also observe that they are much bent, from the constant habit they have of stooping to look for the runs of the mole. They are, however, possessed of much acuteness, and by means of a small ear, are generally tolerably communicative. The rat-catcher is a very different kind of person. There is frequently an impudent, saucy look about him, which seems to partake of the character of the animal he destroys. His very dogs are afraid of him, and they appear sulky and half-starved. His conversation is generally in praise of his dogs and ferrets, and the number of rats he has destroyed with them. He is a great frequenter of the alehouse, and conveys all the scandal from one village to another in the progress of his calling. My friends, the mole-catchers, on the contrary, are a sober and quiet race of men, fond of accumulating money, and are seldom to be met with in an alehouse. Their cottages are generally neat and clean, and the implements of their calling tidily bestowed in them—such as two or three spades, a bundle of rough hazels, and some wooden traps—and in an evening may frequently be seen twisting their horse-hair nooses, or cutting a hazel stick to its proper length.

When a man misuses any thing, his first idea is that somebody has stolen it; though he ascertains ninety-nine times in a hundred, that the loss is from his own carelessness.

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

THE FAMILY OF THE GREAT SULLY.

If our readers want any further proof of the neglect into which great names soon fall, and the speed with which riches and renown melt away into nothing, they will find it in the proceedings of the French Academy, at the last distribution of the priz Monthyon. This, it may not be amiss to remind them, is an annual prize, founded by M. Monthyon, awarded, under the direction of the academy, to such as have distinguished themselves by acts of courage, or disinterestedness; by the practice, in a word, of either the active or passive virtues. The highest of these prizes was awarded at this last anniversary, to Martin, a poor workman, and an old servant of the Sully family, who had saved the last of that noble race from suffering, perhaps from perishing, with actual want.

Maximilien de Béthune, Duke of Sully, was descended from one of the oldest families in France,

— "Béthune's line of Picardie," a family indeed of such pretensions, that when a Mademoiselle de Béthune, not long since danced with the Duke of Orleans, (the heir to the French crown,) the whole Faubourg St. Germain was in an uproar at her want of self-respect, and the legitimist papers were at some pains to explain away the circumstance of her having forgotten herself so far as to dance with "an Orleans." Yet, the descendants of this proud stock, the children of Sully, have been forced to owe their support to the benevolence of a grateful menial! But to our story.

We translate from the address of M^{de}. de Salvandy, then Minister of the Department of Public Instruction, (who lately went out with Count Molé,) who awarded the prizes. The presence of the faithful Martin, and also of a lineal descendant of Sully, one of the objects of his gratitude, added to the interest of M^{de}. de Salvandy's address. We fancy it will be some time before we shall see one of our cabinet ministers a member of an Academy of Literature like the French, and awarding prizes for virtuous conduct. "They manage these things better in France." But let us hear M^{de}. de Salvandy. After mentioning several instances of courage and self-devotion, which had been deemed worthy of reward by the Academy, he proceeds:

"The last picture to which I shall call your attention, gentlemen, shows that an illustrious example is the only inheritance that parents can ever rely upon transmitting to their offspring.

"The great Sully left at his death a fortune equal to his public services and to his fame. The line of male descendants from him became extinct, about the middle of the last century. The daughter of the last Duke of Sully, Maximilienne de Béthune, married the Marquis de l'Aubespierre, and brought him an immense dowry. But the affairs of the Aubespierre family soon fell into confusion; nothing whatever of the large patrimony of Sully is left, and it is now my duty to inform you of the miracle of self-devotion, but for which his descendants would have been without food or shelter.

"At Champrond-en-Gâtine, in the arrondissement of Nogent-le-Rotrou, all of which once belonged to the Duke of Sully, there lives a joiner, named Alexander Martin, whose family was in the service of the l'Aubespierre, during their prosperity. He himself owed his education and his establishment in business to the liberality of the Marquis de l'Aubespierre, formerly colonel of the regiment de la Reine, who took him into his service during the disasters of the revolution. Nor was he insensible to his master's kindness. For thirty-five years he never quitted him. He had the grief to see the wealth acquired by the great Sully, gradually melt away. Little by little, everything was mortgaged and sold. The severest blow to him was a few years since, when he saw the chateau of Villebon, hallowed in the feelings of the public by the memory of its great occupant, pass into the hands of a stranger. The Marquis de l'Aubespierre, saved from the wreck of his estate only three annuities; one of six thousand francs for his son, one of twenty-four hundred for himself, and one of four hundred for Martin. Soon after he died Martin went home to his family, counting on the enjoyment, for the rest of his days, of his well-earned pension; but in vain. It was attacked by the Marquis's creditors, and being now destitute of all means of support, he was forced to resume the trade he had learned in early life, which he did, without a murmur. So he lived, when on the sixteenth of June, 1830, his door opened, and his old master's son, Count de l'Aubespierre entered, with his three children, Angélique, a girl of five, Joséphine, four years old, and Louis, who had not yet seen eighteen months. The father of these infants was forced to leave his native country, and for ever. But he talked to Martin, as though his absence was to be but temporary, and bade him farewell, leaving in charge of a joiner of Champrond all in whose veins flowed any of the blood of the great Sully.

"Martin had himself three children. Fortunately his eldest daughter had just finished her apprenticeship, and was able to work for herself. Her mother and she earned together twenty-four sous a day; Martin himself earns thirty. It was on such an income as this, that they undertook the care of the new family, superadded to their own by a mysterious Providence. When work could not be had, they borrowed; when they could not borrow, they sold their furniture. They regarded no privations for themselves, so long as their master's children felt none. They lived on black bread, but the children of Aubespierre never wanted for white. Nor are you to suppose that Martin and his family sat down at the same table with them: the old servant paid his master's blood the same respect as in the days of their prosperity. He waited on them at meals in his own little hovel, as he would have done in their castle of Villebon; never imagining that he was their equal, because they had been unfortunate; and still less, that his virtues made him their superior.

"Meantime, Martin's devotion became known in the neighbourhood. The Chartrain country, which was once full of the power, and is still full of the memory of Sully, began to move. The venerable ladies of the convent of St. Paul, at Chartres, claim the privilege of providing for the granddaughters of the Marquis de l'Aubespierre. They were rapidly growing up. The curate of Champrond had bestowed on them the rudiments of education, but more was required. Martin yielded with regret to a separation, which he felt to be necessary, and gave up his young charge to those pious hands, who will finish the work so well begun by him. The education of Louis, though he was still young, demanded attention. The convent of Nogent-le-Rotrou, which was founded by Sully, and which contains his ashes, sent some aid for this purpose. So that of all the wealth of the minister and friend of Henry IV., the portion he bestowed on the poor is the only one of which any pittance will reach his posterity! But these resources were inadequate. Some generous spirits opened subscriptions to supply their deficiency, and a benevolent prelate offered a home in his palace. But it was necessary for government, with its ample means, to interpose. And, gentlemen, the king has bestowed on him a bourse in the college of Henry IV. He has done it, too, for the sake of the memory of a minister who served France faithfully, and left behind him a pure and venerable name; he has done it, too, for the sake of the virtuous servant, who deserves to have the consolation of seeing his pupil placed in a situation to ascend, if he will, to the station from which he has fallen.

"Martin, your task is ended. You have deserved the regard of all the virtuous and the good. You have afforded this age the spectacle of virtues that have been but too rare in all ages—gratitude, fidelity, and respect. The academy awards you a prize of three thousand francs.

"And you, Louis de l'Aubespierre, as you are present at this solemnity, may it make a deep and durable impression on your young heart! You make your first entrance into life in the manner in which many are condemned to pass it in maturer age, in full view of the public, with the eyes of all upon you. Know, that the greatest of this world's goods, is the esteem of one's country, and pray to God, who has watched over your infancy, that he will enable you to obtain that wealth which depends on ourselves alone, and of which no ill-fortune can deprive us. You will learn, one day, that all the streams that flow in your veins, are of pure and illustrious blood; but never forget, that you must go back to Sully, to find, in all your race, a single name that is not eclipsed by that of Alexander Martin; and grow to manhood to show yourself worthy of the memory of your ancestor, of the devotion of your benefactor, and of the adoption of your king."

FROM CORRESPONDENTS AT HOME.

LETTER FROM JOHN SMITH.

Smithville, Down East, in the State of Maine, April 20, 1839.

DEAR GENERAL MORRIS—You can't think what rejoicings there is in Smithville. The war in our disputed territory is all over; and Sargent Johnson and his company and my son John has got back, and nobody killed, and only one wounded, and that's poor Billy Wiggins, that had his leg broke by the moose that my son John told about in his last letter. The company is all as hearty as bucks, and look as well as they did when they went away, as they've got their clothes wore out pretty bad. They got along here yesterday noon. We was setting to the table and just a finishing our dinner, and my wife was just a saying, "Oh, dear, I wish I knew what was become of poor Johnny; we hain't heard from him for nigh about a fortnight, and I am afraid something has happened to him;" and she hadn't more than got the words out of her mouth when all to once we heard a terrible cracking and a roaring, like a platoon firing at a muster. We all jumped up and run to the door, and looked out one way and 'tother, and as soon as we looked away up to the top of the hill, we see Sargent Johnson's company just beginning to march down; and the smoke of their guns was rolling away over their heads, where they had just fired a salute to let the folks in the village know they was coming. As soon as we got out to the door my son John see us, and he sprung out a little one side of the company and jumped up on a great rock, and took off his hat and swung it round and hoors'd 'like a house afire. At that my three boys next to John, they turned to, and they hoors'd 'as loud as they could bawl; and then they set out and run up the hill like young colts, and when they met the company they run up to John and tried to shake hands, but John never turned his head to the right, nor to the left, but marched straight ahead like a soldier. Sargent Johnson had give 'em their orders before, not to stop for nobody nor nothin', but march straight forward with heads up, right through the village, clear to the tavern, and there he would dismiss 'em.

When they got along down against our house, my wife was all of a dither, she wanted to get hold of John so. She set out to run right to him, and called out to him, "John, oh, John, aint you going to stop?"

But Sargent Johnson shook his head at her, and called out to his company, "heads up, keep time!" and they marched right by us straight as loons. Old grandfather by this time had hobbled out to the door, and stood leaning over his staff, and when he see them match by so straight without stopping or looking one way or 'tother, says he—

"Ah, that looks military. How that company has improved in discipline since they've been gone! Why, they march as well as British regulars, and seems to me John holds his head up and steps the best of any of 'em."

We stood and watch'd 'em till they got clear up to the tavern, and then they wasn't so far off but what we could hear Sargent Johnson give off the word of command.

"Halt; front face. Make ready; take aim; fire." When they'd let go their broadside, Sargent Johnson made a speech to 'em, and thanked 'em for their bravery and good conduct while they'd been gone, and told 'em if ever their country was in danger again, he hoped they'd always be ready to go at a moment's warning and fight to the last drop of their blood, if it was necessary, to keep off thieves and trespassers, and all such like. And says he—

"Now, my brave feller soldiers, I bid you farewell, and take leave of you, as General Washington took leave of his feller soldiers when he got through the revolutionary war. I've read it in his life, and I feel as if I wanted to cry every time I read it. Now I'll stand here, and I want you all to come round one arter another and shake hands with me, and that'll wind the business up."

And they all marched round one arter another and shook hands with Sargent Johnson, and then he told 'em they was dismissed, and would carry the thanks of their country with 'em the longest day they lived. As soon as they was dismissed, John turned and run right down towards our house full chisel. We was all out doors waiting for him, and such a time as there was when he got there, I guess you never see. Such a flocking round him and shaking hands, and such a hugging among the children, it beat all nater. My wife, she couldn't help kissing him, for all he's such a great boy, most seventeen years old. When the first hug among 'em was over, we all went into the house, and old grandfather he hobbled along and went into our house tu, for all he's so lame he hadn't been in before for nigh upon six months. My wife she flew round John like a hen that's found a lost chicken. She got hold of his arm and looked in his face, and says she—

"Now, Johnny, haint you been shot no where? Seems to me you look kind of pale and thin; I'm afraid you aint well."

John said he never felt better in his life, and as for being shot, he hadn't come any where's nigh it but once, and that was when they took the logging camp.

"Well, John," said old grandfather, "did you mind, my boy, what I told you, not to be in too much of a hurry to fire? Did you keep your fire back till you got up so near the enemy you could see the whites of their eyes?"

"Why, as to that," said John, "we kept our fire back till we got as far as we could go, for we got clear to the outer line of our disputed territory, and stood on it, and hollered, but there was no enemy there. We couldn't see the whites of their eyes nor nothin' else of 'em. So we let drive over into their own territory, hit or miss; and then turned about and went back to the fort."

"Well, that was well done," said grandfather; "it showed your spunk, any how; and proved that you wasn't afraid of the enemy, let him be where he would."

"Well, now John," says I, "my son, I want to ask you one question, if there's room enough for me to get in a word edgewise. And that is, how is it you got through this war so soon down there to our disputed territory, and got along with it without any more fighting? Somehow or other, it seems to me it's cooled off dreadfully quick; I don't exactly understand it."

"Nor I neither," said John; "I don't exactly understand it myself. Some say it's all owing to General Scott. They say he's been down to Augusta and talked to Governor Fairfield till he got him high about as cool as a cucumber. And then he writ some letters to Governor Harvey of New Brunswick, and coaxed him to let the matter drop, till the United States should have a chance to talk along with old England about it a little, and see if they couldn't settle the hash. But some say they don't think Governor Harvey would a minded what General Scott said, if he hadn't heard about Sargent Johnson's company being down there so near the line, and cutting up such shines among the loggers. And he might have heard our guns, too, when we fired over the line, and thought it was best for him to keep out of the way and be quiet. At any rate, I guess, between General Scott and our company, that war is put a stop to for one while. They say General Scott is a master feller to talk to folks and keep 'em from fighting; but if they will fight, they must look out, for he'll put it into 'em just like old General Jackson."

While we was talking Squire Bean come in, and said the folks over to the tavern thought it was best to get up a public dinner for Sargent Johnson and his company, and wanted to know if I wouldn't jine 'em. I told him I was perfectly willing to, for I believed the boys deserved a good dinner as much as any set of fellers ever did. So we went back to the tavern, and they concluded to go right to work and get the dinner ready for to-day.

Says I, "John, what a pity 'tis General Scott didn't come round this way from Augusta, so as to eat this public dinner with us."

"They say he never does such things as that," said John; "he never stops any where to eat public dinners, and never goes round to do anything; but let his business be what 'twill and where 'twill, he always goes straight to it and does it."

"Well," says I, "I think that's about as good a way as any, arter all."

There was considerable of a bustle over to the tavern last night and this morning, cooking and getting the dinner ready; and we let two of our gals go over and help 'em. John offered to go over and grateful to your majesty. He is my pupil, Joseph Wach, and he would fain marry his pupil, the fair Ellen, daughter to old John Farren; the old man gives consent, but his dame is opposed, because Joseph has no place as yet. And your majesty knows full well, that it is hard to carry a cause against the women."

"You are mistaken, Master Handel," said the king, with a forced smile; "I know nothing to that effect; but Joseph has from this day a place in our chapel as first tenor."

"Indeed!" cried Handel, rubbing his hands with joy, "I thank your majesty from the bottom of my heart!"

King George was silent a few moments, expecting the master to ask some other favour. "But, Master Handel," he said at length, "have you nothing to ask for yourself? I would willingly show my gratitude to you, in your own person, for the fair entertainment you provided us all in your Messiah!"

The flush of anger suddenly vanished on Handel's cheek, and he answered in a disappointed tone—"Sire, I have endeavored not to entertain you—but to make you better."

The whole court was astonished; King George stepped back a pace or two, and looked on the bold master with surprise. Then bursting into a hearty fit of laughter, and walking up to him—"Handel!" he cried—"you are, and ever will be, a rough old fellow, but"—and he slapped him good-naturedly on the shoulder—"a good fellow withal; go—do what you will, we remain ever the best friends in the world."

He signed in token of dismissal; Handel retired respectfully, and thanked his majesty. He turned his back on Carlton-house, to hasten to his favorite haunt, the tavern.

We shall not attempt to describe the joy his news brought to the lovers, Joseph and Ellen, nor their unnumbered caresses and protestations of gratitude. John Farren took his "good wife" in his arms and hugged her, "spite of her resistance, and scolding, crying—"D—me, Bet! we must be friends to-day, though all the bells in old England ring a peal for it."

For ten years more Handel travelled throughout England, and composed new and admirable works. When his sight failed him in the last year of his life, it was Ellen who nursed him as if she had been his child, while her husband Joseph wrote down his last compositions, as he dictated them.

Proud and magnificent is the marble monument erected in Westminster to the memory of Handel. Time may destroy it; but the monument—he himself—in his high and holy inspiration, has left us—his Messiah, will last for ever.

FLORIDA SCENERY.

The scenery of Florida is not all uninteresting. He who has seen from some quiet nook a graceful bend of the river bordered with orange bowers and groves of the holly and magnolia and oak, and (truly tropical and stately) the cabbage palmetto and coconut, will find in his memory recollections wherewith to frame a dream of the loveliness of Mahomet's paradise. There are "sinks," too, in Florida—places where rivers suddenly sink or vanish in the sand, or where they rush with adduced plunge into dark caverns, mingling there with subterranean torrents, and gliding away through thickest gloom with many murmurings and discordant sounds. At some future time, the poet, looking into these dark and misty caverns, may imagine, while he feels the inspiration of horror, that these melancholy and subterranean sounds are the moans of the water-geni, lamenting that the river amid whose spray they spread their wings, has left the cypress shade and open sunshine to wander on through the chillness and mist and unrelenting glooms of caverns.

Some of these Stygian waters rise and sink with the tide, thereby indicating their connexion with the sea. Lakes, once wide and beautiful, have sunk in a single night, leaving their beds covered with the fish. During the present winter a lake sank thus, leaving millions of fish dancing upon the land. Cart loads of these were carried off and cured by the neighboring "crackers" (squatters and herdsmen). The remainder, putrifying, tainted the whole atmosphere for miles around, reminding the traveller of the plagues of Egypt.

I was speaking of trees. Unanimously we voted the magnolia to be the most beautiful. The exquisite fragrance of its blossoms, and the "imperial pride" and beauty of its foliage, have made it a great favourite. The live oak attains, however, to great size. We passed some groves certainly magnificent. When growing in the low grounds, they are hung with dismal festoons of moss. A contractor, furnishing timber for naval purposes, informed me of an enormous tree growing on the banks of a river. He measured it, and found it thirty feet to the first bough and thirty-six in circumference at base! He compared its trunk to the stout tower at New-York. I regarded his assertions as exaggeration and extravagance of language, but was assayed by the planter over whose grounds its mighty shadow moved, that the statement was correct. The girth of the forest was beginning to feel the iron rods of steel. It was not cut, as it was found hollow in the middle. These trees are almost invariably hung with the festoonery of the grape. The vines of the grape in Florida are sometimes of great size, bearing abundantly. From the fruit good wine has been made. The acorn or Indian bread is a vine which clammers up the forest trees. Its thorns are very sharp and malignant. From the root the Indian prepares a species of flour in taste not unlike the flour made from potatoes. The palmetto is a shrub which gives character to the scenery. Its leaf is fan-shaped and beautifully green.

The pine of Florida is the long-leaved kind. It grows sometimes to a great height, towering above all in lonely forestness and strength. When the wind rises, the roar of the pine forest is incredibly grand. In Alachua county, the soil is generally rich; there the pine is oft enormous in stature, and its roots strike deep into the fertile earth, so that the ploughman may drive his plough close to the very trunk.

The cabbage palm resembles the palmetto in its leaf, but it is a tree, and grows sometimes to the height of fifty feet. The trunk is pointed with a thousand shafts of bark, shooting out like bayonets. It resembles the cocconut.

The orange is of three kinds—the sweet, the bitter-sweet, and the sour. The latter are not unlike the lemon as to flavour. The West Indies. The delicious fruit brought to the north from the pleasant. Figs, white and purple, are found in the hammocks of Middle Florida, and are as agreeable as the cultivated fruit—Peaches are also found wild, strange as it may seem. Perhaps the botanist may say that they must have been introduced by the natives—by the men who wandered through the wilds of the territory, before the savage had passed the frozen ocean in his descent to the temperate and tropical climes of America.

A RECIPE FOR MAKING TIME STAND STILL.

BY W. P. PRARD.

Dear Tom! if you would learn the way
To quaff life's true elixir,
To keep your curls from growing gray,
And, as you fly, to fix her:
Though scholar and school-boy,
Skilled but in old romances,
I've yet a few old-fashioned rules
To check grim Time's advances:
And this the first—if day and night
You'd shun the dotard's hold,
"Keep all about your Conscience right,"
And then—you'll not grow old!

And never mind, what'er they tell,
Dear Tom, of modern uses,
Be sure you'll do just twice as well
To stick to old abuses;
So pay your taxes—love your king,
How'er our sages bore you,
Take opening med'cines in the spring,
As your fathers did before you;
Don't lend your razor—nor your hack,
And when you give your gold,
Be sure you don't expect it back,
And then you'll not grow old!

And stern how'er you play your part
In life's more sober stages,
Keep one small corner in your heart
For boyhood's sunny days;
Don't cut a friend because he's poor,
But pause before you choose him;
And when a man has shut the door,
Don't let his friends come in;
Sell off your claret—if you must—
But keep yourself unsold,
Then live upon a laugh, or crust,
And still—you'll not grow old!

And when to dissipate your gloom,
You wander down some vale,
And sit within the long brick room
Re-formed since old Saint Stephen,
If you should hear a sacred name
First taught by holy men here,
And your father's ancient faith and fame
Denounced as "cant" before you;
Don't fancy that we're turned to Turks,
But just go home—unfild,
Some page of Pitt's, or Fox, or Burke's,
And then—you'll grow not old!

And welcome, Tom, on health or ill,
Each bright green spot may greet you;
Call Hope delusion, if you will,
But let her—let her cheat you!
Don't rob Life's roses of their bloom,
Though Benhamites deride you—
Don't sit within a childless gloom,
Though Martineau may chide you;
But trust, when bright things round you die,
Something our mothers told
Of happy old homes beyond the sky;
And then—you'll not grow old!

MAGAZINE DAY.

The most remarkable feature in modern book-selling is the trade in periodical literature. "Magazine Day" is a sort of a monthly era in the history of a London bookseller. The orders of the forthcoming numbers of the various periodicals which he is in the habit of receiving for some days previously, kept constantly in his mind's eye; and when it does arrive, the great contest among the trade is, who shall be able to supply their customers earliest. Magazine Day can only be said fairly to commence about half-past nine o'clock, and before twelve you will see the various periodicals in the windows of every retail bookseller throughout the length and breadth of the metropolis. Perhaps in no other instance, that of newspapers alone excepted, is an article so rapidly circulated over the country, as the periodicals on that day. The point from which the magazines and other periodicals all start, when their distribution is about to take place, is, as in the case of larger works, Paternoster Row; which, with that fondness for brevity of expression, so characteristic of the people of London, is invariably called "The Row." The actual publishers of periodicals have, properly speaking, nothing to do with the sale of their respective works on Magazine Day, and they seldom have even any idea of the actual number sold of their own publications on that day.

The quantity of business which some of the larger houses go through on Magazine Day is immense. I know one house which draws, on an average, from twelve hundred pounds to fifteen hundred pounds. Only fancy the number of periodicals, varying from twopenny to three shillings and sixpence, which must be turned over from the shelves of this establishment to the hands of the purchasers, before such a sum of money could be taken! * * The constant bustle kept up from morning till night, in these wholesale concerns, exceeds any thing of which a person who has not witnessed it could form any conception. The premises are full of young men and boys, all struggling for priority of "app'ly." I have often seen as many as fifty or sixty wedged into a shop of ordinary size.

To a person unacquainted with such matters, who chanced to spend a few minutes in a large house in the Row on Magazine Day, a that he heard would be quite unobtainable. The individuals ordering periodicals scarcely ever call the periodicals they wish to procure by their proper names. The love of brevity, to which I have already referred, is observable in every word they utter. The "Gentleman's Magazine," never gets any other name than the "Gents." "Tait's Magazine" is simply "Tait's." The "New Monthly Magazine" is the "New Month." The "Metropolitan Magazine" is abbreviated to the first three letters, with the addition of "Mag." The "Encyclopedia Britannica" is the "Ency. Brit." The "Court Magazine" is the "Courts." The "Ladies' Magazine and Museum" is reduced to the dissyllable of "Ladies;" so that it is "six Talis," and "the Blackwell's." "Two Gents."

Since the late establishment of steam communication between London and almost every port of any importance in the kingdom, the periodicals which first see the light in the Row on Magazine Day, are in the hands of the remotest readers in less than a week.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

VITALITY OF SEEDS.—Jesse, in his excellent and amusing work, the "Gleanings of Natural History," gives a singular instance of the vitality of seeds after lying dormant in the ground for many years. "In still further confirmation of this fact," he observes, "it had long been remarked, that in some meadows at Kingston-upon-Thames, contiguous to the Middle-mill in that town, there had constantly appeared in these grounds, for the last thirty years, a vast quantity of young and very small tendril shoots, having all the appearance and characteristics of the vine in miniature. This fact excited the attention of Dr. W. R., who at first was greatly disposed to attribute their existence to the probability of the fields having been in former ages the site of vineyards; this opinion was still strengthened by a friend taking up one of the tendrils and carefully planting it in a good soil against a wall of general aspect, and rearing a flourishing vine bearing the true claret grape, with its deep red juice, so little cultivated or adapted to the present state of our climate. On proceeding, however, this interesting inquiry, it was ultimately discovered that the owner of these lands laid, for a number of years, been in the constant habit of making raisin vines, and that, after the usual fermenting process of the fruit had been brought to a termination, husks, seeds, and stalks were thrown altogether upon the dung-hill at length found its way as a consequence of manure to the fields in question, thus depositing the germ of these foreign vines, whose vital principle had not been destroyed by the several stages they had undergone, not even by that last and most fearful action—the process of fermentation."

DIFFERENCE IN BOYS.—Some years ago, as a Sussex coach was passing by an avenue leading to the residence of a Mr. Bill, the coachman pulled up on seeing a boy walking leisurely along, and handed a small parcel to him, telling him to take it directly to Mr. B. Upon the boy looking rather vacant and doubtful, he was told to look sharp, and not stand gaping there, but deliver it instantly; upon which the boy began to cry. Upon a passenger remarking this to the coachman, "Ah!" says he, "the boys always cry hereabouts if you speak sharp to 'em; but about Lincoln they are saucy enough. I recollect last summer taking a walk in that neighbourhood with the driver of the —; we happened to lose our way; on seeing a boy sitting on a gate as we turned down a lane, my companion said, 'I saw, Jack, can you tell us which is the nearest way to Lincoln?' 'How did I know my name was Jack?'—'Oh! we only guessed so.' 'Then these may guess the way to Lincoln, for I'll be damned if I tell thee.' A lady travelling on horseback in Hertfordshire, were told that the boys in that country were very rude and impudent; upon coming to a five-barred gate, she requested a boy who was lying against it to open it for her, which, to her great surprise, he did. She then gave him a shilling, saying, that she was sure he was not a Hertfordshire lad, as he was so civil! 'That's a lair,' quickly replied the boy, 'I've been'.

SUBSTITUTE FOR THE SUN.—The most extraordinary discovery of the day is that by which a French philosopher proposes to dispense with the services of the sun, by means of an artificial contrivance answering similar purposes. The newly-invented light of M. Gaudin, on which experiments were recently made at Paris, is an improved modification of the well-known invention of Liebig's Drummond. While Drummond pours a stream of oxygen gas through spirals of wire, upon unslacked lime, Gaudin makes use of a more ethereal kind of oxygen, which he conducts through burning masses of turpentine. The Drummond light is fifteen hundred times stronger than that of burning gas; the Gaudin light, we are assured by the inventor, as strong as that of the sun, or thirty thousand times stronger than gas, and of course ten times more so than that of the Drummond. The method by which M. Gaudin proposes to turn the invention to use is singularly striking. He proposes to erect in the island of the Point Neuf, in the middle of the Seine and centre of Paris, a lighthouse, five hundred feet high, in which is to be placed a column of a hundred thousand to a million gas pipes—the power to be varied as the night is light or dark. Paris will thus enjoy a sort of perpetual day; and as soon as the sun of the heavens has set, the sun of the Point Neuf will rise.

INCLUSION AND MATHEWS.—On one occasion Inclusion and Mathews were travelling on a very fine summer's day, on the outside of a stage-coach sob after the death of Inclusion's friend, to whom he had been greatly attached. A very comely-looking man sat near him, about whom Inclusion's humane heart made him feel an interest, and as frequently spoke to him, inquired into his history, and found that the poor man was going home to his friends to be nursed. Inclusion, when the coach stopped, addressed the poor invalid for the last time, as follows:—"My good man, we're going to leave you. It's my opinion, my poor fellow, that you're bespoken; you're now, I take it, as good as ready money to the undertaker. In fact, you're booked—so there's a seven-shilling piece for you, my good man; and if you see my dear, sainted Jane, pray tell her you saw me, and that I'm well." The poor creature stared, and took the money with a humble bow, but made no reply to this extraordinary address, which he doubtless supposed to come from a lunatic.

INFLUENCE OF THE WEATHER ON TEMPER.—I do not say that the state of the weather will always point out the condition of a man's temper, because there may be counteractions in the state of his health affairs; but I say, that whatever may be his peculiar situation in these respects, he will be more or less affected by the secret influence of the condition of the atmosphere and the direction of the wind. Consequently, if we know what it will be the probable effect of the weather upon certain temperaments, we must feel a proper time as well as to other peculiar circumstances in selecting a proper time to make our advances.

RIGHTS OF SEVEN-SHILLINGS.—The Court Royale of Paris has decided on an appeal in a case of the scene painter and decorator of the French Opera, prosecuting the directors for refusing them their right of admission behind the scenes during the representations, that, since the scenes and decorations form a principal part of spectacle at the opera, these artists are to be placed on the same footing as authors, and to enjoy the right of admission which had been contested.

THE DEET HAVE BEEN SEEN.—"Be collected," as the printer said to a huge batch of old newspapers, bills vat wasn't paid, lying scattered over the bottom of his desk.

MATRIMONY.—Matrimony is a state which admits of no compromise between authority and obedience. Pompey and Cæsar could not rule under the same meridian, nor can man and wife.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"ADVICE TO A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, ON ENTERING SOCIETY." By the author of the "Laws of Etiquette." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard, 12 mo. pp. 295.

THE author of this little volume evidently belongs to the school of Roccocoism and Chesterfield. His advice is admirably calculated to teach "the manners of a monkey and the morals of a rascal." The young man who should gather his rules of conduct from these fatherly monitions would be a mingled compound of the jesuit, the coward, and the scamp. Jeremy Diddler must have had the advantage of precisely such instruction; and Joseph Surface undoubtedly derived his delightful code of morality from the same source. We would as soon think of confining a boy's studies to a perusal of "the complete house-breaker," as of commending the detestable principles of this book to his adoption. In the estimation of our author, language is given to us for the purpose of concealing our thoughts, while manners and accomplishments are to be formed and employed for the great object of duping our fellow-men. Society should be cultivated not for the purpose of improvement and relaxation, but merely as the means of worldly advancement, and as a school of hypocrisy. Such advice may accord very well with the tastes and pursuits of a class, with whom pleasure is a vocation, and sensual enjoyment a study, and conjugal fidelity a mockery, but it will never do for the young men of a republic like ours. We want no whited sepulchres, no smooth-tongued courtiers, with the smile upon the lip and the black treachery in the heart. Long may we be removed from that point of "civilization," where such a class, and the prevalence of such principles, are a necessary consequence! Error may we continue

"A free—a gentle—a simple—honest people!"

That the reader may satisfy himself that we have not misrepresented the character of this "Advice to a Young Gentleman," we select a few passages, at random. The whole tone and tenor are such as to make us strongly suspicious that the book is the production of the senility of a retired pickpocket. We think we can prove this from internal evidence. We have taken the liberty of appending captions to the following quotations:

HOW TO GLOZE AND WHEREABOUTS.—"It is often necessary in conversation to give men credit for morals and principles which they do not possess, and drawing a maxim from the chancery, 'consider that as done, which ought to be done.' Thus in talking to an undutiful son or false wife, we must assume that all is right; in truth, in most cases, such persons are right in sentiment and theory, and wrong by fact, not feeling. The general staple of our conversation, upon all occasions and subjects, should have the same liberality, by giving life credit for excellences which it has not got. It is necessary to cast a little on the side of optimism both in matters of virtue and happiness, and not look at humanity and the world 'in their nakedness.'"

HOW TO PUSH AND WRIGGLE.—"Recollect how Lord Chesterfield exhorts his son to 'push' and 'wriggle' himself into the best company; and learn never to be turned by the sneer of a dunce from a course which is recommended by benefit or inclination, and is not stayed by honour."

HOW TO GET AT THE SILVER SPOONS.—"You must make yourself intimate with people of fashion, and endeavour to gain their affection and confidence, that you may penetrate all their system and compass all their arts. Try to get familiar in the best houses, so as to be considered as one of the family, and invited to assist at domestic celebrations. Try to see frequently their common day-light life, apart from the gas-light glare of state and ceremony."

HOW TO BACKBITE AND CROCKLE.—"Wherever there exists a jealousy of another, nothing gives a sorer satisfaction than to have the merit of that other detracted from; and where the relation of feeling between two parties is that of mere affection, or of pure and lofty admiration, all observations of an accordant character, which, therefore, tend to strengthen the person's sense of the justness of his own sentiment, give a sincere and cordial pleasure. In either instance, it is plain that the person whose conversation gives this gratification is in a way not merely to advance himself in the liking of him to whom he is thus the occasion of a delight, but also to give an influence and leave an impression which may be of signal service."

HOW TO TRY INTO SECRETS.—"There are two ways of finding out secrets which you wish to discover; one by professing yourself wholly ignorant, and curious about the subject; the other by appearing wholly informed. In the former case, vanity will induce a disclosure; in the latter, the conversation that ensues will develop what is hidden. These different methods belong to different occasions and different persons. The latter is more delicate and more certain, but demands more tact."

HOW TO SMILE AND BE A VILGAIN.—"When a man has treated you ill, and you cannot crush him, or, having the means of doing so, find it, on other grounds, more expedient to make a friend of him, treat him with cordial courtesy, which will pass for magnanimity."

HOW TO PICK A LOCK.—"To the courier, manners are a key to unlock the privy closets of the great; to the soldier they are better than the baptism of Thetis; to the man of business, they are a universal letter of recommendation; to the mind, they are as good as an Indian dowry."

HOW TO JUGGLE AND IMPOSE.—"A man of the world should have it in his power to assume almost any manner, if the person or situation shall render it advantageous. Thus, in an interview with a common person, whom you wish to embarrass and put out of countenance, a ceremonious manner, watchful and scrupulous in the etiquette of politeness, may be of great service. Again, the affecting of an open, blunt, free and easy manner, is good to throw persons, especially those who are restrained and embarrassed, off their guard, and betray them into real frankness and openness, and thus you may traverse and ransack their thoughts and characters, and get their secrets. Another style, which will accomplish the same thing in better taste, and is adapted to be more frequently used, is a quiet, indifferent, and apparently natural manner, which will cause the person you talk with to desire to be at his ease, and, to gain that state, he will make himself actually so, by becoming really natural."

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We are not surprised to find that John Neal's admirable paper on "New-England Witchcraft" has excited general attention—out we are surprised to find a number of our contemporaries transferring it to their columns without the slightest acknowledgment of indebtedness to the New-York Mirror, for which journal it was particularly written. We pay for our original papers, and, although we have no objection to their free circulation, yet, in justice to our interests, we must request that the proper credit should be given. We look for this courtesy from American journals at least. As for the foreign depredators, we have so long been accustomed to their pillaging with renegades, and pillage from them in return. Our readers will be gratified to learn that it is probable that our old friend and correspondent, Wm. Cox, will return to New-York. What with the dozen theatres and the thousand frolics and fashions of the day, we stand in need of just such a correspondent at home. We have made arrangements with a well-known popular writer for a London correspondence, which cannot fail to prove unusually piquant and interesting. Other changes and improvements are in contemplation, which we shall shortly have the pleasure of announcing to the innumerable well-wishers and subscribers of the New-York Mirror.—We publish to-day the concluding letter from John Smith, in relation to the difficulties on the border. Happily those difficulties have ceased, and John has returned to Southville to resume his agricultural pursuits. His letters, however, have extended his reputation far beyond the bounds of his native village. We learn that Sir Samuel Colman has collected them into a volume, which he will shortly publish, embellished with spirited engravings on steel, illustrative of the hair-breadth escapes and perilous adventures of John Smith, Billy Wiggins, and the other members of the illustrious corps who accompanied Sergeant Johnson into the disputed territory.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1839.

A glance at the exhibition of the Academy of Design.—We can afford but a brief and desultory glance at the exhibition at Clinton-Hall this week, and candour compels us to say, that, with some eminent exceptions, it is deserving of little more than a glance. Weir's painting of the "Indian Captives" will, however, alone repay the trouble of a journey up the interminable stairs, which lead to the hall—and there are several pieces, by Imman, Durand, Gambardella, Richardson, Huntington, Solly, Spencer, Frothingham, Freeman, Cranch, and Powell, which would more than redeem a much worse collection. The "Indian Captives" will, we suspect, long be considered a chef-d'œuvre among the productions of American artists. The figure and position of the squaw are admirable, and there is a touch of pathos and poetry even in the disposition of the withered leaves that lie at her feet. The hewn log, on which sits a mailed soldier, (there were several hundred suits of steel armour in New-England at the time of the scene,) is painted with astonishing exactness. It really seems to be protruding from the canvass. The figure of the Indian is graceful and expressive. Among some of the most attractive pieces in the exhibition are the exquisite landscapes by Richardson. There is a warmth and richness about them, that is in beautiful unison with the subjects. The landscape by Oddie (fifty-two) is worthy of the encomiums that have been passed upon it. The portraits by Imman are as usual excellent, especially that of Master Seconia (two hundred and forty-seven). The "Boy Fishing" (one hundred and twenty-five), by Watson, shows more than ordinary talent. The expression of the boy's face is nature itself. We wonder at the taste of Mr. A. Smith in painting his excellency, Governor Mason, of Michigan, in his shirt sleeves, with an under vestment of flannel! We should as soon think of painting a hero in his night-cap. Passing into the small saloon, one of the first paintings which arrest the gaze, is the "Caius Gracchus" of Gambardella. The "Young Lady," (two hundred and six), by the same artist, pleases us better; and the "Portia" is a highly beautiful and poetical conception. The "Lovers' Surprise," (two hundred and sixty-four), by Huntington, is not unworthy the pencil of Leslie. It conveys at once to the eye the whole plot of a modern romance or melodrama. The "Summer Evening," by an amateur, (two hundred and sixty-nine), would do no discredit to the hand of a master. The colouring beautifully portrays the golden exhalations of a summer twilight, and the repose of the hour is faithfully expressed. The Group (two hundred and eighty) by Imman, reminds us of some of the most exquisite productions of Lawrence. It is a perfectly successful specimen of a style, perhaps the most difficult that can be attempted. We will resume our comments upon the exhibition next week.

Literary chit-chat.—Among the novelties in press, we see mentioned the new novel of "Sydney Clifton," from the pen of one of our own citizens, and founded on events that occurred in this city "long time ago." There is considerable curiosity respecting it, and we feel satisfied, from the accounts of those who have read the work in manuscript, that it will not disappoint public anticipation. We understand that it is already in the hands of a dramatist, at the instance of the manager of one of the principal theatres, and that it will be produced upon the stage soon after it is issued from the press. In these days of foreign reprints, we shall be pleased to see a good American book succeed. Mr. Fay's "Countess of Ida," the scene of which is laid in Berlin, we perceive is announced by the London as well as the American papers. This work has been long in preparation, and our worthy colleague has devoted to it his best powers. It will also no doubt be dramatised; and its publication will, we are sure, excite interest both at home and abroad, for Mr. Fay holds no common pen, and his friends and admirers are numerous as the stars.

"Filed leaves of the west—
His own green forest land."

By the by, quoting from Halleck, reminds us that the Harpers have in press his poetical works, including "Fanny," and "The Croaker"—also, another edition of Bryant's poems, which is soon to be issued, with additional pieces. An edition of "Sprague's poems" is also talked of. We hope it will not end in talk, for Sprague is one of the few writers of verse, who truly possess the "vision and the faculty divine." The "Romance of the Ring," with other tales and sketches, in prose and verse, by James Nash, is announced as ready for publication. Coming as it will from the pen of a deaf and dumb poet—one who has been pronounced by a distinguished English critic, "one of the wonders of the day,"—it cannot fail to be duly welcomed by his own countrymen.—In reply to many applications at this office for copies of "The Little Frenchman and his Water Lots, with other Hints at the Times," we take occasion to say that we have had nothing to do with its publication, and that it may be had at any of the book-stores for a trifling consideration! We believe that a few copies yet remain on hand—them! D. Appleton and Company, Broadway, have published a handsome octavo edition of the "Life and Times" of John Bunyan, one of those standard works, which will be in demand so long as a taste for reading shall prevail. Mr. Samuel Colman has in press, the "Letters of Eliza Wilkinson," descriptive of scenes in Charleston and its vicinity, during the war of the revolution. The work is edited by Mrs. Gilman, of South Carolina, and from the specimens we have seen, we should think it a valuable contribution to the historical records and collections relative to the events of the revolution.

New buildings.—Niblo's Opera House is completed, and will be opened in the course of a few days. The New Bowery theatre is quite a stately edifice, and reflects credit alike upon the skill and good taste of the architects, and upon the enterprise of Hamblin, under whose sole management it is conducted. The foundation of the new Chatham Theatre is laid, and the building, it is said, will be ready for the reception of the public by the fourth of next July. From present appearances, there will not be a private residence in Broadway, ten years hence. Thirty dwelling-houses, between our office and Canal-street, have been converted into spacious stores since the first instant. The number of contracts for new houses exceeds that of any former year. So rapid are the changes that are taking place around us in this goody city of Gotham—and so wonderful is the increase of population, that those who have not visited it for the last ten or fifteen years, would scarcely recognize, in the present huge and crowded metropolis, the features of the old town of "New-Amsterdam"—a town, which but the other day, as it were, was dotted with the tiled roofs and gable ends of edifices erected by our worthy Dutch ancestors, the materials of which were imported from Holland, and the edifices of which are preserved only in the pages of the New-York Mirror. Of these old mansions, not one remains—no, not one! It is not the fashion here to live in the house of one's forefathers. Every succeeding generation improves upon the primitive habits of the past, and we are becoming so overrun with strangers from every quarter of the globe, that we begin to apprehend that the time is not distant, when a New-Yorker will be a stranger in New-York. Alas, the "mutability of human affairs!"

Theatrical.—The tide of public favour seems to be once more setting in favour of the Park, if we may judge from the well-filled houses of the last two weeks. The "Lord of the Isles" has been produced in quite an effective manner. Sinclair sings some capital songs in his usual graceful style, and Mrs. Gibbs sustains her part with commendable spirit. Hield, as Bruce, is picturesque and melodramatic, and Chippendale and Ritenhams make the most of their parts. Madame Lecompte has appeared during the week in La Bayadere, and a new ballet. She is as attractive as ever. At the National, the opera has been the "order of the evening." The "Mountain Sylph" did not seem to hit hard, and the ever-welcome "Amilie" has been reproduced to good houses. The Bowery Theatre was opened by Hamblin on Monday evening, a crowded audience being in attendance. The new drama of "Nick of the Woods," taken from Doctor Brd's novel of that name, was quite successful. This theatre will undoubtedly do a prosperous business.

Which shall it be?—In the letter of Doctor William F. Channing, just published, are the following words:—"How few women there are that are a man of refinement would consent to marry—yet he honours the sex." The Boston Post appeals to the ladies from this sentence, and thinks it must be a blunder of the printer; the original must have run—"How few men there are, that a woman of refinement would consent to marry," etc. In this form we accept the argument, and acknowledge the conclusion.

Do you give it up?—The latest absurdity that we have heard perpetrated in the way of a conundrum, is the following:—"If Mr. Caterwood's panoramas of Thebes, Jerusalem, and Niagara, at the corner of Prince and Mercer-streets, should be destroyed by fire, why would he be like an orphan?"—Because, he would have no pa-nor-a-ma left.

Moving.—It is estimated that more than two hundred thousand persons, nearly two-thirds of the whole population of the city, changed their places of residence on the first of May! Those of our subscribers, who have not given notice at the office of their present "whereabouts," must not find fault with us if they do not receive the Mirror with the accustomed punctuality.

Tragedy and Fare.—We have seen it stated in a letter from London, that a farce by Sergeant Talfourd is to be produced soon at Madame Vestris's theatre, the Olympick. The author of "Ion" must possess a remarkable versatility of genius, if he succeed as well in "l'Allegro" as in "Il Penseroso."

Musical.—Mr. Horn has arranged the balad, "Near the lake where drooped the willow," as a trio. It may be had, as sung by Mr. and Mrs. Seguin and Mr. Knight, at Hewitt's, corner of Broadway and Park-place.

I LOVE BUT THREE.

A NEW SONG—WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE—MUSICK COMPOSED BY P. CIANCHETTINI.

TENDERLY.

heart to o-ther loves will stray; If I must swear, then, love-ly er hear me, By ev'-ry dream I have a way, By ev'-ry throb I feel when thou art near, I love but thee! I love but thee!

SECOND VERSE.—By those dark eyes, where light is ever playing,
Where Love, in depth of shadow holds his throne,
And by those lips, which give whate'er thou't saying,
Or grave or gay, a musick of its own,
A musick far beyond all minstrel's playing,
I love but thee!—I love but thee!

THIRD VERSE.—By that fair brow, where innocence reposes,
As pure as moonlight sleeping upon snow,
And by that cheek, whose fleeting blush discloses
A hue too bright to bless this world below,
And only fit to dwell on Ede's roses,
I love but thee!—I love but thee!

MISCELLANY.

THE STRATAGEM OF LOVE.

A SPRIGHTLY youth and maiden gay,
In smiling summer weather,
Where Love, within a garden lay,
One morning stroll'd together:
The nymph had laugh'd the god to scorn,
Which served but to amuse him;
And he had vow'd that very morn
To lodge within her bosom.
She tripp'd along with fairy feet
That scarcely bent a flower;
And call'd full many a blossom sweet,
Deriding Cupid's power.
Just then the youth, who'd ask'd his aid,
And begg'd he'd not refuse him,
Pluck'd a fair moss-rose for the maid,
And placed it in her bosom.
Sly Love within the leaves lay hid,
While to her heart she press'd him;
Unconscious thus of what she did,
The simple maid caress'd him;
A transient life the buds retain'd—
The maiden sigh'd to lose 'em,
But Cupid and the leaves remain'd,
And long disturb'd her bosom.

PATRONAGE.—A carpenter having met his employer in the street, the latter reminded him of the gratitude due for his patronage. — "True," said the mechanic—"but if you had not patronized me so far as to give me a house to build, you would have been obliged to live out doors."

PARADOX.—When we reflect that every mother has children of surprising genius, it is matter of serious inquiry where all the ordinary men come from who cross our path in every-day life.

BOOKSELLERS.—There is this difference between the booksellers of our day and the Scandinavian warrior in the Hall of Valhalla,—that the former drink their wine out of the skulls of their friends, the authors, whereas the latter quaffed theirs out of the skulls of their enemies. In ancient times the Vates was considered a prophet as well as a bard, but now he is barred from his profit, most of which goes to the bookseller, who, in return, generally slows the scribbler to come in for the whole of the critical abuse. It has been unridiculously said of the biblioplist that as he lives upon the brains of others, he need not possess any himself. This is a mistake.—He has the wit to coin the wit that is supplied to him and thus proves his intellectual by his golden talents. Many a bookseller rides in his carriage, but we do not know a single bookwriter who does not trudge a-foot. "Sic vos non vobis," says the old proverb. If they take our honey they cannot quarrel with us, if we now and then give them a sting.

NEGRO SHREWDRINESS.—A gentleman sent his black servant to purchase fish. He went to a stall and took up a fish. The fish-monger observing, and fearing the bystanders might catch the scent, exclaimed, "Hallo! you black rascal, what do you smell my fish for?" The negro replied, "Me no smell your fish, massa." "What are you doing then, sir?" "Why me talk to him, massa. Why me ask him what news at sea—that's all, massa." "And what does he say to you?" "He says he don't know; he no been dere dese tre weeks!"

ANECDOTE OF A POET.—A Paris paper relates the following anecdote of a poor but distinguished poet in that city. While dining at a restaurant on the Boulevards, he called for a bottle of Bordeaux premiere qualite. The waiter, struck by the broad Marseillaise accent of the guest, and observing the thread-bare condition of his coat, considered it necessary to remind him that this wine was marked in the carte at ten francs a bottle. "I thought it was twenty," said the poet; "bring me a couple!"

GIREFS.—The number of this extraordinary race in Europe, Asia, and Africa, is calculated to amount to seven hundred thousand. In America they have been hitherto unknown, though a small number are said to have emigrated to that quarter recently. Throughout the world they speak the same kind of gibberish, which is very similar to the language of Hindostan, to which country their origin has, on that account, been assigned.

MODERN XENOPHON.—An Irish adventurer, O'Bryne, some thirty or forty years ago, got himself immolated into the very highest circles, and was visited by the first people in the land, on account of his address at play. Sitting down one night to play in private at piquet, with a certain person whose name there is no occasion to mention, he found himself the winner of a hundred thousand pounds. Being aware of the inability of his antagonist to pay the whole of the sum, and suspecting that, if he could not pay the whole, he might pay none, he despatched his servant to recover all he had won from him, except ten thousand pounds, which he received.—In consequence of this masterly manoeuvre, the witty Mr. Hare gave him the name of "Xenophon O'Bryne," from his retreat with ten thousand.

DOCTOR BENTLEY.—In his life of this literary Thraso, the editor has omitted to insert an anecdote which is worth preserving, if it were only for the pun which it embalms. Robert Boyle, afterwards earl of Cork, having, as it was generally thought, defeated Bentley in a controversy regarding the authenticity of the letters of Phalaris, the doctor's pupils drew a caricature of him, when the guards of Phalaris were thrusting him into his brazen bull for the purpose of burning him alive, while a label issued from his mouth with the following inscription, "Well, well! I had rather be roasted than Boyled."

A NOSE.—A new elected M. C. lately consulted his friend as to the occasion that he should select for his maiden speech. A very important subject was suggested, when the modest member expressed a fear that his mind was hardly of sufficient calibre to embrace it. "Pooh! Pooh!" said his friend, "don't be under any apprehension about your calibre; depend upon it, they will find you bre enough."

POPE'S OATH.—Pope's oath was "God mend me." A little boy to whom he had refused a penny, looking at his diminutive stature and crooked form, cried out, "God mend you, indeed! it would be less trouble to make a new one."

NEW-ENGLAND WITCHCRAFT.

BY JOHN NEAL.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

But why delay the catastrophe? Burroughs and Elizabeth and Rachel were taken. They were led back in triumph; he, prepared for the worse, Rachel afraid only for Elizabeth, and Elizabeth more dead than alive.

On the fifth day of August, 1692—less than one hundred and fifty years ago—he was put upon trial, he, a minister of the gospel, in the very heart of New-England, for witchcraft! It happened in the midst of a terrible thunder storm, and lasted all day and a part of the night. His behaviour was that of a good and brave man; but he shook, nevertheless, two or three times after nightfall, when he saw beside eight confessing witches, and five or six poor distempered creatures, Elizabeth Hubbard herself, a woman whose character had been at his mercy for years, John Ruck, his brother-in-law, a pious, weak man, two or three old and very dear friends, and half a score of neighbours arrayed against him, as if each were encouraged by the others. What was he to believe? What could he believe? These people were not, like Elizabeth Hubbard, in his power, nor like the multitude, either hostile to nor afraid of him. They were there to take away his life—under a deep sense of duty. His manly heart swelled when he saw this—and a shadow fell upon the faces about him. It was the shadow of death, and he knew it.

"The confessing witches testified," to borrow the very language of an eye-witness to the whole, "that the prisoner had been at witch meetings with them, and had seduced and compelled them to the snares of witchcraft; that he promised them fine clothes for doing it, that he brought poppets to them and thorns to stick into those poppets for the afflicting other people, and that he exhorted them to bewitch all Salem village, but to do it gradually."

Among the bewitched, or afflicted persons, one declared, "that in her agonies, a little black man came to her, saying his name was Burroughs, and bidding her set her hand to a book which he showed her, bragging that he was a conjurer, and above the ordinary rank of witches;" and others, that "in their torments, the prisoner tempted them to go to a sacrament, to which they heard him summoning other witches by the sound of a trumpet, who came from all quarters, helter skelter, to the rendezvous;" another, on recovering from a trance, declared, "that he had carried her away into the top of a very high mountain, where he showed her mighty and glorious kingdoms, and offered them all to her if she would but write her name in his book." His sudden appearance at the trial of Sarah Good, his look of premature old age after an absence of only three years, about which everybody spoke with surprise when he appeared in court; his loud voice and swarthy complexion, both so unlike what they had been, that few could remember in him the gay, high-spirited youth, whom they had known but a few years before, and been so well acquainted with when a preacher; his behaviour to the boy, his reproduction of the lost knife at such a critical moment, by the help of that boy; his bright, fierce look, his undaunted carriage, and his remarkable words when they asked him by what authority he was abroad again, and he answered, by the authority of the Strong Man! Who was that Strong Man? "By authority of One who hath endowed me with great power!" Who was that One?

The judges were not long in doubt, for it being proved by a great number of respectable and trustworthy witnesses, that the accused, though a small man, had lifted a gun of seven feet barrel, with one hand behind the lock; nay, that with his fore finger in the barre, he did so, and that in the same party, at the same place, a stout, formidable savage did the same thing, it was adjudged by the court, after consulting together a while, that Burroughs had been aided and assisted by the Black Man, who was near in a bodily shape, and after this, it having been satisfactorily proved that Burroughs "made nothing" of other facts requiring a bodily strength, such a no one there had ever seen or heard of out of the holy scriptures, it was solemnly adjudged by the same court, after a further consultation, that George Burroughs had a devil; and after this, it being proved by Mr. Ruck, the brother-in-law of Burroughs, "that on day, when Burroughs and his wife and Mr. Ruck went after strawberries together, three miles into the country, Burroughs on foot, and they on horseback, Burroughs went aside into the bushes, whereupon they halted and hallooed for him, and he not making them any reply, they went homeward with a quickened pace, not expecting to see him for a considerable time, but when they were near home they saw him ahead of them all at once, and stood as before, with a basket of strawberries newly gathered, waiting for his wife, whom he chid for what she had spoken to her brother on the road, which, when they marvelled at, he said he knew their very thoughts; and Ruck saying that was more than the devil himself could know, he answered with heat, "Brother and wife, my God makes known your thoughts to me." All this being proved, the court after a third consultation, gave judgment in the following words:—"That Burroughs then stepped aside only that, by the assistance of the Black Man, he might put on his invisibility, and in that fascinating mist, gratify his own jealous humour to hear what they said of him."

Others now testified that both his wives had frequently complained of their house being troubled with wicked spirits; and others, who had sworn before the committing judge to the same story, now repeated, what it thundered and lightened in their upturned faces, and the big sweat stood upon the forehead of Burroughs, who appeared as if his heart was broken, though about his mouth was a patient, proud smile; for near him were Elizabeth and Rachel Dyer waiting to be called up, one pale as death, watching his look as if she had no hope on earth but in him, while the other stood up with her majestic forehead flashing to the storm—ay, repeated, even at such an hour, and in such a place, that they had been visited by the apparitions of his buried wives, who charged him with having caused their death, and promised, if he denied the charge, to appear in court against him.

"Prisoner at the bar," said one of the judges, after consulting with Lieutenant-governor Stoughton, a Mr. Winthrop, and a Major Saltonstall, three other judges, "prisoner at the bar, what say you! will you venture to deny the charge?"

"Will I deny the—?" He was interrupted by a crash of thunder that shook the whole house, and was followed by one universal cry of horror from the multitude, rushing together, and falling upon their knees and covering their faces, "will I deny the charge! Yes, that will I! that I do! Let my accusers appear! Let the grave open before me—I am not afraid. If they but wear the blessed features of them that I loved while on earth, I shall but tremble with joy to meet them."

Another crash of thunder followed—another similar outcry—and lo! the afflicted began screaming that the apparitions had actually kept their promise—accepted the challenge—and were seen standing face to face with the prisoner!

For a long time nothing could be heard but shrieks of horror, and the loud voices of the constables trying to make themselves heard.

At last, willing to hear what Burroughs would say, one of the judges asked him what hindered those people from giving their testimony—for they had all been seized with fit after fit, while proceeding with their stories.

"I do not know," was the reply. "I am utterly confounded by their behaviour. It may be the devil."

"Ah," said the judge, "and why is the devil so loth to have testimony borne against you? answer me that. Whereupon," says an eye-witness, "the prisoner was cast into very great confusion."

Here the trial ended. The minds of the jury were made up; for though he spoke in a way that made everybody about him shudder, for what they called the misapplication of his mighty power, and vigour he gave up to the judges a written argument of wonderful vigour and beauty, which is yet preserved among the records of that people, he was found guilty, and straightway condemned to death—nay, for a time, it was a question whether he should not be burned alive or stoned to death.

He showed no sort of emotion. He made no sort of reply. He neither moved nor spoke till he saw the women gather about a place, where Elizabeth Dyer sat, and lift her up and carry her forth into the air, as if she were a dead creature, followed by men with firelocks and drawn swords. Then, and for the first time, he was moved; but, before he could open his mouth, he saw Rachel Dyer stand up, and heard her say to the judges, "Let me be tried, I entreat ye, oh, judges of Israel, before the maid be brought back! Let her be kept away, I beseech ye; if—if!"—her voice quavered for a moment here; "if her presence be not required by the law."

"Let it be so," was the answer from the bench. "Proceed."

But why stop to detail a process, the result of which everybody foresaw and foreknew! Enough to say that she was found guilty like the others.

"Why are these poor women troubled?" quoth Judge Winthrop, just before giving judgment of death against her.

"I do not know," was the reply.

"But according to your belief?"

"I don't wish to say what I think of the matter, friend Winthrop. It can do no good, and it might do harm."

"Don't you think they're bewitched?"

"No, I do not."

"Give us your thoughts of the malady," added another of the judges.

"No, Ichabod, no! My thoughts can be of no value to thee.

If I had more proof, I might be willing to speak of their master."

"Of their master, hey!" cried a little man, with a sharp, eager look, and a pinched-up mouth—"and who is their master?"

"If they deal in witchcraft, or in the black-art, Joseph, thee need not be told by me, who their master is—"

"Woman—you smile. Are you not afraid of death?"

"No—not afraid of death. And yet, if I might be spared for a little time, I should be very thankful."

"Not afraid of death, Rachel Dyer?"

"No—and why should I be afraid of anything but life, and the sorrows and the transgressions of life! Why should I desire to live! What is there to attach a miserable creature like me to life?"

"—No, no—but for one thing—the poor dear child, Elizabeth—I should say, Lord! let now thy servant depart in peace! nay, I should long to be where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest!—"

"What have you done, Rachel Dyer, to disturb the faculties of that woman?"

"Speakest thou of the witness, Elizabeth Hubbard?"

"Yes."

"Much—much—though nought of evil."

"It is your apparition, perhaps."

"If so, I cannot help it."

"Why does your apparition pursue her?"

"How should I know! He that appeared in the shape of Samuel, may appear in the shape of another."

Judgment was pronounced forthwith, and she was ordered for execution within three days.

Elizabeth Dyer was then put to the bar; but half dead with terror, and so alarmingly ill, they concluded to put off her trial, and allow her to have a short interview with her sister.

CHAPTER THE LAST.

The two wretched young women met once more—and but once—before they were to be separated for ever. Elizabeth grew ashamed of her own weakness, on perceiving how steadfast and womanly was the faith of Rachel. "I pray thee, dear sister, to forgive me," said she, falling suddenly upon her sister's neck, after they had been together a whole hour.

"Forgive thee—for what, pray?"

"Do, do, forgive me, Rachel!"

"Why, what can be the matter with the child! Here we sit for a whole hour together, in the dead of night, looking death in the face, without a sob or a tear, comforting our hearts, weary and way-worn as they are, with the hope of soon meeting our beloved mother, and our high-minded father—and yet, all of a sudden, as if we had never thought a word of death—"

"Oh, but I have thought of it, sister!—indeed, I have! and what is more, I have brought myself to be very willing to die now—now!"

"But what, pray!—why does thee stop!—why turn away thy face!—why break out even into such bitter lamentations!"

"Oh, my dear, dear sister!"

"Why, what ails thee, Elizabeth Dyer! What am I to believe! What has thee done! Why does thee cling to me so! And wherefore do thee hide thy face!"

"Oh, Rachel! Rachel! I dare not speak to thee—I dare not look at thee!—I cannot!"

"Lift up thy head, this minute, Elizabeth Dyer! Let go of my hand, and let me see thy face!"

"Oh, no—no, no—I dare not; I am afraid of thee."

"Of me!—I afraid of me, what have I done! Why, what has thee done, my poor sister—and what have I done to deserve this, at thy hands!"

"Oh nothing, sister, dear sister—thee has done nothing. It is I only that have been so foolish and so wicked!"

"Wicked!—foolish!—in what way!—would thee drive me crazy!"

"I am very sorry, sister—very, very—but oh, I could not help it."

"Could not help what! Speak!—and whatever it is, I will forgive thee—speak, in mercy!—we have but a few minutes left, the day is breaking now, Elizabeth; oh, speak to me!"

"I will, I will!" whispered the poor girl, sobbing, as if her heart would break, and burying her face in the lap of her terrified sister, at whose feet she had fallen, with her magnificent hair all abroad—"I will, I will, but!—with the low sweet murmuring of a pure heart, as though it were a confession of guilt and shame—"

"Oh, do not look at me so; I cannot bear it, Rachel!"

"Look at thee! my poor bewildered sister; how can thee tell whether I am looking at thee or not, while thy heart is there! Get up—I don't half like that posture; it betokens too much fear—too much humility—at a time like this. Get up, Elizabeth, get up; if these wouldn't raise a trouble in my heart, which I wouldn't have there now for all the world; get up, I beseech thee, Elizabeth Dyer!"

Elizabeth arose, and fell again upon her sister's neck, putting her mouth close to her ear, while her innocent face glowed with deep shame, whispered—"I pray thee, Rachel, dear Rachel, I pray thee—do let me see once more, though it be only for a few minutes, before we are separated by death—never to meet again, perhaps—never!"

Rachel made no reply, but gathering the sweet girl into her bosom, with a convulsive sob, she wept for a long while upon her neck. They were interrupted by the jailer, who came to read a warrant, saying, that inasmuch as the man called George Burroughs, otherwise called the Reverend George Burroughs, having desired to see Rachel Dyer and Elizabeth Dyer, the confederate witches, before his death, he had been permitted by the merciful and honourable judges to see the said Rachel Dyer, and he the bearer was, therefore, empowered to fetch the said Rachel to the said George—for the reasons aforesaid; and thereof was to fail not for a few minutes, etc., all which he read with great emphasis and solemnity, even to the signatures of the judges, and the day of the month, and year.

A separation like that of death followed between the two sisters. They had no hope of ever meeting again on earth. Poor Elizabeth was quite speechless; but her large blue eyes were turned up to the face of Rachel, as if to implore a consideration of her dying prayer. "If it may be," said Rachel, "if it may be, dear Elizabeth, it shall be. Have courage. Be prepared for the worst, while hoping for the best, however; and now farewell! my dear, dear sister—we shall not see one another again, this side the grave—oh, my sister, forgive me that I have been harsh to thee! and if thy life be spared—as it may, dearest—oh, think of me, as of one that suffered much—from untold sorrow, and a weariness of spirit, known but to our Father, our dear Father in heaven.—Let us pray!"

They prayed together, each with her arm about the other's neck—the jailer standing over them, and wondering to see witches pray; but accounting for it upon the principle of their being deserted by their betrayer, and driven to repentance by the wholesome severity of the law—interchanged their trembling farewell kisses, in a transport of affection, and parted for ever.

Rachel was led straightway to the dungeon, where she found Burroughs, chained like a wild beast to the wall. "There is yet one hope, dear Rachel," said he, and but one; striving, as he spoke, to wrench the pillar from its place, to which he was chained; though at the risk of bringing down the roof with it, like the strong man of old.

"No, George—there is no hope; and I could not have thee deceive myself; nay, say—wouldst thou, if thou hadst the power, pluck down destruction upon the heads of the innocent.—Forbear, my friend, forbear!"

"Nay, it is not for myself that I speak. I am prepared for death, and ready for death; but oh, Rachel! if I could but persuade you, there might be hope for Elizabeth and for you."

"George!—what hope on earth is there for me?"—and she stopped suddenly, as if she had betrayed herself, and withdrew her hand, which he had been holding to his heart.

"Hear me, thou high-hearted, generous woman! I have, indeed, no hope of myself, and but little for thee; but—but—I do believe we might manage to save her."

"Manage!"

"Be patient, my dear friend. There will be a change here—a great change, before long—it must be so—it cannot be otherwise. The conspirators are beginning to overstep the mark. They are going too far—flying too high. The prisons are crowded with people of distinction. This very day they have begun to whisper about our friend, Matthew Paris—nay, even the governor is mentioned, and that story of the Spanish wreck, may yet be a snare to him—or the salvation of hundreds! If they persist—if they go up to the seat of power—mark my words!—there must, and there will be, a speedy overthrow of all these banded wretches and blasphemers. And, therefore—"

"Well, George—why do these stop short, and turn away, as if unwilling to have her look into thine eyes?"

"Because, my friend, I—in short, Rachel, I am anxious to persuade Elizabeth—to have you persuade her, I mean, if possible—to—to—to confess."

"To confess what?"

"Why only to confess—that—that she is a—a—; but you understand me, Rachel."

"Yes, George; I do understand thee. There would have me confess that I am a witch, and ask Elizabeth to do the same."

"Exactly!" said he, quite amazed at her composure.

"And wherefore? What shall we gain by it?"

"Gain by it!—life—an opportunity of doing much good—of sparing to our judges and people the guilt of innocent blood—of bringing the transgressors to punishment."

"And what more, George?"

"What more! Is not this enough?"

"No, George."

"Hear me out, Rachel. Do not wonder at me—nor look at me thus, until I have ended."

"Proceed."

"You are guilty of untruth, to be sure; but you save your life by it—the life of poor Elizabeth—you are moved, I see; and now let me ask you, my friend, which were the greater crime, to die, where you have the power of escape within your reach—trusting to a miracle for safety—or to live, when you may do so, by a few words of untruth, involving no injury to others, nor to yourself?"

"George Burroughs—farewell!"

"Nay, not yet! Hear me through. By this word of untruth, you save your own life, and, perhaps, many other lives; you punish the guilty—you have leisure to repent, if such untruth be sinful; you have an opportunity of establishing your innocence; you may profit by a change of popular faith; and will, hereafter, obtain praise for that very untruth, and real heartfelt gratitude from those who are stopped midway in the career of guilt, and spared, perhaps, the consummation of their wickedness on earth—withheld, perhaps, from the unforgiveable sin!"

"Oh, George!"—and she turned away trembling, and covered her face with her hands.

"But," he continued with eagerness—"but, on the contrary, my dear friend, if you die, and if you should happen to be mistaken—if your death be sinful, you have no time for repentance or godly sorrow; no opportunity to prove your innocence. The guilt of your death, if not charged hereafter to you, will be charged to your destroyers, the judges and the people; and every human creature that perishes hereafter, who might have been saved by you, will have reason to lay his death at your door. Nay, if your character be that, for the preservation of which you are willing to die, consider, that by dying, you leave behind you the character of one, who being charged with witchcraft, foul and abominable witchcraft, was tried and executed for witchcraft, found guilty, and punished as murderers and witches are punished—hung up between heaven and earth!—You shudder, my dear friend—if you cannot bear the picture, how will you ever be able to bear the steadfast and overpowering reality!"

"George Burroughs! I have but one reply to make to thee. Do thee wish me to confess, and live?"

"I do, as I hope for mercy, Rachel."

"Thou wouldst have Elizabeth confess—and live?"

"I would."

"Wilt thou?"

"I!"

"Yes, George, yes—wilt thou?"

"No, Rachel—no, my friend—but our circumstances are so different, you perceive, that I—in short, I would rather die ten thousand times over!"

"So would I, George! and so will I—"

"But Elizabeth?"

"Elizabeth may do what she thinks right. I shall not endeavour to influence her, either one way or the other."

"Oh, but Rachel, if you were to urge her—"

"Urge her! would that be doing as I would be done by! Shall I urge a beloved sister to that which no power on earth could make me do!"

"But if I should be permitted to see her, will you promise not to interfere? will you authorize me to say to her, that you are willing to have her confess, and live?"

"Willing!—yes,—but oh, George, let not the maiden be deceived by thee or me, nor even by the fear of death!"

"Say so on this bit of paper, and I will take it with me."

"Oh, it is certain that she is to see thee, George; and without me!"

"Yes—if she sees him at all," (said the jailer, looking in at the door, and quickly too. I promise you; for the worshipful judges, when they authorized and empowered me, their unworthy—"

"Silence, sir!" cried Burroughs, lifting his manacled hand at the jailer, who started back from the door with affright, and called for help.

"Enough—there—take it, George!"—handing him the paper.

"Enough! I would have my dear sister live!" She will have much to make life dear to her; she will be sure of sympathy and love, all her life long, whatever may come of this; but as for me—I have no desire to live, George!"

"No desire to live!"

"None, except for her sake—and so—and so—we are to part now, George—and the sooner we part, the better." "Let me kiss thee, now, my brother!—let me but kiss thee before we part, and I shall be happy!"

"He stooped reverently toward her, stretched forth his manacled hand and embraced her and then they parted—parted for ever! she, saying with a smile, in a very low quiet voice, her mouth trembling, and large tears dropping on his locked hands, "Thou wilt kiss her too, George!"—these must, "Thou's very dear to the maiden; and she—she—but no matter—whether alive or dead, she will be happy, for they will pity her and love her."

"And you too, bravest and best of women!"

"No, George—love and pity are not for such as I am." There may be hope for a beautiful witch, with large blue eyes, and a sweet mouth; but—but—for a freckled witch, with red hair and a lump on her back, there is no hope!" She was gone.

And lo! he prevailed upon Elizabeth to confess and live. Upon his knees, and in tears—with clasped hands—and with the voice of a broken-hearted man, he besought her to have mercy on herself and live. She consented at last; and they spared her life. But he was put to death on the following day; he bearing with bold and steady courage to the last; forgiving all, and predicting with a voice, like that of a prophet, a speedy and perpetual overthrow to the belief in witchcraft.

Being dead, the jailer was ordered to the women's dungeon, to apprise Rachel Dyer, that on the morrow, early, she would be brought forth to suffer.

And lo! on the morrow, when the multitude were gathered together about the jail, waiting for her to be led forth, a man appeared at the window, pale with fear, saying that she was asleep, or somebody that resembled her, and that he could not wake her. Wherefore the High Sheriff entered the jail, and went up to the bed—and spoke to her—faltering and thrilling as he did so, at the mighty change of countenance which had taken place within forty-eight hours; but she made no reply—she stirred not—moved not—breathed not. The bed was drawn forth to the light—the people gathered round in silence and awe; and she was lifted up, and carried out into the cold morning air, on the way to the gallows. But in vain. She was dead!

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

SINGERS AND SINGING.

The Italians are the only people who have cultivated vocal science with pre-eminent success. From them are deduced the few principles that are established in other countries. Perhaps we may trace certain national variations in tone in singing, to the predominance of peculiar actions of the organs of speech in pronouncing the several languages. The French are nasal, the Germans are guttural, and the English sibilant. These are the characteristics of their several languages. Their own singers differ too in their manner of voicing, while the Italians, whose smooth and gliding syllables are lubricated by the constant succession of vowels, evince in the uniformity of their conduct of the voice, their portamento, as it is termed, that they have a regular and certain method of producing tone; and it must be conceded to them that it produces the purest and the best that art has hitherto attained. They appear, as far as such an act will admit of being described, to form the letters at the back of the mouth, keeping the throat moderately open, than either in the chest, the head, or the throat itself. We should say that there is a place near the back of the mouth, where the voice, whether from the head or the chest, must pass, and it seems as if the method brings the tone to this spot previous to production, and sends it forth in its finished state, from that precise point, unaltered either by the nose or the throat, the mouth or the lips. The mouth, which the English singer craves to take a very principal direction, has little, if any, immediate influence in the formation of the Italian tone. The mouth and lips are much more visibly at rest; they assume a gentle smiling character; the aperture is lengthened rather than rounded as in English singing. Upon such a matter, words convey very inadequate ideas; but the reader will closely observe and endeavour to imitate the tone of a fine Italian singer, a sort of sympathy will direct him to that immediate action of the organs employed in the production and emission of sound which we have attempted to describe, and he will clearly understand these differences.

Besides these grand essentials of purity, richness, sweetness, and brilliancy, I have said it is important that the voice in all its compass and variety should carry with it a distinguishing and predominant characteristic by which it may always be recognised. This property is perfectly compatible with the most sublime, the most lively, or the most pathetic expression of tone. The auditor, even with his eyes shut, should never be at a loss to determine whether the notes proceed from the same person; the conduct of the voice should be equal, and the tones in pronouncing the different vowels, as nearly alike as is consistent with pure and unaffected pronunciation, which ought upon no account to be sacrificed to erroneous notions of tone. The license which the Italian language grants in this point, in permitting something like the insertion of vowels between words beginning and ending with consonants, is not to be endured in an English singer. May for me, day for die, must always be disgusting to a classical ear in any tone. The transitions, though well-marked and well-defined, should never be too violent or sudden, but should seem to melt into each other without any abruptness, unless in compositions where a change of the sentiment demands an entire and rapid attention. The notes should never be quitted abruptly, but should sink as it were into silence. These appear to be the only general rules.

SINGULAR VERIFICATION OF A DREAM.

A letter from Hamburg contains the following curious story relative to the verification of a dream. It appears that a locksmith's apprentice one morning lately informed his master, (Claude Soller,) that on the previous night he dreamt that he had been assassinated on the road to Bergedorff, a little town at about two hours' distance from Hamburg. The master laughed at the young man's credulity, and to prove that he himself had little faith in dreams, insisted upon sending him immediately to Bergedorff with one hundred and forty six dollars, which he owed to his brother-in-law, who resided in the town. The apprentice, after in vain imploring his master to change his intention, was compelled to set out about eleven o'clock. On arriving at the village of Billwerder, about half way between Hamburg and Bergedorff, he recollected his dream with terror; but, perceiving the bailie of the village at a little distance, talking to some of his workmen, he accosted him, and acquainted him with his singular dream; at the same time requesting, that as he had money about his person, one of his workmen might be allowed to accompany him for protection across a small wood which lay in his way. The bailie smiled, and, in obedience to his orders, one of his men set out with the young apprentice. The next day the corpse of the latter was conveyed by some peasants to the bailie, along with a reaping-hook, which had been found by his side, and with which the throat of the murdered youth had been cut. The bailie immediately recognized the instrument as one which he had on the previous day given to the workman who had served as the apprentice's guide, for the purpose of pruning some willows. The workman was apprehended, and, on being confronted with the body of his victim, made a full confession of his crime, adding, that the recital of the dream had alone prompted him to commit the horrible act. The assassin, who is thirty-five years of age, is a native of Billwerder, and previously to the perpetration of the murder had always borne an irreproachable character.

ORIGINAL DRAMATICK EXTRACTS.

SCENE FROM AN UNPUBLISHED COMEDY.

Present—VICTOR and PEDRILLO.

Victor. How now, Pedrillo! Prithce, what's the matter? Have you been bitten by a rapid dog, That you do chafe, and foam, and gnash your teeth, As baited unto madness?

Pedrillo. Look at that!

And wonder at my equanimity.

Victor. A perfect Stoick truly! Mild as moonbeams, And quiet as a riband in a whirlwind— Patience personified!

Pedrillo. Will you read that?

Victor. An if you roar so loudly, my Pedrillo, You'll rouse the watchman snoring on the door-step. Compose yourself.

Pedrillo. I shall go mad, indeed!

What! You have seen it—read it—laughed at it— Retelied it, at the club, as a good joke! But, as the sun's in heaven, I will have vengeance!

Victor. Well done! the action and the word well suited! How such an exit would bring down the braves! Pescara, Hotspur, Gloster,—say, what part Shall be selected for your first appearance?

Pedrillo. Torture! I thought you were my friend. Farewell!

Victor. Stay, till you prove me otherwise. Explain. What dreadful, strange affliction has o'erwhelmed you? Have you been cut off with a paltry shilling By your old, doing uncle? No! Has Laura Eloped with that long-haired, black-whiskered bandit, Count Loterini?

Pedrillo. No. He's her abhorrence. Read—read that paragraph in that vile print. Behold me dragged before a grinning public! Pouted at, squibbed, ridiculed and ridiculed. Made the town's butt—the mockery of my friends! 'Sdeath! I'll be no man's butt! The lying cauff! The scribbling, paltering, venom-bloated cauff! The inky cutthroat—the pen-stabbing footpad! The prying, pilfering, prostituted pander! I'll have his ears on his epigony!

Victor. Bah! Give me a Regalia. Can it be Abuse from such an one can stir your choler? Wait till the blackguard praises you, and then, Curse if you please, the fellow's impudence.

Pedrillo. What! Shall I take no notice of the knave And his base lies?

Victor. By all means, notice him, If you would flatter. Challenge—fog—demand Instant retraction—use him for a libel— So may his aim be answered, and the kicks Of a true gentleman may do him honour, As royalty dubs knighthood with a blow.

Pedrillo. Would you not have me show a due resentment?

Victor. Tell him his sting is felt, he will rejoice— Let it strike harmless on the triple mail Of conscious honour, and the buffed viper Will writhe and hiss to find his venom wasted.

Pedrillo. Ah! but the public scorn!

Victor. The public scorn!

Tell me what scorn the public can inflict,

Which, if unmerited, an honest man

Cannot repay ten-fold! The public scorn!

Oh! paroxysm of insane conceit!

To think such obscene, feeble ribaldry,

Could bring upon your head the public scorn—

Could raise you half an inch above the mass,

For public contemplation! Ah, my friend,

The years, "which bring the philosophic mind,"

Will teach you soon, that, in this jostling world,

The most notorious are but little known.

The "observed of all observers," little thought of—

The loftiest low, the noisiest rarely heard!

And that attacks like this, false, flippant, mean,—

Ephe'meral vermin fastened from corruption—

By the judicious are despised and spurned—

By the unthinking are at once forgotten.

Oh! shallower than the ostrich's device,

Who buries in the desert sand his eyes,

That no one may discern him—is the folly,

Which could persuade you that the public gaze,

From the innumerable concerns of life,

Was turned, by this frail clamour, on yourself!

So, never fear to walk the street to-morrow.

The boys will not hoot after you. The ladies

Will not ejaculate as you pass by.

My life upon it, you will go unharmed,

Unpersecuted. But I'll flout no more.

Though, sooth to say, this sensitive alarm,

This prurient shyness, and unmeasured anger,

Spring merely from egregious self-conceit

Or grosser ignorance. Yet have I known

Mistakes as marvellous—have seen a man—

A high-souled, honourable, valiant one,—

Sickened and blasted by a slanderous breath,

Fanned from the foulest throats that ever swarmed

With lies, so carion with engendered grubs.

And a have witnessed, too, a sadder sight—

A maiden in the bloom of youth and beauty—

And "good as fair, and innocent as young"—

By the same pestilence stricken down and killed:—

While he, the spotted wretch, who did the murders,

Was—oh! the puniest of all creeping things!

The press! What is that terrible engine

In hands of fools and knaves? An empty scarecrow!

A sword of lath! a pop-gun! a tin-trumpet!

O, piteous the delusion, that could fancy

The minds of men, of veritable men,

Were swayed by such impostures!

Pedrillo. Are they not?

Victor. No. Dupes and fools may be. For such I care not.

Their good esteem is worthless as their hate!

Pedrillo. True, every word! You have prevailed, my friend.

The smart is over, and the anger vanished.

Henceforth these slight and slimy paper-hoppers

Shall less annoy than that superior insect,

The shrill cicada of our summer pathways;

Which harmless springs before us from the grass,

Sinks at our feet and straightway is forgotten!

ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

THE OLD MARQUIS.

I did not know what to make of him. He was not a judge, for he did not take his seat on the bench; nor a lawyer, for he never pleaded; nor a reporter, for he never took notes,—and yet he never missed a session of the police court. I found at last what he was—a perfect type of a race of men which is fast disappearing from the world; whose good and bad qualities were alike peculiarly its own. He was a tall, stout old man, slightly bent, with a powdered head, a fresh, strongly marked countenance. Everybody about the court knew him. He always was admitted at the private door, had a place for his hat, and one for his umbrella, a seat by the window in summer, and a chair by the fire in winter, all to himself; and the door-keeper would sooner have kept out a hundred lawyers than the marquis.

For a marquis he was, and that of the old stock, M. de Commandaire de Saint Gènes. His family went back to the old kings of Arragon, and had furnished the church with princes, the province with governors, the army with generals, and the parliament with presidents. He was born in 1766, in the department of Var; but if you had mentioned such a department to him, he would have asked you what you meant. To him, France was still divided into provinces, and he recognized no alteration, geographical or otherwise, made since 1789. That year divided our history into two parts; all that went before it was noble and excellent; all that came after it mean and wretched. He never walked on the side-walks; he preferred inoculation to vaccination; he used a flint and steel to strike fire; and rejected orthography, lithography, the monitorial system, and the jury. If you talked about omnibuses or gas, he was sure to kindle up; he had rather have been drenched to the skin, than enter the former; he went home before dark to avoid having anything to do with the latter.

It was in the intervals of business, that you saw him in all his glory, sitting by the stove, surrounded by a crowd of attorneys, marshals and reporters. His broad face grew radiant with joy; his stentorian voice drowned all others—but his laugh—to conceive it, you must have heard it, it was a good, honest laugh—a healthy laugh, that seemed as though it would shatter his huge chest, and in which his whole frame participated. Though he had left his native place at the age of sixteen, he had preserved the provincial accent in all its strength. Sometimes, to tease him, we would criticize his pronunciation:

"What are you driving at?" he would say. "I am a Provençal; with us, French is only the accessory; I speak the language of oe, the oldest in Europe, and which is yet spoken by more than half of France."

By more than half of France, he meant Moulins, Grenoble and Lyons.

Besides the accent, all his stories had a certain smack of the strange and wonderful. Good or bad, they were always original; and sometimes upset all our ordinary notions of history and geography. And don't suppose he lied—oh no, he believed all he said firmly, and if he was mistaken, it was in the most perfect good faith. Being, as we have said, of a good family, the marquis deemed, as a matter of course, that he was born an officer; and before he was sixteen, he entered the Royal-Comtois regiment of infantry, in which he soon rose to the rank of captain. He had evidently been a magnificent looking man in his younger days. With much mother-wit, and a very tenacious memory, but without instruction and never reading anything but the newspapers, he was a good christian in the way in which men of fashion were under Louis XV, that is, without its interfering in the least with his pleasures or prejudices.

"Marquis," we said to him once, "you speak of the Scriptures, and really you speak capitolly; but how do you reconcile it with your many duels?"

"I have all my life long done my duty as a gentleman."

"True, but we are told, that if we are smitten upon one cheek, we should turn the other."

"Pray to whom was this said?"

"To the apostles."

"The apostles were not gentlemen of the modern school. You see that that does not apply to me."

And the me was uttered in a tone worthy of Louis XIV.

Though the marquis died only last Sunday, he had been buried five and forty years before. He used to tell it thus:

"In 1791, I went to St. Domingo with my regiment. I had hardly landed, before I caught the yellow fever from eating too much fruit—dates, pine-apples, oranges, and especially advocates: the advocates are confounded tough morsels to get along with, (here he would laugh till he cried.) So having eaten too many advocates, I died; that is, they put me in a coffin. I was lowered down, and three files were loading their pieces to pay me the last honours, when all at once, I moved a little in the coffin. They raised me up to know if I had any remarks to make: and I had some."

"What is called the Abogado pear by the Spanish and Avocat by the French."

very important ones, I assure you, for I was only in a swoon. Then Alexandrine, a young negress, who was much attached to me, came up and put some of her herbs into my mouth. I opened my eyes, asked for something to eat—and two days afterwards was at the head of my company."

Those who have lived in the Antilles will readily believe the above, for many tribes have acquainted the slaves with simple specifics, which European physicians have never yet been able to discover.

We used to laugh heartily, whenever the marquis told us of his early burial; which happened, taking one year with another, about twice a fortnight. But we felt no inclination to laugh, when he told us of his return to France, when he first heard of the death of Louis XVI.

"In February, '93," he used to say, "we were betrayed to the enemy." (How could he be expected to own that the Royal-Comtois had been beaten by Jean François's negroes?) "The whole regiment went to the devil—(excuse the expression, the marquis was generally pretty energetic)—of two hundred officers of noble blood, we had only forty-five left. We were shipped on board a merchantman, Captain Robert, bound to Bordeaux; this captain had orders to throw us into the sea, one by one, as soon as we were in order water. Luckily he was a good man, and one that feared God, this Captain Robert: he did not execute this bloody order, and never told us of it till we had reached the coast of France. Judge if we were then grateful to him! We had suffered so much most of us, that we cared little for life; we were willing to lose it, but we wanted it to be in the king's service, and if possible in his sight. We rejoiced in the idea of once more seeing the virtuous Louis XVI, and of bringing back to him all that remained of his faithful Royal-Comtois. Then all at once, two English cruisers chased us, and we were in great danger of being sent to rot in Portsmouth jail; after being thinned out by the negroes, and the yellow fever. Spite of the storm, a pilot came out to us. "Nasty weather, citizens!" said he, as he sprung on board.

"But the king!" we all cried out, "the king! what is the king doing! how is the king?"

"The king? he is dead."

"Dead! (we all fell on our knees) of what?"

"Guillotined."

"Hats off, gentlemen!" said our good captain. He then walked slowly to the binnacle, took up his prayer-book, and began to read the prayers for those in extremity; we finished the De Profundis just as we entered the port of Bordeaux. There we found the new authorities, with red caps on their heads; and, from the dock we landed at, we could see the guillotine. There were five and forty noblemen of us, all on our knees, unarmed, white cockades in our hats, and the cross of St. Louis on our breast: but the people, through pity or respect for us, the people rescued us. We were separated and hurried off, one into a shop, one up an alley to a place of safety. None of us perished then, but we were forced to emigrate, to quit that France we had so long cherished the hope of seeing!"

It was not till the restoration, that the old marquis enjoyed this privilege. His life was simple and regular; he had no enemies, but he could not say he had a friend; he was alone in the world. We missed him lately from the court-room for near a week, and found that he was ill, and that knowing no one to call upon, he had sent a note to the door-keeper of the court, requesting him to collect his quarter's pension. It was, however, too late; he never lived to receive it. He was buried at the publick expense; no stone marks his grave, and nothing but this sketch remains of the Marquis de Commandaire, the descendant of the kings of Arragon.

SELECT NOUVELLETES.

THE COQUETTE.

BY JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

"I WILL not marry yet," was her reply—her face half averted from the kneeling figure beside her, whom still she refused to retain her hand—whose arm still encircled her waist, unforbidden. "I will not marry yet; and love was in the tone of the very accents that withheld the boon of love, or deferred the bestowal of it."

St. Aubyn was a young man of moderate fortune; accomplished, unsophisticated, of quick sensibilities. A student, and fond of retirement, he had selected for his summer residence a small fishing hamlet, on the romantic coast of Devonshire; where, between his books and the sea-shore, along which he loved to ramble, his time passed anything but heavily. Here he had resided about a month, when the little community received an addition, in a young lady and her mother, who joined it for the purpose of a temporary residence; and St. Aubyn stepped back, in surprise, when, issuing one morning from the cabin in which he lodged, he beheld two females, in the attire, and with the air, of fashion—the one leaning upon the arm of the other—approaching the humble portal whence he had just emerged. He bowed, however, and passed on.

He had scarcely more than glanced at the strangers; but, transient as was his survey of them, he saw that one of them was an invalid—the younger. "How touching is the languor which indisposition casts over beauty!" exclaimed St. Aubyn to himself. "Health would improve the loveliness of that face, but the interest which now invests it would vanish. No visitation," he continued, "but late hours and crowded rooms have sent her hither—for I prophesy she comes to make some stay. Sidmouth would be change of scene, not change of occupation!" He was right. St. Aubyn returned from his ramble earlier than was his custom. His thoughts, that day, were in the hamlet, and not upon the shore. He approached his lodging with something like the emotions of expectation and suspense. He looked at his landlady, on entering, as if he expected her to communicate something; and was disappointed when she merely returned the ordinary response to his salutation. He entered his apartment, dispirited, and threw himself into a chair near the window, the sash of which he threw up, as if he wanted air. For the first time, he felt the oppression of loneliness. "They have not come to stop," said he to himself, and absolutely with a sigh—and no wonder! In an assembly, a lovely, graceful, and delicate woman, beheld for the first time, would have exacted from him only the ordinary tribute which beauty shares with beauty; but, in a remote little fishing hamlet, inhabited by beings as rude as their neighbours, the sea and the rocks, such a vision could hardly come, and vanish, without leaving a strong impression upon the beholder. St. Aubyn sat abstracted, chagrined—mortified.

The opening of a window, in a cabin opposite, roused him. The sash was thrown up by a white arm shining through a sleeve of muslin, thin as gauze. Presently, a dimpled elbow reposed upon the sill; and a cheek of pensive sweetness sank upon a hand, so small, so white, that it seemed to have been modelled for no other office than to palliate such a burden. A thrill ran through St. Aubyn, quickening him into wakeful life.

How the hand talks! What passion, thought, and sentiment are in it! What tongues are the fingers! Oh! the things that the hand which St. Aubyn sat watching, discoursed to him, as it changed its posture—now with the palm, now with the back, kissing its owner's cheek—now extending one finger upon the marble, ample temple—now enwrithing itself with one jetty curl and another—now passed over the arched bright forehead—now lowered, and languidly drooping from the window-frame, upon which the arm to which it belonged lay motionless—then raised again, with slow and waving motion, till it closed with the cheek that half met it—then gradually crossed over the bosom that seemed to heave with a sigh as it passed, and pressed to the heart—then clasped with its beautiful fingers, and carried to the back of the head, the full elastic arms swelling and whitening, as they contracted!

St. Aubyn gazed on entranced. Hitherto, the cheek alone of the fair invalid had been presented to him, but now her head turned: her eyes met his and dropped,—she rose and withdrew.

Only glimpses of her did St. Aubyn catch again, that evening,—but they were frequent. A hand—an elbow—the point of her shoulder—once or twice her figure, flitting backwards and forwards, as she paced up and down the apartment. Dusk fell: still he remained at his post. Was it a guitar that he heard? It was but awakened as the first notes of an Eolian harp, which you hold your breath to hear. Her hand was on the strings: one chord at length she struck full; another succeeded—and another. Then all was silence, for a time. St. Aubyn still remained at the window,—nor in vain. The music woke again, as fairy soft as before; and a voice—soft as the music, but oh! far sweeter—awoke, along with it. She was singing, but he could hear nothing except the strain; and yet he heard enough to tell him that it was the theme of tenderness, though sung by fits, that rather seemed to help than mar the passionate mood. The stars shone out; the moon, in her first quarter half completed, showed her bright crescent clear though setting; the folds of a white drapery shone dimly through the still open casement. Did the wester approach, to look out and gaze upon the fair night? No. The sash was pulled down; the string and the voice were hushed: the interesting minstrel had retired. St. Aubyn retired too; but, though his head was upon the pillow, not a moment of that night were his vision and his ear withdrawn from the open window.

It was broad day before forgetfulness cast her spell over the excited spirits of St. Aubyn, nor was it broken till high noon. He arose, emerged from his chamber, and took an anxious survey of the habitation opposite. The room appeared empty. Her partook of a slight repast; and saluting out, made his way to the shore. He had not proceeded far, when, turning a point, he beheld the elder female, about a hundred yards in advance of him, standing still, and looking anxiously upwards towards the cliff. He followed with an appearance, to the direction of her eyes, and saw the younger, half way up, reclining upon her side. Something appeared to betimes. He quickened his pace; and, joining the former, learned from her, that her daughter, attempting to reach the top of the cliff, had incautiously turned, and, unaccustomed to look from a height, was prevented by terror from proceeding or descending; that, from the same cause, she had slipped down several feet; and that she, herself, durst not attempt to go to her assistance. St. Aubyn had heard enough; he bounded up the steep. As he approached the fair one, modesty half overcame terror, and she made a slight effort to repair the disorder into which her dress had been thrown by the accident. St. Aubyn assisted to complete what she had effected but imperfectly; he encouraged her, raised her, and propping her fair form with his own, led her, step by step, down to the beach again. Nor, when she was in perfect safety, did he withdraw his assistance,—nor did she decline it; though, as apprehension subsided, confusion rose, colouring her pale cheek to crimson, at the recollection of the plight in which she had been found. Her ankle was slightly sprained, she said, having turned under her, when she slipped. What was this, if not a warrant for the proffer of an arm? At all events, St. Aubyn construed it as such, and escorted the fair stranger, leaning upon him, back to her lodgings. From that moment, a close intimacy commenced. They were constantly together,—sometimes accompanied by the mother,—more frequently, and at last wholly alone. Communing in solitude, between the sexes and in the midst of romantic scenery, where there is no impediment, no distaste on either side, is almost sure to awaken and to foster love. St. Aubyn loved. The looks, the actions, all but the tongue of Amelia assured him that his passion was returned. Her health had improved rapidly; the autumn was far advanced, and the evenings and nights were growing chill. The mother and daughter now talked of returning to town: a day was fixed for their departure; and, on the eve of that day, St. Aubyn threw himself at the feet of the lovely girl, and implored her to bless him with her hand. Yet, though she did not deny that he had interested her—though her eyes and her cheek attested it—though the hand which was locked in his, locked his as well—though she suffered him to draw her towards him, by the tenure of her graceful waist—still was her reply,—“I will not marry yet.”

St. Aubyn did not require to ask if his visits would be permitted in town—he was invited to renew them there. An excursion to Paris, however, on a matter of pressing necessity, respecting the affairs of a friend, prevented his return for a month. At the expiration of that time, he found himself in London; and with a throbbing heart, repaired to the habitation of his mistress, on the very evening of his arrival. The house was lighted up;—there was a ball. He was scarcely dressed for a party; yet he could not overcome his impatience to behold again the heroine of the little fishing hamlet. He rang, at the same moment when a knot of other visitors came to the door; and entering along with them, was ushered into a hall-room, the footman hurriedly announcing the names of the several parties. The dance was proceeding. It was the whirling waltz—

The dance of contact, else
Forbidden! abandoning to the free hand
The sacred waist; while face to face—that breath
Died kiss with breath, and eye embraced eye—
Your tranced coil relaxing, straightening—round
And round, in waltz measure, you enwined
Circle with circle—till the swimming strain
And panting heart, in swoony lapse, gave o'er!

It was the waltz, and the couple consisted of a man of the town and—Amelia!

The party who had entered, with St. Aubyn, immediately took seats; but he stood, transfixed to the spot where his eyes first caught the form of his mistress, in the coil of another. She saw not him. With laughing eyes, and cheeks flushed with exertion, she continued the measure of licence, her spirits mounting, as the music quickened, until she seemed to float round her partner, who freely availed himself of the favourable movement of the step, to draw her towards him, in momentary pressure. They, at length, at dawn amidst the applauses of the company. St. Aubyn writhed! He retired to a quarter of the room where he thought he should escape observation, and threw himself into a chair.

“Who think you, now, is the happy man?” said one of the group of gentlemen who stood within a few paces of him.
“Why, who, if not Singleton?” replied another; “he has waltzed himself into her heart. This is the twentieth time I have seen her dance with him.”

“Oh! another will waltz him out of her heart,” interposed a third; “she is an incorrigible coquette, from first to last.”

Here the party separated. St. Aubyn, scarcely knowing what he did, after sitting abstracted for a few minutes, rose, and passed out of the hall-room.

He descended the staircase, with the intention of quitting the house; but the supper-room had been just thrown open, and the press carried him in. Nor was he allowed to stop until he had reached the head of the table. Every seat but two, close to where he stood, was occupied. “By your leave sir!” said a voice behind him. He stepped back; and the waiter led his mistress to one of them, and placed himself beside her. St. Aubyn would have retreated—but could not without incommending the company, who thickly hemmed him in. Amelia drew her gloves from the white arms they little enhanced by covering—the waiter assisting her, and transferring them to the custody of his bosom. His eyes explored the table in quest of the most delicate of the viands, which, one after another, he recommended to her; until she made a selection. He filled a wine-glass with sparkling Burgundy, and presented it to her; then crowned a goblet, till the liquid almost overbore the brim—breathed her name over it, in a sigh—and quaffed it off to the bottom, at a draught. He leaned his cheek to hers, till the neighbours almost touched. He whispered her—and she replied in whispers. He passed his arm over the back of her chair, partly supplanting it in the office of supporting her shoulders. He pressed so close to her, that it would have been the same had both been sitting in one seat. She was either unconscious of the familiar vicinity, or she permitted it. The whispering continued; the word “marriage” was uttered—repeated—repeated again. St. Aubyn heard her distinctly reply, “I will not marry yet;” as she rose, and, turning, met him face to face!

“St. Aubyn!” she involuntarily exclaimed. St. Aubyn spoke not, save with his eyes, which he kept fixed steadfastly upon her.

“When did you arrive?” she inquired hurriedly, and in extreme confusion.

“This evening,” replied St. Aubyn, without removing his eyes.

“When did you join our party?”

“While you were waltzing,” returned St. Aubyn, with a smile.

“And how long have you been standing here?”

“Since supper commenced; I made way for your partner to hand you to that seat, and place himself beside you.”

“You have not supped! sit down, and I will help you.”

“No!” said St. Aubyn, shaking his head, and smiling again.

“My mother has not seen you yet! Come and speak to her.”

“No! I have not a moment to spare. I leave town immediately.”

“When?”

“To-night!—Farewell!” said he, turning to go.

“You surely are not going yet!” earnestly interposed Amelia.

“I must not stay,” emphatically rejoined St. Aubyn. “For one object alone I came to town. That is finally disposed of. The necessity for my departure is imperative. Remember me to your mother. Good night!” he added, moving towards the door.

“Have you been well?” she inquired, almost tremulously. He continued his progress as fast as the thorough permitted him—affecting not to hear her. She followed, laid her hand upon his arm, and stopped him.

“You surely are not well now,” she said in a tone of solicitude.

“No,” he replied, passing on till he reached the door.

“St. Aubyn!” she exclaimed, heedless of those who surrounded her, “stay a little longer!—an hour—half an hour—the quarter of an hour.”

St. Aubyn stopped; and turning, looked upon her, with an expression so tender, yet so stern, that she half shrank as she met his gaze.

“Not a moment!” he replied; “I should be only a clog upon your pastime. I do not wait!”—Then snatched her hand—raised it to his lips—kissed it—and dropping it, hurried down the staircase, and departed.

Amelia, at once perceived the awkwardness of her situation, recovered her self-possession, and with well-dissembled mirth, affected to laugh.

“A poor jest,” she exclaimed, “whom I pity, notwithstanding his extravagant aberrations of mind. He is innocent, in his madness. But come, let us forget him.”

The dance was resumed. She was the queen of the mirthful hour that shone, surpassing all. She laughed, she rallied, she challenged, she outdid herself—her spirits towering the more, the more the revel waned. Party after party dropped off; still she kept it up till she was left utterly alone—and then she rushed to her chamber, and cast herself upon a couch—dissolved in tears.

She loved St. Aubyn. Vainly had been touched before—but never sentiment, till she visited the little fishing hamlet, on the coast of Devonshire. At first, she could not persuade herself that St. Aubyn would not return;—but a month set that point perfectly at rest. She drooped. Society, amusement, nothing could rouse her into her former self. Her partner in the waltz in vain solicited her to stand up with him again. She declined the honour; his visits were discouraged. Her mother anxiously watched the depression of spirits that had taken possession of her, and seemed daily to increase. The winter passed without improvement—the spring. Summer set in; bloom and fire returned—but cheer was a stranger to her heart. Change of scene was recommended. She was asked to make choice of the place whither she would go—she replied, with a sigh, “to the little fishing hamlet.”

She and her mother arrived there early on a Sunday morning; and re-occupied the identical lodging which they had taken before. The landlady, a kind hearty creature, expressed her surprise and sorrow at the altered appearance of her young lodger.

“Ah,” the young gentleman would be sorry to see this—though he has had his turn of sickness too; but he is now quite recovered.”

“Mr. St. Aubyn?” breathlessly inquired Amelia.

“Yes,” replied the landlady, “that same handsome, kind young gentleman.”

“Merciful heaven! is he here?” she vehemently demanded.

“He is, my lady,” returned the landlady.

“Mother!”—she exclaimed, as she turned upon the latter a look, in which pleasure was painted, for the first time since the momentous night of the ball—“Where does he lodge?” asked Amelia, turning to the landlady.

“In the same place. He came back, about a month after he left,” added the landlady. “Poor young gentleman!” she continued, “we all thought he had come to die amongst us—so pale, so melancholy. He would keep company with no one—would speak to no one, and at last he took company to his bed.”

Amelia laid her head upon her hand, covering her eyes; her tears had begun to flow.

“But the daughter of our neighbour, who had a rich brother that sent his niece to school, and had determined to adopt her—having completed her time, came upon a visit to her father, shortly after the return of the young gentleman, and her mother made her read to him constantly, to divert him; and he grew fond of listening to her, and well he might, for a sweet young creature she is, and at last his health took a turn; and he was able to quit his bed, and to walk, as he used with you, my lady, rambling, whole hours, along the shore with her.”

The eyes of Amelia were now lifted to the landlady's face. Her tears were gone, all but the traces of them; they seemed as they were glazed. The landlady had paused at the sound of several voices and a kind of bustle without; and now ran to the window.

“Come hither, ladies!” she said, “they are just coming out!”

Amelia, by a convulsive effort, rose, and hastily approached the window with her mother.

“Here they come!” resumed the landlady, “and this is the end of my story. The young gentleman, at last, fell in love with his sweet young nurse, and offered to marry her. She had already fallen in love with him: she accepted him, and, this very morning they are going to church. There they are! look! did you ever see so sweet a sight! What a couple! God bless them! They were made for one another!”

The landlady started and looked around. Amelia had fallen in a swoon upon the floor. With difficulty they recovered her. In an hour her mother was on her way with her from the little fishing hamlet.

In a month she dressed her in a shroud!

EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM LONDON.

The Venice question—Lady Flora Hastings—On dit respecting Lord Melbourne—Equestrianism—Anecdotes of the Queen—Dukes and Lords—the Theatre—Mr. James Crow, etc. etc.

DEAR ———. War, scandal, agitation, matrimony, routs, balls, monkeys, lions, and the great metropolis crammed to repletion, afford us ample subjects for the signal success in dispelling odious and yawning ennui.

We are unquestionably decided upon shirking the Maine question, and our reply is, "we prefer being excused." If the old duke was at the helm, perhaps the case might be different, and a friendly rubber indulged to those fire-eaters who so gallantly burnt powder at a print of our little queen. Hard knocks must be exchanged, when John Bull and brother Jonathan go at log-gerheads, and the white bear would certainly avail himself of the opportunity, when the former was out of breath. Poor old fellow! to claw that valuable property in fee, the possessions in India. So that you really must excuse us giving the chance of such a calamity.

Lady Flora Hastings, a lady-in-waiting to the dutchess of Kent, has been the object of slander in the palace, creating a great sensation in all classes of society. Two chattering tabbies—Ladies! Portman and Faircloth, reported to her majesty the opinion of one Sir James Clark, physician to the dutchess of Kent, that the interesting Lady Flora, (as fair as the goddess herself), was in a condition unsuited to the continuance of her honourable station. With impolitic haste the Queen sent instantly a command, "that she was not to appear in her presence." Upon investigation, the shameful story proved totally groundless; and her majesty, "with unshed tears swimming in her eyes," made an ample apology to the much injured lady, expressing a profound regret for the cruel, but unintentional wrong committed. A report is prevalent that Lord Melbourne popped the question to the dutchess of Kent, and is a successful story; but in my opinion without reasonable foundation. The Premier is not of a marrying inclination, resembling the gay summer insect in his taste, "flying from flower to flower, sipping all buds that are pretty and sweet." By the way, creeching would have been more appropriate, for my lord is far down the hill of life. However, still the glow of beauty's eye quickens his pulse, and the bright approving smile is often awarded for his polished gallantry.

Equestrianism is the reigning fashion. No young fair one dare disp a negative, when asked "if she rides?" A stare of infinite wonder would follow, if the indispensable accomplishment were wanting. Far better would the confession of eating beef sound, than not being in the habit of wearing a habit. The Queen has rendered the mania for horse exercise so fashionable, that many a learned M. D. sorrows in secret the adopting of this health-bestowing and invigorating amusement. Her majesty's riding costume has frequently been noticed, from its neatness and elegance combined; but her whip, strange to say, has escaped remark, for

"Of all the whips that e'er were made,
This whip whips them all!"

It is about three-quarters of a yard in length, composed of horse-hair. The handle is dead silver, embossed with flowers, and extends ten inches. At the end is a bird holding a chain, to which is attached a finger-ring, all of the finest gold, and exquisitely worked. Small circles of gold ornament it within a short space of the end, which forms a short thong. The pretty trifle cost thirty-eight pence.

You probably have seen Fanny Kemble—now, by the by, Mrs Butler—if so, you have a perfect resemblance of the Queen's mode of managing a horse: high-spirited, bold; but not very elegant. I saw her upon one occasion display great nerve with her favourite, a small bay horse, with arched neck and switch tail. The animal refused to pass a wheelbarrow in St. John's Wood-road. Twice, with difficulty, he was adroitly turned towards it by the expert hand of his royal mistress, when a groom galloping up, proceeded to remove the object of aversion. "Let it remain," exclaimed the Queen, at the same moment inflicting a sharp cut upon the shoulder of the offending horse. Again he turned from it, when the whip cracked upon his glossy coat—one—two—three—with such earnestness, that the horse, after twirling innumerable capers, rearing upon his haunches almost perpendicularly, and bounding into the air—thought it advisable to obey the imperial mandate, by placing his nose quietly, and close to the wheelbarrow. With flushed cheek, her majesty patted her forgiveness, and with a merry triumphant laugh, cantered away with her young and gay suite.

The balls at the palace commence next month, and are anticipated to be very brilliant. The Princess Augusta is to attend "the festive scenes" this season, and will make her début at one of the Queen's parties.

The Duke of Wellington is in excellent health and very popular. He may be seen rolling about the parks daily, with all the unostentation of a truly great man.

The Duke of Devonshire found it convenient to go abroad, notwithstanding his immense income. His magnificence of living exhausted the coffers for a time. His grace visits Athens, Constantinople, etc.

Lord Brougham is very unwell from a disease in his throat, and is still at Paris. His daughter is said to be very handsome. When I last saw her, severe indisposition had rendered her quite an object of pity.

The Crown Prince of Russia will arrive here early in June. This illustrious personage will be regarded with a jealous eye, although great attention will be paid to him.

Our theatres—oh, the taste! are metamorphosed into menageries. Where the immortal Keen was, there a tiger howls—where a Mahbran, a lion roars. Now, is not this too hard!—However, it has been patronized by the highest in the land, and therefore, must be correct, I suppose.

Hosts of monkeys are at the minor theatres, and lots of apes wait to grin at their prototypes, producing golden results to their respective exchequers. All London is singing "Such a gettin' up stairs," imported in the person of Mr. James Crow-Rice. He is an amusing fellow, and never fails to create plenty of mirth. My purse of news is exhausted. Adieu.

SKETCHES OF THE BAR.

THE COURTS OF LAW—THE SESSIONS.

PERHAPS few scenes among the many which attract the attention of the promiscuous population in a crowded metropolis, are more redolent with instruction, if rightly considered, than the criminal courts. Within their gloomy precincts are gathered the bloated victim of intemperance, the loxxy-practitioner of deception, the despairing child of poverty, and the hardened veteran in vice. The distinction between colours, grades, ages, and sexes, are lost in the republic of infamy, and one not unfrequently meets, arranged in the same dock, individuals whose outward seeming would separate them "wide as the poles," if their moral obliquity had not thrown them in companionship. The Court of Sessions was, for a great number of years, under the direction of the honourable Richard Riker, our late worthy recorder. The legal acquirements of that gentleman are too widely known and appreciated to need any eulogy. As a jurist, profoundly learned in the depths of criminal laws—as a judge, possessing a mind at once comprehensive, discriminating, and logical—and as a man, merciful, conciliating, and virtuous—his fame will continue to gather lustre from the lapse of years. The honourable Robert H. Morris, the present Recorder and Chief Judge of the Sessions, is a son of the late Governor Morris, whose history is so honourably identified with the early period of the republic. Mr. Morris, although his standing at the bar was not possibly in the first rank, was, at the period of his selection, in the possession of an extensive practice, and with one or two exceptions, which are considered unfortunate by our best lawyers, his decisions have been favourably received. Without any pretension to the experience of his predecessor, his knowledge of criminal law is quite equal to the most of his contemporaries, still at the bar, and time and practice will no doubt qualify him to grasp the most weighty questions, which are mooted in our criminal tribunals. James R. Whiting, Esq., the district-attorney, although still a young man, has exhibited powers of the highest order since his elevation to his present station. Before his appointment his practice had for several years been very extensive, and his talents and legal acquirements were highly appreciated, but in several instances since his induction into his present responsible office, he has elicited the admiration of bench, bar, and auditory, by the comprehensive grasp of his mind, and his fervid and manly eloquence. One prominent characteristic of Mr. Whiting's mind is that of depth and intensity of feeling. Unlike some lawyers who consider stoicism and callousness indispensable to success in the profession, the district-attorney permits the feelings of his heart to go par passu with his reason and judgment, and he is thus enabled to strike every chord of sympathy in the breasts of judge and jury, and to bring forth a favourable response. In the cross-examination of witnesses, his discrimination of character is highly-effective, and he seldom fails to detect perjury, however skillfully veiled. Possessed of a vivid imagination, and armed with the lighter weapons of wit and satire, his efforts, when he chooses to exert his powers, present a rapid succession of assaults on the defences of his antagonist, and a skilful resort to every honourable stratagem to fortify his own position.

In addition to his skill as a jury lawyer, Mr. Whiting is considered an able counsellor; and his native benevolence renders him peculiarly adapted to the nature of his present duties, when innocence is at times confounded with guilt, and where the proper discrimination between veniality and confirmed baseness so frequently aids in snatching the young delinquent from the brink of destruction. The appearance of the sessions during the preparations for an exciting trial, is worthy of note. The recorder and two aldermen, who compose the bench of judges, occupy an elevated seat, which commands a view of the whole auditory. Beneath them are stationed the clerk of the court and the crier, who are flanked on either side within the railing, which separates the court and its appendages from the audience, by counsel, jury, and officers on duty. Without the railing, a motley assemblage are congregated, exhibiting specimens of all the various grades of society, from the mottled complexion of the houseless vagrant to the well-dressed figure of the fashionable "man about town." At length the crier has uttered his nasal "oh, yes!"—the jury have been called and tried with as much ceremony as the prisoner whom they were summoned to judge—the counsel gathers up his briefs, and assumes the solemnity proper to the occasion—the prisoner is placed in the dock, and the innocent witnesses are given over to the tender mercies of the legal gentlemen, who whet their scapels in anticipation of the usual cutting up.

In fact, of all the parties concerned in the trial of a celebrated criminal, I know of none more entitled to our sympathy, than the novice who is first placed on the stand as a witness.

Confronted by an array of dignitaries, whose solemn visages, and imposing manner frighten him from his propriety, he no sooner reaches the stand than he is assailed with extreme severity by a practised gladiator, whose blows on his consistency and integrity fall thick and fast, until he retires to his seat overwhelmed with confusion, and in doubt whether in reality he has answered to the name of Tom Jones or John Smith.

In many instances, the prisoner at the bar exhibits less feeling than any other individual in the assemblage, and I have at times witnessed a burst of emotion throughout the crowded auditory while listening to the soul-stirring appeals of the eloquent counsel, while the criminal in the dock was entirely unmoved.

In fact, it is a study to view the various degrees of guilt, as represented by the actors in the scene, from the trembling nerves of the novice to the stolid indifference of the veteran in iniquity.

Let the young, therefore, beware of taking the first step in depravity, lest in its gloomy vortex they lose the power of volition, and become steeped in pollution beyond the power of recall. It is painful to witness the talent and adroitness frequently exhibited by arraigned criminals in their efforts to escape punishment; for the same abilities, if exerted in an honourable sphere, would not only insure worldly competence, but might have exalted the delinquent to a station sufficiently elevated to gratify the aspirations of ever-vaulting ambition.—Madisonian.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

THE ANGEL'S WING.—BY SAMUEL LOVER.

THERE is a German superstition, that when a sudden silence takes place in a company, an angel at that moment makes a circuit among them, and the first person who breaks the silence is supposed to have been touched by the wing of the passing seraph. For the purposes of poetry, I thought two persons preferable to many, in illustrating this very beautiful superstition.

When by the evening's quiet light
There sat two silent lovers,
They say, while in such tranquil plight,
An angel round them hovers:
And further still old legends tell,—
The first who breaks the silent spell,
To say a soft and pleasing thing,
Hath felt the passing angel's wing.

Thus, a musing minstrel stray'd
By the summer ocean,
Gazing on a lovely maid,
With a bard's devotion:—
Yet his love he never spoke,
Till now the silent spell he broke
The hidden fire to flame did spring,
Fann'd by the passing angel's wing!

"I have loved thee well and long,
With love of heaven's own making!
This is not a poet's song,
But a true heart's speaking:
I will love thee, still untired!"
He felt—he spoke—as one inspired—
The words did from Truth's fountain spring,
Unwakened by the angel's wing!

Silence o'er the maiden fell,
Her beauty lovelier making:
And by her blush, he knew full well
The dawn of love was breaking.
It came like sunshine o'er his heart!
He felt that they should never part,
She spoke—and on!—the lovely thing
Had felt the passing angel's wing.

PETITGOAT GOVERNMENT.—The following scrap, from the Army and Navy Chronicle, contains some intelligence which we think will be new to the majority of our readers. For our own part, we are free to acknowledge that we were unaware of such a power behind the throne in Peru. Signora Gamarra must be a modern Semiramis: "The government of Peru is at present in the hands of a woman. Madame Gamarra is a female Bonaparte; and though her husband is nominally the head of the republic, she is the real sovereign. It was owing to her energy that he rose from the ranks of the army, a common soldier, to his present rank. It is said that she never permits any subject, pertaining to the government, to be discussed even in private council, without her presence; and she always accompanies the President on his official visits, especially those made to foreign dignitaries. General Gamarra made a visit, not long since, to our squadron, accompanied by the different ministers of departments. Madame Gamarra of course with him. After the customary salutes, they entered the commodore's cabin, where refreshments were offered, and the usual compliments exchanged. When Madame Gamarra thought they had remained a sufficient length of time, she rose, looked around her with the air of an empress, and uttering the single word "vamos!" (begone!) left the cabin, the others following her out like a pack of sheep following their leader. She always wears pistols and a dirk, and is said to be a good shot. Not long since, finding some fault with the police and discipline of one of the regiments of the army, she sent for the colonel commanding it, and reprimanded him in a manner to which he did not feel inclined to submit, especially from a woman; he replied that he would hold himself responsible to the President, but not to the President's wife. He was soon taught, however, whom he had to deal with; for Madame Gamarra immediately commanded him to silence, and at the same time, presenting a pistol, told him that if he uttered another word of insolence, she would drive the bullet through his head. Some say that her husband has more than once experienced such a threat; but we all know the world is addicted to scandal."

WELLERISME.—"It appears to me I have seen you somewhere before," as the man said ven the collector called on him the twenty-seventh time for money. "You've got a bite," as the angler said to the piven the dog had him by the ear. "No soft soap," as the mouse said ven puss patted him on the cheek, preparatory to taking off his head.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"John Smith's Letters, with 'Picters' to match." Containing reasons why John Smith should not change his name, Sam Deby Smith's juvenile spirit, together with the only authentic history of the late war in our disputed territory. New-York. Samuel Colman.

"Smith—Smith—John Smith! I certainly have heard that name before."

The last of these letters appeared in the Mirror of the past week; and here we have them in the book form, cleverly illustrated with engravings on steel, from designs by Parcell. This adds one more to the innumerable volumes that have been collated from the pages of this journal. By the following letter from John Smith, to the republisher of his epistles, it will be seen that considerable commotion has been produced in Sm.ithville, by his appearance in print before the publick.

Smithville, Down East, in the state of Maine, April 25, 1839.
To Mr. Samuel Colman, No. 8 Astor House, New-York.

DEAR SIR—I see by some of the papers that you are a goin' to put out a book, containing my letters that I've been writing to the New-York Mirror. That I should ever come to be the writer of a book is what I never expected; but strange things happen now-a-days; and if you think the letters that I and my son John have writ, are worth making into a book, I'm willing you should do it. If you are a goin' to have picters in it, as the papers say you be, I wish you would send me a few of 'em, for there's nothing in this world that my children likes to see so well as they do picters.

Cousin Deby says it is the fashion, when anybody puts out a book, to have it dedicated to somebody; and if you should think it best to put in a dedication, I want it to be to uncle Joshua Downing, of Downingville, out of respect I feel for the memory of my cousin, Major Jack Downing. I don't mean none of your New-York counterfeits Jack Downings, that stole my cousin Jack's name, but my own dear cousin, the Ma'or, that writ all his letters in the Portland Courier, and the Downing Gazette, printed in Portland, State of Maine. I send a dedication that you can put in, if you think it best. Your friend and well-wisher, JOHN SMITH, ESQ.

"Leonard's Arithmetick." Boston: G. W. Light.
Not all our numerous readers, we presume, will be very deeply agitated by the announcement of this work, the title or publication, for published it is, by Mr. Light of Boston. It has not the popular interest of a new romance, or a spicy tragedy. There is neither murder nor love in it. But now and then, between ourselves, gentle reader, we do feel conscience bound, disbelieve it who may, about these really useful books, which, if they are not popular, most richly deserve to be so. Such, in a word, we mean to say is Leonard's work—a work of extraordinary merit—clear, simple, natural, yet not too simple, (like too many of the new school books); but manly and thoroughgoing, and withal remarkably adapted in every way to the daily, actual, practical wants of the mass of the people, and the people's children in the schools. More explanation would make this obvious, but ours is no journal for lengthened analyses of scientific works; and this we must leave, therefore, as it now lies, commending it, however, to the attention and the examination of all committees and teachers who may chance to see this notice.

"The Ballantynes Humbug Handled." Such is the title of a pamphlet published by Lockhart, in reply to the "Refutation of the slanders against the Ballantynes" contained in Lockhart's Life of Scott. The English correspondent of the Star says:—"It shows, beyond doubt, that the Ballantynes—improvident and lavish, if not actually knavish and dishonest, had contributed to Scott's pecuniary involvements." From an examination of the two pamphlets, it is evident to us that this sweeping opinion is very superficially and flippantly formed. Thus far the Ballantynes evidently have the "vantage-ground" in the controversy, and prove, by facts and figures, rather than rhetorical flourishes, the truth and justice of their position.

"Cheverley, or the Man of Honour." By Lady Lytton Bulwer. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

The rumour that this work was written by Lady Bulwer, as a satire on her husband, from whom she is separated, is evidently a ruse of the booksellers to promote the sale of the book. There is considerable cleverness in some of the sketches of character, but as a whole, the novel is stale and unprofitable. Lady Bulwer may satirize her husband as much as she pleases, but her book gives little promise that she will ever rival him as a novelist.

"Jack Sheppard's Romance." By W. Harrison Ainsworth, Esq., author of "Rookwood," "Crichton," etc. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.
The second number of this work has been issued. It is full of exciting interest, and by the lovers of romance will be sought and read with avidity. The work is to be completed in eight numbers.

"Births, Deaths and Marriages." By Theodore Hook, author of "The Parson's Daughter," "Jack Bragg," etc. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.
This is much superior to the author's last work, "Gurney Married." In exposing the frivolities of fashionable society, and piercing to the inmost motives which sway the heart of the "man of the world," there is no writer of the day who displays a keener sagacity than Hook. In farce, comedy, and caricature, he may be inferior to "Boz," but in truthful delineations of character and society, he soars far above him. His present work is worthy of his reputation.

"Mr. Adams's Oration before the Historical Society." Samuel Colman has in press and will speedily publish the address delivered recently before the Historical Society of this city, by John Quincy Adams. The multitudes who were prevented from hearing it delivered, will undoubtedly be gratified by this intelligence.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We thank our Baltimore friend and correspondent, "D. M.," for communicating the very beautiful verses by "Inez." They shall appear the first opportunity.—The long and minute critique by "Titian," upon the paintings at Clinton-Hall, is, we fear, of too little general interest for our columns. A great proportion of the paintings are wholly new, and of the structures bestowed upon them. We shall look in at the Apollo next week, and will bear in mind the request of an amateur.—The verses upon Stead's statue of Victoria, are clever, but they, but we must respectfully decline them.—"T. V." very article entitled "The Magazine Mania," should appear but for its offensive personalities.—The querulous abuse of "B.," who complains of the withholding of his pieces, is misdirected. If he has anything to say, let him make a personal application, and not indulge in anonymous blackguardism, for, with us, it is as the idle wind, "which we regard not."—We must decline the following verses—"Spring Sunshine," "Thou art gone," "The Day-Star," and "Stanzas," written on seeing Sully's painting of Mrs. Wood.—We conclude in the present number John Neal's valuable paper on New-England Witcraft. It will furnish valuable materials for the future historian of our native state.—A beautiful photo from the pen of our old friend, JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES, will be found in another column of the Mirror of to-day. Although we have not the pleasure of publishing this as an original production, we take some credit to ourselves in being the first to present it to the American people. It is a literary gem—and has all the delicious freshness of a writer who has no superiors among living authors. Long life to dear, dear, Eddy Knowles, whom we remember with a heart-glows.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1839.

The New-York Gazette, Wall-street, and other matters.—Our friend Daniels of the Gazette advertises for a colleague, to relieve him of a portion of the onerous labours of the editorial department of his valuable journal. A better opportunity for agreeable and profitable investment could not be presented. The Gazette is a thriving, popular, and admirably conducted paper, and its editor is a chaste and vigorous writer, and one of the most true-hearted and high-minded of men. It has long been a matter of surprise to us, that a daily journal so thoroughly and ably edited as the Gazette, should be indebted to a single, unassisted editor, for the interest of its columns. In this contemplated association, we trust that Mr. Daniels will succeed in diminishing the onus of his duties, though we doubt if he can better please his readers than by communicating with them himself as frequently as possible. While on the subject of the Gazette, we take the liberty of transferring to our pages the following graphic account, from the pen of the editor, of the "progress of demolition" in Wall-street.—It is as difficult to wend a man's way through Wall-street at this time as it ever was within the memory of the "oldest inhabitant." Physically as well as financially, there is peril in penning that street. Stocks may rise, but stones are falling prodigiously in all directions. We know one valuable source at least, that can bear witness to the fact. The Manhattan and City Bank buildings are, "being" torn down, and there are other edifices in old Wall, also under the beam. New-York ever since we knew it, has been a scene of very long standing, of course—has been a city of modern ruins—a perfect Babel of a day's growth and a day's dilapidation. The builder is abroad one day and is relieved in his labours by the destroyer, the day after. The houses now pulling down would be deemed palaces elsewhere, but not being pretty enough, they must come for something prettier. Next year their successors will likely enough share the fate of their "illustrious predecessors." The Custom-House and Exchange look as though they might last for several years, with proper care, but we tremble every morning lest we should see them taking down before they are half finished. There certainly can be no objection to the erection of better buildings than the ones to which we have just alluded as being in the full tide of prostration, but we do most fervently entreat their proprietors to build something in their stead that need not be demolished before the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and—thereabouts. We beseech that they may be suffered to stand for about four years, at least. We never expect to see the city finished, but we have the greatest anxiety to see it fairly commenced."

Second visit to the exhibition at Clinton-Hall.—The sins of omission in this exhibition are much greater than those of omission. Far better would it have been to have left one half the walls bare than to have disfigured them with such painful caricatures of humanity as meet our eyes in every direction in the large saloon. What can be more totally uninteresting than a commonplace, characterless portrait, badly designed, and unskillfully executed? It would be invidious and superfluous to point out the instances in which this complaint holds good—as they will be sufficiently apparent to all who may visit the hall. At present it chimes better with our humour to hunt out the beauties than to rail at the defects of the exhibition—and to the more agreeable task we proceed. Powell's portrait of Professor Smith (108) is quite a spirited composition, and withal an excellent likeness. This young artist is particularly successful in the expression and attitude of his faces. The "Wife of an Artist," by Alexander, (231,) is truly a masterly production. We have never seen a more life-like and remarkable "counterfeit presentation." It deservedly meets with general admiration. Gambardella's likeness of Dr. Channing, the distinguished divine, is faithful and good, though by no means flattered. "The Nurse and Child," by Sully, (242,) is an exquisite sketch. The contrast between the unmarked face of the mulatto and the clear roseate complexion of the child is startling. We should not omit to make honourable mention of Freeman's "Masaniello," (284,) and also of Spencer's "Mother and Child (107.)" They are both admirable. Frothingham's portrait of a British Naval Officer, (97,) is one of the best of the portraits, and in the same list we would number Huntington's portrait of a lady (56.)

Improvements in the City.—"Pull down, and then build up again—always in the ruins." Such is the exclamation of Philip Van Artevelde of Ghent, and most appropriately may it be said with regard to New-York. In Wall-street—besides those two Titanic structures, the Exchange and the Custom-House, which are in progress—the banking-houses heretofore occupied by the Union and Manhattan, the Merchants' and the City Banks, together with the intermediate house between the National and Manhattan Banks, are already levelled to the ground since the first instant. In Broadway, says the American, at almost every turn, something is altering or repairing. The buildings on the upper corner of Broadway and Maiden-Lane, are no more; the large and handsomely finished house next the corner of Park-Place, is roofless and shuttered, and fast disappearing; the whole range on the upper corner of Chambers-street has vanished—and that is no loss, for they were mere shanties; and, in short, at every turn around, repairs, demolition and construction, are going on. The stocks, they say sometimes in Wall street, are heavy; but there seems plenty of work—high wages—high rents—high markets—and high hopes of peace and prosperity. May these be, as we have reason to think they will, amply realized.

Parisian Literature and Morality.—The Paris Correspondent of the New-York American says—"One of the popular novelists of Paris has just issued a tale, entitled Une Larme du Diable, a Tear of the Devil." The same correspondent significantly remarks—"I presume that his Satanick Majesty has as little occasion to shed tears here, as in any part of the world, especially on the Sabbath. It is about a year since I heard a French lady of three-score, among the most sagacious and observant I have ever known, who, for thirty-five years, had moved most widely through various circles of this capital, where she was born, express the belief that no one million of people in any one area of the globe, thought or prepared so little for another life as the Parisians. The absorbing idea and sin is pleasure, in all the forms and extremes of grossness and refinement, in which it can be yielded by passion, frailty, vice, fancy, taste, genius, talent, money, or labour. According to the medical journal L'Hygie, of the eighteen thousand persons who annually quit this life, in Paris, more than six thousand die in the hospitals, most of whom are victims of sensual excess. The fate of the greater part of the hundreds whose bodies are dragged from the Seine, and of the thousands who tenant the lunatic asylums, is due to the same cause."

Boston Engraving.—One of these days we think of getting up, what we are sure would interest all our readers, some account of the progress of the engraving art in this country—a rich subject. Our attention just now is called to it by some beautiful specimens of the work of two Bostonians—we mean George G. Smith, and N. Dearborn and Co. The "Declaration of Independence" of each is a masterpiece in its way. Nothing can be prettier for a little frame to be hung in one's study. Smith's map of "Mount Auburn," also a sweet thing, will attract notice at this time; and we might say the same of Dearborn's steel cut of Webster, a portrait in a small compass—just in season, by the way, to send to one's English correspondents, now that the great man of America is about making Europe a visit. Dearborn, if we mistake not, was about the earliest of all the wood-engravers in Boston—say twenty-five years since. There are probably hundreds employed there now in the various branches of the art.

Sully's Portrait of the Queen.—The painting of Victoria by Sully is generally acknowledged by the London connoisseurs to convey the best likeness of her majesty that has yet been offered to the publick. A finished proof of the engraving of this painting has been submitted to the Queen and highly approved. Copies have at length been received by the Messrs. Appleton, of Broadway, who are the agents for this country. The engraving is a superb specimen of mezzotint, and is quite an ornamental picture.

The Amaranth.—D. Appleton and Company, who import all the gift books, souvenirs, bijoux, gems, etc., have recently received the Amaranth, a magnificent quarto, edited by T. K. Hervey, which is one of the most imposing and beautiful of all the annuals. At the store of the Messrs. Appleton, in Broadway, may be found a large collection of choice, rare, and elegant works, fresh from the English press, besides splendid editions of the classics and other standard productions.

New-York Literary Gazette.—We like the tone of this beautiful journal. Each number is filled with light, graceful and interesting papers. The original matter is in an easy, flowing style, and the selections are made with exceeding good taste. It is occasionally adorned with engravings. The "Game of Life" is an exquisite production. The highest praise that we can bestow upon the Literary Gazette is to state a simple fact—it is under the editorial direction of a gentleman.

Rooke's new opera.—The title of the new opera by the distinguished composer of "Amilie," is "Henrique, or the Love Pilgrim." It was announced for representation at Covent-Garden, on the thirtieth of last month. Macready, it is said, retires from the management of this theatre, at the close of the season, in consequence of the exorbitant demands of the proprietors.

Charm of dramatic representations.—The Edinburgh Review says—"We have heard of many extraordinary tastes and antipathies, but we never knew an instance of a young person who was not delighted the first time he visited a theatre!" Who that has ever read it can forget Charles Lamb's touching and beautiful description of his first visit to a theatre?

THE YOUTH AND THE SAGE.

"THERE was a time when I could sigh
At woman's foot, and strive to win her—
Swear heaven was pictured in her eye,
And she a saint, and I a sinner.

"Then would soft music's dying fall
Melt a fond heart like mine to sadness—
While the loud trumpet's battle-call
Roused my hot blood almost to madness.

"I found the coyest maid will yield—
But love possessed was ever cloying—
And the red trophies of a field
Some orphan's tears were still alloying.

"I tried them all—and all were vain—
Glory a name—and love, untrue;—
Say, shall I risk my peace again,
For counsel, Sage, I come to you."

The Sage gazed on the downcast boy,
And sadly shook his silver head—
"Yes—sorrow follows fast on joy,
And love is but a dream," he said.

"No more by woman's wiles be caught,
And fly from sickening scenes of slaughter—
In winter—TAKE YOUR TODDY HOT,
In summer—STICK TO GIN AND WATER!"

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.—It is not so much the plan of this stupendous work, which is an extraordinary, as the immense distance of fifteen hundred miles over which it is extended, over mountains of two or three thousand feet in height, and across deep valleys and rivers. It consists of a high mound of earth, cased on each side with bricks or stone, with projecting masonry towers at stated distances. It has been computed that the materials of all the dwelling-houses of England and Scotland, supposing them to be one million eight hundred thousand cubic feet of masonry or brickwork, are barely equivalent to the bulk or solid contents of the great wall of China. Nor are the projecting towers taken into the calculation. These stone, supposing them to continue throughout at bow-shot distances, are calculated to contain as much brickwork as all London. To give another idea of the mass of material in this stupendous fabric, it may be observed, that it is more than sufficient to surround the circumference of the earth, on two of its great circles, with two walls, each six feet high, and two feet thick.

A SARACONIC REPLY.—The Academics of Louvain complained to Margaret, the emperor's sister, and aunt to Charles the Fifth, who was entrusted with the government of the Netherlands, "that Luther, by his writings, was subverting Christianity." "Was it Luther?" inquired the governess. The Academics replied, "he is an illiterate monk." "Is he so," said Margaret; "then you who are very learned and very numerous, write against this illiterate monk: for surely the world will pay more regard to many scholars than to one blockhead."

MODERN AUTHORS.—An experiment, very frequent among modern authors, is to write upon nothing. When the subject is utterly exhausted, to let the pen still move on, by some, called the ghost of wit, delighting to walk after the death of its body. And, to say the truth, there seems to be no part of knowledge, in fewer hands, than that of discerning when to have done.

HAPPINESS.—Our life, it is true, has its bright and its dark hours, yet none are wholly obscured, for when the sun of happiness is set, the reflected moonlight of hope and memory are still around us.

GREAT EVENTS CAUSED BY TRIVIAL INCIDENTS.—The first year of the reign of Charles the First were tranquil and prosperous. "For twelve years," says Lord Clarendon, "the kingdom enjoyed the greatest calm, and the fullest measure of felicity." While this calm endured, the most sagacious politicians were so far from perceiving any indication of the storm they were to direct, that, believing the country was doomed and resigned to the loss of its liberties, they resolved upon leaving it, and transporting themselves in voluntary exile, to a land of freedom. Lord Brook, Lord Say and Sele and his sons, Pym, and other distinguished men of the same sentiments, were about to remove to a settlement in New-England, where the name of Saybrook (in honour of the two noble leaders) had already been given to a township in which they were expected. Eight vessels, with emigrants on board, were ready to sail from the Thames, when the king, by an order of council, forbade their departure, and compelled the intended passengers to come on shore, fatally for himself; for among those passengers Haslerigge, and Hampden, and Cromwell, with all his family, had actually embarked. There are few facts in history which have so much the appearance of fatality as this. Charles and his ministers feared that so many discontented and stirring spirits would be perilous in a colony which, being decidedly hostile to the Church of England, might easily be alienated from the state. They saw clearly the remote danger, but were blind to the nearer and greater evil.

WHITE RACE OF ATLAS.—M. Guyon, chief surgeon of the African army, writes to M. Dureau de la Malle, that at Bouga there is now living a woman, originally from the interior, supposed to be descended from the white tribe of Mount Aoreps. She is at most twenty-six or twenty-eight years of age, of very agreeable physiognomy, blue eyes, fair hair, beautiful teeth, and has a very delicate white skin. She is married to the Imam of the mosques, Sidi Hamed, by whom she has had three children, bearing a strong resemblance to herself. M. Arago observes, that these white people are not rare in that part of the world, as might be supposed; for, when he was going from Bouga to Algiers, in 1806, by land, he saw women of all ages in the different villages, who were quite white, had blue eyes and fair hair, but that the nature of his journey did not permit him to stop and ask if they came from any peculiar tribe.

FALCONRY.—Falconry, which is now so much in disuse among us, was the principal amusement of our ancestors. A person of rank in England, some three or four centuries ago, scarcely stirred out without his hawk upon his hand, which in old paintings is the criterion of nobility. The expense which attended this sport was very great; among the old Welch princes, the king's falconer was the fourth officer of state, but, notwithstanding all his honours, he was forbidden to take more than three draughts of beer from his horn, lest he should get intoxicated, and neglect his duty. In the reign of James the First, Sir Thomas Monson is said to have given a thousand pounds for a cast of hawks; and such was their value in general, that it was made felony, in the reign of Edward the Third, to steal a hawk. To take its eggs, even in a person's own ground, was punishable with imprisonment for a year and a day, together with a fine at the king's pleasure.

LONDON SLANG.—The following is a specimen of the manner in which her most gracious majesty is treated by the London satirical press:—"What are these corn laws," inquired her majesty of her ministers, "about which the people are making so much fuss?" "They have reference, my dear," replied Melbourne, "to the staff of life." "The staff of life," exclaimed the Queen, pray, my lord, has that anything to do with Lord Hill's staff, or is it merely confined to the Life Guards?" Melbourne would have explained, had not her majesty begun amusing herself with the skipping-rope."

MOVEMENTS.—Those only deserve a monument who do not require it; that is, those who have raised themselves in the minds and memories of men.

NATIVE MUSIC.—BY SAMUEL LOVER.

Oh, native music! beyond comparing
The sweetest far on the ear that falls,
Thy gentle numbers the heart remembers,
Thy strains enchain us in tender thralls.
Thy tones endearing,
Or sad or cheering,
The absent soothe on a foreign strand:
Oh! who can tell
What a holy spell
Is in the song of our native land?

The proud and lowly, the pilgrim holy,
The lover, kneeling at beauty's shrine,
The bard who dreams by the haunted stream,—
All, all are touched by thy power divine!

The captive cheerless,
The soldier fearless,
The mother—taught by Nature's hand,
Her child when weeping,
Will lull to sleeping,
With some sweet song of her native land!

FRANKINCENSE.—Frankincense, which was also used in the worship of the true God, and on the altars of the heathen temples, was obtained from trees which grew in Arabia Felix. The incense trees grew only in that part of Arabia inhabited by the Sabaeans, and so strict were their laws respecting them, that persons were not permitted even to see the trees, except those appointed to take care of them. The valley where they grew was surrounded by mountains, and was situated eight days' journey from Sabota, (now Sanna,) the capital, whither the incense was conveyed on camels; and it was forbidden, on pain of death, to enter the city with this drug, except at one particular gate, where the priests took a tenth part for their god Sabas, and no person could either buy or sell it till this duty was discharged. The Gebanites were the only people allowed to carry it out of the country. They also paid a toll to their sovereign. It was taxed again at Gaza, and by the time the kings, the priests, the secretaries, the wardens of the temples, and the various officers had levied their contributions on this drug, but little was left to pay the great charge of bringing it to the coast. At the time the frankincense was taken to Alexandria to be tried, refined, and made up for sale, the workmen were attired only in short trousers, which were sewed up and sealed, to prevent the possibility of their concealing any portion of this valuable drug. Their heads were fixed in a mask of cast, lest they should secrete the smallest portion in their mouths or ears. They were not suffered to depart after all these precautions without a strict examination.

NATIONAL WEALTH.—A MODERN DISCOVERY.—The following is a very happy satire on the prevailing folly of the times:—"Get your bread studs from the Baltic and Black Seas, and your potatoes from England, Ireland, France, or any where; they may be had for the low price of a dollar a bushel. Raising potatoes is not a vulgar but laborious business—leave it to those who know nothing better. Let us plant our farms (if they have not been sold for city lots) with the Morus Mutiliculus. In a few years we may all wear silks, provided we do not, in the meantime, starve to death. This is the new steam process to speedy wealth."

MAGNANIMITY.—Of all virtues, magnanimity is the rarest. There are a hundred persons of merit for one who willingly acknowledges it in another.

SUMMER FIELDS.

THE summer! oh 'tis joyous—
The sunny summer time;
The time of butterflies and bees,
When birds are singing in the trees,
And flowers are in their prime!
The summer! oh 'tis joyous!
We will not think of care,
With such a verdure round us spread,
With such a blue sky overhead,
And such a balmy air!
Leave care until to-morrow,
My best-beloved one;
We have known griefs together—
We have passed through wintry weather—
But the winter, love, is gone!
'Tis summer, joyous summer!
The flowers are on the earth;
And we, like creatures made to bless
The Father, with their happiness,
Will go rejoicing forth.
Look round—how full of life,
Of gladness, are all things!
The slowly-wandering flocks—the herds—
The ceaseless singing of the birds—
The myriad insect-wings—
The sunny water running on,
Mid glancing lights and shadows—
The flowers that spring up rich and sweet
And beautiful, beneath our feet,
Amid these grassy meadows!
Oh, best beloved one!
Cast round thine eyes, and see
How all these things are good—are sent
To wake a trustful sentiment
In weak ones such as we!
God loveth all his creatures,
Doth bless them hour by hour;
And will He not of man take need,
Who so much beauty hath decreed
Unto the wayside flower?
Oh, best beloved one!
Come forth this summer day—
'Twill do our spirits good to go—
'Mong peasant-people poor and low,
And be as blithe as they.
Come forth, this summer day!
We will not think of care,
With such a verdure round us spread,
With such a bright heaven overhead,
With such a balmy air!

SELECT NOUVELLETES.

SUN-DEW.—A GRUB-STREET FAIRY TALE.

GEORGE SELWYN'S passion was for witnessing executions—Dragonet's is for possessing dressed dolls.—I have heard of a nobleman so fond of cock-fighting, that, when he was bed-ridden, it was his wont to have the spurred combatants brought to exhibit on his coverlet. My appetite was for 'first nights';—for a play fresh from Sheridan Knowles' golden mine—for one of Shakespeare's 'beings of the mind,' when, after a long sleep, he was anew presented to us by Macready or Charles Kemble—for Mars in a new part, or Tagliani in a new pas, or Weber in a new ouverture, or Aubert in a new opera comique, (how is 'Le Domino Noir' haunting me while I write!) Such was my passion. Did you, any of you, dear readers, ever father or mother a play—not permitted by a somnolent and good-humoured audience to dwindle and dwindle, till, as Woodward predicted of 'She Stoops to Conquer,' it went out, like 'the snuff of a farthing candle'—but fiercely and unanimously hessed to death by a resolute pit, boxes and gallery? If so, you can understand how and wherefore the said passion became extinct. It was, then, in a state less gracious than that of satiety—namely, disgust—that I dragged myself theatre-ward, to assist at the first night of —a tragic comedy, some twelve months ago. To make the matter worse, my seat was in his box; and I was obliged to bear company with the flushed cheek, and the nervous hand, and the restless eye—symptoms of authorship in a state of expectancy so intolerable, but so precious, to the possessor—symptoms, to my fastidious taste, wonderfully irritating! How absurd for a full-grown man thus to agitate himself for such a trifle! If I spoke at all, I was in great danger of speaking in a wrong tone. I resolved, therefore, during the ouverture, to occupy myself with my favourite pursuit of picking out odd physiognomies among the audience. My luck, as it chanced, indulged me with a peerless specimen, even at a first view. In a private box, immediately opposite to ours, there was seated an object, the fellow to which I shall never see. It was a head—not of a negro, for the complexion was paler, —not of a monkey, for superhuman intellect twinkled in those sharp eyes, and wrinkled every pucker that hemmed round that mouth, full of ivory teeth—but with traits borrowed from both races—belonging, it seemed, to a dwarf, or some one placed in a very low chair; alone, too, and framed, as it were, by a box in which it was posted. The head was crowned by a turban of rich shawls, piquant enough in its pattern, and peerless enough in its materials, to destroy Madame Dévy with hopeless envy. There was a rich ferrière of large diamonds stuck on the ancient lady's forehead; she wore earrings, too, of the same precious stone.

It was impossible, from her face, or her dress, or her gestures, to divine her age or her country. She was never still for a second—looking here, looking there;—now see-sawing on her chair, after the fashion of the Litchfield Boanerges,—now fanning herself with an elaborately carved fan, which might have belonged to some patched Melissa or Cleone of the days of the 'Spectator,'—now beating time to the music of the orchestra, on the lid of a snuff-box, positively blazing with precious stones,—now screwing up her face to survey us all—myself, I thought, with peculiar interest—through the lorgnette, which formed the handle for her crutch. There is nothing so thoroughly piquant, odd, and ugly as she was, to be found in Mr. Beckford's china closet! I looked: and was fascinated for the whole evening.

The ouverture was done—the curtain up. The two confidantes, according to old-established usage, had, by their very profuse allusions to events which each knew, prepared the way for the hero and heroine—the latter had made their several dispositions and desires known, in scenes of wonderful power and ingenuity, (so said the morning papers)—all was going merrily as a marriage-bell—the flush of anxiety upon —a brown cheek was already shading off into the flush of triumph—the restless eye was already exchanging its deprecating gaze for one of exultation.

"Is it not magnificent!" said good-natured P—, leaning across to me, as the curtain was falling on the second act.

"Magnificent!" I was compelled to echo; "but I'm dying with this heat!"

At that instant, my eye glancing across the house, caught a glimpse of the queer, little incognita, rising with wonderful alacrity; and in another second, she was out of her box.

The curtain rose again. It is but once in a life that the most visionary of dreamers is permitted to look upon such a scene as I saw before me. Fancy a glade in a deep forest—an avenue of gigantic old trees—strong and vigorous in their age,—royally up-bearing their weight of summer-green foliage! Foremost of these stood one so superb beyond all its comrades, that there would have been no mistaking it for any other tree than Herne's oak—the chosen haunt of the fairies,—even if the dim towers of England's one palace, displayed in the back-ground, by the brightest and most cloudless moon that ever gloomed the sky of September, had not placed the matter beyond doubt. To the right and the left, opened away paths of a delicious verdure; and where the absence of boughs permitted the moonshine to streak these, there might be seen the dew glittering on a hundred wood-flowers that nodded round the roots of the aged trees. Presently, as I looked, that haunt began to swarm with tiny figures, at first view no bigger or more distinct than glow-worm-sparks among the grass,—but ere long, discovered to be those small beings whom persons of feeble faith have fancied to have utterly taken leave of us "human mortals" somewhere about Cromwell's time. Nay, I feasted my eyes upon the show, the quaint music of many harps and tabrets was revealed to my ear—and when this ceased, the prattle of innumerable voices.

The little people formed themselves into a ring—but not to dance; for their sovereign commanding silence, there was straightway heard only one speaker. She, it is true—a brown old fairy, the ugliest and most ancient it seemed, of all the troop—made noise enough for ten. She had been on a long and wearisome journey—she had performed a task the most difficult ever appointed for elf; and was now just returned home, and recounting her adventures, with a vivacity and a gibbousness passing the power of man's language to describe. I know of nothing to which it may be likened—save Dejazet's burst upon the stage, in "Suzanne," when the spell of her dumbness had been broken, and she has to make up in one speech, for the silence of eighteen years of girlhood!

What had been that journey?—what had been that task? Luckily, I am able to answer both questions. From time immemorial, the two most venerable fairy maids of honour, Sun-dew and Woodbine, had been only able to muster one cavalier between them—a certain antique elf, called Pink, whose worn-out courtesies and solemn wrinkled little face made him the amusement of the whole court. The life of Pink was not one of roses—his ladies being exacting and jealous. If he danced with Woodbine one instant too long, Sun-dew would trip up his heels, and keep him on his feet half the night after, by way of revenge;—if some gossiping moth (for gravely though they be clad, moths are sad gossipers) brought Woodbine news that Pink had presented some new compliment or homage to her rival, Woodbine was quite capable of powdering the busy old bean from head to foot with arcula dust, treasured up on purpose against a day of wrath, in the presence of all the court, and when Pink was in full ball-dress! Time sweetens not such tempers as theirs; and their quarrels rose to such an offensive pitch, at the wedding party (I think it was) given in honour of the marriage of Prince Poy to the Princess May-bud, that the Queen, entirely worn out, struck them both dumb on the instant, and ordained that Sun-dew should set forth on a pilgrimage—not to return—and neither antagonist to recover speech—till she had found the most jealous thing in the world.

"Here I am, ladies," exclaimed the little old fairy, already hoarse with glee and talking. "Pink, my parrot!—Woodbine! you are looking frightfully bilious—I declare you are! Here I am!—mercy upon us, after such a journey! It is untold where I have been—what I have gone through. Pink will be too happy to read your majesty my journals, whenever your majesty is disposed. I do suppose I must have been twice round the globe, and back."

"So far to find what you wanted?" said the Queen. "We had thought those clumsy people must be jealous enough in all conscience. They fight sometimes, I hear," she added, with a yawn.

"They do, your majesty—I have been in one of their battles myself. Spain, I think, they called the place, but I could not catch the name clearly, because of the firing; and their generals hate one another mortally—but somehow Then I went among the lovers—for there I was sure I should find some sigh, or a tear, that would answer my purpose, and do your majesty's bidding. had been war, and of the horrors of war, until my young heart grew sick and cold. I was then told that I must go and make myself very happy; that I should have a plum-pudding for dinner, and some neighbours' children to play with in the evening, and that we should go and see the bonfire in the market-place—because there was peace! I felt as if I had a personal interest in this peace—and it thus made a strong impression on my memory. But for the pains which my peace-loving parents took to fix this event on my mind, my earliest recollections would have been of war—and with this exception, they are so altogether.

We lived in a small country-town, through which, at that time, no coach or mail passed; and the letters and newspapers were brought, every evening, from a neighbouring town, by a species of Davies Mail-setter, who rode a small, bony animal, and announced his arrival by the long blast of a tin horn. Davies was an important person. He possessed the news full four hours before his town's people; and had, moreover, the privilege of riding twelve miles, decorated with blue and yellow ribbons, in case of any great victory,—and thus, without speaking a word, of proclaiming the good news, as he travelled. People used to run out, of an evening, to see him come in—to anticipate his tidings by his telegraphic exterior. And what ringing of bells—shooting of bells, as it was called—there used to be on the news of the victory! I have the ecstatic sound of those bells in my ears, at this moment—as it used to come through the clear frosty air of a winter's evening to our warm fire-side; and very pleasant it seemed—although my mother sighed over every peal.

Everybody, in those days, lived in a state of excitement and fearful expectation. Our children now know nothing of human life—while we had strange experience long before they were their age. We heard of Buonaparte from our very cradles—he was never much called Napoleon then—that is a name which was adopted after his fall, when the reaction had taken place; but to us he was Buonaparte—and the name conveyed whatever idea of a horrible ferocious monster the imagination of a child could conceive. I had no very definite notion of what he was like—he had so many shapes of horror to my fancy. I used to sit in my little chair, at the breakfast-table, and hear my parents talk of the war—of the last victory—or of the triumphant march of the great usurper, and the defeat of our own armies. I heard them talk of blood—of devastation—of thousands of wounded men—of burning towns—of miserable prisoners—of loathsome French hospitals and prisons. I heard them tell of strange prophecies—for people's minds were then in such a state of excitement as to regard those things—spoken years before, by singular or mysterious beings, which were now finding their fulfilment in the fearful events of every day. Awful and sublime chapters in the prophetic books of the Old Testament, and in the Revelations, were referred to and read; and a few grave, religious, and somewhat visionary persons, who used to visit at our home, would come in, of an evening, and discuss all those dark mysteries, or collate them with the terrible judgments that seemed to be coming upon the nations. How well I remember the undefined terrors of those conversations—but still more my father's grave countenance, and the pale anxious looks of my mother, as they sat discussing in an under-tone, lest I should hear—and every word of which I heard, all the time—what should be done in case the enemy came to our own shore, when the invasion was threatened! Oh, I remember well all the scheme they had for securing the valuables, as some of our own kin and kin had done, at the time of the Scotch rebellion—and the plan for their own and my escape—and the prayer that these things might not be in the winter.

If, from these sublimities of the parlour fire-side, I went to the nursery, it was only to find that the terrors and sorrows of war were there also. The father of my nurse-maid was a tailor, and resided in our town. I remember when my brother William 'listed' for a soldier, and I cried two whole days for sympathy, although I never had seen her brother. Her father, as I said, was a tailor, and to his house we used often to go—I and my nurse. There, as usual, everything had reference to the war. It was when the volunteers were first raised, and he and all his men were busied in making accoutrements. I can see, now, the coarse red cloth jackets that were being pressed with the iron goose in the kitchen, and those which were in another stage in the work-room upstairs. I can see the enappings of red cloth that scattered the floor, the pipe-clayed belts, the stiff white epaulettes, and the short upright tuft of green cock's feathers, which was worn by the drummers, I believe, and which was an object of my extreme admiration. My visits to the tailor excited in me the desire to raise my own volunteer corps; accordingly, I had my regiment of volunteer dolls.

If I looked from my nursery window, into the street below, what did I see? Not troops playing at the playful game of marbles or hoop, but little rods of them arrayed in soldier-fashion, marshalled under some boy-sergeant, with drum and file playing, imitating the recruiting party which paraded our streets once a week, or being drilled, as their fathers were, in a young volunteer company. All our playmates were infected with the same war-mania; and every game which had not in it the spirit of attack and defence was voted intolerably insipid. Nothing but martial music was listened to, and the very dances of those days were battles and marches. There was my cousin, George—the great boy of my acquaintance,—who wore a watch, and aimed at being a man when only twelve years old—what a fine young soldier he was! His father's house was filled with his military property; and all his money, of which he had more than enough, went in the purchase of weapons, offensive and defensive. He had a plan for defending the house, in case the French should land near—which, as it stood on the south shore, was seriously apprehended. He maintained that we could make a gallant and successful resistance—or, which was better, blow up and sink the French squadron—by the discharge of red-hot cannon balls, which, in imitation of General Elphinstone, at Gibraltar, he proposed to send among them in the evening, and play the perpetual terror of eruption and explosion. His petty cannon were mounted on every wall, and at every window; and it was no unusual thing to be startled fifty times, in the course of the day, by an unexpected battery. "That boy," his mother would exclaim, "will blow off his limbs, some of these times!"—"But," said the father, "where does George get all his money, for these things?"—"Goodness, gracious me!" exclaimed the fat old cook, bursting into the room, covered over with soot and grease, "the dinner's all spoiled, every atom of it, with Master George's powder-works in the kitchen-chimney blowing up. It's a mercy I'm not a dead woman, for the chimney-breast has fallen, and I was winding up the spit at the time!"—"Where is Tom?" the father would say, when he could not find the groom's boy. "Oh, sir, he's helping Master George to build a counterscarp at the south wall!"—"Where's Joe, then?" "He's gone, sir, to get a rivet put in Master George's new sword!"—"Hang his sword and the counterscarp!" the father would say. But George went on unreprieved. In fact, George was only a sample of a fine active-spirited boy in the war-time. The war was everything then, and influenced the feelings of all—young and old, rich and poor.

In those days, when everybody's thoughts, conversation, and actions had reference to the war, it might well have been wondered how, in a continued time of peace like the present, people could by any possibility find subjects either for thought or discussion. No marvel is it that in these latter years, so many poets and novelists have written such multitudes of books, and have found so many readers—and that we have now professors and students in every conceivable branch of science and philosophy! People in these peaceful times want something to do and to be interested about. Our children of six years old, if a man were employed to paint their father's house, would either be engaged in their studies, or if allowed to look at him, would question him perhaps, as to what paint was made from, or of the component parts of his brush. It was not so in the war-time. I sat by the painter whole days, for the pleasure of being horrified by his exaggerated accounts of Buonaparte, and of terrible and bloody battles—till at length, tired, I suppose, of my insatiable appetite for terrors, he would send me down the garden to look, if upon a distant bridge I could not see him and his men coming!

Everybody, as I said before, had an intense interest in that war. I saw my own parents overwhelmed by the deepest affliction, because of the death of a beloved relative, in the battle of Jena. Every family, also, with which we visited, not only lived like ourselves, in the excitement of fear and anxiety, but either sooner or later, mourned over the death or the melancholy imprisonment of some dear friend or relation. And that imprisonment was one of the most painful causes of interest. The husband of my mother's landress was a soldier, and was confined in some horrible French prison—I forgot where. Our hearts were made to bleed regularly once a week, by the distress of this poor woman—to whom a rumour of her husband's sufferings had come. I remember as well as if it were only to-day, sitting with my mother in her own chamber, when the poor creature rushed in, and threw before her an ill-folded miserable looking letter, written on the very coarsest, meanest of paper; and, praying her to read it, burst into a passion of tears. It was, in truth, a letter to break the heart of a wife. It described himself and his wretched companions, as enduring unheard-of sufferings; as being subjected to every indignity; as wanting clothes, sufficiency of food, light, air—everything! It then told of his many unsuccessful attempts to write to his wife, and his uncertainty as to whether this would ever reach her. To this melancholy letter was added a postscript, by a fellow-sufferer, saying that poor Saville (the husband) had since died; but that, in reality, he was better off, being dead, than were his living companions!

Many such letters as this found their way to England—while thousands of other such were never suffered to leave the walls within which they were written. It is to the everlasting honour of England, that the prisoners which she took during the war—though thousands of them were confined within those immense, gloomy and stern prison-houses which were erected in several parts of the kingdom to contain them—never were subjected to that severe and degrading confinement which destroyed the health and lives of so many English prisoners. Many small English towns were made, in fact, into prisons—and here captivity was comparatively easy. It was, however, a most interesting, yet melancholy sight to see within the two or three miles circuit in which the prisoners were allowed their liberty, these thin and dejected men going forth alone, or in a little company, to gather, perhaps a salad of young green herbs, which were to be found by the way-side—but every circumstance, inoffensive as it was in itself, became a taunt in the mouths of the coarse John Bulls of those days, upon the poor meagre French prisoners, who could make a dinner of herbs!

Thank heaven! that war, with its unintellectual, ferocious spirit—its enormous crimes and sufferings—and its narrow nationality, mis-called patriotism and loyalty—has ceased to be the temper of the age.

THE LAST ANECDOTE.—"Who's that ere Mr. Scattering, that always gets a few votes at our town meeting?" inquired an old lady, a few days since, of her spouse, as she was busily engaged in perusing a newspaper. "I do not know," said he, "nor never did, though the people have been trying to elect him ever since I began to vote."

VERSES ON A PAINTING BY HORATIO MACCULLOCH, ESQ. R. S. A.

"CASTLE CAMPBELL."

"The castle of gloom in the vale of sorrow,"
No wandering ray to light the gloom
That broods above thy crumbling wall;
The very sadness of the tomb
Hangs o'er it like a funeral pall.

Darkly the clouds on high are spread,
Darkly the river sweeps below,
And each pale floweret bends its head
Down to the earth in silent woe.

All moveless hangs the aspen leaf,
And not a sound disturbs the air,
But the tumultuous voice of Grief,
Or low and plaintive wail of Care.

And gazing on the scene, I feel
Its sadness o'er my spirit creep,
And long to hear the thunder peal
Arouse it from its death-like sleep!

Not thus wert thou when last I stood
Within the shadow of thy towers;
No gloom was in thy solitude,
No dewy tears were on thy flowers.

It was a radiant summer day,
That smiled upon this wooded dell;
And on thy heights so worn and gray
The glorious sunlight fell.

'Twas a glad scene! The song of birds
From every tree the gale was bringing;
And with gay laughter and light words,
Thy echoes loud were ringing.

Above us hung the beech-tree's shade,
Through which the odorous breezes play'd,
And show'd blue glimpses of the sky,
Smiling in cloudless purity.

And when the day, with arrowy speed,
To its bright close at length had come,
I hung me on the nut-brown steed—
(Willing to bear me to that home,
Whose well of roses, as I write,
Rises all softly on my sight)

Oh! yet my memory can recall
The flashing eye, the bounding tread—
Though dim, and cold, and nerveless all,
And numbered with the silent dead!—
Oh! fleet of foot and fair of form,
Thou peerless one! I see thee now,
As when the glow of life was warm
In those proud veins, whose fiery flow
Cold death has frozen—hail or plume
Shall never see thy like again!

My life has been a sunny path,
No cloud has stained its joyous hours,
Nor vengeful storms arisen in wrath,
To mar its fair unwithered flowers;
And when I look upon the past,
It is not with the creamy thought
That the bright halo round it cast,
Can tinge no more my future lot;
But memory of such scenes can give
A glory to the coming years;
And Hope's benignant art revive,
To cheer us through this vale of tears.
Then welcome again that brings to view
The fair but faded past anew,
And, in the fairy world of art,
Recall such visions to the heart—
Of hours whose swift and shadowy gleam
Was rapid as the lightning's beam—
And makes us feel that cold decay
Can never chase their bloom away!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

A MONUMENT TO A MOTHER'S GRAVE.

BY JOSEPH R. CHANDLER.

The death of a friend who never spared a fault of my character, nor found a virtue which he did not praise, had cast a gloom over my mind, which no previous deprivation had produced. I remember how sceptical and heart-smitting—not heart-broken—the broken heart always believes—I stood at his grave, while the clergyman touched too little on his virtues, and spoke with a humble confidence, that he would spring from the tomb to an immortality of happiness; and suggested the promises of scripture, and argued with logical precision, from facts and analogies, that my friend should rise from the dead. Despondency is not more the child than the parent of unbelief—deep grief makes us selfish, and the naturally timid and nervous lose their confidence in promises, including their own particular wish, which they yield to them, when the benefit of others is alone proposed. A little learning is dangerous in such matters. I suffered a mental argument upon the probability of an event which I so much desired, to displace the simple faith which would have produced comparative happiness. Those who have contended with, and at length yielded to this despondency, alone know its painful operation.

Occupied with thoughts resulting from such an unpleasant train of ideas—
* Two streams bearing the above names flow through the vale of Dolor, in which Castle Campbell is situated.

of mind, I followed into a burying-ground, in the suburbs of the city, a small train of persons, not more than a dozen, who had come to bury one of their acquaintance. The clergyman in attendance was leading a little boy by the hand, who seemed to be the only relative of the deceased in the slender group. I gathered with them round the grave, and when the planter coffin was lowered down, the child burst forth in uncontrollable grief. The little fellow had no one left to whom he could look for affection, or who could address him in tones of parental kindness. The last of his kinsfolk was in the grave—and he was alone.

When the clamorous grief of the child had a little subsided, the clergyman addressed us with the customary exhortation to accept the mortification, and be prepared; and, turning to the child, he added: "She is not to remain in this grave for ever; as true as the grass which is now chilled with the frost of the season, shall spring to greenness and life in a few months, so true shall your mother come up from that grave to another life, to a life of happiness, I hope." The attendants shovelled in the earth upon the coffin, and some one took little William, the child, by the hand, and led him forth from the lowly lament of his mother.

Late in the ensuing spring, I was in the neighbourhood of the same burying-ground, and seeing the gate open, I walked among the graves for some time, reading the names of the dead, and wondering what strange disease could snatch off so many younger than myself—when recollecting that I was near the grave of the poor widow, burned the previous autumn, I turned to see what had been done to preserve the memory of one so utterly destitute of earthly friends. To my surprise, I found the most desirable of all monuments for a mother's sepulchre—little William was sitting near the head of the now sunken grave, looking intently upon some green shoots that had come forth with the warmth of spring, from the soil that covered his mother's coffin.

William started at my approach, and would have left the place: it was long before I could induce him to tarry; and, indeed, I did not win his confidence, until I told him that I was present when they buried his mother, and had marked his tears at the time.

"Then you heard the minister say, that my mother would come up out of this grave," said little William.

"I did,"

"It is true, is it not?" asked he, in a tone of confidence.

"I most firmly believe it," said I.

"Believe it," said the child—"believe it—I thought you knew it—I know it."

"How do you know it, my dear?"

"The minister said, that as true as the grass would grow up, and the flowers bloom in spring, so true would my mother rise. I came a few days afterward, and planted flower-seeds on the grave. The grass came green in this burying-ground long ago; and I watched every day for the flowers, and to-day they have come up too—see them breaking through the ground—by and by mammy will come again."

A smile of exulting hope played on the features of the boy; and I felt pained at disturbing the faith and confidence with which he was animated.

"But, my little child," said I, "it is not here that your poor mother will rise."

"Yes, here," said he, with emphasis—"here they placed her, and here I have come ever since the first blade of grass was green this year."

I looked around, and saw that the tiny feet of the child had trod out the herbage at the grave side, so constant had been his attendance.

What a faithful watch-keeper—what mother would desire a more constant attendant than the form of her only son, bending tearful, not hoping, over her grave!

"But, William," said I, "it is in another world that she will arise"—and I attempted to explain to him the nature of that promise which he had mistaken. The child was confused, and he appeared neither pleased nor satisfied.

"If mammy is not coming back to me—if she is not to come up here, what shall I do? I cannot stay without her."

"You shall go to her," said I, adopting the language of the scripture—"you shall go to her, but she shall not come again to you."

"Let me go, then," said William, "let me go now, that I may rise with mammy."

"William," said I, pointing down to the plants just breaking through the ground, "the seed which is sown there, would not have come up, if it had not been ripe; so you must wait till your appointed time, until your end cometh."

"Then I shall see her!"

"I surely hope so."

"I will wait, then," said the child, "but I thought I should see her soon—I thought I should meet her here."

And he did. In a month, William ceased to wait; and they opened his mother's grave, and placed his little coffin on hers—and this was the only wish the child expressed in dying. Better teachers than I, had instructed him in the way to meet his mother; and young as the little sufferer was, he had learned that all labours and hopes of happiness, short of heaven, were profitless and vain—Lady's Book for May.

"A SILENT ANSWER TURNETH AWAY WRATH."

It is related of a distinguished physician in this city, distinguished as much perhaps for the softness of his manners and the amiability of his disposition, as for the rank he holds in his profession—that while one day driving hastily through the streets to attend a case of great emergency, his course was arrested by a dray, which blocked up the passage. In reply to a request made to the owner that it might be removed, he not only refused, but commenced heaping upon him a torrent of violent and abusive language.—The worthy doctor, however, untroubled by such treatment, was just about turning around to pursue his course in a different direction, when a case of manifesting his unaltered good-will towards the stranger, he gently addressed him thus, "Friend, when thyself or any of thy family should be sick, send for doctor —" The man's spirit at these words seemed totally regenerated, he not only instantly removed the incumbrance and assisted the doctor in passing, but in a common phrase, "begged ten thousand pardons" for his misconduct. Of what advantage such trifling lessons as these may be to those who impress them upon their minds and summon them to their aid when placed in somewhat similar circumstances—I will relate a little incident, which occurred to myself but yesterday. Rambling on the opposite side of the river with my favourite rifle, and desirous of finding a spot where I could amuse myself at target-shooting, without infringing upon the peace or safety of any one, a place at length seemed to offer itself which possessed these advantages. It was a considerable distance from the high road, on the banks of Cooper creek, partially sheltered by underwood from view, and scarcely a house to be seen within a mile. Here I commenced my favourite sport, and having placed my mark at about one hundred yards distance, began to flatter myself upon the skill I displayed, striking near the centre at every shot. But, alas,

"All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the dearest;"

how soon was my solitary yet exquisite enjoyment dampened; for three or four hundred yards before me and directly in my range, I observed a countryman approaching with hasty steps. Though satisfied of the object which brought him hither, yet conscious of my innocence, I distanced to fly, but on the contrary, shouldering my rifle, I advanced toward him. We met near the target; I saw at a glance that he was angry and excited.

"Is it you who has been shooting so?" were the first words he uttered.

"Yes, sir," replied I, with one of my most benevolent smiles.

"Well, you have incurred a fine of fifteen dollars, and the forfeiture of your gun," said he.

"I knew there was a law to prevent trespassers upon the property of others, but did not know the penalties of its violation were so heavy, sir," I replied.

"Such are the penalties," said he, and I now momentarily expected to hear a summons to surrender, and made up my mind to comply without resistance.

"But, my friend," continued I, "I was not really aware that any injuries or inconvenience would be incurred to any one by my amusing myself here."

"It's dangerous," replied he—"see the direction your balls take."

"The paths they have taken I can assure you, my friend, are directly across the creek, and the bank being at least thirty feet higher than the opposite they could not possibly do harm; I am, however, extremely sorry I have incurred your displeasure."

"You seem something of a gentleman, any how," replied he.

"You seem disposed to compliment. I am, however, always a gentleman when with such." I saw the right chord was touched; his disposition and tone entirely changed.

"That's a very pretty gun of yours—American make, I 'pose!"

"Yes sir, Constable's second rate, and I came here to try it."

"Well! just move your mark a little further to the right," said he.

"I will—younder is a place will answer the purpose," said I.

"But wot the bushes be in your way?" said he.

"Not at all! not at all! So I went at my sport again—and the old gentleman seemed almost as much amused as myself for a while, when he gently retired and left me "alone in my glory," with the privilege of shooting as long as I pleased.

On my way back to the ferry, I fell into a train of reflection, the result of which, I am inclined to think, will be of advantage to me through life. It was the wisdom contained in that simple yet beautiful little passage of scripture, "a mild word turneth away wrath," the fine illustration of its truth afforded in the case of the excellent character alluded to at the commencement of this article, as well as in that of my own—the important influence which the most trivial circumstances may have upon our welfare, together with the advantages of improving by every lesson afforded us by our fellow-men.

PERSONAL ADORNMENT OF LADIES.

Art is an extremely beautiful thing, but nature is a much more beautiful and a wiser one. Jewels of all sorts are a beautiful thing; satin, velvet, the costly oriental draperies, etc., are also attractively grateful to the eye, and are chief ingredients in the entire composition of the gorgeousness of the picture; but despite of our admiration of these, the general ornaments of ladies, we still cannot help remarking the very few natural flowers and wreaths by which a woman can alone increase (if it be possible to increase) her own beauty. Pure as the diamond is, clear as the brilliant is, warm as the ruby is, sunshiny as the topaz is—a beautiful woman is purer, clearer, warmer, and casts forth a more celestial sunshine than any one of them; and they are, therefore, not so fitted to accompany and share the admiration compelled by a woman's beauty as flowers, the only things of the lovely which art cannot increase in beauty, except women. We remember a short time back being inexpressibly delighted with the taste a young lady, who sat near us, displayed in the style of her head-dress, which consisted merely of a wreath of white roses. Her eyes and hair were as black as sloes; upon her cheeks was the delicate blushing of the rose; and these with the sweet modesty of her face's expression, united to the simplicity of the head-dress, composed an aspect the beauty of which could not possibly have been attained by the costliest: clasp of diamonds, or the united brilliancies of all the precious stones wealth could procure. How the beauties of Titian and the old masters would suffer if jewelry were substituted for the profusion of flowers by which they are adorned. We really find it difficult to see the propriety of putting a heavy head-gear about the delicate brow of a fairy, but could well fancy her supporting a delicate rose wreath, or even the more ample luxuriance of a crown of ivy or vine. Do our readers think with us?

THE MEMORY OF THE POETS.

By Mr. Sargent Talford.

The fame of those sweet bards, whose fancies lie,
Like glorious clouds on sunnier's hottest eve,
Fringing the west, upon the skirts of heaven,
And sprinkled o'er with hues of rainbow dye
Is not of trumpet sound, nor strives to vie
With martial notes sublime. From ages gone,
In most angelic strain it lengthens on,
Earth's greenest bowers with fresh delight to fill,
Heard breathing from the silence of the sky,
Or trembling in the joy of gushing rill,
Or whispering o'er the lake's unrippled breast,
'Till its last earthly melodies are still—
Hush! 'mid the joys of immortality,
In the calm bosom of eternal rest.

A GOOD THOUGHT.—The Macon (Geo.) Telegraph proposes to place the Botanic Garden, about to be erected in that town, under the direction of the young ladies of the flourishing Female College, which does so much honour to the gallantry of Macon.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

SONG OF PEACE.—BY ROBERT GILPILLAN.

AWAKE the song of peace—
Let nations join the strain;
The mirth of blood and pomp of war
We will not have again!

Let fruit-trees crown our fields,
And flowers our valleys fan;
And on our mountain steep—the songs
Of happy swains be there!

Our maidens shall rejoice,
And bid the timbre sound;
Soft dreams no more shall broken be
With drums parading round.

No tears for lovers slain
From lovely eyes shall fall;
But music and the dance shall come
In halcyon joy to all!

The rider and his steed,
Their path of fame is o'er;
The trumpet and the trumpeter
Shall squadrons rouse no more!

No fields of victory won
With blade and battle brand;
A nobler triumph shall be ours
A bright and happy land!

Too long the man of blood
Hath ruled without control;
Nor widows' tears, nor orphans' sighs,
Could touch his iron soul!

But lo! the mighty are fallen—
And from his lofty brow
The chaplet fades that circled there—
Where are his trophies now?

Look to the countless graves,
Where sleep the thousands slain!
The morning song no more call forth
The stirring bands again!

The din, the strife is past,
Of foe with falling foe—
The grassy leaves wave o'er their heads,
And quiet they rest below!

Sound high the harp of song,
And raise the joyous strain;
But war's rough note be ne'er heard
To swell the chords again!

Put all its trappings past—
A pomp of bygone years—
To ploughshares grind the pointed swords,
To pruning-hooks the spears!

Come, man, to brother man,
Come in the bond of peace;
Then strife and war, with all their train
Of dark'ning woe, shall cease.

Come, with that spirit free,
That art and science give;
Come, with the patient mind for truth,
Seek it, and ye shall live!

Then earth shall yield her fruits—
The seasons forth shall bring
And summer fair shall pour her sweets
Into the lap of spring!

While autumn, mellow, comes
With full and liberal hand,
And gladness then shall fill each heart
Through all the happy land!

TOPICS FOR THOUGHT.

Everything is military at St. Petersburg; little fellows just from the breast must go to school, have a sword instead of a coral, and cast for a doll—instead of a doll—instead of a doll, they can scarcely walk, and, to complete their infant education, are taken out in a coach to bivouac in the open fields. Even the scholars of the university are in military uniform. Lord Londonderry informs us that Nicholas is better acquainted with the art of drilling and with military manoeuvres, than any man in Europe. The influence of the good man renews not at death; he, as the visible agent, is removed, but the light and influence of his example still remain; and the moral elements of this world will long show the traces of their vigour and purity; just as the western sky, after the sun is set, still betrays the glowing traces of the departed orb. The most sublime thoughts—beautiful and powerful figures—and pure philosophy—are found in an obsolete work, but seldom quoted, called the Bible.

A French baron has invented an omnibus cooking-shop, which travels about the streets for the purpose of feeding people at their doors!

Frankness is not rashness, nor is it vehemence. It is not petulant or dictatorial. It is as modest as it is undisguised. It is not obtrusive. Yet it dares to lift the veil and show unpleasant truth.

If a man blends his angry passions with his search after truth, become his superior by suppressing yours, and attend only to the justness and force of his reasoning.

Courage, when genuine, is never cruel. It is not fierce. It foresees evil. Its trepidations come either before or after danger. In the midst of peril it is calm and cool. It is generous, especially to the fallen. It is seldom attained.

Lord Erskine, speaking of animals, hesitating to call them brutes, hit upon the happy phrase—"the mate creation."

Virtue wants no admirers, wisdom more supplicants, truth more real friends, and honesty more practitioners. Philanthropy wants a residence, and fidelity an asylum.

Tacitus says early marriage makes us immortal—that it is the soul and chief prop of empire—and that the man who resolves to live without woman, or the woman who resolves to live without man, are enemies to themselves, destructive to the world, apostates from nature, and rebels against heaven and earth.

Mystery magnifies danger as fog does the sun; the hand that warned Belshazzar derived its horrifying influence from the want of a body.

Raleigh says, if thou marry for beauty, thou bindest thyself all thy life for that which perchance will neither last nor please thee one year.

THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

LADY of England!—o'er the seas
Thy name was borne by every breeze,
Till all this sunset clime became Familiar with Victoria's name!

Though seas divide us many a mile,
Yet, for the Queen of that fair isle
From which our fathers sprung, there roves
A blessing from this Land of Groves!

Our fatherland!—fit theme for song!—
When thou art named what memories throng!—
Shall England cease our love to claim!—
Not while our language is the same!

Then, royal maid! so live and reign
That when thy nation's swelling strain
Is breathed amid our forests green,
We too may say "GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!" G. P. M.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

Translated for the New-York Mirror.

THE DAGUERROTYPE.

We have thus far said but little on the subject of the new and striking discovery of M. Daguerre, which is supposed by many to be the beginning of a total revolution in the arts of drawing and engraving. We do not share in these extravagant anticipations, nor, on the other hand, have we any private reasons or peculiar information to induce us to undervalue what almost every one is loud in praise of. All we know is, that common sense tells us we must wait some time longer, and see and know much more about this new discovery than we do at present, before we can indulge in any reasonable or well-founded enthusiasm on the subject. While waiting for time to furnish us these developments, we may remark that it is somewhat curious to note how many competitors for the honour of the invention start up all around us. No sooner is M. Daguerre's theory hinted at, than a rival candidate for fame presents himself in the person of Mr. Talbot, an Englishman, who we now learn, has been long engaged in the same experiments as the French philosopher, and arrived at similar results. The next, we hear, is from Berne, in Switzerland, which boldly brings forward its claims alongside of London and Paris. A letter from that place, published in one of the Paris journals, assures us "that the art of producing images of objects with the aid of the camera obscura, has been known here for many years. Professor Gerber made some experiments ten years ago, in which he seems to have advanced farther than M. Daguerre himself. He assures us, that he has produced images on sheets of white paper by using nitrate of silver in a camera obscura; that he has found a way of representing the effect of light and shade; finally, that he was acquainted with a process founded on the same principle by the help of which, any desired number of copies might be taken of any experiment. The professor intended making some further experiments, but has not succeeded in finding such a room as he wished."

From the other side of the channel comes the voice of Mr. Talbot, also claiming the honour of the first discovery. Like Professor Gerber, he uses paper instead of M. Daguerre's copper plates; but he obtains exactly opposite effects, that is, lights where M. Daguerre has shades, and vice versa. But he does not pretend, as M. Gerber does, that he can multiply the impressions of any such copy. We are to observe that Dr. Gerber seems thus far hardly to have reached his journey's end, since he has not arranged such an apartment as he wishes.

Messrs. Biot and Arago, of the French academy, with a natural desire to indicate the fame of their countryman, have taken pains in their report on this subject to state distinctly and of their own knowledge, that M. Daguerre had been employed on this matter for many years before he published his discovery. M. Arago informs us that as early as 1805, a M. Nieps, of Chalon, had invented an apparatus which, imperfect as it was, gave M. Daguerre the first hint of his discovery. There is besides an agreement made in 1829, between M. Nieps and M. Daguerre, which proves that the two had at that early day, associated themselves in pursuit of the great discovery which M. Daguerre has been so fortunate as to make.

M. Nieps obtained drawings in this way, but he required twelve hours for each one; and every one knows, that in that time, the sun changes its place completely, so that the shadow indicated on the right of the picture at the beginning of the operation, would be on the left before its close. When this report was presented, M. Arago begged leave to state, that he was acquainted with M. Daguerre's secret, and that his process was as simple as he represented it to be. He added, that in ten minutes he had himself obtained a perfect view of the Boulevard de Temple.

M. Arago and M. Daguerre have not yet thought proper to enlighten the public as to this simple and most precious secret, but Mr. Talbot has given us a full account of the process invented by him. It may be found in the March number of the Philosophical Journal, in a communication made by Mr. Talbot to the Royal Society, at some length and with great minuteness, to which, as chancery pleaders say, for greater certainty, we beg leave to refer our scientific readers. It is also more briefly stated in a letter from

Mr. Talbot to M. Biot, read at a late sitting of the French Academy. From this we learn, to quote the philosopher's own words, that "to make what we may call ordinary photogenic paper, I choose in the first place a firm paper of good quality. I dip it in a weak solution of common salt, and dry it with a linen cloth, so as to distribute the salt as equally as possible over the surface; I then spread over one side of the paper a solution of nitrate of silver, mixed with a large quantity of water. I dry it by the fire, and it is ready for use. When this experiment is repeated often, it will be found that there is a certain proportion between the quantities of salt and of the solution of silver, which it is better to preserve. If the quantity of salt is increased beyond this point, the effect diminishes, and in some cases vanishes almost entirely. This paper, if well prepared, may serve for a great variety of ordinary uses in obtaining images; nothing, for instance, can be more perfect than the representations of leaves and flowers obtained by this means, under a warm sun; the light, penetrating the leaves, delineates every vein on them."

"Now, let us take a sheet of paper thus prepared, and spread over it a solution saturated with seasil, and dry it before the fire, and we will usually find the sensibility of the paper very much diminished by it, sometimes reduced to almost nothing, especially if it has been kept for some weeks before making this experiment; but if the solution of silver is applied again, the paper becomes a second time sensible to the light, and even more so than it was at first. In this way, I succeed in rendering it sufficiently sensitive to fix with considerable rapidity the image presented by a camera obscura."

"There is, however, one thing to be attended to here. As by this means we obtain results sometimes more, and sometimes less satisfactory, owing to slight accidental variations, we shall find, if we repeat the experiment often, that at times the chlorure of silver obtained in this way is apt to grow gradually black without being exposed to the light. Therefore, after preparing a certain number of sheets of paper, each with different chemical preparations, I take a bit of each, numbered, and expose these bits to a feeble diffuse light, for a quarter or half an hour. If I find among these pieces one that shows a decided superiority over the others, I choose that paper it belongs to, and never fail to make use of it as soon as possible after preparing it."

"It now remains to state what means I use to fix the images thus obtained. After several unsuccessful attempts, the first thing that I found to answer, was to wash the drawing with iodure of potass, mixed with a large quantity of water. An iodure of silver is thus formed, on which the sun has no action whatever. This process, however, requires care, for if we use too strong a solution, it will carry off the dark parts of the picture; but a moderately weak solution answers the purpose very well. By this means, I have preserved drawings perfectly for five years, though often exposed to the sun. But a simpler mode, and one I have used very often myself, is to dip the drawings in a strong solution of common sea-salt, wipe them lightly, and let them dry. The more brilliant the sun at the time of taking the drawing, the more efficacious will this method be; for then the dark parts will suffer no injury from the sun. The lights, when exposed to the sun, sometimes take a bright lilac colour, and then disappear. By repeated experiments, I have ascertained that this lilac colour is not uniform, and that when certain proportions are used, it does not appear, and the lights are perfectly white."

"Sir John Herschel has lately suggested to me a beautiful invention of his for the preservation of photogenic pictures. I do not feel at liberty to mention it, but can state, that its success is complete."

After Mr. Talbot's paper was read, M. Dumas made some remarks on the theory of all these operations. It was clear, he said, that chlorure of silver was produced here, as in M. Daguerre's first experiments, which would turn completely black, if it was not dissolved; and that common salt, or chlorure of sodium, as well as iodure of potassium, readily dissolved the chlorure of silver when recently formed, by the reaction of a former portion of chlorure on the nitrate of silver, but had no effect on it after it had turned black, while an excess of salt formed with it a compound much less affected by light. Sir John Herschel's method he suggested, must be the use of the hyposulphite of potash or of soda, which, as was remarked in some of Sir John's early writings, have the quality of dissolving very readily the chlorure of silver, when not yet acted on.

We will not bore our readers with any more chemistry, but barely add, that as all stories grow larger from day to day, so is it with this matter of the Daguerrotype. The latest improvement is that of M. Colas, by which this same principle is applied to statuary, and that in such perfection, that in the copies, you can distinguish a statue from a bas-relief, and see even the stain produced by age on the marble. We suppose the next advance will be to give us in landscapes, not only the foliage of the trees, but the songs of all the birds that may happen to be perched on their branches; and in portrait, to furnish us, besides an accurate copy of the subjects' faces, with a short sketch of his life, and the number of his residence. We have heard of so many brilliant discoveries, in our day, that promised to revolutionize art and science, and after being talked of and admired awhile, vanished into nothing, resting as they do, on hearsay and newspaper reports. At the same time, it is evident that the process invented by M. Daguerre, may reasonably be expected to facilitate greatly the imitation of some objects, and to furnish us with many pretty effects that are beyond the reach of the pencil and graver.

THE SNOW ON THE GREAT ST. BERNARD.

A Chapter from an unpublished history of the Great St. Bernard, by M. Rey.

In December, 1830, a large quantity of snow fell, and caused enormous avalanches round Mont St. Bernard. The convent is situated a little below the point of perpetual snow, and there often falls so great a quantity in winter, that the summer is not long enough to remove it. There was, in fact, a time when it was feared the masses would turn into a glacier. These fears, however, exist no longer; for since the beautiful experiments of Benet, upon the enormous glacier of Gietroz, which he melted by covering it with water, from the melting of more elevated snows, a glacier can be formed almost where we wish.

Snow, cold as it feels to the touch, is still less so than ice, and observation early found in this difference of temperature an infallible means of restoring limbs recently frozen, which is used by the monks with great success. When they encounter a traveller, who cannot use his limbs, they begin by ascertaining whether they are only stiffened or actually frozen. In the first case, they apply to the limbs simple friction only; in the latter, they rub the patient with snow, on the spot, without waiting to transport him to the convent. At the convent, the frozen limb is plunged into snow-water till it thaws, and a cure follows speedily. The use of fire and heat is most especially to be avoided. Count Tilly had his feet severely frozen in ascending the mountain, and on descending wrapped them in a sheep's skin, the heat of which caused the feet to swell to an enormous size; after four days, gangrene ensued, and it required all the skill of the physician of Geneva to save his feet.

One of the effects of snow, and one which follows still more speedily when we are fatigued, is that of putting to sleep by the combined influence of the monotony of the spectacle, and the action of the cold on the brain. Wo to the traveller, if he yields, while in the snow, to the profound lethargy that he feels overpowering him; he will awake only in eternity. The cold will contract the orifices of the vessels, the circulation will invariably diminish, the surface of the body will begin to be lifeless, the blood will flow back on the brain, which yielded to the cold more slowly, and gorges it; and his existence will end without pain, without suffering. In 1829, the monks found on the road a man standing upright, resting on his staff, one leg raised, and the foot set down in the attitude of a man ascending a height. He had fallen asleep in this position, and had been frozen to death instantly. He had a knapsack, and over it another, which belonged to a fellow-traveller, who lay dead near him, and who was afterwards ascertained to be his uncle.

"On the twenty-ninth September, 1829, (the monks told me,) some travellers reached the convent during a horrible storm, and informed us that the great quantity of snow, and regard to their own safety, had obliged them to leave a man and woman behind them, about half a league from the hospice. We immediately went in search of them; but the unfortunate beings had lost their way, and were buried under the snow. We searched for them till night, but in vain, and renewed the search with no better success. The same day another traveller died, who had been overtaken by night. Three days after, we found their bodies."

"More than once," says an English traveller, relating his ascent of Mont Blanc, "we asked of our guides to let us lie down on the snow, a few minutes, to indulge a longing for sleep, which no one can conceive who has not experienced it. We were often forced to halt to take breath, and at every stoppage slumber overpowered us. Often ascending to the Grand Plateau, I asked Courtes, the guide, if I might not sleep on the snow for a few minutes. He consented, but reluctantly, and the next minute I was sound asleep. In a few minutes he aroused me, else I might have slept on for ever." In fact, the guides rarely allow travellers who pass the night at the camp of Grand Mulets, in ascending or descending Mont Blanc, to spend the whole night there. They awaken them often to ascertain whether their elbows, shoulders, or knees, are not frozen, as those articulations are the first parts affected during sleep.

The constant presence of snow increases an influence on the atmosphere, which reacts in different ways on the human organization. The coolness it gives to the air, renders long stay in the region painful. Its reflection of the rays of light that strike on it, produces most striking effects on the skin. It renders it rough, red, and tanned, and covers it with watery pustules, which are painful, though easily removed. It irritates the optic nerves, and produces an ophthalmia, which is always harder to remove in proportion to the recentness of the snow and the clearness of the air. Some persons it soon renders blind; some for a short time, others, as was the case with Cyrus' soldiers, for life. It is well known that the inhabitants of polar regions have more or less feeble vision, and that many are blind by the time they are twenty.

The Col du Bonhomme is, perhaps, the most subject to changes of temperature of any of the passes of the Alps, and the most dangerous from the frequency and violence of the storms that sweep over it. Accidents happen from snow-storms every week, and I might almost say every day. Without going back to tradition, I will mention a melancholy instance which happened in our own time. In September, 1830, two young Englishmen, of eighteen or twenty, Messrs. Campbell and Brackley, were travelling in Switzerland, under the care of their tutor. When they arrived at Chamonix, they took a guide, a stout and prudent man, and proceeded to the Col du Bonhomme with all the ardour and gaiety of youth; when they reached a house near the Platz (plateau) des Dames, which is the last you meet in going towards the Col, they wished to take dinner. Unfortunately, a number of young men from a school which had just left, had taken with them all the provisions usually kept in such houses. They were far from dreaming how fatal this circumstance, seemingly so trivial, would be to them. Urged on by hunger they left at once, in the hope of overtaking the young men, and obtaining some food from the remains of the provisions they had carried off; but no one was to be seen, and the pursuit, made at great speed, only served to add to their hunger and fatigue. Nor was this all. During the time which would have been required for taking their meal at the auberge, which they employed in walking, the atmosphere, thus far calm and clear, underwent so instantaneous a change, that the whole four found themselves in the midst of one of the severest storms of that bleak region, without the least suspicion of it, even on the part of their guide. They were cut to the bone by a fierce and icy wind; blinded by a whirlwind of snow, and carried off their feet by sudden whirlwinds. One of the young men, who had been most weakened by hunger and fatigue, seized with terror at the unexpected horrors around him, stopped suddenly short, as if petrified, deprived of hearing and motion. The guide took him in his arms, wrapped him up in his own garments; opened his breast and pressed him to it, to communicate to him some portion of the heat of his body, spoke affectionately to him to encourage and console him; but in vain; he clasped a corpse. The other, Mr. Brancley, terrified at the outbreak of the storm, fell down on the snow, stupefied with cold. He half rose up at times and embraced the knees of their guide, as though to thank him for his efforts in behalf of his friend. But when he saw that that friend was lost to him for ever, he began to shrink, spite of all the attentions of his tutor. He gradually ceased to turn his eyes towards the stiffened corpse, and let his head fall on the snow, never to raise it again. The tutor, in despair at these scenes of horror, bore them, nevertheless, with manly courage. As soon as the storm was over, and it did not last long, he placed one of the frozen bodies on the guide's shoulders, and bore the other himself to the nearest cottage. Every means that could be obtained was there tried to restore them to animation, but in vain, and the unhappy tutor repaired to Geneva to order two coffins for his ill-fated pupils, whose carriage and courier were yet waiting for them to pursue their tour of pleasure. Before the day fixed for their interment, the tutor was dead. His strength of constitution saved him at the Col; grief destroyed him at Geneva. A third coffin was ordered, and the funeral was attended by all the crowd of gay travellers assembled in that city.

SOME PARTICULARITIES OF GOETHE.

A distinguished painter, M. de Keilboelter, who was on habits of great intimacy with Goethe during the last twelve years of his life, has given us an account of some of the great man's peculiarities, of which the public was previously ignorant.

Light and warmth Goethe loved above all things; and consequently, the higher the temperature, the gayer and the more conversable was he. He used to say jestingly, that if a man could move beforehand a true idea of the horrors of winter, he would hang himself in the autumn, sooner than endure them. He would never allow the windows of his study or of his sleeping-room to be opened; even if the air was fairly noxious, he found it comfortable. It was only in his absence, and at the risk of being severely censured, that those around him would sometimes, acting from a well-grounded anxiety for his health, throw open these two apartments to change the air in them.

Goethe was insensible to unpleasant odours, with the single exception of that of rotten apples—an odour which, by a singular contrast, Schiller was peculiarly fond of. Goethe walked one day into Schiller's study, and not finding him at home, determined to await his return, and sat down not far from the poet's desk, but soon experienced a stupor which gained gradually upon him, and did not disappear until he was fairly in the street. Schiller's servant set to work to find, if possible, what could have produced such an effect on Goethe's nerves; and found on a shelf above the desk, a score or so of apples, all more or less rotten, with which the author of Joan of Arc had provided himself, in order to perfume to his taste what he called his "workshop."

Goethe, whether at home or in society, always endeavoured to snuff with his own hands all the candles near him, because, as he used to say, it was an operation that no one could perform to his satisfaction. He has even been known to leave more than one party abruptly, because the servants had not snuffed the candles that stood before him in a way that pleased him, and because there were no snuffers on the table, whereby to correct their blunders. He did not like to be asked how he did, and if such a question was put to him when he happened to be in the least indisposed, he was vexed, and without making any answer, would change the conversation to some other subject. He loved life, but loved good health more, and did not fear death. "The only things I now fear," he would say, in the last year of his life, "are diseases, and a painful end. If God will grant me an easy death, and that soon, it is all I ask."

THE KING OF BAVARIA.

We notice by the Milan Gazette, that the king of Bavaria arrived there lately. He is travelling through Italy under the name of Count of Augsburg. A good story is told of an adventure that happened to him on his first setting out on his journey. In August of last year, his majesty was pleased to issue a decree, forbidding the wearing of moustaches by any military men, and ordering the proper authorities to arrest all who might violate this provision. Soon the moustaches began to fall, like withering leaves before the autumn blast, and it so happened that the decree had been obeyed by all without a murmur, and there was not a single instance of continuance. Early this spring, however, the gendarmes on duty fell in with a train of travelling carriages filled with gentlemen, one of whom sported huge grey moustaches. They required him to produce his passport, which he did; they found it all en règle, but as the bearer was described in it as Count of Au, they asked him if he was a soldier, to which he replied in the negative. Thereupon they pronounced him under arrest, and ordered him to follow them, stating, however, that as soon as the offending moustaches had been shaved off officially, and at his own expense, he should be at liberty to proceed. His companions protested against this severity, and intimated to the gendarmes that they might perhaps be sorry for it afterwards. But the guards would listen to nothing of the kind; they insisted on the traveller producing his commission or sacrificing his moustaches, and had actually laid hands on him to carry the sentence of the law into effect, till the stranger, seeing his last entrenchment, so to speak, on the point of being forced, was obliged to show off his incognito, and announce himself as Louis-Charles-Augustus, king of Bavaria, and Generalissimo of its armies; whereupon the gendarmes released their illustrious prisoner, vowing, but a little too late, that they would not be caught so again.

THE LOVELINESS OF CELIBACY.

Monsieur Chateaubrand, in a letter to the Countess of Fontanes, the daughter of one of his oldest friends, thus expresses the regrets of a man who has outlived the friends and associations of his youth—"The past is now my only employment—recollections of other days murmur faintly in my ears, like the dashing of waves on a distant shore. When I walk in the woods, I often fancy with the poet, that the welcome voice of some long-lost friend whispers to me in the rustle of a withered leaf. But alas! I have so much to regret, that I know not what to mourn. Left alone, I am busied putting the empty house in order, and closing the doors and windows. When these pious duties are discharged, if my friends, when I shall go hence to join them, ask me what I did here, I will answer, 'I was thinking of you.' There will soon be between us a community of dust, as well as an union of hearts."

"The men of other days, when they grew old, were less to be pitied, and less solitary than those of our own; if they had lost the objects of their affection, at least but little else was changed; though strangers to the youth around them, they were at home in society. But now, a lagard in this world sees not only men die, but ideas; principles, manners, tastes, pleasures, pains, sentiments, nothing is like what he once knew, he is a being of a different species from those among whom he is to finish his days."

PHRENOLOGICAL NOTICES.

The original copy of the following communication, politely furnished to the Mirror several months since by Mr. COMBE, was accidentally lost. We have much pleasure now in copying it from the Phrenological Review.

MR. GEORGE COMBE

ON THE SIZE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT'S BRAIN.

MR. EDITOR—The following paper was recently received from a relative of mine, at present in Edinburgh, and was procured for the purpose of insertion in your journal. The friend referred to was present when Mr. Combe made the examination of which the result is here presented; and in reply for permission to send me the developments for insertion in the American Phrenological Journal. Mr. Combe very politely sent the paper, accompanied by a note, giving permission to my friend to make any use of it which might be wished. Some additional interest will probably now be given to anything from the pen of this gentleman, from the fact of his having become personally known to the American public as a lecturer on the science, which he has long and successfully studied; and of which he is now certainly the most philosophical advocate living. This interest will be still further increased, at least to those who have attended Mr. Combe's lectures, by their recollection that in the latter half of his second lecture he was somewhat extended in the remarks he made on the head of Sir Walter Scott, as strikingly exemplifying the great principle of our science, "That, other things being equal, size is a measure of power."

The paper bears internal evidence of being designed for publication; and I have ascertained, by inquiry of Mr. Combe, that it was designed for the Lancet (late Edinburgh) Phrenological Journal. In the January number of that journal it will appear; and if you insert it, its appearance in both journals will be nearly simultaneous: as yet it has never appeared in print. On receiving the article, I waited on Mr. Combe to solicit his permission to forward it to you, and that permission was most promptly and politely afforded; you will, therefore, I feel assured, very gladly afford it a place.

Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott has an extensive circulation in this country; and, of course, the note which gave occasion to the existence of Mr. Combe's article is, to some extent, affording to the enemies of phrenology a plausible pretext for opposing it. On this account, it is important that the antidote should accompany the disease; in other words, that Mr. Combe's article should be preserved in your pages; because it is not possible that one in a thousand, in this country, who read Lockhart's work, should obtain a sight of the London Phrenological Journal; while yours, I trust, will be at least as generally read here, as the work of Scott's biographer. It may operate beneficially, also, in another way: the exposure made by Mr. Combe, of the unfairness, or ignorance, or prejudice, of a medical practitioner, when making a professional report of a professional examination, will long remain, in temper, over those medical men who remain hostile to phrenology; if they shall ever have the opportunity, and feel the inclination, to walk in the footsteps of Mr. Clarkson; it will render them morally certain that they will be made, in such a case, to participate in his unenviable notoriety, as a partial, contracted, and unphilosophical reporter of a professional operation. I remain, sir, very truly yours, R. W. A. N.

For the American Phrenological Journal.

In the seventh volume of Mr. Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, page 394, there is a foot-note to the following effect:

Abbotsford, September 23, 1832.—This forenoon, in the presence of Dr. Aschaffenburg, from Edinburgh, and my father, I proceeded with a surgeon to the head of Sir Walter Scott.

On removing the upper part of the cranium, the vessels on the surface of the brain appeared slightly turgid; and on cutting into the brain, the cerebral substance was found of a darker hue than natural, and a greater than usual quantity of serum in the ventricles. Excepting these appearances, the right hemisphere appeared in a healthy state; but in the left, in the choroid plexus, three distinct, though small, hydatids were found; and on reaching the corpus striatum, it was discovered diseased, a considerable portion of it being in a state of ramollissement. The blood-vessels were in a healthy state. The brain was not large.

(Signed)

J. B. CLARKSON.

On reading this report, the feeling in the mind of every reflecting person must be that of astonishment at the extreme paucity and vagueness of its details; and, as at almost necessary consequence, a suspicion of unintentional, but not less real, partiality on the part of the reporter. Taking into consideration the general interest which exists on the subject of phrenology, and the eagerness with which important facts, favourable or adverse to its pretensions, are examined and canvassed, it is, perhaps, not going too far to affirm, that nine out of every ten readers will peruse the above report chiefly with reference to its bearing on phrenology; and will rise from the perusal biased for or against its truth, according to the opinion which they form of its accuracy or conclusiveness. Knowing, indeed, the extreme desire which exists among the opponents of phrenology to find out adverse facts in the organization of men of remarkable mental powers, and aware of the hostility to the science manifested by Sir Walter Scott during life, we cannot resist the conviction that the reporters themselves proceeded to the examination of his brain, with the clear perception of the importance which would be attached to it, as a matter of phrenological evidence; and, consequently, that in limiting themselves to the darkness visible of the above statement, they shrunk from the duty they owed to science, and from the example set before them in the cases of other men, the equals and superiors of Sir Walter Scott. When Byron, Cuvier, or Duguet, died, we were not left to the vague opinion of any man that their brains were small or large, but their condition was minutely described, and we were furnished with an account of their respective weights in pounds, ounces, and drachms, from which every one could deduce his own conclusions. But when we contrast this mode of proceeding with Mr. Clarkson's meagre opinion that Sir Walter's brain was "not large," we feel at once the lamentable want of precision, which entirely destroys the value of his testimony. If he had measured or weighed it, with reference to any fixed standard, he would have stood on unassailable ground; but as it is as much as men are to vary in their estimates of things which they form merely a rough guess, we can attach no definite meaning to Mr. Clarkson's assurance. He obviously could not say that Sir Walter's was a small brain; and yet such is the meaning which every anti-phrenologist attaches to his statement—a meaning at variance with fact, and which he was bound to have divested by a strict ascertainment, and the use of more precise expressions. It may be, that he and the friends of Sir Walter felt a delicacy in allowing Sir Walter's brain to become a subject of philosophical or popular discussion, and, therefore, wished to withhold all details. If so, I admit at once that they had a right to consult their own feelings in the matter, and to withhold all information, if they pleased. But the same motives did not warrant them in giving forth a document calculated to mislead the public from its inherent vagueness, and, therefore, equally injurious to the truth, as if purposely designed for its obstruction. In fact, the course they have followed is the only one by which controversy could be excited; for had the necessary details been given, there would have been no room for difference of opinion. Whereas Mr. Clarkson's statement, that the brain was "not large," having been adopted by anti-phrenologists as implying that it was small, and there being ample evidence it was "not small," discussion becomes unavoidable, till the apparent discrepancy be removed.

The extraordinary meagreness of Mr. Clarkson's report is further shown in its utter disregard of another question, which every interested physiologist for some years back, viz.: the influence of the size and depth of the cerebral convolutions on the mental power. Strong grounds have been assigned for believing that large and deep convolutions are favourable to vigour of the mind. Never was a better opportunity than that afforded by Sir Walter Scott's death, of obtaining good evidence in proof or disproof of this allegation; and yet not a syllable occurs in the report on the subject.

If the three medical practitioners whose names are connected with the report, were not actuated by hostility to phrenology in their examination, they have displayed a lamentable disregard of the interest equally of physiological and phrenological science; for a more meagre description of the brain of one of the most distinguished men of his age, has not recently been presented to the public. The phrenologists constantly call for evidence, and when they are permitted, they furnish it. It is the opponents who conceal or omit; and yet if they had any confidence in the grounds of their own rejection of the science, they would accumulate evidence with greater zeal than they display in suppressing it.

As the subject is interesting, I beg leave to present you with the best evidence which, according to my information, now exists regarding the size and development of Sir Walter Scott's head.

In January, 1831, Mr. Lawrence Macdonald, sculptor, now settled in Rome, lived for several days at Abbotsford, and modelled a bust of Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Macdonald was then a practical phrenologist. He knew that no bust, authentic in the measurement of Sir Walter's head, existed; and he bestowed every possible attention to render his work a true representation of nature. He assured me that he measured the size of the head in different directions with callipers, and preserved the dimensions in the clay; while he exhibited the outlines and proportions as exactly as his talents could accomplish. Sir Walter sat four hours at a time to him, dictating a romance all the while to his amanuensis, Mr. Laidlaw. Sir Walter's vigour, both bodily and mental, had by that time declined; and his features had lost part of their mental expression. The bust bears evidence, in the features, of this decay of power; but there is no reason to believe that the disease had, at that time, existed so long as to cause any diminution of the skull. This bust, therefore, forms the best record which now exists of the dimensions and relative proportions of the different parts of Sir Walter Scott's head; and as it is in my possession, I present you with the following measurements, and note of the size of the organs. It will be seen that the head was really large.

The hair, as represented in the marble bust, is short, and, in the crown, thin. If, therefore, we deduct two eighths of an inch from the following measurements, they will probably approach very closely to those which would have been afforded by the head itself.

From individuals to the occipital axis, eight inches and two-eighths; destructiveness to destructiveness, six and three-eighths; cautiousness to cautiousness, five and six eighths; comparison to constructiveness, seven and two-sevenths; sensitiveness to sensitiveness, six and four-eighths.

The following measurements are made where there is no hair: From directly to directly, four inches and six-eighths, constructiveness to constructiveness, five.

In the following measurements, the hair may be estimated as equal to one-eighth of an inch, which should be deducted:

From the base to the ear to firmness, six inches and six-eighths; benevolence, six and six-eighths; individuality, five and five-eighths; occipital spine, four and four-eighths; from the lower margin of individuality to the centre of veneration, five and six-eighths.

The anterior lobe is very large in the lower region. It is large in the middle line. In the upper region it is less. The coronal region is large. It is rather short from before backwards, but very high above causality. Veneration and hope are the predominating organs. The coronal region rises to an unusual height. The base of the brain, particularly in the posterior lobe, is large.

The relative proportions of the organs, as they appear on the bust, may be thus estimated:

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1 Amateness, large. | 17 Hope, large. |
| 2 Philoprogenitiveness, large. | 18 Wit, very large. |
| 3 Constructiveness, moderate. | 19 Ideality, full. |
| 4 Adhesiveness, rather large. | 20 Wit, full. |
| 5 Constructiveness, large. | 21 Imagination, very large. |
| 6 Destructiveness, rather large. | 22 Individuality, rather large. |

I have seen a cast, purporting to be one of Sir Walter Scott's head, and which is said to have been taken in Paris; but it is widely at variance with Mr. Macdonald's bust, and also with my recollection of Sir Walter's head; which I have seen at least a thousand times, and closely observed. It was the highest head, from the ear to Veneration, that I ever beheld; and in the lower region of the anterior lobe, as well as in Benevolence, Imagination, and Wonder, it had few equals. The only evidence which could be appealed to in support of the assertion of its being small, is the fact, that he wore a small hat. But the hat affords a measure of the circumference of part of the head, and not of the height or whole magnitude of the head, and therefore does not afford a measure of the size of the head that can be relied upon for scientific purposes. In Sir Walter's head, the upper and lateral portions of the forehead were only moderately developed; which organs, collectively, determine the dimensions of the circumference of the head; while the forehead and coronal region towered high into its artificial cavity, without rendering any enlargement in that quarter necessary.

While, therefore, I controvert the statement that Sir Walter's brain was "not large," and maintain that, in the proportions, in the lower region of the anterior lobe, in the middle of the anterior lobe, and in the coronal region, it was actually large, I do not subscribe to the opinion that Sir Walter Scott stood in the highest rank of intellect, and much less of general, mental greatness. In exact correspondence with those regions of the brain which were large, he manifested vigorous observing and descriptive powers; with a vast insight into human feeling and action. But also, in correspondence with those parts of the brain which were not largely developed, he was deficient in philosophic penetration and comprehensiveness. He has not struck out, or even adopted and imbibed, any great principle calculated to excite his race to moral and intellectual improvement; and his poetry was the splendid elevation of that of Shakespeare, Milton, and Byron. In short, he was an extraordinary man in an extensive, but still a limited and secondary sphere; and this is all that truth permits us to say of his genius.

It will be observed, that the whole of the perceptive organs, except that of Size, are well developed. I have stated reasons (System of Phrenology, page 366, third edition) for believing that this organ takes cognizance of Distance, and gives a talent for Perspective. Sir Walter mentions that he had an eye for scenery, and tried to draw, but somehow or other failed in his attempts. The large development of the knowing organs probably gave him the acute perception of external objects, which he calls an eye for scenery, while his deficiency in Size was probably the cause of his failure in drawing; a low degree of that organ being attended by feebleness in the power of representing perspectives.

SKETCHES OF REAL LIFE.

THE IMPROVISATRICE OF FLORENCE.

"I am a daughter of that land,
Where the poet's fire and the painter's hand
Are most divine. I am of Florence."—L. E. L.

LAURA ZUCOLLO, the daughter of a celebrated physician, at the age of eighteen was one of the most attractive personages in Florence. However Italy may have degenerated, none can deny her the merit of fully appreciating genius and talent. In the present case, Laura's fame as an improvisatrice and poetess earned her that notice and acceptance which was unentitled to claim on the ground of personal beauty, wealth, or birth. Whilst she was delighting the Florentine princes in their Palladian halls—whilst crowded audiences listened to her lays of love or chivalry—little did she admire through respect that the impassioned poetess was then suffering the pangs of unrequited love! But so it was! Laura was susceptible to the charms of personal beauty, though entirely destitute

* In a number of observations which I have made, I have seen the anterior portion of Cautiousness large and the posterior portion small, and in those cases, I think it probable that two organs are included in the space now allotted to Cautiousness.

tute of that goodly gift herself. Signor Stephano was the youth upon whom our heroine had most unfortunately fixed her affections, and in all respects the signor justified the taste of his youthful worshippers.

The signor was a son of one of those noble houses who claim descent from the contemporaries of the Cæsars; his person was of the most graceful form, his head worthy of the Apollo, his mind richly stored with the learning of the ancients, and with all modern accomplishments. Signor Stephano had been one of the first to discover and foster the genius of the youthful votary of the muses. He had repeatedly protected her from insult, and had at all times treated her with a kindness that went to the heart of the too susceptible girl. She became passionately attached; but, alas! Signor Stephano observed nothing of this, or, if he did casually notice that Laura's eye brightened when he entered her presence, or a sigh escaped her when he departed, he ascribed it to another source than its true one; he thought it merely the natural gratitude of a sensitive heart towards a liberal benefactor and a powerful protector.

Laura loved, but not without hope; the signor was unmarried, nor was it known that he was attached to any lady, neither was the signor a man of gallantry, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, so that the poetess hoped that the signor's habitual kindness might at last open into a deeper feeling. Matters had gone on thus for many years, and the girl had spent many womanly days, but neither her feelings nor his had changed; still she hoped—but the hope was blighted! Stephano had been appointed an attaché to a mission to the court of Madrid. Whilst there, he had become enamoured of a dark-eyed Castilian, Donna Isabel de Murcia; her he had wedded, and Laura Zucollo was thrown into despair. No longer had music or poetry charms for her—she sharply sunk into despondency; her former haunts and habits were neglected, and she sat motionless brooding over her hopeless passion. Her father, Doctor Zucollo, died about two years after this event, and Laura found herself her own mistress, in the possession of a small independence arising from her father's savings and the result of her own exertions.

We are not sufficiently read in the intricacies of the human heart to know what it was that induced Laura shortly after to settle her affairs in Florence and depart for Madrid; this, however, she did, and settled herself in a small house, with a respectable elderly female as her companion. She gradually resumed her habits of improvisation, and her fame quickly flew through Madrid. Signor Stephano, among others, heard of the fair countrywoman and protégée; he mentioned the circumstance to the donna, and it was agreed between them that the talented Florentine should be invited to their house, not as a public performer, but as a friend and countrywoman. Poor Laura's heart beat high as she entered the mansion of him her soul held most dear, and when he greeted her in his usual kind manner, her feelings overpowered her, and she burst into tears. Both her father and the signor were so much astonished at this display of sensibility, and for the first time a suspicion of the truth glanced through the mind of her former patron. After this time the signor cautiously avoided taking the least notice of the poetess; she perceived it, and at once knew that her secret had been discovered. Ashamed and mortified, she gave up all society, and now she found that the object of her tenderness did not in the least degree respond to her feelings. Hope altogether fled, and as love can hardly exist without hope, the violence of her attachment abated.

Signor Stephano had returned to Florence with his bride, and now Laura no longer had reason to avoid society; her old habits returned, except that her exertions to please were gratuitous, and she was a welcome guest at the houses of the highest nobility. Some years after this, Don Pedro de Lara, a general in the Spanish service, and governor of Mexico, had obtained leave of absence from the colony, and had returned to Madrid for the purpose of arranging his affairs in the mother country, and ultimately settling altogether in the New World. The don had been repeatedly thrown into the society of the improvisatrice, and the more he saw of her the more he considered her as eminently suited to make him happy. He thought that the genius and talents of Laura would, in the colony, shine out with a resplendence which would make him the most envied of governors; he offered his hand, and her youthful passion being extinguished she accepted it, if not with the expectation of enjoying exquisite felicity from the union, at least with the hope of moderate happiness.

Don Pedro and his bride departed for Mexico, and after a prosperous voyage, the thunder of the cannon announced the return of the governor; but before they landed the don found courage to mention a circumstance which should have been stated earlier. Don Pedro, during his previous residence in Mexico, had formed a connexion with a female of high blood, her father being a Spaniard, her mother an Indian; this woman was residing in the place with her family. The fact of the don having a mistress did not at all affect Laura; she considered it all in the course of things; so she good-humouredly asked the governor his intentions with regard to his family. The don replied that he would take care that Laura should not be incommoded by the female, and that he would remove her to a separate establishment as soon as possible, and at the same time promised that no renewal of intimacy should take place.

For some weeks after the arrival of the governor and his lady they lived very happily; he was a man of sense and could well appreciate the genius of his wife. Up to the time he had not found courage to intimate to his mistress that she must remove, and that all intimacy had ceased. At last the blow fell upon her like a thunderbolt; she was a half-educated, passionate creature—a slave to every impulse—she threw herself at Lara's feet, deprecating the separation, promised to avoid all offence to Donna Laura; only let her rest under the same roof as her beloved—only let her children enjoy their father's notice and protection. Don Pedro, in an unguarded moment, consented; but, as an honourable man, avoided all communication with his former mistress. This enraged her; she found, contrary to her expectations, that Lara's European wife had obtained an influence over him which she never possessed. All the bad passions of her soul were awakened; she meditated revenge; and, with the cunning of her nation, she found means to accomplish it. Don Pedro was absent in the interior on business. The woman found access to the apartments of Laura, and infused poison into some food which had been prepared for her; when she supposed that the poison had partly performed its work, she rushed into her room and there found her in the agonies of death. With a demoniac laugh of triumph, she boasted of what she had done, and was immediately seized by the servants and removed to prison. Lara died a victim to jealousy and revenge. Lara returned to his palace and found that his accomplished wife had been murdered. Stern was his revenge; his former mistress was condemned to be burned at the stake! Don Pedro instantly quitted the country; he returned to Madrid, and retired to a convent.

LITERARY MISCELLANIES.

THE DAYS THAT ARE PAST.

BY EPHRAIM SARGENT.

We will not deplore them, the days that are past;
The gloom of misfortune is over them east;
They were lengthened by sorrow and sullied by care,
Their griefs were too many, their joys were too rare;
Yet now that their shadows are on us no more,
Let us welcome the prospect that brightens before!

We have cherished fair hopes, we have plotted brave schemes,
We have lived till we find them illusive as dreams;
Wealth has melted like snow that is grasped in the hand,
And the steps we have climbed have departed like sand;
Yet shall we despond while of health unbereft,
And honour, bright honour, and freedom are left!

O! shall we despond, while the pages of time
Yet open before us their records sublime!
While, ennobled by treasures more precious than gold,
We can walk with the heroes and martyrs of old;
While humanity whispers such truths in the ear,
As it softens the heart, like sweet music, to hear.

O! shall we despond, while with vision still free,
We can gaze on the sky and the earth and the sea;
While the sunshine can wake a burst of delight,
And the stars are a joy and a glory by night;
While each harmony running through nature can raise
In our spirits the impulse of gladness and praise!

O! let us no longer then vainly lament!
Our scenes that have faded, and days that are spent;
But by faith unshaken, answer by misadventure,
On Hope's waving banner still, fixed be our glance;
And should Fortune prove cruel and false to the last,
Let us look to the future and not to the past!

MAGNOLIA GRANDIFLORA.—This fine tree appears to have been first brought to Europe, from the banks of the Mississippi, in 1732, by a French officer of marines, who planted it at his native place, Mailardière, about four miles from Nantes. Here the Magnolia grew and flourished; but, its introducer having died, little notice was taken of it, and when, as observed, it was only supposed to be some variety of the common laurel, which it resembled in its leaves. Thirty years afterwards it flowered, and was then discovered by M. Bonami, professor of botany at Nantes, to be the Magnolia Grandiflora of Linnaeus. At a meeting of the states at Breague, held at Nantes in 1760, M. Bonami presented a branch of this Magnolia in flower to the Princess de Rohan Chabot, and it excited so much admiration, that its fame shortly after reached the ears of Louis the Fifteenth. The monarch was then ornamenting his garden at the Petit Trianon, and had there some small plants of the Magnolia Grandiflora, which had, in the meantime, been re-introduced into Europe by one of the English collectors; and when Louis heard that he had in his own dominions a tree of this rare exotic, forty feet in height, which was covered with blossoms every year, he sent two of his gardeners to examine it, with orders to transport it to Versailles, if they could ensure its living. This it was a formidable obstacle, and the gardeners reporting that they feared it would not survive its removal, it was suffered to remain at Mailardière. Thirty years more brought the revolution, and amidst the general destruction, the poor Magnolia did not escape; it was mutilated in the war of La Vendée, and its branches were cut for firewood.

MILTON AND GALILEO.—Florence and its environs, beautiful as they are, acquire attraction from the memories with which they are blended. What English visitors can look at Faenza without remembering that our own Milton has visited it too; and commemorated it and Galileo in his Paradise Lost!

"His ponderous shield,
Ethereal temper, massy, large and round,
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening from the top of Faenza,
Or in Valdarno, to rise and on a day
Rivers, or mountains, on her spotty globe."

Who can forbear dwelling with deep interest on the meeting of two such master minds as those of the "starry Galileo" and Milton, and fancying their conversation! Galileo, already with impaired vision in those eyes which had so long contemplated the heavens, and made such discoveries in their starry lore, that dazzled by the wonders they described, they became at a later period shrouded in darkness, and Milton, doomed to lose his sight, which seemed to have been only granted him long enough to have filled his glorious mind with images whose brightness never escaped from it, but embued his work with unfading light long after he himself had ceased to enjoy all physical sense of it. I love to think of this meeting, when my eyes dwell on the sunny Faenza, and people its summit with two such spirits.

MORE WORDS FOR MONK.—We have been talking a good deal lately about "words for music," and what sort of things they ought to be. The "Morning Chronicle" selects a specimen from the latest libretto, which places the success of our exhortations, so far, in a remarkable point of view. Here it is—

"One fatal night, as slumbers o'er us stole,
A fearful noise disturb'd our tranquil rest,
'Twas loud as thunder's roar, 'twas thunder's roll,
And in an instant, we were up and dressed."

This puts us in mind of an anecdote we once heard of a man who had run away from a mad bull, with some damage to his unmentionables. "The bull," said he, in an eloquent and sublime crescendo (but ought to have been set to music), "the bull roared like thunder—I too like lightning—and, in jumping over the hedge, tore my breeches as if heaven and earth were coming together!"

BENEVOLENCE.—Mr. Charles Burney, writing to Miss More, relates a natural trait of benevolence in a little child. This child was present at the play of Jane Shore, and being in the front of the stage box at a country theatre, and hearing the wretched Jane in such supplicating "a morsel to support her famished soul," and crying out, "give me but a morsel," the child, not five years old, touched with her distress, said, "Ma'm, will you have my ol-lange?" which the audience applauded much more than the artificial words of the actress.

Some of the "ginnivine" morris multicaulis sold in the South, not having sprouted with the expected rapidity, Cuffie proposed to his master to hatch out the eggs by placing them under the hens

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Richelieu; a play in five acts, by E. L. Bulwer." New-York: Harper and Brothers.

We see by the London papers that this play has already passed through ten editions in that metropolis, and that it has been produced by Macready upon the Covent-Garden boards with success. As a dramatic production we think it inferior to the "Lady of Lyons." It is not so "well-digested in the scenes," and the interest droops before we arrive at the denouement. It is more like a dramatized novel than a thoroughly wrought play. Yet there are many passages of remarkable power, which no one but Bulwer could have written. "Richelieu" can never meet with the popularity of the "Lady of Lyons" upon the stage. It is, however, a work which will materially add to the reputation of the author, and will, in the closet, give undoubted satisfaction. The character of Richelieu is portrayed with mastery skill, and the fact that the subject of the play is essentially undramatic makes the triumph of the dramatist the more remarkable. One of the most effective scenes in the whole play is that at the close of the fourth act where Richelieu replies to Baradas, who has scoffed at his gray hairs.

Baradas. (Aside.) His mind

And life are breaking fast!

Richelieu. (Overhearing him.) Irreverent rascal!

If so, beware the falling ruins! Hark!

I tell thee, scorner of these whining clouds,

When this snow melteth there shall come a flood!

Avant! my name is Richelieu—I defy thee!

Walk blundering on; behind thee stalks the headman.

Ha! ha!—how pale he is! Heaven save my country!

"The Adventures of Robin Day." By the author of "Calavar," "Nick of the Woods," etc. In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Had this work been put forth anonymously, we should have commended it as a production of considerable merit and more promise. But it is strikingly inferior to the former productions of Dr. Bird, and, measured by his own standard, it is found wanting. The plot is meagre; the characters, with one exception, are characterless, and many of the scenes ineffective. The author appears to have sat down to his task without any settled story or plan in his head, and to have trusted to luck for such incidents as his imagination might pick up by the way, not knowing whether the work would "turn out a song or a sermon." One of the best scenes is the adventure with Hollett in Mr. Bloodgood's house at night; and there is considerable fun in the dashing impetuosity and patriotic exploits of Mr. Richard Dare. In spite of the rambling and undramatic style in which the story is conducted, the book is superior to most of the English novels of the day, and will, undoubtedly, prove attractive to many classes of readers.

"The Life and Adventures of N. holds Nicotley." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

The thirteenth number of this immitable work by Charles Dick- ena, has been given to the American public, illustrated with two capital etchings. There is no falling-off in the humour and interest of the narrative. The scenes between Mrs. Nickleby and the insane old gentleman, who makes love to her, are admirably hit-off; as is the interview between John Browdie and his bride, with Nicholas and the Squeers—where the promising Master Wackford, feasts "at the enemy's expense," much to the satisfaction of his estimable father.

"The History of the Navy of the United States of America." By J. Fenimore Cooper. In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Here is a subject which Mr. Cooper is simply qualified to illustrate. As far as our own observation extends, he has executed his task honestly and well. He has, with great ingenuity, fused his materials into one continuous history, preserving a degree of unity, which heightens the interest and merit of the work. Commencing from the earliest period of our naval history, he has brought down the narrative to the close of the last war, presenting a complete and most valuable record. The work at once assumes a place among the standard historical productions of the country, and should be in the library of every enlightened American.

"Bentley's Miscellany," edited by W. Harrison Ainsworth. New-York: J. M. Lewer.

The republications of this able Magazine are issued with remarkable regularity and rapidity. The late numbers have been peculiarly rich, containing contributions from Thomas Moore, Sergeant Talford, Dickens, and other conspicuous writers. The amusing papers, which appear as by the author of "A Parisian Sabbath," are from the pen of Isaac Appleton Jewett, a young American, residing at the west. They are praised in the London journals as among the best things in the Miscellany. The description of "A Ball at the Tuileries," in the April number, has, we perceive, been copied by several of our papers. These sketches are taken from a work published in Boston some months since, in two beautiful volumes, entitled "Passages in Foreign Travel." Of course now that the merit of these "passages" are endorsed by a London magazine, they will be read, praised and copied, although the work from which they are derived has been suffered to lie neglected on the shelves of the booksellers.

"Poems," by James Mack.

The title of Mr. Mack's contemplated publication is altered to "Earl Rupert, with other tales and poems." We understand it will be preceded by an interesting memoir of the author, by a distinguished literary character. The work is expected to appear in June.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The verses in our paper of to-day, under the signature of "Inez," will impress every lover of poetry with their beauty and grace. They are from the pen of a young lady of Edinburgh, some of whose productions have appeared in Black- wood's Magazine, and received the commendation of Professor Wilson. There is a spirit, a freedom, and earnestness in her style, which give evidence of the possession of true poetical talent. It is seldom that we have an opportunity of commending the compositions of the young with so much sincerity. We are told that the lady is not more distinguished for her literary attainments than for her personal attractions. We shall be pleased to hear from her again. The beautiful piece on our first page, by Mary Howitt, entitled "Summer Fields," will delight our readers; as will also, "War's Alarms," by the same author, and "Sun-Down," by Chasley.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1839.

The United States reprieved by Charles Mathews.—We are sure that the "friends of republican liberty throughout the world" will be delighted to learn that Charles Mathews has magnanimously consented to repress the publication of his book against this country, its inhabitants and institutions. Whether he has been induced to adopt this course in consequence of the attempts against the life of Madame Vestris, instigated by the American government—whether our minister at the court of St. James has obtained the queen's injunction against the publication, calculated as it would be to disturb the peaceful relations happily existing between the two nations—or whether, as is most probably the case, Mr. Mathews has been actuated solely by compunctious motives of generosity and compassion toward our promising young republic, it would be needless to inquire: Suffice it to say, that the English papers announce the important and gratifying fact, that the book on the "United States by Madame Vestris's husband, is not to be published. Once more, then, may the people of this country breathe freely—resume their wonted occupations—and renew their hopes of the perpetuity of our institutions. By the way, can our brethren across the water inform us—where is Gatchell?

An old friend.—Our London correspondent has sent us a beautiful engraving—almost an identity—of our esteemed correspondent, "the Hon. F. Henry P. Berkeley, M. P. for Bristol, returned by the liberals the twenty-fourth of July, 1837. J. W. Childs, del. H. B. Hall, sculpt., published by J. Childs, Bedford-street, Strand." This print we value highly. There stands our old friend, like a fine scholar and a true gentleman, as he is, in his very best looks, as natural as life, in his library at Berkeley castle, we presume, with hat and stick in hand—by the side of a table laden with bills, petitions, etc. We instinctively touched our beaver to him, as we were about to do in days gone by, when he was in the habit of visiting the Mirror office, with these admirable papers that used to turn the green-room topsy-turvy, and set the town in commotion. The print itself is one of the best we have seen. As but few copies are in the United States, we shall have this one framed and hung in the office, where the innumerable friends of Mr. Berkeley may see it.

Miller's paintings of Oregon scenery.—The beautiful paintings by the American artist, Miller, executed for Sir William Stuart, and illustrative of scenery and adventures in the Oregon territory, after having been exhibited two or three weeks at the Apollo Gallery, have been shipped to England. These paintings have excited much attention in this city, and will, doubtless, attract much more in Europe, from their novelty. A contemporary justly remarks, that the skill of the artist is chiefly shown in his spirited delineations of the wild sports of the Far West. The different buffalo hunts, the encounter with the grizzly bear, the hunter's camp, and all the wild scenes of peril and adventure through which his pencil has followed his gallant friend, are depicted with a life-like force and reality, that promise a rich reward as a painter.

Bend to your ears.—Our boat clubs are once again in motion, and a plenty of sport is to be witnessed on both our rivers. Surely, if there is any spot on the globe, where aquatic amusements should be in vogue, it must be here, circled as we are in the arms of two magnificent streams with an outlet to the ocean unsurpassed in its natural advantages. A sail to Hoboken at sunrise, when the smooth, creamy surface of the Hudson is still flushed with the orient crimson, is no undelightful and unrefreshing episode from the prosaic realities, the dust and turmoil of city life, whatever our late sitters and late risers may think to the contrary. Try it, and our word for it, you will not object to a repetition.

The son of the author of "Betræum."—Our attention has been called to a prospectus of a work, to be entitled "Tales from Roman History," by Edward Maturin, a son of the celebrated author of "Betræum." He proposes to publish a series of "passages" illustrative of scenes in the imperial households of Tiberius Claudius and Nero. From the specimens we have seen, we can commend the proposed work to the public favour as replete with interest, displaying much classical research and dramatic skill. Mr. Edward Maturin, though still a young man, has shown himself the inheritor of much of his father's genius, and promises to achieve a reputation not unworthy of his parentage. We trust that a liberal encouragement may be extended to his contemplated undertaking. Persons disposed to order copies of the "Tales of Roman History," (the subscription price is only one dollar) may leave their names at the office of the New Era.

Cologne and New-York.—The Nerin, which arrived here a week or two since, was the first vessel that ever came to this port direct from Cologne in Prussia.

New-York theatricals.—At the Park, Mrs. Gibbs, and Messrs. Jones and Sinclair in opera, and Miss Clifton in tragedy, have been the chief attractions. We accidentally omitted, in a recent notice of the production of the "Lord of the Isles," to pay a merited tribute of approbation to the efforts of Mr. Jones, who aided materially in the success of the opera. He is always correct, and his vocal accomplishments are of an order rarely equalled. Miss Clifton has produced, during her engagement, a new tragedy by Mr. Fielding, of the Southern theatres. It is entitled "Anna Boleyn," and was quite successful. The brilliant acting of Miss Clifton was received with reiterated applause. At the National, opera is still the rage. "Cinderella" has been produced in a most effective style, Miss Shirreff, and Messrs. Wilson, Seguin and Morley assuming the principal parts. Nothing, however, which can be produced, appears to attract like "Sonnambula" and "Amilie." At the Bowery, "Ernest Maltravers" and "Nick of the Woods" have drawn excellent houses. Mr. Hamblin's personation of the principal character in the former piece is full of spirit and power, and no one can witness Mrs. Shaw's "Alice" without admitting that she displays extraordinary talents in the part. Niblo's Opera-house opens in a day or two, and then will come "the tug of war."

Texas theatricals.—There are two theatres in Houston, which it is well known numbers about six thousand inhabitants, principally emigrants from the United States. The theatres are under the separate management of Corri and Carlos, who do their best to oppose each other. Corri's theatre is the largest and most fashionable. It is built of wood—has two tiers of boxes, and holds about six or seven hundred people. The price of admission to all parts of the house is two dollars. The stage is neatly arranged, the scenery good, and the company quite respectable. Barnes, wife and daughter, Plumer, J. R. Scott, and others, have been starring at the "Corri"—opposed by Finn, Llewellyn! and Holland at the "Carlos." They all did a fair business, the Barnes family carrying away a considerable sum of money—Miss Charlotte being as great a favourite there as she is everywhere else. She is a girl of fine talents, and writes as well as she acts. Barnes and Plumer have returned to New-York, and Finn is on his way here. It is said that a plot of ground has been presented to Corri by the corporation of Galveston, and that he intends building a new theatre there immediately, similar to that in Houston. The Texans are exceedingly liberal in their support of theatricals, and we should not be surprised to hear that money invested in that way there produced a larger interest than it does at the north.

Brandywine Springs.—For the information of travellers we take occasion to state that Mr. Sanderson, jun. will open the well-known hotel at Brandywine Springs, on Monday, the twelfth of June. These Springs are in the most salubrious and pleasant part of Delaware, and are the fashionable resort of the good people of our sister cities, Philadelphia and Baltimore. We have no doubt that the hotel will be thronged during the warm season, and a more pleasant retreat from the cares and perplexities of town-life, cannot well be imagined.

Exhibition of paintings at the Apollo Gallery.—An admirable collection of paintings, selected under the supervision of Mr. Her- zing, is now presented for exhibition at the Apollo Gallery. We shall find space to notice it more particularly hereafter. In the meantime, we may say to our readers, in all sincerity, if you have any taste for the fine arts, and the least pride in their advancement in this country, go to the Apollo Gallery, and you cannot fail to be gratified.

A female prisoner of rank.—A singular instance of worldly vicissitude is mentioned in a case lately reported in the London papers. It was a prosecution for perjury, in the course of which it was given in evidence that the prosecutrix, Lady Parker, becoming security for her sister, Lady Lake, for the sum of nineteen thousand pounds, in consequence of legal proceedings for its recovery, became an inmate of the King's Bench prison, where she officiated as cook to the more wealthy portion of the prisoners.

Chargé des affaires.—We are gratified to learn that our old friend and correspondent, William Leggett, has been appointed our chargé des affaires, at Guatemala. A more suitable appointment could not have been made. Mr. Leggett is a man of great and peculiar talents; and we hope the climate of South America will restore his health, impaired, as it has been, by long-continued and arduous literary labours.

A sanguinary proposal.—Some one has sent us a long, diplomatic-looking document, tied with red tape and endorsed: "Proposals for massacring the milk-men and radish-boys, with hints to the strawberry-women and other itinerant vendors." We cannot lend an ear to any such iniquitous proposal.

Mind your steps.—A writer in describing Aaron Burr says:— "He glided rather than walked; his foot had that stealthy, stealthy movement, which involuntarily makes one think of treachery, and in the course of a long life, I have never met with a frank and honourable man to whom such a step was habitual."

American works in England.—Dr. Chaunay's address on Self-Culture is eulogized in the warmest terms by the London press. One of them describes this lecture as of a thousand times greater utility to the working classes, than any of the publications sent forth by the Society for the diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Interesting to wine-bibbers.—A French journal says that cabbage is an infallible remedy for intoxication from wine, and that it has also the power of preventing it.

An ingenious editor.—A country paper, puffing a new store, says, in conclusion, "We get a prime pair of boots for putting this in."

IMPROPTU.

Written after paying the note of one friend, and trying to borrow from another.

Writes, to serve a friend, your name
On a note—expect him to pay the same:
Ask for a loan, when your purse is low,
Expect his cash like water to flow.
If the note be paid by your friend—
If in your need he has cash to lend—
Then believe, but not till then,
You may trust in the faith of men!

NOTES AND NOTICES.

REVOLUTIONARY ANECDOTE.—M. B., a merchant of Providence, Rhode Island, and a man quite celebrated afterwards for his liberality and public spirit, was the owner of a most fortunate privateer which sailed out of the port of Providence. On one occasion when he had just unshipped a cargo of sugar, etc., taken from a very rich prize, in rolling it into the yard, one of the hogsheads stove, and a quantity of sugar fell out. A poor woman in the neighbourhood seeing the disaster, ran and filled her apron. Mr. B. from the loft of his store called out, "What are you doing there?" The poor woman looking up, answered, "Privateering, sir." The retort was so forcible, that the merchant immediately made her a present of the entire hoghead.

Nobody.—Blackwood says that every one's experience must have convinced him that there is no such arrant rascal in existence as Nobody. The fellow is never easy but when in mischief. In the street door left on a jar at midnight, a plate chest ransacked, a jewel box stolen or mislaid, a window broken, an orchard robbed, or a slander spread abroad, ten to one nobody is the guilty party. Of all the offences that are daily committed against society, one-half at least are committed by this incorrigible scamp.

BEAUTIES OF LITIGATION.—The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, sitting at Northampton last week, was occupied several days in the trial of a case concerning a title to land, which had been in litigation two or three years. The value of the land in dispute was only about thirty dollars. After running up a bill of cost amounting to six or eight hundred dollars, the parties went home perfectly satisfied of the glorious "uncertainty of the law."

MATRIMONIAL TRIP.—At a jeweller's shop on Ludgate-hill, London, a bill is exhibited in the window, on which is written:—"Wedding rings at this shop made of lucky old guineas."

FEELING INQUIRY.—"Has the grand jury broken up?" inquired one friend of another. "I don't know, nor do I care—they owe me nothing," was the reply. "Aye," remarked a bystander—"but they may have a bill against you."

CHEVALIERS D'INDUSTRIE IN NEW-ORLEANS.—The Picayune says: Pickpockets seem to be plenty as blackberries in this community, particularly on and about the Levee. We beg these ingenious gentlemen not to be offended with us, if we put the publick on their guard. We do not pretend to deny that the pickpocket is the most honourable of all thieves. There is something open and above-ground in taking a man's pocket-book with one hand, while you are enforcing any remarks you may see fit to make, by opposite gestures with the other. Not that we would advise any of our readers to follow the profession. No, by no means. The objections are innumerable. To say nothing of the danger and disgrace of detection, the profession, in this city at least, is crowded to excess. Unless your talents be of the first order, let us advise you to follow some more quiet and popular vocation. If, however, you are confident that your genius will bear you out, perhaps you cannot do better. There are some vulgar prejudices afloat, just at present, which render the occupation a trifle dubious, both in the matter of profit and honour; but from all we can hear, the profession is getting into favour at Washington. The pickpockets, therefore, may reasonably hope for a change in public opinion, and, in the meantime, may pay that the time will soon come when men will cease to carry their money in their boots.

A PRECOCIOUS DIABOLIST.—The editor of the Standard, published at Monroe, in Louisiana, being absent, his "devil" has mounted into the vacated chair, where, like a beggar on horseback, he lays about him in the following dashing and summary style:—"Editor absent on professional business—not much original matter this week—weather delightful—Quachita rising rapidly—Doctor H. Holmes has resigned—Polish violin-player arrived—don't look much like Cupid—gives a concert shortly—hope he has more politeness than Adams—nothing to write about—sportsmen flocking in—makes town lively—races commence on Wednesday—preaching to-night, we hear—wonder if it's a fact—mail arrived—not much news—Republicans as interesting as usual." That will do, my little Belzebub. You may get down.

HOLDING HER TONGUE.—The late Doctor Abernethy would never permit his patient to talk much. He could not succeed in silencing a loquacious lady, but by the following expedient:—"Put out your tongue, madam." The lady complied. "Now keep it there till I have done talking."

IT TAKES THE YANKERS.—The present chief naval director of the Sultan of Turkey is a New-Hampshire man, named F. Knodes. He is high in rank, and enjoys a heavy salary—in fact a perfect bashaw.

LITERARY REMUNERATION.—It is stated that Sir Walter Scott, for the whole of his writings, now comprised in eighty volumes, received not less than two hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

WEATHERY STEAMBOATS.—There are three hundred and seventy-nine steamboats on the western and south-western waters. Of these one hundred and eighteen were built at Pittsburgh.

BACHELORS' BALL AT CAMBRIDGE.

Oh, my heart beat with rapture when first I heard tell
(Twas fat Heavyside told me with mischievous glee)
That for doing their Senate House lessons so well
All the dear little boys were to have a nice dance

Then I made my locks put on a glossier hue,
O'er my face, too, of rouge a fresh layer I spread,
And thus made it appear, though myself not a blue,
That my cheeks had a claim to be reckoned deep-red!

Oh, the ball was divine! A real lord we had there,
With the sweetest of coats and of pantaloons on;
It is true that of fashion he had no great share,
But a lord is a lord, though he have little ton.

Oh, the ball was divine! I at nothing was vexed
Save that none of the bachelors wanted a wife:
And I thought as each youth begged my hand "for the next,"
How delightful 'twould be if he'd take it for life!

Weippert's band (which was there) was perfection itself,
And so too was the supper; each wine and liqueur
Was sublime, save the one that I prize most myself,
Which was wanting, alas! I mean "perfait amour!"

There was waltzing, quadrilling, and all sorts of popping,
There were carloads of dainties and seas of champagne;
But it gave me no pleasure to hear the corks popping,
Since to me the soft "question" was "peppied" by no swain!

MARTYRS OF THE PRESS.—On the eighteenth of September, 1797, the French directory issued the following proclamation:—"Orders are hereby given to the executors of the mandates of justice to arrest and conduct to the prison of La Force the editors and printers of (here the papers are named, twenty-nine in number) all guilty of having conspired against the internal and external repose of the republic." All the presidents of the national convention were, with one or two exceptions, journalists. Of the sixty-three who attained that honour, eighteen were guillotined, three committed suicide, eight were transported, six imprisoned for life, four became mad, and died at Bicetre, twenty-two were declared outlaws, and there were only two who escaped without castigation of some kind. If we extend this synoptical tableau to the entire press, we shall find its proportions pretty exact. There perished from 1789 till 1797, at least one-half of the political writers of Paris.

BIRDS IN SUMMER.

How pleasant the life of a bird must be,
Flitting about in each leafy tree;
In the leafy tree so broad and tall,
Like a green and beautiful palace hall,
With its airy chambers, light and boon,
That open to sun, and stars, and moon;
That open unto the bright blue sky,
And the frolicsome winds as they wander by.

They have left their nests in the forest bough,
Those homes of delight they need not now;
And the young and the old they wander out,
And traverse their green world-round about:
And, hark! at the top of this leafy hall,
How one to the other they lovingly call:
"Come up, come up!" they seem to say,
"Where the topmost twigs in the breezes sway!"

"Come up, come up, for the world is fair,
Where the merry leaves dance in the summer air!"
And the birds below give back the cry,
"We come, we come to the branches high!"
How pleasant the life of the birds must be,
Living to love in a leafy tree,
And away through the air what joy to go,
And to look on the green, bright earth below!

How pleasant the life of a bird must be,
Skimming about on the breezy sea,
Cresting the billows like silvery foam,
And then wheeling away to its cliff-built home!
What joy it must be to sail, upon
By a strong, free wing, through the rosy morn,
To meet the young sun face to face,
And pierce like a shaft through boundless space!

To pass through the bowers of the silver cloud,
And to sing in the thunder-halls aloud:
To spread out the wings for a wild, free flight!
With the upper cloud-wings,—oh, what delight!
Oh, what would I give, like a bird, to go
Right on through the arch of the sun-lit bow,
And to see how the water drops are kissed,
Into green, and yellow, and amethyst!

How pleasant the life of a bird must be,
Wherever it listeth, there to flee;
To go when a joyful fancy calls:
Dashing down 'mong the waterfalls,
Then wheeling about with its mates to play,
Above and below, and among the spray,
Hither and thither, with screams as wild
As the laughing mirth of a rosy child!

What joy it must be, like a living breeze,
To flutter about 'mong the flowering trees;
Lugally to soar, and to see beneath
The wastes of the blossoming purple heath,
And the yellow furze, like fields of gold,
That gladden some fairer region old:
On mountain tops, on the billowy sea,
On the leafy stems of the forest tree,
How pleasant the life of a bird must be!

SELECT NOUVELLETES.

THE RECTOR'S DAUGHTER.

I do not love to speak to many of our poor friend and early play-mate, the rector's daughter. There is a sacredness about her sorrow—it has something so almost mysterious in its dispensations—and is borne with a fortitude so touching, and a resignation so saint-like—that it seems ever to me unfitted for ordinary handling, and language an inappropriate exponent of her mournful tale. A grief like Caroline's should have no other interpreter than the sad and solemn characters which it has written on her still beautiful brow. She never weeps—at least none see her weep; and her gentle voice, which from her very childhood had a tone of sadness, is heard by no mortal ears in the language of complaint. What dirge-like music may be uttered in the haunted depths of that wounded spirit is known only to herself and the angels; but to the world, she speaks always calmly—and even cheerfully at times. You who knew Caroline through all her young days, will remember well that light-hearted as the sweet child was, there was even then at times a sort of shadow on her brow—an air of thought not natural and infinitely touching, in one so young. As she grew towards womanhood, the shadow became permanent without deepening; and the graceful girl, with her long fair hair and somewhat antique fashion of dress, gave us both the impression of one predestined to suffer—

"She was of those whose very morn
Gives some dark hint of night,
And in her eye, too soon, was born
A sad and softened light."

And on her brow youth set the seal
Which years, upon her brain,
Confirmed too well—and they who feel
May scarcely weep again!"

Seated, amid the shadows of a summer evening, in the old oratory which her father had fitted up as a boudoir, for her who was all the treasure that time had left him—ministered to by the breath of the jasmine and the fragrance of the rose—I have gazed, at times, on the unconscious girl, when, to my excited imagination, there was something almost apocalyptick in her look; till, as I stepped in upon her, the spirit of prophecy seemed lifted from the forehead, before a smile of welcome, that made her face like the face of an archangel. Oh! those happy days in the old rectory!—For Caroline was happy then; and the seeming cloud on her brow (for it had not yet reached her heart) was but the shadow flung from that approaching destiny which has, since, alighted. I cannot, therefore, speak of the rector's daughter to every one: but to you, who knew and loved her as I did myself, I will, at length, fulfil the promise so often made, and narrate the incident which finally darkened her spirit for all the remainder of its earthly pilgrimage.

The early pleasures and early trials of the rector's daughter are as well known to yourself as to me; and you remember well how rich a volume the sibil Hope presented to Caroline, when she first emerged from childhood. Year after year tore away some portion of that charmed book; and the perished leaves but enhanced the value of her young heart to those that remained. You remember how, each after the other, her sisters were laid beneath the old trees in the churchyard; and the channels in which her young affections had been accustomed to run, were, one by one, thrown back into the deep well of her spirit, there to seek fresh outlets, or make her heart a waste. Then, her mother, weary with her long separation from those who were to return to her no more, went forth to them, and was laid in a grave by their side. From that day, Caroline was a child no more—at least she never again looked like one: and her father, the kind-hearted rector, old in heart, though in the vigour of his years, had none but herself to remind him of all that he had lost, and inherit the accumulated treasure of love which had reverted to his spirit from the cluster of graves in the neighbouring churchyard. And then came happier times to Caroline; and her heart found fresh issues. You remember George P—the play-days of the young cousins—their joint studies—their young attachment—their mature love. You were a witness to the growth of that hallowed and hallowing love, amid the fond and smiling approval of all who had an interest in the youthful pair. Those were Caroline's sunny days—when the memory of her childish griefs had taken a tone in which its indulgence had a charm for her heart, and she seemed, in the bright prospect which was opening up around her, to have emerged from the destiny that had overhung her like a prophecy! Something, however, of her latter sorrows I believe you know; for you had not gone forth from amongst us when her new and final trials began. You remember George's departure for Oxford, and the rumours that reached our quiet village, and the hearts that loved him there, of the surrender to the temptations by which he was surrounded. You saw the gradual coming up of that cloud, from the day when it was "no bigger than a man's hand," till it had overspread the entire heaven of that hope in which the rector and his daughter had been blest, and shut out the sunshine from poor Caroline's heart. You know that, when George left Oxford, and flung himself into the vortex of London dissipation, instead of returning to the fond and forgiving hearts that awaited him at the rectory, his reckless career of extravagance had involved the fortunes and bowed down the spirit of his father. But the sequel of that painful story, you know not—and that I am now to relate to you.

It was in the old rectory, Caroline's boudoir, and amid the deepening shadows of an autumn eve, that the rector and his daughter spoke together, for the last time, of George P. The old man had marked the sufferings of his child, in her pale and wasted cheek; and, in his earnest desire for her happiness, and with something like a hope that the nobler qualities of her lover might yet come out clear from the shadow by which they were, for the moment, darkened, had forbore to add to her distress, by any comments on the conduct of him to whom she was betrothed. But the prodigal student had forgotten the hearts that yearned towards him, amid all his follies; and tidings of his excesses had reached the village, which robbed the rector of his last hope, and made it incumbent on him to dissolve the ill-omened connexion, for the sake of his daughter's peace. In that solemn interview, he exacted a promise from Caroline—given with many tears, but unhesitatingly given—that she would consider the engagement between herself and her cousin as cancelled; and as he kissed her cheek, and bid adieu to her for the night, the poor girl felt that, but for her father, she was, once more, alone in the world. Never had she felt so desolate till that hour; but the morning was to bring a yet deeper desolation to her breast. That night took from her the last heart to which her's clung: for, amid its shadows, the rector had passed away—almost direct, as it seemed, from that painful interview with his sole surviving child—to the presence of those to whom he had mourned so deeply and so long!

Months passed over the head of the bereaved girl, cheered by no incident save the universal sympathy which her orphan condition and unvarying sweetness won for her. The new rector, whose family was large, had been supplied with a more commodious residence than the old rectory-house; and, by the kindness of the patron, an arrangement had been made, which left her, with her nurse, in possession of the home which had been the scene of all her hopes, and was now for her "the house of memory." Tidings had, indeed, been received of her former lover, which, no doubt, brought consolation with them—though, after the pledge given to her father within the immediate shadow of his grave, they could no longer bring hope. His naturally noble mind had awakened from its demoralizing dream; and the energies of a "spirit finally turned," had directed themselves, at length, to those "fine issues" which were its natural result. His soul had shaken off the foul mists by which its clearer perceptions had been, for a time, so fatally obscured; and, amid the sweet and sacred images that came gliding back into his purified heart, came, first and sweetest of them all, the vision of the rector's daughter. Then it was, that he learned the vow which had come between their hearts, and knew that he and Caroline were separated by the solemn shadows of the rector's grave. In the strength of his redeemed and penitent spirit, he bowed his head to the dispensation which he felt that he had himself provoked; and lent himself manfully to arrangements in his favour which were making by his friends, and which resulted in once more opening up to him the path to fortune, though far away from the scenes alike of his early hopes and recent faults. Under circumstances of peculiar promise, he was invited to join a commercial speculation in India; and in a few weeks the seas were to ratify that separation betwixt George P and the rector's daughter, which, in her mind, was already consecrated by the grave of her father.

I have said that Caroline seldom weeps; but many and bitter, in those days, were the tears shed by the solitary girl. It was on a winter's evening, in one of those moments when her spirit was awakened by the scene of its utter desolation, that the window of the old oratory was opened from the garden, and George P stood, once more, in the presence of the rector's daughter. The buoyant youth of sixteen was changed into a pale and wasted man; and he had come to take the words of forgiveness from the lips of Caroline, ere he parted from her for ever. No one saw their interview; but the old nurse heard the murmur of voices in the boudoir, and the sound of deep and passionate sobbing. What passed between them is known but to God and themselves—save by its result; and that result was what might have been anticipated from such an interview. What could be expected from two young beings, thus thrown together by the old tie which was the only one that time had left—at least, to Caroline? How was the orphan girl to be proof against the passionate pleading of the only heart which still beat in unison with her own? George had the art to persuade his mistress that the promise exacted by her father, in the prospect of his follies, would assuredly have been cancelled in favour of his repentance; and that, if the rector had been with them, that evening, in the oratory where they had so often sat together, he would not have stood between his child and the returning penitent whom she still loved. Caroline's reason and heart alike told her that this was indeed so: and ere the lovers parted on that night, they were once more betrothed. The friends who immediately presided over the fortunes of the orphan, entirely approved of the spirit in which her promise to the rector had been read, and gladly ratified the contract which once more opened up a prospect of happiness to her bruised spirit. It was agreed that George should depart for Calcutta, alone; and, so soon as the success of his speculations had been ascertained, and arrangements made for her reception, that Caroline should follow, and become his wife. There were many in the village, however—where Caroline was beloved of all—who looked on this engagement with uneasiness; and prophesied that no good could come of a contract founded on a breach of promise to the dead.

And, almost from the first, it seemed as if these forebodings were about to be realized. The ship in which George had taken his passage for India had sailed many months, yet no tidings of it reached England. Week after week of anxious suspense passed away, and the ill-fated girl drooped and faded before this new trial of the heart. At length, however, when the time which had elapsed left no hope in the minds of all others, the spirit of the orphan rallied, under some mysterious impulse, and hope came back to her heart, and bloom to her cheek. Her friends looked on uneasily—for she was obviously sustained by some delusion—and this "hoping against hope" argued an unsoundness of judgment, at which they trembled, but could not wonder. Strange and poetical fancies kept the poor girl happy, through that trying time. Dreams of enchanted islands, at which the ship had, perhaps, cast anchor, wooed by their wondrous beauty—visions of unknown continents, which the crew might have turned aside to explore, accounted to her for the delay. Then, there were times when her fancies took a more sober tone, and drew their salutations of her lover's silence from something more like realities. But, amid them all, it never occurred to her to doubt that he would, one day, come back. He might have been shipwrecked, or taken by pirates—but his return was a portion of all her speculations—long after his friends had mourned him as dead! And, for this once, fortune was in alliance with her heart. When all who had hopes embarked in that vessel, save herself alone, had laid them in their graves, came letters, announcing George's arrival at Calcutta. The vessel had been driven far to the southward, by a long prevalence of adverse winds; and regained her course when famine had nearly deprived the crew and passengers of all power to avail themselves of the more auspicious weather. Caroline received the news without any surprise—as what she had long expected; but, in the presence of her assured hopes, her tottering mind gradually regained its natural tone. And then came fresh tidings, announcing George's success; and Caroline set sail for India, to be, at length, united to the lover of her youth.

The weather was stormy enough, until the ship, in which she and her hopes were embarked, had reached the tropic latitudes; and, in the excitement of the novel scenes by which she was surrounded, Caroline's thoughts were diverted from dwelling much either on her past sorrows or her future prospects. But when the weather lulled, and a succession of calm and light breezes succeeded to the noise and bustle of fresh gales and heavy seas, a sort of tender melancholy stole over the spirit of the lonely girl. Amid the vast solitudes of the ocean—cut off from all old familiar ties—the scenes of her orphaned condition came heavily to her heart; and though she strove to look forward to that happiness of which she was sailing in search, yet she had been too long the victim of disappointment to be altogether successful in her strife against that feeling of foreboding, so naturally born of the waste of waters and the torpid air.

It was one evening, after a day of more than usual depression, that Caroline descended to her cabin, in order to seek a refuge from the heaviness of spirit which she had vainly endeavored to shake off. She sat long at her window, watching the shadows gradually steal over the world of waters by which she was surrounded; and flung herself, at length, upon her bed, weary in spirit and heavy at heart. But her slumbers were unrefreshing and her dreams disturbed; and, after a troubled sleep, of she could not guess how long, she found herself suddenly awake. Her face was hid in the bed-clothes; and vague and undefinable terror was upon her, which made her flesh creep, and chilled the blood within her veins. Cold drops of perspiration stood on her forehead, and her heart faint, as the heart of one who stands in the presence of a disembodied spirit! She lay for some moments in this mortal terror; and then, with a presence of mind marvellous in one whose pulse stood still with fear, she argued herself into the conviction that she was under the impression of a nightmare, and, raising her head by a convulsive effort, looked forth into the cabin. The moon shone clear into the small chamber; and between her bed and the narrow window by which it gained entrance—in the direct path of its rays—stood the pale face and wasted form of George P. The moonlight fell around him, like a mantle; and the eyes which had never before turned on her without the expression of love, were fixed on her's with a look of calm and passionless repose. With a loud scream, she buried her face again within the bed-clothes; and lay, she knew not, how long, in the sleep of insensibility. When consciousness returned, and she, once more, ventured to look up, the apparition was gone, and the moonlight fell unintercepted on her bed. With a feeling like that of approaching death, she rose from her couch; and, flinging a cloak over her shoulders, ascended to the deck.

It was a beautiful but melancholy night. The moon glided, spectre-like, through the cloudless heaven; and flung, from her nearly full orb, upon the slumbering waters, that pale and mournful light which the young and crescent planet never shed. The ship floated through the waters, before a breath so faint as to be scarcely perceptible, save from the creeping motion which it communicated, and, standing on the same track with themselves, though all but motionless, the yards and shrouds of another ship rose right between her line of vision and the wan moon. Most of the canvases had been taken in; and the two vessels were evidently standing under easy sail, for the purposes of communication with each other. As Caroline gazed upon the spars and cordage, with all their tracery defined in the pale moonlight, the strange vessel appeared to her excited imagination like a spectre-ship; and the same mysterious sense of terror crept to her heart, that had chilled its life-blood in the cabin which she had left! But the night air revived her—and her fear passed away—and a sensation of exceeding tenderness and melancholy took its place. The phantoms of her mother and her sisters passed through her heart—and the echoes of old familiar voices floated to her ear; and it seemed to her as if her destiny were accomplished, and she was beckoned, by invisible hands, on board the spirit-ship that lay white before her, in the moon-beams. She sat on the poop of the vessel, and watched the strange craft that appeared to her heart like some mystery which it was bound to solve; till, letters having been exchanged between the ships, the object of her trance-like interest spread its wings, and glided slowly away through the moonlight. Never before had the lonely girl felt so lone. What was that strange ship to her, that her spirit yearned towards it, and her heart so died within her to see it depart! All night, she fancied that she heard the sound of wings that went and came between the ships; and when, at length, in the gray of the morning, the stranger faded off into the distance, it seemed to her as if the spectre-ship had vanished away into some sea grave!

That night at sea it which was left on the forehead of the rector's daughter, the solemn characters whose interpretation you have so often sought for me! The tale is soon told. When Caroline reached Calcutta, there was no one expecting her, and no one to meet her. Three days after the date of his letter, summoning over his bride, her lover had been seized with the fever of the country, and carried off in a few hours. In writing to Caroline, he had recommended her to come out by a vessel which was to sail some months later than that in which, for reasons of convenience, her friends had secured her passage. She was not, therefore, expected so soon; and when he knew that he was dying, he had made it his earnest request that he might be sent home to be near her, in the old churchyard. His body was conveyed to England, in the vessel which had exchanged letters with the ship on board of which was the rector's daughter; and thus had the two met, for the last time, amid the moonlight solitudes of the sea!

This it is that has weighed more heavily on Caroline than all her sorrows besides. Never has she consoled herself for having misunderstood the warnings of her heart, in that unconscious meeting, and passed forward to India, in search of happiness, while her lover was travelling homeward to his grave! The strangeness of that meeting—strange enough even to you and me, who are but unimpassioned listeners to the narration of an incident so singularly wild—has haunted her heart, like some high and solemn mystery; and it can scarcely surprise you to learn that the poor girl's mind is indelibly impressed with the reality of a visitation from her lover, in her cabin, while the two ships were in company. There are some circumstances, so striking in themselves and so strange in their combination, that it would be worse than idle to argue against the convictions which they leave behind, in the troubled spirit they assual. Caroline returned to England, and has resided since amid the friends to whom her story is known, and beside the graves of her perished hopes; and the memories of that night, acting upon a heart which time has once more tuned to all its early sweetness, have made her the intensely interesting and strangely beautiful being you now see her.

MISCELLANEOUS SELECTIONS.

A FEW WORDS ON PRECIOUS STONES.

Amos all the moralizing of philosophers upon the nothingness and worthlessness of personal embellishments, the taste for adorning the outward man (perhaps we ought to say the outward woman) is so universal, that it should be considered merely as a natural propensity.

Rich and costly habiliments have at all times been considered as indicative of high rank and station, and therefore it is no wonder that inferior persons should delight in approximating their external appearance to that of their betters—a very harmless vanity when not carried to the extent of injuring more important interests. But besides costly and elegant apparel, there has prevailed in all ages, in all countries, another method of adding dignity and grace to the human form—we mean by wearing ornaments, composed of precious metals and stones, which no ingenuity can justify as even approaching to a necessity; in the dress of the Jew, the Persian, the magnificent dress, that it is purely ornamental, or significant of high rank.

Yet it is an extraordinary fact that in many countries, particularly in Eastern ones, that whilst ornaments of the most costly and precious are worn by the higher ranks, to denote that rank, to exemplify worth, or to adorn their persons, so the lower classes all wear similar articles in construction, though of more common materials. Thus, whilst in India a lady of distinction wears enormous gold bangles on her ankles and arms, rings of the same metal in her nose and ears, the very Pariahs will encumber themselves with enormous bangles of iron of the very commonest workmanship! We can well understand why a wealthy person should wish to exhibit a proof of it on his or her person, or why an individual of rank should wish to show the world an external sign of it; but we must confess that all our philosophy cannot enable us to discover why the lowest classes should ape the customs of their superiors, when no one can for a single moment be deceived either as to the wearer's rank or wealth, and when at the same time their personal appearance is injured rather than improved by the custom. But all this is a extraneous to the subject; we can only say, that we cannot understand it, and there leave the matter.

Sacred writ is sufficient evidence that the custom of wearing precious metals and gems as embellishments to the person and as signs of rank is of the highest antiquity; but we have no knowledge of the extent to which the custom prevailed amongst the Jews; pearls are mentioned in the book of Job—but that is all we know, except that they were of great price.

We have abundant means of knowing that the Roman ladies were particularly extravagant in the use of jewels—witness Lollia Paulina, who, we are informed by Pliny, carried about her person ornaments to the value of thirty millions of dollars; a very pretty sum; and Miss Polly must have been a person of great consideration. Again—Pliny and Horace both mention that one Clodius, when he gave an entertainment, threw pearls into the goblets of his guests: we are not bound to believe that he actually swallowed them, either whole or dissolved; most likely it was considered a very elegant manner of presenting a souvenir. Suetonius likewise reports that Caligula followed the same custom—and a very magnificent custom it was, and one which we should advise our wealthy fair-ones to follow. Now to give our fair readers a short account of some of the precious gems which repose on their fair bosoms.

The diamond, which is the most valuable of all substances, weight for weight, in its natural state, is found in Ethiopia according to Pliny, and we know, also, in the East Indies and in South America. The ancients ascribed to it many virtues; it was thought to be a cure for insanity, and counterpoise of the effects of poison; it was a test of conjugal fidelity, and was used as a charm in the incantations of their necromancers and magicians by the Arabians, and possessed numberless other superstitious virtues too tedious to be repeated here.

The first persons who appear to have known anything of the real nature of the diamond was Botius de Root, who declared it to be inflammable, though on insufficient grounds; he was quite right in his supposition—the diamond, as has since been proved, being pure carbon.

Until the fifteenth century the diamond was so rough, as it was brought from the mines, and it was only in the year 1365 that Louis Berghem, of the city of Bruges, discovered the art of polishing this valuable stone. The other precious stones were polished by the friction of emery powder, which would not touch the diamond at all. Louis Berghem succeeded in giving a polished (facet) to a diamond by rubbing it against another; the invention of the wheel, and the use of diamond powder, is also due to Louis Berghem. The manner of cutting diamonds is not our business to describe—its appearance when finished is sufficiently well known.

Tavernier says that in the throne of the Great Mogul there were one hundred and eight large rubies, varying in weight from one hundred to two hundred carats, and one which weighed two ounces and a half.

HANDEL AND MOZART.

Each of these great masters was admirable as much for science as for genius, for melody as for harmony, for sublimity as for sweetness. Handel had less variety of expression than Mozart, but the style in which he excelled was the highest of all. Mozart was alike at home in depicting all the more extreme passions of our nature—love, fear, joy, despair. Handel chiefly excelled in expressing those pure and solemn emotions which elevate our nature above itself. Mozart is, at least to modern ears, more full and flowing; but the stream of his composition has somewhat too much of an instrumental character. Handel is pre-eminently vocal; his music is not merely expressive, but it is articulate; it does not breathe but speaks. Mozart, we cannot help thinking, was unfortunate in his chief subjects. His soul was fitted for better things than to dramatize the silly or libertine intrigues of Spanish barbers or groves. Yet he was risen infinitely beyond his matter, and has produced the highest purity and sublimity out of folly and coarseness. Handel had little dramatic power, and by an involuntary impulse originally wrote some of his finest sacred pieces to stage compositions, to which they were comparatively inappropriate. He found, in fact, however, in the sound feeling and generous patronage of an English public, an opportunity to exert his peculiar and unrivalled talents, more favourable than any that his successor ever enjoyed. From an ardent comparison between them we would wholly exclude the choruses of Handel, as these stand by themselves without any thing that exists, aut simile aut secundum. And it is the greatest proof of Handel's genius, that even without these his superiority in "it is essentially to be ascribed to Mozart's credit that he acknowledged Handel for his master; and while we commend him to the difference between them, we should ever remember that Handel lived to the mature age of seventy-five, while Mozart died at thirty-six.

If we are to assimilate these illustrious composers to any of the great lights of the world in the department of poetry, we should set Handel down as the Milton of music; but, perhaps, with less luxuriance of imagination, and a still more severe simplicity of style. Nothing can be conceived more characteristically Miltonic than the whole oratory of Handel, and more especially that noble air, Totul Ecclap, which Handel, in the blindness of his latter years, must have reviewed with feelings near akin to those that crowded upon Milton's mind when brooding over his own bereavement. Mozart, we would venture to designate as the Virgil of melody—tender, graceful, majestic, sublime—now leading us through green and gladsome pastures—now through the dark and dreary shadows of an uncertain world: here awing us by the terrors of supernatural agency, or the tortures of guilty despair; and here melting us to pity, by the sorrows of bereaved affection, or the pangs of deserted love.

ANECDOTES OF BEATTIE.

Dr. Beattie's prose writings are justly famed for the purity of their English, and the delicate discrimination and fancy they display. The elegant Addison long and deeply, and certainly attuned to his perspicuity, simplicity and elegance. His moral dissertations, his essays on language, on poetry and music, abound in happy allusions; and when he estimates the character and genius of Dryden, Pope, Swift, we feel that he is not unworthy of the name of one of these immortals. A paper by Beattie in the Mirror, on the subject of dreams, shows how much learning and reading he could bring even to a trivial and hackneyed subject. As a metaphysical casuist, he was deficient in the originality and in the power. In his latter years, when his nerves were shattered, he could not bear to look on his "Essay on Truth." Postscript seem to be of the same mind.

The most marked departure from the ordinary rules of acting and thinking which Beattie, who detected all extremes, seems even to have made, was in the case related by himself in the education of his son. He was desirous to make a trial how far the boy's reason would go in tracing out, with a little direction, the great and first principle of all religion, the being of a God. The child was in his fifth or sixth year, and could read a little. The father went to his garden, wrote in the mould, with his finger, the three initial letters "J. H. B."—of his son's name, and sowing garden crosses in the furrows, covered up the seed. Ten days after, the little fellow came running to him, and, with astonishment in his countenance told him that his name was growing in the garden. They went to the spot; the boy said it could not be by chance that the letters came there.

"Look at yourself," I replied, "says Dr. Beattie, 'and consider your hands and fingers, your legs and feet, and other limbs; are they not regular in their appearance, and useful to you?' He said they were. 'Come you then further by any means?' 'No,' he answered, 'that cannot be; something must have made me.' 'And who is that something?' I asked. He said 'He did not know.' (I took particular notice that he did not say, as Rousseau fancies a child in such circumstances would say, that his parents made him.) I had now gained the point I aimed at, and saw that his reason taught him, though he could not so express it, that what begins to be must have a cause, and that what is formed with regularity must have an intelligent cause. I therefore told him the name of the Great Being who made him and all the world; concerning whose adorable nature I gave him such information as I thought he could in some measure comprehend. The lesson affected him greatly, and he never forgot either it, or the circumstance which had introduced it."

A NEW "VEGETABLE DIET."—"Doctor," said a stout coach yesterday, whose constitution had been considerably broken by over-indulgence in that class of the good things of this life generally known as spirituous liquors, "Doctor, I say, I'm very weak; my appetite is gone, and when I eat I don't agree with me. What do you think I had better eat, doctor?" "You should confine yourself to a vegetable diet altogether." "Should, eh? Well that's rather tough. By the way, doctor, speak of vegetable diets, do mind, I please come under that head, I'm, certainly not. But why do you ask?" "Why, I was going to say that if mine were why under the head of vegetable diet, I'm willing to go your prescription entire.—Piscogene."

THE HEIRESS AND HER LOVERS.

Three lived some years ago in one of the largest mansions, in one of the most fashionable squares of the great metropolis, a proud old baron—proud both of the veneration shown him on account of his great age, for he was eighty-six, and of the years and honours of his family, for he was the twenty-second baron. Although he had been a bachelor and childless for many years, he still lived in the most sumptuous style of old English hospitality; his equipments were the gayest, and his liveries the most gorgeous, in London. As he was childless, it might be asked why so old a man should live in such magnificence, and why his parties were so large, and his house so much frequented by all the gay and fashionable young men in town. We will explain: he had one beautiful and lovely grandchild, now in her eighteenth year, his only hope in his declining years, and the sole and undisputed heiress of the venerable old lord, whose vast estates lay in Kent and Oxfordshire, and who doted on her with all the affection of a tender father, and would have granted her any request save one—to marry a man who could not prove that his ancestors fought with William at the far-famed battle of Hastings. And well did the lovely and accomplished girl requite his love. Not many days of her first season had gone by, when she was wooed by an endless host of lovers, each waiting for a smile from the future baroness; the task of describing them all would be too tedious, therefore we will speak of three: first, a young man, heir to an ancient earldom, and almost boundless wealth from vast estates; second, a baronet just come from Cambridge, holding a commission in the Horse Guards; and third, Mr. A.—, of great moneyed wealth, but who could not trace his ancestry in honourable succession, like the noble house of Le Despenser, now represented by a youthful and virgin peeress, related by recent ties to the noble house of Pakenham, famed in the annals of war, and to the houses of Roden and Farnham, known by their attachment to the Protestant cause. At first the baron would hear of none but the heir to the earldom. But as Miss S.— did not seem to favour his suit, the old peer ceased to press it, but allowed her to take the wealthy squire, if she preferred him; the second lover he would not listen to, because his property, though good, was not equal to his expectations, although he could trace his ancestry to the conquest. How the baron came to decide in favour of a man whose wealth was his only recommendation, and who probably knew not who was his grandchild, we are unable to explain, we merely relate the fact. The lovely girl, although she wished never to grieve her noble relative, could not feel justified in joining herself for life to a man she did not love—for the young soldier-lover had won her heart, and when the old man discovered the secret he dismissed him from his house, with strict injunctions to his grandchild, on pain of his displeasure, never to mention the name of Sir Henry again, and to be banished all thought of him for ever from her heart. One of his mandates she could obey, the other was impossible, therefore, notwithstanding the assumed gaiety of her manner, the canker worm of sorrow was gnawing at her heart, and the roses on her cheeks had faded to the whiteness of the lily.

The author whom we first spoke of, conceiving it to be impossible that he would have been refused notice from his lover more favoured than himself, possessed the heart of the beautiful Miss S.—, determined to discover the rival—yowing vengeance on his devoted head. At last, by some unknown means, he discovered, challenged, and drove him. It was at six o'clock on a summer's morning that he found on to the ground in his cab, with his second, and about the same time Sir Henry drove up from the other side, and the young man prepared. The surgeons were awaiting their arrival, the ground was measured, the principals were placed, the seconds gave the signal—Sir Henry was severely wounded by his adversary's ball passing through his arm, and fired into the air at the same instant; they both shook hands, and all left the ground. The wounded gentleman was ordered to the south of France to recruit his health. What must have been the feelings of the lovely Miss S.— on seeing the following announcement in the Morning Post—"We regret to state that Sir Henry — has been mortally wounded in a duel, by the honourable Mr. —. We understand that the cause of the quarrel is the wealthy heiress, Miss —, granddaughter of a wealthy peer." The news passed away in the most dreadful agony of spirit, when one day the following note was given into the hands of Miss S.— "My dearest Mary—Fearing you might have heard of the affair in which I have lately been engaged, and have pictured things worse than reality, I write now to say that I have been slightly wounded, and am ordered to go to Lyons for a year; show this to the baron if you think right. Ever yours devotedly, HENRY." She did show it to the baron, but he positively refused his consent to her marrying the baronet. At length the old peer, in his daily visits to the clubs, heard so much in praise of Sir Henry, and how honourably he had acted in the duel, that his heart, by slow degrees, seemed to warm towards the man who appeared destined to be his grandson. Three months rolled by, when on their arrival, the old peer, addressing his grandchild, said, "I have a little piece of news which I think will please you. I am going to Lyons on Monday, and will allow you to marry your lover as soon as his health is recruited." It is unnecessary to say with what delight the beautiful girl received the intelligence! On Monday they started, and in due time arrived at Lyons, where, on their arrival, the first great point to discover was where Sir Henry lived. Their joy at meeting (to use the old phrase) can be more easily imagined than expressed. The health of Sir Henry was soon restored, and in two months after their arrival the ceremony was performed at Lyons, by a Protestant clergyman residing there. Immediately after they started for London, leaving the old peer at Lyons, and proceeded to spend their honeymoon at Sir Henry's magnificent seat in the north of Ireland.

About six months after their arrival, they received a letter from Lord —, wishing them to come to London immediately, and on their arrival, they found the venerable man suffering greatly from intelligence he had just received, that that very day the young heir to the earldom and the wealthy Mr. — were both to be hanged for extensive forgery. The old man lingered on for a few months, rejoicing, previously to his death, at the birth of a great-grandson. Sir Henry and his lady returned after the funeral to Ireland, where we shall leave them. It was subsequently discovered that there had been an agreement between the two young men convicted of forgery, that one of them should marry (if possible) the wealthy heiress, and then poison her; that the one who married her should retain possession of the whole property, but should pay annually a moiety of the income to his friend.

THE PERVERSENESS OF WOMEN.

There is an old story of a man, who had married a young lady, and who had a friend somewhat sceptical as to the obedient tendency of the wife's disposition, much to the dissatisfaction of the Benedick, who strongly asserted and warmly asseverated that his wife was law, and that she never by any chance disobeyed any wish or injunction of his.

"Have you ever tried her temper in that respect?" said the friend. "Have you ever desired her positively not to do any particular thing? for that is my point, since you tell me she never refuses to do whatever you desire her to do."

"No!" said the affectionate husband, "I never have found occasion to desire her not to do anything, but—"

"That's it!" as the old women say, "cried the friend, "female obedience is proved by negatives; tell her not to do any particular thing, give her no particular reason why, and see if she does not do it."

"Ridiculous!" says the husband.

"Try!" said the friend.

"Well," replied the husband, "agreed! we are both going away for the day; what proof shall I put her too? what shall I tell her not to do? may she not play her harp? must she not sing, or draw? or, in fact, tell me what you want me to prohibit her doing, and I stake my life she does it not."

"Oh, no!" said the friend, "drawing and singing, and playing the harp, are things which she might abstain from without a murmur, or, what is more essential to the affair, a wonder; because she has sung, and played, and drawn a thousand times; it is an injunction not to do something she has never done before—for instance, tell her when we go, not to climb some particular hill, for particular reasons which you do not choose to give her; or, by way of carrying the principle out to its fullest extent, warn her not to attempt to ride on the dog's back."

"Neptune's back!" said the husband. "Yes!" replied the friend, "on the back of this most valued Newfoundland dog, the bravest and faithfullest of his breed."

"Ride on a dog's back!" exclaimed Benedick, "how can you be so absurd!—as if!"

"Ah! then it is!" said the friend, "as if—now, take my word for it, if you issue the injunction, without giving her any reason, Harriet will break it."

The most incredulous of men rejoiced at the idea, which he felicitously ridiculed, and resolved upon trying the experiment in order to establish his Harriet's superiority of mind, and his friend's exceeding ill-will.

He parted from his Harriet, and with tender fondness she clung round his shoulder, as he said in quitting her,

"Harriet, dearest, we have seldom been separated since our marriage—I shall be back soon—take care of yourself, love—but, just attend to one thing I am going to say, dear; don't try to ride upon Neptune's back while we are away."

"What!" said the laughing Harriet, "ride upon Neptune's back, ha, ha! what an odd idea—is that all you warn me against?—why, what a ridiculous notion! why should you tell me that? What nonsense!"

"That, my dear," said the husband, "is a secret; all I beg of you is, not to ride upon Neptune."

"Ride upon Neptune!" repeated the lady, and she laughed again, and they parted.

When Benedick and his friend returned to dinner, the laughing Harriet did not as usual present herself to receive them; there was a sort of gloom pervading the house; the footman who opened the door looked dull, the waiter who came into the hall looked as white as his waistcoat; the lady's own maid rushed down stairs, evidently to prevent a scene.

"Where is your mistress?" said Benedick.

"Up stairs, sir," said the maid, "there is nothing the matter, sir—nothing in the world, sir—only my mistress has had a fall—quite a little fall on the walk in the flower garden; and has cut her face the least bit in the world, sir; all will be well to-morrow."

"A fall!" said Benedick.

"Humph!" said the friend.

"And up stairs ran the anxious husband.

"What has happened?" he exclaimed, he, catching her to his heart, and seeing her beautiful countenance a little marred—"how did this happen?"

Harriet cried and hid her face.

The explanation never came altogether clearly before the friend or the family; but the accident was generally thought to have arisen from Harriet's having endeavoured to take a ride on Neptune's back.

LAST WORDS.

Perhaps it would be difficult to find anything more decidedly characteristic of the life of an individual than the last words which are uttered previously to death. The circumstance may be in some degree accounted for, if we call to mind how frequently the dream of the night is merely a reflection of the ideas which have pre-occupied the mind during the day. Death is the great night—the last recollection—the dream of past life. In support of these remarks a few striking examples may be easily adduced.—Lucan, when condemned to death by Nero, opened one of his veins, and expired reciting that passage in the Pharsalia, in which he had described the death of the wounded soldier, Gilbert, the most unfortunate poet of his age, died repeating a sacred ode which he had written in his dying moments. Metastasio produced two beautiful stanzas in his dying moments. The Emperor Adrian composed on his death-bed the celebrated apostrophe to his soul, which had been so happily imitated by Pope. Geoffrey Chaucer bade adieu to all human vanities, by writing a ballad on his death-bed. Corneille died, whilst writhing under the tortures of his fanatical persecutors, recited, before he breathed his last, the third ode of the third book of Horace. Bonhours, the grammarian, observed in his last moments, to one of his friends, Je suis, ou je ne suis mourir, car l'un et l'autre se disent. Malherbe with his dying breath breathed reproaches to his servants for their solecisms, and corrected their errors of language. Lamotte de Vayer, who devoted himself much to the study of the history and manners of remote nations, breathed his last whilst inquiring of one of his friends what was the latest intelligence from Mogul. Finally, we may quote the last words uttered by Lergney, the mathematician; as the moment of his dissolution approached, he seemed to lose his collectedness of mind, and appeared unable to recognise the persons about him. One of his friends asked him what was the source of his trouble? "A hundred and forty-four," he replied, and breathed his last.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

IN THERE AN UNBELIEVER.—BY THOMAS HAYNES EAVLY.

Is there an unbeliever?
One man who walks the earth,
And noddly doubts that Providence
Watch'd o'er him at his birth!
He robs mankind for ever
Of hopes beyond the tomb;
What gives he as a recompense?
The brute's unhallow'd doom.

In manhood's loftiest hour,
In health, and strength, and pride,
On I lead his steps through alleys green,
Where rills mid cowslips glide:
Climb Nature's granite tower,
Where man hath rarely trod:
And will he then, in such a scene,
Deny there is a God!

Yes—the proud heart will ever
Prompt the false tongue's reply!
An Omnipresent Providence
Still sadly he'll deny.
But see the unbeliever
Sinking in death's decay;
And hear the cry of penitence!
He never learnt to pray!

AN OVERBEARING TEMPER.

Nothing shows a greater abjection of spirit than an overbearing temper appearing in a person's behaviour to inferiors. To insult or abuse those who dare not answer again, is as sure a mark of cowardice as it would be to attack with a drawn sword a woman or a child. Add wherever you see a person given to insult his inferiors, you may assure yourself he will creep to his superiors; for the same baseness of mind will lead him to act the part of a bully to those who cannot resist, and of a coward to those who can. But though servants and other dependants may not have it in their power to retort in the same taste, the injurious usage they receive from their superiors, they are sure to be even with them by the contempt they themselves have for them, and the character they spread abroad of them through the world. Upon the whole, the proper behaviour to inferiors is, to treat them with generosity and humanity; but by no means with familiarity on one hand, or insolence on the other.

THAMYSIS.

A young poet, gifted with a creative fancy and an excellent disposition, joined the scholars of the divine Plato. His poetry was commended by all who knew him, and Helias declared of him that he would be another Sophocles or Pindarus. But the praises of the multitude blinded him, so that he continually spoke of Hesiod and Æschylus, and other masters of song. This grieved the divine philosopher, and he wished to cure the soul of the vain youth. I consider myself qualified, said he, to bring honours on my country that will be a greater advantage, than if I should win for it a province. For the holy art of poetry has been given to man to elevate him above the earth. But it does not belong to infernal spirits.

ECONOMY.

Economy is one of the chief duties of a state, as well as of an individual. It is not only a great virtue in itself, but it is the parent of many others. It preserves men and nations from the commission of crime, and the endurance of misery. The man that lives within his income can be just, humane, charitable and independent. He who lives beyond it becomes, almost necessarily, rapacious, mean, faithless, contemptible. The economist is easy and comfortable; the prodigal, harassed with debts, and unable to obtain the necessary means of life. So it is with nations. National character, as well as national happiness, has, from the beginning of the world to the present day, been sacrificed on the altar of profusion.

ADVANTAGES OF CONVERSATION.

Conversation calls into light what has been lodged in all the recesses and secret chambers of the soul. By occasional hints and incidents, it brings old useful notions into remembrance; it unfolds and displays the hidden treasure of knowledge with which reading, observation, and study, have before furnished the mind. By mutual discourse the soul is awakened and allured, to bring forth its hoards of knowledge, and it learns how to render them most useful to mankind. A man of vast reading, without conversation, is like a miser, who lives only for himself.

LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.

Experience teaches that the sword, the fagot, exile and proscription, are better calculated to irritate than to heal a disease, which, having its source in the mind, cannot be relieved by remedies that act only on the body. The most efficacious means are sound doctrines and repeated instructions, which make a ready impression, when inculcated with mildness. Everything bows to the sovereign authority of the laws—but religion alone is not to be commanded.

CLEANINGS FROM BORNE'S WORKS.

Never was Luther wiser than when he threw the inkstand at the devil's head! For the devil dreads nothing but ink, and betakes himself to his heels as soon as he sees it.

Freedom may use her tongue, because speech is both her weapon and her spoil; but despotism is lost from the moment it attempts to vindicate its ways.

A rusty shield prayed to the sun, and said, "O sun, illumine me with thy ray!" To which the sun retorted, "O shield, make thyself clean!"

Original.
THE PASSAGE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.

Years have faded like a dream.
Since I crossed this gliding stream,
And the sunset fair as then
Tints the river and the glen.

Then, in this same shallop frail,
Comrades two did with me sail—
One a sage almost inspired,
One a youth, whom glory fired.

One for knowledge pale his brow,
Him a lingering death laid low.
One, in battle and in blood,
Sank beneath the stormy flood.

So when'er a look I cast
On the unreturning past,
Comes the thought that nevermore
May I see the loved of yore!

Yet can death for ever part
Friend from friend, and heart from heart?
Ah! our souls were mingled then,
Let them mingled be again!

Boatman! twice thy ferrage take—
Take it, boatman, for my sake;
For, by thee though undescried,
Two with me have crossed the tide!

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A CONTINUATION OF THE CULPRIT FAY.

WHOMEVER has read Drake's Culprit Fay, will see that but for that beautiful poem, the following verses would never have been written. For the benefit of those who may not have seen that gem of fancy, and we cannot think there are many, we will attempt a brief outline of it, in order that our humble continuation may be better understood.

A fairy having fallen in love with an earthly maiden, is arranged before the Elfín monarch, to answer for his offence. Such a crime ranks high upon the fairy calendar, and the sentence usually passed upon those convicted of it, we quote, as follows, from Drake, who seems to have been deeply read in their criminal law:

"Tied to the hornet's shardy wings,
Tossed on the prickles of nettles stings,
For seven long ages doomed to dwell
With the lazy worm in the walnut shell,
And every night to writhe and bleed
Beneath the touch of the centipede,
Or closed in a cobweb dingoos dim,
Your puler a spider, huge and grim,
Amid the cartion bodies to lie
Of the worm, and the bug, and the murdered fly.
These had it been thy lot to bear,
Had a stain been found on the earthly fair."

But in consideration of the fairy-like beauty of the maiden, and the perfect purity of her mind and heart, which mercy tempers justice, and a full pardon is granted upon two conditions. The offending lover must first catch a drop of water as it falls from the sturgeon in his graceful leap in the moonlit sea; this will cleanse his wing, soiled by contact even with the purest thing of earth. He must then watch in mid-heaven for a shooting star, and follow it in its downward flight till its last spark is fading away. With this, and this only, his torch which the gross air of earth had extinguished, can be again lighted. Then blest with forgetfulness of his earthly love, he is again permitted to revel in the joys of fairy-land. Thus far, Drake. We remember when we first read this truly unique poem, that we were convinced that the fairy was too deeply involved to allow the matter thus to close; and if the reader will turn his attention to the following lines, he will find how far our anticipations have been realized.

"Were such as a spirit well might love,"

In explanation of the last few lines of this poem, we beg leave to state, that it is well known, that the Marshalls and Storps of the superior Elfín court, which holds its sessions in the tulip's cup, have decided, that "if any fairy persists in loving an inhabitant of the lower world, and for his or her society absents him or herself from the fairy court, for a time, as long as that which passes from the first opening of the moss-rose till it has expanded into the full flower, that fairy shall forfeit its immortality, and live no longer than the being with whom he or she has fallen in love."—Fairy Commonwealth Reports, vol. xi. p. 50.

"Scenes of wo and scenes of pleasure,
Scenes that former thoughts renew—
Scenes of wo and scenes of pleasure,
Now a sad and last adieu!"—Burns.

The monarch's pardon now is won,
The fairy's weary race is run;
He has followed the star in its downward flight,
And kindled once more his elfin light,
And cleared his tiny wing again
From every blot, from every stain,
And his little lips, e'en now are wet
With the drops that woe him to forget

His fatal sin, his earthly love,
His wanderings from the elfin grove
To woo the daughters of the earth;
And his voice burst forth in careless mirth.
He touched his lute, but he sang not now
Of the deep blue eye, and the polished brow,
Of the lovely hand so small and white,
As well become a fairy sprite;
As soft as the inner leaf which holds
The stem of the lily's spotless folds,
As light to the touch as the gossamer,
Which bends to the slightest breath of air.
Of earth his voice is still and mute,
As in elfin land he strikes his lute,
And he sings no more of his earthly love,
But the joys of fairy-life above,
And visions of fairy beauty seem
To win him from his earthly dream.
With joyful heart, the pardoned fay
Upon a cloud's rich purple lay,
And he vainly thought his spirit free
From love, and he laughed with ecstasy.
Never, he thought, would he disobey
The dictates of the royal fay,
Ne'er would he love again, or know
Love's mingled happiness and woe.
And yet, he thought, I would see once more
The secret grove, and the pebbled shore
Of the lovely lake, where first I met
The maid whom now I must forget.
The night was clear, and he turned his eye
Towards earth's fair prospect with a sigh;
The landscape lies beneath his sight,
Bathed in the moonbeams' softening light,
And here and there the waters shine
Like mirrors set by power divine,
Like polished plates of silver shewn
Inland among the foliage green.
The fairy could no more delay,
He lifts his wing, and he hastes away.
He cuts the air with tiny wing,
And wanders onward, hastening
To seek the spot on earth the best,
The sweetest and the loveliest.

How brightly beautiful the lake
Gleams in the pale moon's silver ray;
The gentle winds its surface break,
And cool the cheek of the weary fay.

He stops to rest on an ancient stone,
Which with velvet moss is cushioned o'er,
And each wave o'er his tiny feet is thrown,
And cools them ere it wets the shore.

He watches the fish as in joy they break
With a silver arch the moonlit sea,
He starts, at the sound of the skittish snake,
As he creeps to his home in the hollow tree.

He strikes with his wand the lily white,
Which floats on the wave like a fairy sail,
And catches a gift of diamonds bright.
On the drops that are brought by the passing gale.

He watches the clear and cloudless sky,
Where the stars are few in the moon's bright ray,
And a tear stands sparkling in his eye,
But a tear he would not catch away.

It was not a tear of grief alone,
For his mind was full of solemn joy,
And fancy's brightest flowers were thrown
Around the dreams of the fairy boy.

'Twas a tear where sadness and pleasure met
With joy and a more delicious woe,
In memory's brightest picture set,
Which lover's hearts alone can know.

But his thoughts are not of the sky above,
Of the breaking wave, or the balmy air,
He dreams of the joys of his earthly love,
When his earthly bride was with him there.

The lake was of a glassy sheen,
Reflecting the o'erhanging trees,
Save where like broken silver gleam
The billows in the breeze.

Upon the hills' thick crest of green,
The unclouded moon was shining bright;
Like diamonds in the trees are seen
The dew-drops in the light.

In such a quiet solitude
The culprit fairy mused alone,
And was it strange in such a mood,
That he should dream of one?

Of one whom often he had met
Beneath those shades of green,
And was it strange his cheek was wet
With tears, for what had been?

Above his head the branches hung
Of many a well-known tree,
And around the echoing forest rung
With the nightwind's minstrelsy.

The wavellet softly rippling near,
The night breeze whispering low,
Seem to breathe lightly in his ear
Kind solace for his woe.

All was the same—but where is she
For whom all this is dear?
Heaven would be lost, could she but be
A single moment near.

His oath, his punishment forgot,
His fairy home and fame,
His monarch's word he heeded not,
He only breathes her name.

He prays, but 'tis for her the prayer
Falls softly from his tongue,
For his fairy home he has no care,
His fairy joys are gone.

A step sounds lightly on his ear,
He starts—"is a step well known;
His heart beats quick as that form draws near,
'Tis she—the prize is won."

He dreams not of his home above,
Of the court of fairy pomp and pride;
Earth is to him a heaven of love,
With his own earth-born bride.

"The elfin lamp beams bright," he cried,
"And fairy voices lightly fall
Upon the ear, but thou, my bride,
Art dearer far than all."

"Thine eye beams with a softer light,
Thy lips breathe forth a sweeter tone,
To my fairy home, I bid good night,
I live for thee alone."

"I came to bid a last adieu
To thee, thou dearest to my heart,
I vainly thought to part from you,
As fairy lovers lightly part."

"That thought, that foolish wish is o'er,
I long not for my home above,
While time on earth I can adore—
For thee alone I love."

Thus for his first, his earthly love,
The fairy lost his home above;
Thus gave up immortality
To live beneath a woman's eye;
To die, when death should steal away
The star which threw its gentle ray
Upon his soul—when death should close
The eye which wept for all his woes,
And still that tongue, which won his ear,
And wooed him from his heavenly sphere.

Pray, did the loving spirit do well,
When thus he bade to heaven farewell? OBERON.

THE PERJURED GAMBLERS.

A COMEDY IN THREE ACTS, BY M. VIENNET.

WE, perhaps, break more frequently the vows that we make to ourselves, than those that we make to others; the feeling of honour, the respect of our own kind are more powerful than the secret reproaches of conscience. We do not dare to break a promise openly given and received, since our personal interest might suffer from it; but we relapse with too little scruple into a fault or vice of habit, notwithstanding the solemn compact into which we have entered with ourselves to refrain from it.

See to what the want of firmness conduces us in business, in society, in government. What folly, what baseness, what crimes weakness alone can commit!

This weakness, too prevalent alas, among the human race, and which our haughty wisdom vainly struggles with, is the theme of one of Voltaire's most agreeable fables. Mennon has been deceived by woman; his prudence wishes to fly for ever the presence of the fair sex. The wife of Cyprus has weakened the powers of his mind and body; he renounces all the temptations of the table, that he may preserve his health and reason. Gambling troubles the repose, jeopardises the most solid patrimony, and excites the best friends into quarrels often shameful and bloody. He will play no more. He will preserve his money and dignity and will live tranquil. These three vows are easy to keep, but what is human wisdom!

In the course of the day Mennon encounters a beautiful woman in distress. His natural goodness cannot refrain from consoling her. A little after he receives an invitation to dinner from one of his best friends, whom a refusal would offend. After drinking, he is invited to make one in a party of whist; he is obliged to accept, under pain of appearing uncivil or ridiculous; and our philosopher, who has, in the morning, abjured woman, the excesses of the table, and all quarrelling, is, before night, deceived by a "painted demon," brought home drunk, stripped of his money and wanting an eye: the new sage, ruined by his follies, is obliged to request a place; and now behold him a solicitor and obliged to beg for the favours of the court, where his pride had resolved he should never appear again! Oh human wisdom! what has become of your vows!

M. Viennet has taken this idea as text for his comedy. But he has chosen to give to this philosophical truth a political and contemporary colour, which predominates and necessarily injures the effect of the moral. He has made it rather a satirical review of the ridiculousness of the day, than a comedy. This manner of treating the subject is more commodious and expeditious. Luckily, it has not injured the success of the work. Were we to reproach the author with having employed a similar procedure, and with having shown himself too chary of inventions of plot and of dénouement, he would answer—I have succeeded without all that. It is the first rule of theatrical poetry.

The scene is placed a few leagues from Paris, in the chateau of M. d'Asigniant, a devoted servant of the ancient dynasty, whose incurable fidelity withstands alike the wheelings of the minister and the court balls. This retreat and the heretical ennui to which his conscience condemns him, are enveloped by a chosen society, and by the family that he unites around him. First, is an old aunt whose ideas and opinions are dated with her birth, 1770. She is a precious ruin of Coblentz, the worthy companion of one of those colleagues of Louis XIV., whom we have seen in our childhood arrive at Paris in the train of the Cossacks, less strange to us than our truly exotique countrymen, those contemporaries of another age. The aunt and nephew have sworn never to tarnish the blazonings of their carriage by permitting it to appear among the hackney-coaches of the court. The new co-tailors dignity and power; the marquise recalls with emotion the favours of the tabouret and the prerogatives of the bouquet at Versailles; but they both renounce for ever these privileges and these honours; they have sworn never to leave the chateau.

A young baronne de Neris, daughter of the noble colonel, has also made her vow: it is to remain a widow. The husband that she has lost was slovenly, imperious, and jealous; she has sworn not to marry again. She is a truly inconsolable widow.

Valentine, their domestic, is an old soldier of the empire. He has both the glory and the defect of a veteran; he is an intrepid drinker. However, to please Froine, (who, it is unnecessary to say, is the femme de chambre, of the marquise,) he will renounce the pleasures of the bottle and the ineffable sweetness of the petit verre. He makes between the pretty hands of the ambrière, a vow of eternal sobriety. A young officer, who has been educated in the salons, and who has only fought quarrels à bouillotte, an immovable smoker of the Boulevard de Gard, his beard bristling like that of a savage, or of a peasant of the middle ages, a dandy à la mode raffinée, also comes to exhibit his plan of reform. He has lost all his money at play; he vows never again to touch a card.

A Monsieur de Fage, however, who has heard all these vows, takes a malicious pleasure in causing them to be broken, one after the other. He is an old peer of France. He knows, by experience, the reliance to be placed in vows. No one, according to him, will keep them more than twenty-four hours.

He first secretly intrigues to have the count elected deputy, who, proud of the popular mandates, ceases to be sulky with the government, and consents to enter the Bourbon palace—from the Bourbon palace to the Tuileries there is but one step. M. de Fage obtains an invitation to the court-ball for the marquise. The marquise will go—out of curiosity to see the revolutionary waltzes, and to hear the concert of the usurpation. And their oaths! the desire of power and vanities have carried them far; and their conscience finds excellent motives of justification.

Will the young baronne have a firmer heart, a more stable determination! M. de Fage undertakes personally to overcome the heretical resolves of this proud beauty. He is gallant, amiable; his humour is neither impetuous nor jealous; he has none of the evil qualities of the defunct; and in a short time the inconsolable widow breaks her vow; like all young widows—she marries M. de Fage.

M. de Saint Brice perjures himself like the other. In the country, one gets bored very often. A card-table is open, the cards are by chance passed before him. De Page challenges him. To pass away the time, he accepts. Farewell to his oath. Behold him again become a gambler. At last, the old soldier of the Beresina, a witness of all the weakness of his masters, has not the impudence to pretend to move firmness; he yields to their influence, and, at the risk of losing the good graces of Froine, he yields himself up to the seductions of burgundy, and to the sweetness so purely military of eau de vie and rum. Froine, who perceives that heretofore is incorrigible, and the proverb, that he who has drunk well drinks, is incontrovertible, thinks it better to have a drunken husband than to have none at all. She resigns herself, and marries Valentine. Thus, all the vows have become so many perjuries.

SKETCHES OF FASHIONABLE LIFE.

THE REVERSES OF A SEASON.

This evening of Thursday, the fifteenth of February, was one of the most delightful I ever remember to have spent. I was alone; my heart beat lightly; my pulse was quickened by the exercise of the morning; my blood flowed freely through my veins, as meeting no checks or impediments to its current, and my spirits were exalted by a multitude of happy remembrances and of brilliant hopes. My apartments looked delightfully comfortable, and what signified to me the inclemency of the weather without! The rain was pattering upon the skylight of the staircase; the sharp east wind was moaning angrily in the chimney; but as my eye glanced from the cheerful blaze of the fire to the ample folds of my closed window curtains—as the hearth-rug yielded to the pressure of my foot, while, feeling time to my own music, I sang, in rather a louder tone than usual, my favourite air of "Judy O'Linneegan"—the whistling of the wind, and the pattering of the rain, only served to enhance in my estimation the comforts of my home, and inspire a livelier sense of the good fortune which had delivered me from any evening engagements. Men—married men—may expatiate, if they will, in good polished sentences, on the delights of their firesides, and the gay cheerfulness of their family circles; but I do not hesitate to affirm that we, in our state of single blessedness, possess not only all the sweets of our condition, but derive more solid advantages from matrimony itself, than any of these solemn eulogists of their own happiness can dare to pretend to derive from it. We have their dinners, without the expense of them; we have their parties, without the fatigue of those interminable domestic discussions which are inseparable from the preliminary arrangements; we share the gay and joyous summer of their homes, when they are illuminated for company, and escape the intervening winter of darkness and economy; and, having participated in the sunny calm, the halcyon hours of the establishment, we depart before the unreal and transitory delusion is dispersed, and leave the husband to contemplate the less brilliant ensembles of the lady's countenance and temper, and to maintain a single combat against the boisterous perversities of her offspring. No man can be really chez soi—can be in the full enjoyment of all the accommodation afforded by his own house, and friends, and furniture, and presume to exercise the right of a master over them, unless he be independent of the fetters of wedlock. No man, I repeat it, can be in the entire enjoyment of life, unless he be a young unmarried man, with an attached elderly valet to wait upon him. I am so thoroughly persuaded of this fact, that nothing on earth but my love for you, Maria, could persuade me to relinquish "my unbounded, free condition." Nothing but my adoration of such a union of various beauties, and almost incongruous mental accomplishments, could have induced me to abandon my present state of luxurious independence; but, under my peculiar and most favoured circumstances, I only pass from a lower to a higher degree of happiness. True, the idle, the downy, the somewhat ignominious gratifications of celibacy are sacrificed; but they are exchanged for the pure and dignified enjoyment of labouring to secure an angel's happiness, beneath the cheering influence of her exhilarating smiles.

I thrust my hands into the pockets of my dressing-gown, which, by-the-by, is far the handsomest piece of old brocade I have ever seen—a large running pattern of gold hollyhocks, with silver stalks and leaves, upon a rich, deep, Pampadour-coloured ground—and walking slowly backwards and forwards in my room, I continued—"There never was, there never can have been, so happy a fellow as myself! What on earth have I to wish for more? Maria adores me—I adore Maria. To be sure, she's detained at Brighton; but I hear from her regularly every morning by the post, and we are to be united for life in a fortnight. Who was ever so blest in his love! Then again John Fraser—my old schoolfellow! I don't believe there's anything in the world, he would not do for me. I am sure there's no living thing that he loves so much as myself, except, perhaps, his old uncle Simon, and his black mare."

I had by this time returned to the fireplace, and, recasting myself, began to apostrophize my magnificent black Newfoundland, who, having partaken of my dinner, was following the advice and example of liberality, and sleeping on the rug as it disappeared from you, too, my old Neptune, am I you the best and handsomest dog in the universe?"

Neptune, finding himself addressed, awoke leisurely from his slumbers, and fixed his eyes on mine with an affirmative expression. "Ay, to be sure you are; and a capital swimmer too!" Neptune raised his head from the rug, and barked the ground with his tail, first to the right hand, and then the left:

"And is he not a fine, faithful fellow? and does he not love his master?"

Neptune rubbed his head against my hand, and concluded the conversation by again sinking into repose. "That dog's a philosopher," I said; "he never says a word more than is necessary"—Then, again, not only blest in love and friendship, and my dog; but what luck it was to sell, and in these times, too, that old, lumbering house of my father's, with its bleak, bare, hilly acres of chalk and stone, for eighty thousand pounds, and to have the money paid down on the very day the bargain was concluded. As I said, so I did. I wrote my commands to Messrs. Drax and Drayton, to pay my eighty thousand pounds into Coutts's; and, after desiring that my note might be forwarded to them the first thing in the morning, I took my candle, and accompanied by Neptune, who always keeps watch by night at my chamber door, proceeded to bed as the watchman was calling "past twelve o'clock," beneath my window.

It is indisputably very beneficial for a man to go to bed thus early; it secures him such pleasant dreams. The visions, that filled my imagination during sleep, were not of a less animated nature than those of my waking lucubrations. I dreamt that it was day-break on my wedding morning; that I was dressed in white satin and silver lace, to go and meet my bride, seated in a richly painted and gilt sedan chair, was conveyed to the church by the parson and six clerks, who wore white favours in their wings, and large nose-gays in the breasts of their canonicals; that our hands were joined by Hymen in person, who shook his torch over our heads at the altar, and danced a pas de deux with the bride down the middle of Regent-street, as we returned in procession from St. James's; that I walked by the side of Neptune, who was, in some unaccountable manner, identified with my friend John Fraser, and acted as father of the bride, and alarmed me in the midst of the ceremony by whispering in my ear, that he had forgotten to order any breakfast for the party; that, on returning to my house, which appeared to be the Pavilion at Brighton, I found a quantity of money-bags, full of sovereigns, each marked eighty thousand pounds, ranged in rows on a marble table; that I was beginning to empty them at the feet of the bride with an appropriate compliment—when my dream was suddenly interrupted by the hasty entrance of my valet, who stood pale and trembling by my bedside, and informed me, with an agitated voice, that he had earned my note, as ordered, to the office of Messrs. Drax and Drayton, the first thing in the morning, and had seen Mr. Drax; but that Mr. Drayton had decamped during the night, taking away with him my eighty thousand pounds, and five hundred pounds of his partner's.

I was horror-struck—"I was ruined!—what was to be done? The clock had not yet struck ten, but, early as it was, I was determined to rise immediately, and see Drax myself upon the subject. In an instant—in less than an hour—I was dressed, and on my way to Lincoln's Inn. Twenty minutes after, I stood in the presence of Mr. Drax.

He appeared before me, among the last of the pigtails, with his powdered head, his smooth black silk stockings, and his polished shoes, the very same immutable Mr. Drax whom I had remembered as a quizz from the earliest days of my childhood. There he stood, in the same attitude, in the same dress, the same man of respectability, calculation, and arrangement, that my father had always represented to me as the model of an attorney, but with a look of bewildered paleness, as if he had been in a situation where his respectability became doubtful, his calculations defeated, and all his arrangements discomposited.

"Oh, Mr. Luttrell!" he exclaimed, "I beg pardon, Mr. Lionel Luttrell, you've received intimation, then, of this most extraordinary occurrence—what will the world think!—what will the world say! The houses of Drax and Drayton! Such a long established, such a respectable house!—and one of the partners—Mr. Drayton, I mean—to abscond!"

"Ay, Mr. Drax, but think of my eighty thousand pounds!"

"Went away, sir, without leaving the slightest instruction where he might be met with, or where his letters might be sent after him!"

"Most extraordinary proceeding!"

"You'll drive me mad, Mr. Drax. Let me implore you to inform me what's to be done about my money."

"Your money, Mr. Lionel Luttrell!—here has the same party taken off with him five hundred pounds of the common property of the house: all the loose cash we had in our banker's hands; drew a draft for the whole amount; appropriated it to himself; and never took the ordinary measure of leaving me a memorandum of the transaction! Why, sir, I might have drawn a bill this very morning—many things less probable occur—and might have had my draft refused acceptance!"

"Oh, Mr. Drax, this torture will be the death of me. Sir—sir—I'm ruined, and I'm going to be mazed!"

"A most unfortunate event. But, Mr. Luttrell, your gay young men of fashion at the west end cannot possibly enter into the feelings of a partner and a man of business. My situation—"

Incapable of listening any longer to the lamentations of Mr. Drax, and perceiving that he was too much engrossed by the perplexities of his own affairs, to yield any attention to my distress, I seized my hat, and hastily departed, to seek elsewhere for the advice and consolation I required.

"I'll go to John Fraser," I exclaimed; "he's always sensible, always right, always kind. He'll feel for me, at all events: he'll suggest what steps are best to be taken in this most painful emergency."

Upon this determination I immediately proceeded to act, and hastened towards Regent-street with the rapidity of one who feels impatient of every second that elapses between the conception and the execution of his purpose. As I was pressing forward on my hurried way, my thoughts absorbed in the anxiety of the moment, and my sight dazzled by the rapidity of my movements, and the confused succession of the passing objects, I was checked in my course by Edward Burrell—the pet of the dandies—"Stop, Lionel, my dear fellow, stop. I want to congratulate you."

"Congratulate me!—Upon what?"

"Your appointment: Inspecting Postman for the district of St. Ann's, Soho; of course you're here—none but persons of such high station could be justified in using such velocity of movement, and in running over so many innocent foot passengers."

"Nonsense!—Don't stop me!—I've just heard of the greatest imaginable misfortune. Drayton, my attorney, has decamped, heaven only knows to what country, and carried off the whole of my fortune."

"Oh! indeed!—So you're one upon the innumerable list of bankrupts!—A failure! a complete failure!—Don't be angry, Lionel, I always said you were rather a failure!—And so now the attorney man—what's his name!—has absconded and ruined you for life by his successful speculations in hops."

The pet of the dandies walked off, laughing as immediately as a "professed exclusive" ever dares to laugh. It had made me believe to be a pun: that is, I suppose, I dare say the sentence is capable of some quibbling interpretation. The words are unintelligible, unless they contain a pun.—Whenever I hear one talk nonsense, and find other things, I invariably conclude that he is punning; and if the last paring words of Edward Burrell really do exhibit a specimen of this vulgar kind of solecism, the puppy was more than indemnified for the distresses of his friend, as any punster would necessarily be, by the opportunity of hatching a joke upon them. "It will not be so with you, John Fraser!" I interjected to myself; and in a few seconds I rapped at the door of his lodgings in Regent-street.

They detained me an age in the street—I rapped and rapped again, and then I rang, and at the ringing of the bell, a stupid-looking, yellow-haired, steaming maid-servant, in a dirty lace cap, issued from the scullery, wiping her crimson arms in her check apron to answer the summons.

"Is Mr. Fraser at home?" I demanded, in a voice of somewhat angry impatience.

"Mr. Fraser at home!—No, sir, he isn't."

"Where's he gone to?"

"Where's he gone to!" rejoined the girl, in a low drawing voice—"I'm sure, sir, I can't tell, not I."

"Is his servant in the way?"

"Is his servant in the way!—No, sir; the other gentleman's gone too."

"His servant gone with him!—Why, how did they go?"

"How did they go!—Why, in a post-chaise and four, to be sure—they sent for him from Newman's."

"Heavens! how provoking! Did they start early?"

"Start early! no, to be sure, they started very late; as soon as ever master came home from dining in Russell Square."

"Russell Square! what the deuce should John Fraser do dining in Russell Square! How very distressing!"

"Master came home two hours before Mr. Robert expected him, and ordered four horses to be got ready direct."

"Indeed! what can possibly have happened?"

"What has happened! Oh, Mr. Robert told us all about what had happened; says he, 'my master's great friend, Mr. Luttrell, is clean ruined; his lawyer man's run off with all his money. Master's in a great quandary about it,' says Mr. Robert; and so, I suppose, says he, 'that master and I are going out of town a little while to keep clear of the mess.'"

"Good heavens! and can such cold-hearted treachery really be?"

"And so," continued the girl, perfectly regardless of my vehement ejaculation, "and so I told Mr. Robert I hoped luck would go with them; for you know, sir, it's all very well to have a friend and such like, as long as they've got everything comfortable about them; but when they're backing up, or anything of that sort, then it's another sort of matter, and we have no right to meddle or make in their concerns."

The girl was a perfect philosopher upon the true Hume and Rochefoucault principles. She continued to promulgate her maxims in the same low, monotonous, cold, languid vein; but I did not remain to profit by them, but hurried away to conceal my sorrow and my disappointment in the privacy of those apartments, where, on the preceding evening, surrounded by so many comforts, I had proudly, perhaps too proudly, contemplated my stock of happiness, and had at large expatiated on my many delectable topics of self-gratulation. How miserably was that stock of happiness now impaired! But, hopeful as I am by nature, my sanguine temperament still triumphed; and, as I ascended the staircase to my apartment, Maria's image presented itself in smiles to my imagination, and I repeated to myself, "My fortune's gone! My friend has deserted me! But, Maria! thou, dearest, still remainest to me. I'll tranquilize my mind by the sweet counsel of your daily letter, and then proceed to delineate and act for myself!" I knew that the post must by this time have arrived.

I approached the table where my cards and letters were constantly deposited—but no letter was there. I could not believe my eyes; I rung, and asked for my letters—none had arrived during my absence from home. "Had the post-boy gone by?" "Yes, many an hour ago." It was too true, then—even Maria was perfidious to my misfortune. This was the severest blow of all. The cause of distrust was apparently slight—possibly accidental; but, occurring at such a time, it fell with all the weight of a last and consummating calamity on one who was already overthrown. I clenched my teeth; I stamped upon the floor; I tossed about my arms with the vain and objectless passion of an angry child. My dog, amazed at the violence of my gesticulation, fixed his large dark eyes upon me, and stared with astonishment, as well he might, at the agitated passion of his master. I saw, or imagined I saw, an expression of tenderness and commiseration in his looks; and, in an agony of tears—don't laugh at me, for, in the same situation, under the same circumstances, you probably would have done the same—I flung myself down on the floor by his side, exclaiming: "Yes, Neptune, everything on earth has forsaken me but you, my faithful friend, my love—with my fortune; and you, you alone, my good old faithful dog, are constant to me in the hour of my affliction!" I started up, and paced my apartment backwards and forwards with wild and hurried strides, fevered with the rapid succession of painful events, bewildered in mind, afflicted at heart, perplexed in the extreme!

Impelled by that restlessness of body which results from the agitation of the mind, I took up my hat, called Neptune to follow me, and prepared to seek abroad that distraction for my grief, which could not be found in the quiet of my home. In leaving the room, my eye accidentally glanced towards my pistol, which lay on the lock of the door. I perceived that to approach the place where they lay was like tempting hell to tempt me; but a thought flashed across my mind, that to die were to punish the unworthy authors of my sorrow—were to strike imperishable remorse to the hearts of Maria and of John; and I took the pistols with me, muttering, as I concealed them in my breast, "Perhaps I may want them."

In this frame of mind, wandering through back and retired streets, with no other motive to direct me than the necessity of locomotion, I, at length, found myself on the bank of the Thames, at no great distance from Westminster Bridge. My boat was kept near this place: On the water, I would be delivered from all apprehension of observing eyes. I should be alone with my sorrow; and, unfavourable as the season and the weather were, I proceeded to the spot where my boat was moored. "Bad time for boating, Mr. Luttrell," said Piner, who had the charge of my wherry; "it's mortal cold, and the rain getting out there to the windward." But, careless of his goodnatured remonstrances, I seized the oars impatiently from his hand, and proceeded, in angry silence, to the boat. I pushed her off, and rowed rapidly up the river towards Chelsea, with Neptune lying at my feet. When I thus found myself alone upon the water, with none to know, or mark, or overhear me, my grief, breaking through all the restraints that had confined it as long as I was exposed to the inspection of my fellow-creatures, discharged itself in vehement exclamations of indignant passion. "Fool! Fool! Idiot that I was to trust them! Nothing on earth shall ever induce me now to look upon them again. Oh, Maria! I should have thought it happiness enough to have died for you; and you to desert me—to fall away from me too, at the moment when a single smile of yours might have indemnified me for all the wrongs of fortune, all the treachery of friendship. As to Fraser, men are all alike—selfish by nature, habit, education. They are trained to baseness, and he is the wisest man who becomes earliest acquainted with suspicion. He is the happiest, who, scorning their hollow demonstrations of attachment, constrains every sympathy of his nature within the close imprisonment of a cold and unparticipating selfishness; but he is revenged. Fallen as I am—sunk—impoverished—despised as Lionel Luttrell may be, he will be the first to be taught to know, that he will not be spurned with impunity, or trampled on without reprisal!"

At these words, some violence of gesture, accompanying the vehemence of my sentiment, interfered with the repose of Neptune, who was quietly sleeping at the bottom of the boat. The dog vented his impatience in a quick and angry growl. At that moment my irritation amounted almost to madness. "Right—right!" I exclaimed, "my very dog turns against me. He withdraws the mercenary attachment which my food had purchased, now that the sources which supplied it have become exhausted." I imputed to my dog the frailties of man, and hastened, in the wild suggestion of the instant, to take a severe and summary vengeance on his ingratitude. I drew forth a pistol from my breast, and ordered him to take to the water. I determined to shoot him as he was swimming, and then leave him there to die. Neptune hesitated in obeying me. He was scarcely aroused, perhaps he did not comprehend my command. My impatience would brook no delay. I was in no humour to be thwarted. Standing up in the boat, I proceeded, with a sudden effort of strength, to cast the dog into the river. My purpose failed—my balance was lost—and, in a moment of time, I found myself engaged in a desperate struggle for existence with the dark deep waters of the Thames. I cannot swim. Death—death in its terrors—instantaneous, inevitable death, was the idea that pressed upon my mind, and occupied all its faculties. But poor to Neptune required no solicitation. He no sooner witnessed the danger of his master, than he sprang forward to my rescue, and, sustaining my head above the water, swam stoutly away with me to the boat.

When once resuscitated there, as I looked upon my preserver shaking the water from his coat as composedly as if nothing extraordinary had happened, my conscience became penetrated with the bitter feelings of remorse and shame. Self-judged, self-extracted, self-condemned, I sat like a guilty wretch in the presence of that noble animal, who, having saved my life at the very moment I was meditating his destruction, seemed of too generous a nature to imagine, that the act he had performed exceeded the ordinary limits of his service, or deserved any special gratitude from his master. I felt as one who had in intention committed murder on his benefactor, and, as I slowly rowed towards the land, eloquent in the praise of the unconscious Neptune, the recollection of my perilous escape—the complete conviction of my having in one instance been mistaken in my anger—and, perhaps—most unaccountably as it may sound—the physical operation of my cold bath, and my wet habiliments—all these causes united, operated so effectually to allay the fever of my irritated passions, that the agitation of my mind was soothed. Mine was now the spirit of one in sorrow, not in anger. Humbled in mine own opinion, my indignation against Maria and John Fraser, for their cruel desertion of my distresses, was exchanged for a mingled sentiment of tenderness and forgiveness. On reaching the landing-place, I hastened to take possession of the first hackney-coach, and, calling Neptune into it, drove off to my lodgings in Conduit-street.

On arriving at my apartments, the first object that presented itself to my eye was a note from Maria. I knew the peculiar shape of the billet, before I was near enough to distinguish the handwriting. All the blood in my veins seemed to rush back towards my heart, and there to stand trembling at the seat of life and motion. I shook like a terrified infant. Who could divine the nature of the intelligence which that note contained? I held the paper some minutes in my hand before I could obtain sufficient command over myself to open it. That writing conveyed to me the sentence of my future destiny. Its purport was pregnant of the misery or happiness of my after life. At length, with a sudden, a desperate effort of resolution, I burst the seal asunder, and read:

"DEAREST LIONEL—I did not write yesterday, because my aunt had most unexpectedly determined to return to town to-day. We left Brighton very early this morning, and were established at Thomas's Hotel. Come to us directly—or to this wicked theft of Mr. Drayton's—which, by-the-by, will compel us to have a smaller, a quieter, and therefore a happier home, than we otherwise should have had—compels you to be busy among law people, and occupies all your time this morning, pray come to dinner at seven—if it is not to dinner at all, then contrive to be with us in time. I will square some time this evening. My aunt desires her best love, and believe me, dearest Lionel, your ever affectionate, MARIA."

And she was really true! This was by far the kindest, the tenderest note I had ever received. Maria was constant, and my wicked suspicions only were in fault. Oh, heavens! how much was I to blame! I how severely did my folly deserve punishment!

The operations of the toilet are capable of incalculable extension or diminution. They can, under certain circumstances, be very rapidly despatched. In five minutes after the first reading of Maria's note I was descending the staircase, and prepared to obey her summons. My valet was standing with his hand on the lock of the street door, in readiness to expedite my departure, when the noise of rapidly approaching wheels was heard. A carriage stopped suddenly before the house—the paper was loudly and violently beaten with a hurried hand—the street-door flew open—and John Fraser, in his dinner-dress of the last evening, pale with watching, and fatigue, and travel, and excitement, burst like an unexpected apparition upon my sight. He rushed towards me, seized my hand, and shaking it with the energy of an almost convulsive joy, exclaimed, "Well, Lionel, I was in a moment—thought I should be. The fellows drove capriciously—deuced good horses too, or we should never have beat him."

"What do you mean? beat whom?"

"The rascal Drayton, to be sure. Did not they tell you I had got out of the starting, and was off after him within an hour of his departure?"

"No, indeed, John, they never told me that."

"Well, never mind. I overtook him within five miles of Canterbury, and horsewhipped him within an inch of his life."

"And—and the money?"

"Yes, he lodged that at Goutte's. I thought it best to put that out of danger at once. So I drove to the Strand, and deposited your eighty thousand pounds in a place of security, before I proceeded here to tell you that it was safe."

If I had been humbled and ashamed of myself before—I had repented my disgusting suspicions on seeing Maria's note, this explanation of John Fraser's absence was very little calculated to restore me to my former happy state of self-approbation. "Telling my friend by the arm, and calling Neptune, I said, 'By and by John, you shall be thanked as you ought to be for your kindness; but you must first forgive me. I have been cruelly unjust to Maria, to you, and to poor old Neptune here. Come with me to Berkeley square. You shall there hear the confession of my past rashness and folly; and when my heart is once delivered from the burden of self-reproach that now oppresses it, there will be room for the expansion of those happier feelings, which your friendship and Maria's tenderness have everlastingly implanted there. Never again will I allow a suspicion to pollute my mind which is impious to those I love. The world's a good world—the women are all true—the friends all faithful—the dogs are all attached and staunch—and if any individual, under any possible combination of circumstances, is ever, for a single instant, induced to conceive an opposite opinion, depend upon it, that the unhappy man is deluded by false appearances, and that a little inquiry would convince him of his mistake.'"

"I can't, for the life of me, understand, Lionel, what you are driving at."

"You will presently," I replied; and in the course of half an hour—seated on the sofa, with Maria on the side of me, with John Fraser on the other, and with Neptune lying at my feet—I had related the particulars of my late follies and sufferings, and heard myself affectionately pitied and forgiven, and concluded, in the possession of unmingled happiness, the series of my day's reverses.

HANDSOME REVENGE.—The opera singers at Naples were formerly in great terror of a certain Doctor Borini, a morose critic, who dealt his severities on all sides in such a manner, that he had not a friend among them. It happened that the doctor, who possessed a fine bass voice, was obliged to appear on the stage himself, and he chose the part of Bartolo in the Barber of Seville. All Naples was in commotion; people came from a distance of twenty leagues, and bought tickets at any price, to see and hear the enemy of all singers, and take a full revenge on him. When Borini appeared, he was received with a general uproar; this, however, did not discompose him, and he went through his grand air with such steadfast nerve and excellence, that his bitterest enemies were disarmed. The noises were changed into cheers and bravos, and the doctor acquired not only an excellent engagement, but a moral lesson by which it is to be hoped that his future life profited.

LITERARY MISCELLANIES.

DEATH OF NOORIT.—A letter from Naples says:—"This great singer terminated his career by suicide, on the eighth of March, at Naples. The refusal of the Neapolitan censorship to permit the performance of Polyxène, composed by Donizetti expressly for his debut in that city, preyed upon his mind; and his feelings, it is said, were wounded by humiliating demands made upon him by Barbaia, the manager of the theatre of San Carlo. On the evening of the seventh he appeared in the part of Pollo, in Nemro, for the benefit of one of the performers. At the end of his duet with Signora Granchi, two or three hisses were heard, which were immediately drowned in loud acclamations of applause from every part of the house, and he was afterwards called for by the audience, but did not appear. On returning home he retired to his chamber, but continued to walk about all till three in the morning. He then sat down and wrote his will and several letters, among which was one to his wife and another to M. Casimir Perier, after which he went out of the room. Madame Noorrit, alarmed at his absence, got up to seek him, and looking out at the window, saw with feelings which may be conceived but not described, the lifeless body lying in the court-yard below. He had thrown himself from the window, four stories from the ground. Noorrit's character as a vocalist is known to the whole musical world. As a man he was loved and respected by all who knew him; and his loss, in the vigour of life and full possession of his transcendent powers, will be universally regretted. The condition of poor Madame Noorrit inspired her friends with great anxiety for some time after the fatal event; she remained in a state of gloomy despair for twenty-four hours, and then, at the sight of some objects, which her husband had brought home the day before his decease, she burst for the first time into a violent paroxysm of tears, which gave her mind the relief it so much required. Inspired by her maternal affections, she retained sufficient presence of mind to assure her eldest daughter that her father was struck with apoplexy, and that she had sent for a physician. Two days ago Noorrit was visiting M. and Mrs. Garcia, jun., and being requested to write or compose something, he wrote the following:

"Si tu m'as fait à ton usage,
O Dieu! l'air de mon aïeul.
Donne moi en course,
Car domine tout le monde,
Mon âme, en proie à la souffrance,
Est tout près de succomber!
Pauvre! ah! m'as-tu l'espérance
O! ne me laisse pas tomber!"

"He will be buried this evening. His wife wished to take him remains to France, but was deterred by being informed that the expense would be immense. She will, however, carry with her his heart, now cold and inanimate."

THEATRES IN RUSSIA.—A letter from St. Petersburg states that the Imperial theatres have just issued an ordinance relative to the personnel of the imperial theatres, and containing the following provisions:—"First. The artists of these theatres are divided into three classes: the first of which comprise the chief employés and the artists charged with the principal parts in every line, the directors, maitres de chapelle, and directors of the orchestra, the painters of decorations, the directors of the costumes, and the principal machinists. The second class is to comprise the actors entrusted with second and third-rate parts, the masters of the wardrobe, the painters, sculptors, and inferior machinists, the leader of the musical bureaux, and the fencing-masters. The third class is to comprise the chorists of the opera and the ballets, the figurants, chorus-singers, and their leaders, copyists and hairdressers. Secondly. The personnel composing the first class, after ten years' service at the imperial theatres, are to have the rank of employés in the chancellery of the third class, and are to be eligible to civil employments. Thirdly. The pupils of the imperial theatres are to have the same right, and are to be admissible to civil employments, but only after fifteen years' service. Should they quit the imperial theatres before that period they will be assimilated to the persons comprised in the second and third classes."

YORKSHIRE HUMOUR.—An action was brought against the owner of a wagon, which, by the carelessness of the driver had crushed an unlucky donkey against a wall, and killed it. A learned sergeant, well known for his roughness of exclamation, was perplexing one of the witnesses, who found no other means of extricating himself than by giving a graphic description of the matter in question. "Well, my lord judge," said the hesitating clown, "I'll tell how it happened as well as I can. My lord, suppose I am the wagon, here I was. Now, my lord judge, here you are, you are the wall." The describer now paused as if trying to recollect his lost position.—"Come, fellow," exclaimed the sergeant, out with your story at once. You have not told us where was the ass?"—"My lord judge," exclaimed the witness, with a sudden sparkle in his eye, "his honour the counsel is the ass!" Of course the court was in a roar.

FEMALE COURTSHIP IN ROME.—The women of Rome know nothing of those restraints which delicacy, modesty, and virtue impose upon the sex in northern Europe. A Roman lady, who takes a liking to a young foreigner, does not cast down her eyes when he looks at her, but fixes them upon him long and with evident pleasure; nay, she gazes at him alone whenever she meets him, in company, at church, at the theatre, or in her walks. She will say, without ceremony, to a friend of the young man, Dite à tel signor mi piace.—"Tell that gentleman I like him." If one of her choice feels the like sentiments, and asks, My valute bene?—"Are you fond of me?" she replies with the utmost frankness, Sì, caro.—"Yes, dear." In this simple and unembellished manner connections which last for years, and which, when they are dissolved, cause the men to despair. The Marquis Gatti lately shot himself, because, on his return from Paris, he found that his mistress had been false to him.

A NEW DON JUAN.—We understand that a work, under the designation "Don Juan Junior," by Lord Byron's ghost, is about to make its appearance. It purports to be a continuation of the plan and plot of Byron's celebrated poem; and, the leading events and characters of the day are said to be scrutinized, and shown up in its pages, the announcement has created an immense sensation among certain notorious characters, who have too much reason to fear that their misdeeds occupy a prominent place in its rhymes.

"Let us remove temptation from the path of youth," as the frog said when he plunged into the water, upon seeing a boy pick up a stone.

LITERARY NOTICES.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Beauties of Daniel Webster." Second edition. New-York. Edward Walker.

The selections for this little volume are made with taste and discrimination, and perhaps it contains the best extracts from the works of our great statesman, that could have been made consistently with its size. We nevertheless miss many passages, which to hear once is to be impressed with for ever. What, for instance, can exceed, in Shakespearean concentration of thought and felicity of expression, that magnificent allusion to the laud of our fathers, where the orator speaks of the country, "whose morning dawn beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the whole globe with one continued strain of the martial airs of England!" Could whole volumes convey more fully and powerfully an idea of the extent of British enterprise and dominion? Where, in the whole range of English poetry and eloquence, not excepting the bard of Avon himself, can you find so beautiful and true a compliment to England, conveyed with such terseness and sublimity?

"A Residence in the Sandwich Islands." By C. S. Stewart, U. S. N. Late Missionary at the Sandwich Islands. Fifth edition—enlarged. Including an introduction and notes by the Rev. William Elias, from the last London edition. Boston. Webb, Jordan and Co.

We had with pleasure this neat and correct edition of a work which has deservedly claimed the attention of the christian community both of this country and in England. It contains the most thorough, elaborate and faithful description of the South Sea Islands, their physical and moral resources, that has ever been published. So extensively is the work already known, that we fear any extracts we might make would be but too familiar to our readers. We will therefore content ourselves with simply announcing the publication of a new and elegant edition, and with recommending it to the especial favour and confidence of the public.

"Deerbrook," a novel by Harriet Martineau. Two volumes. New-York Harper and Brothers.

We are not among the admirers of this lady and her writings. She is so shockingly given to fibbing in her facts and to prosing in her fictions, that we never resort to her books except when every other method of inducing somnolency has failed. We have at least a dozen female writers in the United States superior to Miss Martineau in talent and intellectual attainments, though unable to compete with her in mendacity, and a certain masculine presumption, which, however admirably calculated it may be to contribute to literary success, (we use the word in its mercantile sense,) does not accord harmoniously with the gentler attributes of the feminine character. "As for Deerbrook," if we can summon resolution enough to read it, we will duly record our humble opinion of its merits.

"Sketches of United States Senators of the Session of 1837 & 8." By "A looker-on here in Vienna." Washington: W. M. Morrison. P. 67.

"A looker-on here in Vienna" would have been in stricter accordance with the letter of the quotation, if the author really intended to draw upon Shakespeare for his subriquet. "This little work embraces sketches, personal and descriptive, of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, Preston, Grundy, Wile, Southard, Wall, Wright, Crittenden, Buchanan, Tallmadge, Rives, and Allen." The writer does not appear to have been influenced by any political bias. He writes with evident impartiality—his style is graphic and vigorous—and we can readily believe that he has had ample opportunity for transferring the peculiar traits of the individuals described. As a favourable specimen of the work, we select the following passage in relation to Mr. Clay.

"Of Mr. Clay, as an orator, you can have no kind of idea, by reading his speeches. You are amazed when you peruse coolly in the papers, a day or two afterwards, what enchained your attention, and feasted your soul and your senses, amidst the crowd and beauty at the capital. I well remember the first time that I heard Mr. Clay. I was quite a child, and on a holiday afternoon wandered into the Capitol. The columns and the pictures 'caught my youthful fancy.' Whilst there, Mr. Clay spoke, casually and briefly, upon the repair of the Cumberland road. I recollect it as if the occurrence was but of yesterday. The impression upon me by his voice and manner was indelible—that voice! how various, how commanding, how rich in volume, and in intonation! In the course of his remarks, he used this exclamation, 'the West! the West! the poor West!'" I was actually awed! The painted dome above his elevated form repeated "the West, the West." He gave to the word poor, a most melancholy emphasis: it was re-echoed with added solemnity.

"Simple as this circumstance may seem, and long ago as it occurred, yet the music, the magic, the tone and effect, with which that simple sentence was uttered, engraved it, with the form and manner of the speaker, for ever upon my memory, and is wonderfully haunting me yet, though many a year has fled, like some wild meadow."

"The face of Mr. Clay is strongly indicative of mind and passion. His hair is light—unfrosted yet his forehead expanded—his nose large, broad, and Roman—his eyes blue, his cheek bones prominent, his complexion florid. His most remarkable feature, however, is the mouth, which expands almost from ear to ear, and is wonderfully expressive. It is very difficult, truly and fairly, to depict the character, streaks of the mind of Mr. Clay. He possesses the utmost tact and readiness in debate. He is plain, practical, and convincing in argument, with ready wit and matchless declamation. Although fervid and vehement, yet Mr. Clay cannot be said to be imaginative. You find few of his expressions or paragraphs brilliant or striking enough for preservation. There seems but little poetry in his matter, and that little not always in the best taste, but appears, as it were, by accident, upon the surface of his earnest diction. His great power is passion—the basis of that passion a strong, common-sense conviction of the truth of what he declares. He draws his hearers along with him, as the locomotive brings on the attached cars—the steam within impels the first, and the latter must obey the propulsion. His mind appears surcharged with a force of conviction sufficient to hurry his whole audience irresistibly to his own conclusions."

Such a pile of unnoted communications is before us, that we really shrink from the task of noticing them individually. "The Lament of the Dying Prophet," is too good to reject, and yet too long to publish. The sermoneer is excellent, and many of the thoughts are strikingly beautiful—"N. S." review of "Cleveland," is a little too severe. Mrs. Butler is evidently a lady of talent, although by no means a practised and graceful writer. We know nothing of the merits of the dispute between her and her husband, and wonder how any one can think it a matter of sufficient interest to "adulate upon." We like the proposition of "an Artist" in regard to the Altein collection of paintings now exhibiting in Boston, and hope that arrangements will be made to afford the New-York public an opportunity of examining the productions of the greatest of living painters: We must respectfully decline the communications of "Decius," "V. V.," "Sigo," "L. N.," "Vincent," and "X. L. C."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1839.

Macadam and asphaltum, wooden pavements and stone.—The changes which are taking place in our goody city, are not confined exclusively to objects above-ground. The very pavements beneath our feet appear to be subjected to hedomalid alterations and upturnings. The competition at present is between the Macadamites, the Asphaltumites, the Wooden-pavementites, and the advocates of the old fashioned-paving-stones. That useful class of individuals, whose vocation it is to lay the dust in our crowded streets, go in with great unanimity for Macadam, when they profess to think one of the greatest of great men, and a benefactor to the human race. The ophthalmok doctors are of the same opinion; and a friend of ours, who manufactures glass eyes, speaks in terms of the warmest approbation of the invention of that "Colossus of roads." That Mr. Macadam has kicked up a great dust in his day, no one can be so ignorant as to deny; but that the thoroughfare of a populous city is the best place to test the utility of his invention admits of a question. We hope his ghost will not be so hard to lay as the dust, for which he is responsible. As for the new asphaltic pavement, it has been well said that it has renewed in our city the time that "tried me" the roads. The organ of adhesiveness is most decidedly developed upon its front. Add to this, it is disapproved of by our good friend Major Noah, who tells us that the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah owed their destruction to the prevalence of asphaltum as an ingredient in their structure, so that when once ignited they burnt like barrels of tar. Notwithstanding this warning example, the asphaltumites are apparently gaining ground in our community. Two patches of sidewalk in Broadway already furnish specimens of the material; and in Beaver-street, near Delmonico's, a pavement half stone and half asphaltum has been recently constructed. This must have been the effect of a compromise between two of the factions, into which our population is divided. The successful result of the wooden pavement experiment appears to be doubted by many, but whether these sceptical persons have been bribed by the oculists and the water-sprinklers, or whether their opinions are sincere and disinterested, it is vain to inquire. The omnibus proprietors and drivers are, we believe, to a man, in favour of blocking up, or more properly, blocking down the streets—in other words, they are in favour of a wooden pavement, inasmuch as it would save their wheels and their horses' feet. But the wheelwrights, the carriage-makers, and the blacksmiths are equally opposed to all innovations, and give their entire preference to the regular old wheel-tearing, ear-splitting, head-bumping, rumbling and stumbling pavement of stone. We will for the present remain non-committal, neither espousing nor condemning any one of the different modes. In the meantime we shall watch with interest the evolutions made on the pavé by all the various factions we have enumerated.

The theatres.—We remember as an event of yesterday the astonishing manifested by the New-York public when Madame Huon, the first danseuse of celebrity that ever appeared upon our boards, came bounding down to the gaslights on one foot, the other in the air, and dumfounded the spectators by one of those remarkable twirls, which caused all the ladies in the house instantly to retire, and the gentlemen in the pit to ejaculate, "no mistake!" We were an unopinionated people then. The subsequent importation of Celeste, Ronzi Vestris, Augusta and Leconte, however, has enlightened our primitive understandings on this subject, and that which in former times was considered an objectionable performance, has become so fashionable that the public would think us remiss in our duties if we neglected to say that Monsieur and Madame Tagliani, who are now at the Park theatre, are distinguished artists, who have come to us recommended for their professional worth and private excellence by Mr. Wheaton, our minister at the court of Prussia. Miss Ellen Tree, who is not more esteemed for her fine professional talents than for her many excellent qualities in private life, will commence her farewell engagement at the Park on Wednesday evening next. She will undoubtedly attract brilliant houses every night, for Miss Tree's friends are as numerous as the leaves of the forest. Mr. Wallack is expected to return in the Great Western, and to bring with him, "novelties of a very peculiar character" for the National theatre, where opera has, for the last month, been the principal attraction; and this is no wonder, with Miss Shurreff, Mrs. Seguin, Mrs. Bailey, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Seguin, and Mr. Morley, to sustain the principal roles. By the way, we notice that some of the papers have been making ungallant contrasts between the performances of Miss Shurreff and those of Madame Malbran and Mrs. Wood. This is unfair. Miss Shurreff is a sweet singer, an excellent actress, and deservedly an universal favourite. Comparisons are odious, and there is no occasion for bringing her in juxtaposition with any other vocalist. She has merit enough to stand alone, and will never be heard either upon the English or American stage without eliciting the warm commendation, which she has never failed to receive, and to which she is so justly entitled. Since the opening of the Bowers theatre one novelty has succeeded another with such rapidity, that we have been unable to chronicle them. Mrs. Shaw, ever a favourite elsewhere, is of course a favourite here. Her Constance is one of the most delightful things upon the stage, and the melodramas that have been produced, have owed much of their success to her fine and spirited acting. Since the rebuilding of this theatre, we have noticed one change for the better, which reflects credit upon Mr. Hamblin, for it is owing to his judicious management that it has been effected. There was a time when the following couplet, from the pen of one of our cleverest poets, was, perhaps, but two applicable.

"Throw not the pearl of Shakespeare's wit,
Before the swine of the Bowers pit."

But this is inappropriate now; for a more orderly audience than that which nightly fills the Bowers, cannot be assembled in any theatre in the country.

Court scandal.—The Liverpool correspondent of the Evening Star is one of the pleasantest and most agreeable of newspaper letter-writers. The editor of that journal has a jewel in him. We rarely, by any chance, open an exchange paper, wherein we do not see his paragraphs either quoted or commented upon. His letters doubtless furnish a faithful compendium of all the floating gossip current in the metropolitan society of England, and this he conveys to the American public, without being always answerable for its accuracy. The following in relation to the Queen is unquestionably untrue; but we give it as a specimen of the scandals to which even a young and innocent girl, occupying a royal station, is subjected:

"What has long been whispered in the higher circles has, at length, come to pass, that is, there has been a regular emu between the Queen and her mother. In my next I may be able to communicate the full particulars, at present I shall merely state what is generally received and I may add regretted. You have been aware from previous letters of mine, that a decided coolness existed between Victoria and the Duchess of Kent. For five weeks they had no direct—no personal communication. The Duchess during that time never once dined with her royal teacher, but resided in her own apartments, which are in a wing of the palace most distant from those of the Queen. Once a day, a formal message passed between the two personages, and that was all. This was extremely unpleasant, and it much afflicted the spirits and visibly influenced the health of the Queen's mother. A fortnight ago, I told you that a sort of peace had been patched up, and that the Duchess of Kent was again invited, once or twice, to dine with her daughter. This hollow peace has been broken, and things are now worse than ever. An insult of a very slighting nature was put upon the Duchess of Kent by one of her daughter's most favoured and confidential attendants. On a representation of this, the Queen laughed at it. The complaint was renewed, and a very painful and unduly long reply was the result. This too, was given before many witnesses—ladies of rank and fashion. The Duchess burst into tears, hastily said, 'Did I make all my sacrifices for this return?' and the Queen turned to her piano and began to play an old English air called, 'Pray, Goddy, cease to moderate the rancour of your tongue!' This mode of conduct may be exceedingly Queenly, but it is not very lady-like. That such was the exact bearing of Victoria on this occasion, I fear there is no cause to doubt. The Duchess of Kent thus was forced to do what she wished to avoid. She sent for the Duke of Wellington—albeit her political views differ from his—and placed in his hands a written statement of her case. In this, she demanded a dismissal of the lady in the royal household who had insulted her. The Queen placed her case in the hands of—Lord Melbourne! The unpires met, but the Queen would not concede the point that her attendant should be dismissed or even reprimanded. At last, the demand being a non, she was with the Duke of Wellington, the part of the Duchess, the Queen requested to see him, or rather walked into the room where he and Lord Melbourne were discussing the matter. 'My Lord Duke,' she is reported to have said, 'if my house has become an unpleasant habitation to the Duchess of Kent, she can leave it!' The Duke did not trust himself to make a reply, and here rests the matter. If this be not a turn-out worthy the filial piety of a Tarquinius, then I know not what is! Several things of recent occurrence show that our young Queen, in a very unwomanly way, is resolved to have her own way. She has taken some dislike to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and, to vex him, invited him to dine. Well, he went, and instead of giving him the pos at table, as the first church dignitary in the empire, (she being 'Head of the Church' and 'Edo Defensor'), he was allowed to remain in the drawing-room with the pages, and actually to be the last to enter the dining-room, where, all other seats being appropriated, he had only Houson's choice, and took his seat between two equerries, his place of right being next the Queen! Another instance is this: the Hon. Malinda Paget is one of the Queen's maids of honour, grand-daughter to the Marquis of Anglesea, and of as high blood very nearly as the Queen herself. Well, she was one day late in waiting on the Queen, and her Majesty very sulkily remarked it, handing her a watch, saying, 'Went that, Miss Paget, and see if it will make you punctual.' It was the manner of the gift that made it an insult. Again, Miss Pitt (another maid of honour) was so 'shocking vulgar' as to play with a locket while speaking to the Queen. Her Majesty said, 'I hate the manners of a chambermaid with the dress of a lady. Pray, Miss Pitt, take out that locket, find better employment for your fingers than fiddling with them, and remain in your room until I send for you.' Miss Pitt burst into tears and left the apartment. Miss Spring Rice addressed herself to the Queen, and endeavoured to extenuate the offence of her friend. The haughty answer was, 'I think, Miss Rice, you had better stay in your room until I want you, which will not be very soon.' All this shows 'the rose and fair expectancy of the state' in an unfavourable light. Yet I have not written down a tithe of the anecdotes in currency which go to show the same. They go to prove why her maids of honour are continually resigning unenviable offices."

Ballston and Saratoga.—A new spring has been discovered at Ballston, similar in properties to the famous Washington spring, which failed some years since. It is said also to be impregnated with iodine, a valuable ingredient in the case of many complaints.

Pianofortes.—It is estimated that upwards of one thousand pianofortes are manufactured annually in the United States!

A singular allowance.—A gentleman of our acquaintance allows his wife a thousand dollars a year to keep out of Broadway.

TO LINGER NEAR THEE.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS H. BAYLY—AND ADAPTED TO THE CELEBRATED LAST WALTZ OF C. M. VON WEBER.

The following is the very popular song introduced by Mr. Charles Mathews in Bayly's favourite afterpiece of "One Hour, or the Carnival Ball." Our fair readers will find that it is admirably adapted to Von Weber's celebrated and familiar melody.

To linger near thee, to see and hear thee, Shall be for ever my pray'r; Those eyes en-charm me, oh! la-dy, grant me One smile to banish des-pair. With thee I'll wan-der, still grow-ing fon-der, Thy will-ing cap-tive I'll prove; Though once a ro-ver, all that is o-ver, For thou hast taught me to love. Thy voice I'm sure, dear, is soft and pure, dear, let my song be thy choice; Don't a mi-nute, at once be-gin it, Oh! how I long to hear thy voice. To linger near thee, to see and hear thee, Shall be for ever my pray'r; Those eyes en-charm me, oh! la-dy, grant me one smile to banish des-pair.

3d—Nay, why so chill-ing? Why thus unwill-ing To give me pleasure? Dearest sing; Content I'll stay, dear, the Hye-long day, dear, Take my guitar and touch the string; A bright eye charms me, and beauty warms me, These without musick weary seen; Venns to me, love, a fright would be, love, If I heard her sing out of tune. Thy voice I'm sure, dear, is soft and pure, dear. Then let my song be thy choice— Don't pause a minute, at once begin it— Oh! how I long to hear thy voice. To linger, etc.

NOTES AND NOTICES.

A CLINCHER.—Two gentlemen walking together were talking of the senses, seeing, feeling and the like. One remarked that his sense of hearing was remarkable for its acuteness, while the other was not wonderfully endowed in this respect, but observed that his vision was wonderful. "Now, to illustrate," said he, "I can see a fly on the spire of yonder church." The other, looking sharply at the place indicated—"Ah!" said he, "I can't see him, but I can hear him step!"

OLD, BUT TRUE.—Political editors, who are expected by their respective patrons to blacken each other's characters as much as possible, are generally on good terms, personally; while musicians and singers, who are expected to be all harmony and concord, generally cherish the bitterest jealousy and enmity towards each other.

PHYSICAL FORCE.—A young man, a lecturer upon universal suffrage, holding forth in a room in a certain village, and while expatiating on moral and physical force, was asked by one of the auditory, a conservative, what was the meaning of physical force, upon which the lecturer lifted up one of the candlesticks and knocked him down, saying, "That was physical force, sir." This had nearly caused a row, but moral force prevailed, and it was quashed.

A CUTTING REPLY.—A charitable divine, for the benefit of the country where he resided, commenced a large causeway, and as he was one day overlooking the work, a certain nobleman passed by—"Well, doctor," said he, "notwithstanding your pains and charity, I don't take this to be the highway to heaven." "Very true, my lord," replied the doctor, "for if it had, I should have wondered to meet your lordship here."

THE SELFISH MAN.—Colorden, when on his death-bed, was visited by his friend Barthe, who requested his opinion of his comedy of the Selfish Man, which he came to read at his bed-side—"You may add an excellent trait to the character of your principal personage," replied Colorden; "say that he obliged an old friend on the eve of death to hear him read a five act comedy."

VARIETY.—"Custom cannot stifle his infinite variety." Over the stall of a publick writer in la rue du Bac, at Paris, is the following inscription: "M. Renard, publick writer, advising compiler, translates the tongues, explains the language of flowers, and sells fried potatoes."

THE BEGINNING AND THE END.—It has been said of William III., that he commenced his reign by kicking his father-in-law from the throne, and ended it by breaking his own neck. The first act would be considered a very good one, were it not eclipsed by the last.

CLIMAX.—A lecturer on the history of chemistry, thus described the celebrated Mr. Boyle: "He was a great man, a very great man, he was the father of modern chemistry, and the brother of the earl of Cork."

THE LAST EXCUSE.—A Massachusetts paper mentions the case of a chap who had some excuse to give for every glass of liquor he took. His last was, "Give me a brandy toddy; I'm going to have fish for dinner."

AFFECTING THE CHILDREN.—We knew a blind man who had fourteen children, and yet was under the necessity of hiring a lad to lead him about the streets.

THE TRANSCRIPT.—This is one of the oldest of the penny papers. It has passed through various hands, and at times has been conducted with unusual ability. It has recently undergone another change, and is now under the editorial direction of Mr. Lomas, who possesses the requisite degree of tact, talent and industry, to render such a paper interesting, and every way worthy of support.

A SUMMER NOON AT SEA.

A hot stillness, beautiful and deep,
Reigns in the air and broods upon the ocean;
The worn-out winds are quieted to sleep,
And not a wave is lifted into motion.

The fleecy clouds hang on the soft blue sky,
Into fantaisic shapes of brilliance moulded,
Pillowed on one another broad and high,
With the sun's dazzling tresses interfolded.

The sea-bird skims along the glassy tide,
With sidelong flight and wing of glancing whiteness,
Or floats upon the sea, outstretching wide,
A sheet of gold in the meridian brightness.

Our vessel lies, unstirred by wave or blast—
As she were moored to her dark sandow, seeming—
Her worn-out sails like marble drapery gleaming,
And her drop-like sails like marble drapery gleaming.

How at an hour like this the unruined mind
Partakes the quiet that is shed around us!
As if the Power that chained the impatient wind
With the same soothing influence had bound us! — M. S.

NAUTICAL SKETCHES.

SCENE WITH A PIRATE.

In the month of July, 1813, I was on my way from New-York to the island of Curaçoa, on board the American ship Patrick Henry, commanded by Captain Tuttle. We had had a fine passage, and were looking forward to the end of our voyage in about a week. I was the only passenger, and of course was thrown in a great measure on my own resources for amusement, the chief of which was testing the powers of an admirable glass of London manufacture upon every vessel that showed itself above the horizon. Our captain was kind and civil, but there appeared a mystery about him that he did not like to be probed into, and our communication had in consequence been reserved.

In about latitude twenty degrees, and longitude sixty degrees fifteen minutes, we were running along with a fine fresh breeze abeam, and all our weather-studding-sails set. I was sitting alone in the cabin, ruminating upon the changes of scene and society into which I had been forced so contrary to my inclinations, and wondering whether the happiness of a quiet and domestic life was ever to fall to my lot, when the captain came down and told me that, as I was so fond of using my glass, there was a vessel just appearing on the horizon to windward, and that I might go and see what she was, for he could not make her out at all. I went on deck, and mounted into the main-top, and began my scrutiny. "Well, what is she?" asked the captain from the deck. "I can hardly make her out, but I think she is a schooner." "Ay—what's her course?" "South-west by south, I think; about the same as ourselves." I remained in the top for a few minutes, and continued looking at the stranger. "She seems fonder of the sea than I am," I continued, "for she might have her topsails and top-gallants, and studding-sails to boot, all set, instead of slipping along under her lower sails." The captain made no answer, but was looking hard at her with his eye. I now perceived through my glass a white speck above her foremast, flapping against the mast. "Well, she must have heard me, for there goes her fore-top-sail." The captain now went to the companion for his glass, and after looking attentively at her for a short time, "What's that?" he asked; "is that her square-sail ship's setting?" I can't very well see from the deck," I looked again: "Yes, 'tis her square-sail; as I'm alive, she's changed her course, and is bearing down upon us." But by this time the captain had mounted the rigging, and was standing beside me; he was eyeing the distant vessel keenly. After having apparently satisfied himself, he asked me to go with him to the cabin, and I followed him to the cabin. He motioned me to take a seat, and after carefully shutting the door, "I rather expect," said he, "that fellow's a pirate." "Pirate?" I asked in alarm. "Yes, I say pirate, and I'll tell you why. In the first place, you see, he'd no business to be sneaking along like that de hille sort of a way, as when we first saw him; who ever, that had any honest business to do, would allow such a fine breeze to go by without showing more canvas than a powder-miller's old breeches to catch it? Next, you see, what the mischief has he to do with us, that, as soon as he clapped eyes on us, he must alter his course, and be so anxious to get out his square-sail? Again, he looks just like one of those imps of mischief, with his low black hull and tall raking masts. But it's no use talking; I tell you he's a pirate, and that's as true as my name's Isaac Tuttle. And now the only thing is, what shall we do? The Patrick Henry ain't a Baltimore clipper, and that 'ere fellow will walk up to us like nothing. But I'll tell you what strikes me: If we let them rascals aboard, it's most likely we'll all walk the plank; so we'd better try to keep 'em out. We'll not get but an old rusty carronade and two six-pounders, and I don't believe there's a bullet on board, we came off in such a hurry. Then, there's two muskets and an old regulation rifle down in my state-room; but they ain't been fired I don't know when, and I'd as lief stand shore 'em as behind 'em. But our ship's as handsome a looking craft as you'll see;

and couldn't we look wicked-like now, and try to frighten that cut-throat-looking rascal?"

I confess I was at first startled at the captain's opinion of the strange sail, and his reasoning left me hardly a hope that his judgment was not correct; but his cool and collected manner impressed me with confidence in his management, and I told him he knew best what we should do, and I would second him as I best could. He walked up and down the cabin twice; then rubbing his hands together as if pleased with his own ideas, "I have it," he cried; "I'll just go on deck to put things in order, and in the meantime you'd better amuse yourself looking out your pistols, if you have any; for if he won't be content with a look at us, we'll have to fight."

I hurriedly took my fowling-piece and pistols from their cases, for I fortunately had both; and though I somehow refused to allow myself to believe there would be any occasion for their use, yet I loaded them all with ball; and in each of the pistols put a brace; this done, I went on deck, where I found the captain surrounded by his crew, telling them his suspicions, and his plan of action. "But," said he, "maybe we'll have to fight; if them villains have a mind to try us, they'll send a boat on board, and I want to know if you'll help me to keep 'em off. You see it's most likely they'll make you play the plank, whether you fight or not, if they get on board; and I calculate, if you do just as I tell you, we'll frighten 'em." There was a hearty "Ay, ay, sir," to this short and pithy harangue. "Thankee, thankee, boys," said the captain; "now we'll not show another stitch of canvas, but seem to take no more notice of that fellow than if we didn't see him; and if he does try to come aboard, then we'll show 'em what we can do."

Our captain was about fifty years old, rather short and stout, but muscular; his face was bronzed with time and tempest, and his locks, which had once been black, were grizzled by the same causes. He was an old sailor and a staunch republican; and as some of his men told tales of fight in which their captain had borne a part, I presumed he had served, when a young man, in the navies of the States.

The crew were busy, in obedience to his orders, cutting up a spare fore-top-gallant mast into logs of about four feet long; these were immediately painted black, with a round spot in the centre of each end, so as to bear a tolerable resemblance to pieces of cannon, and with two old six-pounders, were placed, one at each port, on our deck, five on a side; but the store were to be kept closed until the captain gave the order to open them, then they were to be raised as quickly as possible, and the logs thrust out about a foot. A platform was then made on the top of the long-boat, which was fixed between the fore and main masts, and the carronade, or fourteen-pounder, was hoisted up. These things being arranged, the captain went below, and the crew mustered in knots, to wonder and talk of what was to be done.

In the meantime, we had been standing on our course, and had not shifted or hoisted a single sail, but were as if perfectly regardless of the schooner. Not so with her, however; for besides a large square-sail and square-top-sail on the foremast, she had run out small fore-top-mast studding-sails, and onward she came, right before a pretty smart breeze, yawing from side to side, at one moment sinking stern foremost into the trough of the sea, as an enormous wave rolled out from under her, and at the next forced headlong onwards by its successor, while a broad white sheet of foam spread out around her, giving beautiful relief to the jet-black colour of her hull, testifying how rapidly she was going through the water. I could not help thinking of the captain's expression, for she certainly did "walk up to us like nothing!" and as there appeared to be not much time to lose, I went down to the cabin to assume my weapons. The captain was there arranging some papers, and a bottle was before him, into which he had put a letter. "May be," said he, "something'll happen to me; for if them 'ere bloody pirates won't be cheated, I'll be the first to suffer; and a natural enough too, for all the mischief they'll suffer will be by my orders, just because I didn't like to be overhailed like an old tinsmith, by every rascal who chooses to say heave to, in the high seas. But never mind, only, should you escape, just drop the bottle and letter overboard, if you think you can't deliver it yourself."

Now, I had never seriously considered the probability that I might also be killed in an approaching melee, for I thought that the captain intended to throw open his ports and show his square guns, and that, of course, the schooner would take flight. But when he began to talk about death in such a serious strain, I began to feel very uncomfortable; and not being naturally a warrior, I wished myself anywhere else than on board the Patrick Henry. There I was, however, with a chance of escape; and I suggested to the captain that it would be as well for me to put a letter into the bottle also, in case of any accident to both of us, which was agreed to; and we arranged that if either survived and had the opportunity, the letter of the unfortunate should be safely forwarded to its destination. After this little piece of preparation, the captain took me by the hand. "This well," said he; "are you willing to share with me the next danger?" Do not suppose I am unaccustomed to the perils of a sea-fight; no, young man; I've supported the glory of the thirteen stripes in many a gallant action, and have witnessed the death of those honoured and esteemed as the sons of liberty. Yet they were fighting for their country, and it was their duty to hold their lives cheap; but you are a passenger, and should be under my protection—yet I ask you to share my danger. I wish some one to stand by me on the platform, and help me to manage the swivel. Hands are scarce, and I don't know where else to place you." The hardy fellow's eyes glinted as he made the proposal, to which I, of course, instantly agreed. "Thankee, thankee," he replied, and relapsed into his former character. "Twas strange; he had always appeared on board his vessel as a common Yankee captain, with little to say, and with a rough uncouth manner but little removed from his men. Yet he at once, though evidently indiscreetly, assumed the air and manner of a polished gentleman; and it certainly struck me that the latter character appeared more natural in him than the former. There was evidently a mystery about him, and I determined to find it out when more opportune circumstances should occur.

We went on deck, and the men were still hanging about waiting for the orders of the captain to make them start. There were soon given. The cooper and the carpenter were ordered to bring up all hatchets and other offensive and defensive weapons, and with the muskets and rifle they were distributed among the crew, who received their orders to use them in repelling any attempt to board.

The schooner had now come down within half a mile of us, when she suddenly took down her square-sail, and hauled her whiff, to have a look at us. I dare say she did not know what to make of our seeming indifference. Presently a cloud of smoke burst from her side, and a ball came skipping over the water, and passed astern of us. "I thought so," said the captain; "now, lads, show her our stripes." A ball of bouncing flew up to the end of our mizen peak, rested an instant, and fluttered out into the American ensign. The smoke drifted away from the schooner, and she ran up at her gas the ensign of the Columbian republic. "That's terribly the way with them blackguards; they're always making a fool of some republic." Scarcely were the words out of his mouth, when another column of smoke burst from the schooner, and another ball came skip—skip—skiping over towards us, but, catching a swell, it plunged in, and we saw no more of it. "That fellow now, I take it, is a good shot, so we'll not wait for another. Clue up the main-sail, boys; haul aft the weather main-braces; clew up the foresail; luff her, man, luff her a little more—steady," burst from our captain's mouth; the orders were obeyed with the quickness of a well-disciplined crew, and our ship was hove to. "Now, my lads, take your stations, four to each port on the weather side, but do nothing till I tell ye." The men took their stations, as directed, round each log on the weather side, and I followed the captain to the platform where our carronade was mounted. It was loaded to the muzzle with bits of iron, musket-balls, lumps of lead, and various other missiles, for the captain had conjectured rightly—there were no balls on board. The schooner hove to, and a boat was lowered, and crowded with men. It approached rapidly, pulled by eight rowers. The muzzle of our carronade was depressed as much as possible, and made to bear on the water about fifty yards from the ship. The captain stood with his speaking-trumpet in one hand, and a handspike, with which he shifted the position of the gun as required, in the other. The schooner's boat approached, and was pulling rapidly to get alongside. "Now, sir, keep steady, and obey my orders coolly," said the captain, in an under tone. "Boy, fetch the iron that's heating in the galley—run." The boy ran, and returned with the iron heated at one end, which was handed to me. "When I tell you to fire, fire, as you value your life and those on board." The captain now put his speaking-trumpet to his mouth, and hailed the boat, which was within a hundred yards of us. "Stop—no nearer, or I'll blow you all out of the water—keep off, keep off, or I say, Pull!"

At that instant the man at the bows of the boat, who appeared to take the command, gave an order, and a volley from several muskets was fired at us. I heard the balls hit about me, and turned to look for the captain to receive my order to fire. He was on one knee behind the cannon, and holding it by the breech. "Why, captain! what's the matter! are you hit?" He rallied. "Nothing—they're coming." He gave another shout to the crew, cast his eye hurriedly along his barrel—"Fire, and be quick!" I needed not a second bidding, for the boat was close alongside. The smoke burst from the touch hole with a hiss, and for an instant I thought the gun had missed fire, but in the next it exploded with a tremendous report, that deafened me. "Throw open your ports, boys, and show them your teeth," roared the captain through his trumpet, and his voice sounded hideously unnatural. In an instant every man was up, and our guns protruded their muzzles. I had fancied that I heard a crash, followed by wild screams, immediately upon the discharge of the cannon; but the report had deafened me; and the smoke, which was driven back in my face, had so shrouded me, that I could not see; the unearthly shout of the captain had also for the moment driven the idea from my mind, and I now grasped my gun to repel boarders. But my hearing had not deceived me; for, as the smoke was borne away to leeward, the whole scene of destruction burst upon my sight. The cannon had been most truly pointed, and its contents had shivered the hardest hull, killing or wounding almost every person in her. The longest lifetime will hardly suffice that scene from my mind. The stern of the boat had been carried completely away, and it was sinking by the weight of the human beings that clung to it. A few gradually disappeared, the miserable wretches struggled forward to the bows, and with horrid screams and imprecations battled for a moment for what little support it might yield. The dead and the dying were floating and splashing around them, while a deep crimson tinge marked how fatal had been that discharge. Ropes were thrown over, and everything done to save those that were not destroyed by the cannon-shot, but only three out of the boat's crew of twenty-four were saved; the greater part went down with the boat to which they clung.

The whole scene of destruction did not last ten minutes, and all was again quiet. The bodies of those who had been shot did not sink, but were driven by the wind and sea against the side of the ship. From some the blood was gently oozing, and floating around them; others, stiff in the convulsion in which they had died, were grinning or frowning with horrible expression. One body, strong and muscular, with neat white trousers, and a leathern girdle in which were stuck two pistols, floated by, but the face was gone; some merciless ball had so disfigured him, that all trace of human expression was destroyed. He was the pirate captain.

But where was the schooner? She lay for a few minutes after the destruction of her boat; and when she started at our appearance, or horrified at the loss of so many of her men, I know not, but she slipped her foremast, and stood away as close to the wind as possible. We saw no more of her.

The excitement of the scenes we had just passed through, prevented our missing the captain; but so soon as the schooner bore away, all naturally expected his voice to give some order for getting again under weigh. But no order came. Where was he? The musket discharge from the boat, with the unearthly voice that conveyed the orders for the ports to be thrown open, flashed across my mind. I ran to the platform. The captain was there lying on his face beside the gun that he had pointed with such deadly effect. He still grasped the speaking-trumpet in his hand, and I shuddered as I beheld its mouth-piece covered with blood. "The captain's killed!" I cried, and stooped to raise him. "I believe I am," said he; "take me to the cabin." A dozen ready hands were stretched to receive him, and he was taken between, and carefully laid on a sofa. "Ay," he said, "I heard the crash; my ear knows too well the crash of shot against a plank to be mistaken, and my eye has pointed too many guns to miss its mark easily now. But, tell me, is any one else hurt?" "No, thank heaven," I said; "and I hope you are not so badly hit." "Bad enough. But cut open my waistcoat—'tis here." A mouthful of blood stopped his utterance, but he pointed to his right side. I wiped his mouth, and we cut off his waistcoat as gently as possible. There was no blood; but on removing his shirt, we discovered, about three inches on the right of the pit of the stomach, a discoloured spot, about the size of half-a-crown, darkening towards its centre, where there was a small wound. A musket ball had struck him, and from there being no outward bleeding, I feared the worst. We dressed the wound as well as circumstances would permit; but externally it was trifling—the fatal wound was within. The unfortunate sufferer muttered for all to leave him but me; and calling me to his side, "I feel," said he, "that I am dying; the letter—promise me that you will get it forwarded—'tis to my poor widow. Well, I've tempted this death often and escaped, and 'tis hard to be struck by a villain's hand. But God's will be done." I promised that I would personally deliver the letter, for that I intended returning to New-York from Curacao. "Thank you truly," said the dying man; "you will then see my Helen and my child, and can tell them that their unfortunate husband and father died thinking of them. This ship and cargo are mine, and will belong to my family. Stranger, I was not always what I now seem. But I could not bear that the Yankee skipper should be known as he who once—." A sudden flow of blood prevented his finishing the sentence. I tried to relieve him by a change of posture, but in vain; he muttered some incoherent sentences, by which his mind seemed to dwell upon former scenes of battle for the republic, and of undeserved treatment. He rallied for one instant, and, with a blessing for his family, and the name of Helen on his lips, he ceased to breathe.

The body of our unfortunate captain was next day committed to the waves, amidst the tears of us all. Our voyage was prosecuted to an end without further interruption. I did not forget the wishes of the dying man; I bore faithfully I fulfilled them, and how I have been rewarded, or how satisfactory to me was the previous history of the poor captain, need not be told. Suffice it to say, that I am settled in Elm Cottage, Bloomingdale, and am the happiest son-in-law, husband, and father, in the United States.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

A LAST DAY IN OFFICE.

"The late minister held their last meeting at the Hotel of Foreign Affairs, and, in retiring, those gentlemen have not been unmindful of themselves or their friends.—Private correspondence of the 'Times' relative to the French ministry."

In a noble hotel in Paris, a man of striking appearance, though considerably past the middle age, was seated in a small room, busily employed in sorting papers, which he drew from a box placed near the fire by his side. Some of these he committed to the flames, whilst others he arranged on the table, according to the nature of their contents. The person thus employed was Comte M—, and of the ministers of the French government. He continued at his task for some time uninterrupted, until at last, as if wearied, he leant back, and for a few minutes appeared lost in abstraction; the few words which he uttered, as if unconsciously, showed in what direction his thoughts had been turned. "It is vain to struggle," he said; "the whole plan of government must be changed. The elections are going against us, and the public will must not be slighted. How, then, should I act at such a conjuncture? Shall I still hold fast to power, supported by my royal master? or, yielding in time to the swelling tide of popular discontent, shall I point out to him how he should steer his course amidst these troubled waters? This latter part is the safest and the most honest, and the one I must in all probability adopt. A descent from power is always, in some degree, humiliating; but it may be invested with dignity in the eyes of the world. Let me, at all events, prepare for the worst. Wisely did the great Pitt observe, that 'it was the part of a fool to retire from office without bearing away the means of re-entering it.' Let me not commit so foolish a mistake."

He again betook himself to his work, burning such papers as might be useful to his successor, and retaining all which could at a future day disturb the new ministry, and enable him to again enter on power. He had nearly concluded his anxious task, when a knock was heard at the door. The Comte gave the word to enter, and his private secretary appeared with a huge pile of opened letters, which he placed on the table.

"The elections are even more against you, my lord, than you anticipated. Your majority cannot by possibility be more than twenty, even supposing that the contests which are still pending should be as favourable to the government as your lordship could possibly hope. In this résumé of the intelligence received up to the last hour," and he placed before the Comte a sheet of paper closely covered with writing and figures, "you will see the actual state of the chamber, and you may form a conjecture as to your future proceedings."

"And what would you advise me, Théodore?" said the Comte, carelessly, without raising his head from the paper he was examining. "My lord," said the young man, the colour mounting to his cheek, "since your lordship condescends so far as to allow me to speak—me, whom your bounty has made what I am—I should exert against my duty and my conscience, did I not deal with you candidly. My lord, the only honourable course before you is to resign. The steering of the state vessel is now too severe a task for even your practised hand. The political horizon forebodes a storm, and shipwreck will probably await those who compose her crew. To resign now, is to retreat with honour; and a skilful retreat has always been considered as great an achievement as a dearly-bought victory. My lord, I would seriously recommend you to resign."

"My young friend," said the minister, kindly, "such was my intention. I only asked your opinion, to find another proof of your attachment to myself, even though at the expense of your personal interest. But you shall not lose by your frankness. The falling minister is still in power."

He then tied the several packets of papers separately, and labelled them carefully. He placed them in the box from whence they had been taken, and having doubly locked it with a small key which hung round his neck, he told the young secretary to attend him at dinner the next day without fail, and then left the room. He proceeded at once to the boudoir of his wife. "It is finished, ma chère amie," was his address to her. "In another day I shall cease to be minister." The Comtesse uttered an exclamation of alarm. "There is no need of inquiring yourself," pursued he; "the present moment admits of a safe retreat. The delay of a few weeks might render such a course impossible. But we have much to console us. Power is attended with so much anxiety, that we should congratulate ourselves on being able to leave it. Besides, we are rich and highly respected. The name of ancien ministre will always adhere to me, and I shall have the honour of being a privy councillor. Beside, if we desire it, I can again enter the ministry. Men of political experience are so rare, that application must at some time or other be again made to me to return to power. As to your own feelings in retiring to private life, you will have but little need to place any constraint on yourself, as this is the last night you will have to receive the visit of your acquaintance; and as my intended resignation is more than suspected, your salons will be deserted this evening. I remember once, when Talleyrand was disgraced, many years ago, I met him as he came forth from the king's closet. He passed his time in his features unmovable, as they always were. I, however, knew of his disgrace, and I stared at him without offering him the slightest salute. He ought to have formed a high opinion of me."

"A mean one you mean, I suppose," said the Comtesse, "at thus neglecting him in his hour of trial?"

"No," said the Comte. He at once must have thought me as one brought up in a good school. To salute a fallen minister is a piece of political folly, altogether ridiculous; and I am quite convinced, that, had I made Talleyrand the smallest civility, he would have despised me. The same will occur to-night: no person will throw away their time and their politeness on us. Your salons will be deserted."

But the minister was mistaken: his experience was at fault on this point. On the mountains of Switzerland, or on the shores of the Mediterranean, travellers hurry forth to behold the setting sun, but when once it has sunk below the horizon, they deem it unnecessary to tarry longer. Thus it is with the decline of power: men feel anxious to witness the expiring rays of the political luminary, in whose mid-day beams they experienced emotions of pleasure or fear; and hence the Comtesse's room had never been so thronged. The Comte was overcome with surprise: he was overwhelmed with civilities, and he almost fancied that some unexpected circumstance had arisen to retain him in place. Thirty private audiences were demanded for the morrow, and he granted them all with the grace so easy to those who have been accustomed to dispense favours.

On the morrow the crowd of solicitors filed the ante-chamber of the Comte. His intended resignation had already become public, and the papers of the morning announced plainly that he had but one day more of his political existence to spend. The gentlemen of the chamber introduced the proprietor and one of the editors of a ministerial paper.

"Monsieur le Ministre," said the proprietor, "we have always been your firm supporters whilst you were in power, and we have now come to place our journal at your disposal, to assist you to resume a post which no other can fill so worthily."

"So much zeal and devotedness touch me deeply, gentlemen, and I only wish I could prove to you how keenly I feel your generous endeavours to serve me."

"If your excellency is disposed to do something to serve your most devoted friends, you can easily have the opportunity. I have the last week been soliciting the permission to open a concert-room with certain privileges. If your lordship would only sign your name..."

"My dear sir, give me the petition."

The minister placed on the margin the fortunate word Accordé; and then turned to the editor:

"And you, Monsieur, have you not also something to demand? I have not forgotten your powerful articles: you have given proofs of great facility of style, a never-ending tact, and great power of logical reasoning: you are sure to advance. You have nothing at your button-hole. Will you allow me to present you with the Cross? Take mine—it will be honoured by reclining on so talented a breast."

"I accept it, Monsieur le Ministre, with gratitude. But I confess that I did intend to solicit another mark of your kindness."

"Speak, sir. Rely on my desire to serve you."

"I am anxious to be appointed to some literary mission."

"Nothing is more easy, and the cross shall be yours also. Where do you desire to go?"

"Wherever your excellency shall think fit."

"Let me see! I shall not speak of France, that is not worth your while. Italy? It has got quite common lately. What would you think of England?"

"I have already been to London and Edinburgh."

"Spain?"

"The country is not over and above safe."

"Germany? I... But no: I have already sent seven or eight writers there, and they have brought nothing back. What do you say to Russia?"

"It would suit me exactly."

"Well, then, Russia let it be, with a grant of twelve thousand francs to bear your expenses. The ordinance shall be got ready to-morrow morning."

The two journalists took their leave, and a young painter entered, bearing a splendidly-bound album.

"My lord, I bring the album of Madame la Comtesse," said the artist. "I have exerted myself to the utmost to enrich it with works from the pencil of our first painters. There is not a famous artist in France who has not contrived something to this precious repository. Will your highness permit me to offer the whole as a mark of my sincere desire to serve you?"

"A thousand thanks, Monsieur. You are really too obliging. Will you please to name what sum I am indebted to you for this beautiful collection of chef-d'œuvre?"

"Your excellency is too good... As I have served you as an artist, perhaps you would recompense me as minister?"

"Oh! with all my heart. To-day you shall receive an order to paint two grand historical pictures for the state. You paint history?"

"Everything, my lord."

The pendule struck the hour, and the minister repaired to his last council. As he passed from his reception-room, twenty petitioners rose to greet him. He anticipated their requests by saying—"Gentlemen, please to hand your petitions to my secretary. I am forced to go to council. But I will strive to satisfy every one who has done me service."

What passed at the last meeting of the ministry was never known with certainty. The same day, however, at six o'clock, all his friends were seated round a table sumptuously prepared for the last dinner. Never was a repast more gay. Wit and repartees flew about in abundance; and the health of the master of the feast was toasted with enthusiasm. Never was any man surrounded with more devoted and hard-drinking friends. At last when the dessert was placed on the table, and the servants had retired, the minister arose, and, with a grave voice, spoke as follows:—"Gentlemen, to-morrow the Moniteur will contain the news of my resignation. I have governed without fear, and I abdicate without fear (vide sensation). I depart from the ministry with pure hands, and I return like Cincinnatus to my domestic gods. There shall I be found when my services are again needed for my country; and on all occasions I shall be ready to sacrifice my private convenience to the public good. (Cries of Bravo, bravo, c'est bien dit.) I regret not to have been able to serve my friends sufficiently, but it was the time, and not my inclination which failed me. This morning I could not conveniently give you all audience; this evening I thank heaven I am sufficiently powerful to do you some good (Exclamations of Notre généreux protecteur.) Theodore, bring me the plateau."

The young secretary brought forward a magnificent silver plateau, on which were heaped up not less than thirty brochettes. The most important of the whole was first chosen out and presented to Théodore, for whom the Comte felt a real affection, and who of the whole group was perhaps the only one who was truly devoted to the falling minister. The rest were divided among the guests, according to their merits and their claims. The appointments were of various sorts. There was a place of premier président; two places of councillor of state; a chef de division; six barons de tabac; two consularships; a line of omnibuses; a privilege of opening a theatre; the commission of a captain in the navy; and a crowd of others. Each one got something; and as each person obtained his prize, he debated with himself what was the best mode of finding out the new minister, in order to offer his services, now that all that was possible was obtained from his predecessor.—At last the night waxed heavy, and the guests retired.

The next day the Moniteur announced the resignation of the Comte M—. It did not, however, inform the public, as I have done, how he spent his LAST DAY IN OFFICE.

LORENZO DA PONTE.

The author of the libretto of Auber's and Meyerbeer's French Operas has realized, by his writings, a competent fortune. He resides in his chateau and lives on his rents. This is as it should be. Many of the libretto alluded to are very clever dramatic compositions, consequently the good fortune of their author is not immoderate. It, however, presents a remarkable contrast to the fate of the poor Italian Da Ponte, who wrote the texts of Mozart's Don Giovanni, Cimarosa's Martirio Segrato, Salieri's Azra, and other operas, which, for the space of fifty years, have maintained popularity throughout Europe. Da Ponte died last year at New-York, in a state of abject poverty. It was not, it is true, Da Ponte's talent which has conferred immortality on his writings, and diffused the words of his songs through the civilized world. Yet, nevertheless, who can learn, without feelings of pain, that the man who wrote Fin che dal vino—that glorious effusion of convivial mirth and joyousness of spirit, should have lingered for years in misery and have died for want. Da Ponte lived to the advanced age of ninety, and very shortly before his decease he wrote to one of his countrymen in Europe, a letter containing melancholy reflections on the state of destitution to which he was reduced in North America, where, for the space of thirty years, he had struggled to earn a subsistence as a teacher of the Italian language. This letter compares with the following sad words:—"Alas! had my fate led me to France instead of to America, I need not have feared becoming after my death food for the dogs, because I have not wherewith to buy a little bit of ground, to receive my bones, and rescue them from oblivion.—English paper."

SONG.

There's not a word thy lip hath breathed,
A look thine eyes hath given,
That is not shired within my heart,
Like to a dream of heaven!
There's not a spot where we have met,
A favourite flower or tree;
There's not a scene, by thee beloved,
That is not prized by me!

When'er I hear the linnets' song,
Or the blithe woodlark's lay,
Or mark upon the golden west,
The rosy clouds decay;
When'er I catch the breath of flowers,
Or musk from the tree,
Thought wings her way to distant bowers,
And mem'ry clings to thee.

WHAT I WOULD HAVE.

Give me old music—let me hear
The strains of days gone by;
Nor stay thy voice in kindly fear,
If to their tones my falling tear
Should make a mute reply.

The songs that lulled me on the breast
To sleep away the noon,
Sing on—sing on—I love them best;
There's witchery in the tones impressed
Of each familiar tune.

Give me old wine—its choicest store
Drawn from the shady bin;
Our vineyards will produce no more
Such rare strong juice they gave of yore,
As sparkling lies within.

This was my grandeur's chief delight,
When the day's chase was o'er;
Fill high—fill high—its treasures bright
Should sparkle on our board to-night,
Though we should drink no more.

Give me old friends—the tried, the true,
Who launch'd their barbs with me,
And all my joys and sorrows knew,
As chance's gains the pilgrims blew
Across the troubled sea.

Their memories are the same as mine;
Their love with life shall last;
Bring one, bring all, their smiles shall shine
Upon our good old song and wine,
Like sunbeams from the past.

MY DAY-BOOK.

True charity.—A poor old woman had orders from a butcher to come to his stall every market-day, for a portion of meat, which a benevolent individual (who desired to be unknown) gave regularly to several indigent industrious persons. One day she was receiving it as usual, and chanced to see Mr. B. (reputed to be equally rich and covetous) standing near, and observing the distribution of the meat; in a burst of grateful eloquence and virtuous indignation, she exclaimed, "Ah, how long will it be before you do as much for the poor! God bless the giver!" Mr. B. and the butcher exchanged a furtive glance, and the latter was interested afterwards to hear the former declare that he "then repaid the full reward of his gifts when he found that he could so well bear her reproaches." He was the benevolent individual.

The stature of the mind, like that of the body, sometimes stops growing for years, and again will shoot up, one knoweth not how, in a few short hours. Some characters are made in a moment.

People are all the summer learning to leave a door open, and the whole winter learning to close it.

Tradesmen often try to sell their goods by assuring customers that they "sell more of this article than any in their shop." Such assurance has always upon me the effect of warning me not to purchase a rat precisely like that of all my neighbours.

Some individuals are not rich enough to afford to be mean—the wealthy may indulge in being so with impunity.

Many a "good day's" work.—A popular physician declared that he believed he owed a great part of his success to his daily address, "How so?" asked a friend.

"I never," replied the doctor, "offend the tenuous plebeian by saying, 'good morning,' when he has dined, nor the conventional practitioner by saying, 'good afternoon' before he has done so."

"What then?"

"I say 'good-day,' and thrive by it."

Too many writers of fiction of the present day continue to draw characters, as copyists do their paintings, i. e. copying mere copies, and often even by formulae, till the whole is gross caricature, instead of that free, bold sketching from the life, which only can win popularity, and be secure of fame, when sketch and sketcher both have ceased to be caught but a memory of the days gone by.

The clouds.—Clouds are a mystery in our childish years, and happily not less so in after life.

Beautiful curtains between earth and heaven! sole instance ye of motion void of noise, of colour without mass, of form without compression! What is it elude ye round, and weaves your varied shapes, and tints your dazzling hues!

"Tranquil its spirit seems and fleeth slow, Down its very motion there to rest."—WILSON.

Yes, there is rest among your crowded folds, and we may note the delicate tinctures, and almost count their shades; an a breeze sweeps by, and the light fabric melts away, more softly than the foam floats on the summer-sea—than morning steals on night—than age succeeds to youth; but it were vain to multiply what it excels! There is but one flush on this neither earth, which can compete in softness, brilliancy, and beauty, with the summer's cloud—the radiant blush of woman as it glows and fades!

Castles in the air are the shuttlecocks of sixteen; as fast as one falls, another springs up in its place, and there is no brain so cool, no head so fully filled with the fashionable eloges of the hour, but some odd day in youth, a coach and six, or its equivalent, halt driven through it.

The tell-tale trees.—A facetious old gentleman rode one day along a road, which two lovers had previously perambled the same morning: the young lady was visiting in his house. When they met at dinner the damsel asked her host, "if he had had a pleasant ride."

"Extremely so, my dear; the trees whispered to me all the way."

"Indeed, sir! what could they say?"

"Why, my dear, the great oak outside the town told me, that you had paused under it to adjust your shawl; the elm-rod said that Sir A. had squeezed your hand the whole way it extends; the fir-belt betrayed the tender declaration, and the stunted little sycamore had heard the first kiss."

I have known the simplicity of childhood in persons of mature age, and again, the grossness of experience, in those who could not have learned ill.

THE AUTHOR AND THE PUBLISHER.

The following amusing hit at the recent difficulty between Captain Marrvatt and Mr. Colburn, is copied from a late number of the London Weekly Dispatch.

FATAL DUEL BETWEEN CAPTAIN MARRVATT AND HENRY COLBURN.

Our readers will perceive that Mr. Colburn had paid Captain Marrvatt seven hundred and fifty pounds for a new novel, upon an agreement duly signed, and delivered. The gallant captain, however, having received the money, threatened to deprive the publisher of the property, unless he came down with a further sum. The publisher moved the Vice-Chancery Court to restrain the gallant captain's proceeding, and in granting the restraint or injunction the Vice-Chancery Court denounced the gallant captain's conduct as dishonourable. This naturally led to a newspaper correspondence, and which, with such brave men, has naturally led to a fatal duel, of which we give the exclusive report. We have the copyright of the correspondence, which we now present to our readers.

"Sir—By the production of letters, affidavits, and various other documents, you have induced the Vice-Chancery Court to denounce me as a dishonourable man; I have, therefore, to call upon you for that satisfaction which every gentleman of honour has a right to demand of another. My friend Captain Dennis Dermott Patrick Larry O'Callaghan, of Artillery-place, Shooter's hill, will deliver you this letter. I have the honour, etc.

"H. Colburn, Esq."

"Mr. Marrvatt's Lodge, Southwark."

"Sir—A little unpleasant restraint imposed upon me by the vulgarity of the law obliges me to send you Captain Marrvatt's letter by the Twenpenny Post, and I request you will give me a verbal reference to any gentleman you may select for the arrangement of the ensuing fatal duel. I am, etc.

"To Henry Colburn, Esq."

"Great Marlborough-street."

"Sir—Were I to fight all the authors that fall under the castigation of Judges in Equity, or under the sentences of Police Magistrates, and the Courts of Criminal Law, I should have two duels on my hands every week throughout the year; I should soon be drilled like a sieve, and authors would then see through me, which they have never yet been able to do, and which I intend they never shall. You state that you are a lion, (you always take the lion's share), and that I am a lamb, and the fight would not be fair. You ought to shoot the Vice-Chancery. I am so busy in getting out of that account of yours, which in my letter to The Times, I denounced as dishonourable, that I shall have no time to affairs of honour for many months. I am, moreover, extremely anxious to settle the dispute relative to superiority as orators, statesmen, and literati, which has so long raged between the Marquis of Londonderry, and Colonel Sibthorp, and which the parties consider of national importance. For anything further I refer you to my friend, the Baron Von Killamsdorf Target Scheimer Boosliebebourg, of the Fire Brigade, Station-house, Shooter's Hill. I have the honour to be, etc.

"Captain F. Marrvatt, R. N."

"HENRY COLBURN."

"We, the two undersigned seconds, do unanimously agree that Mr. Colburn is not to be shot at like the cover of one of his own volumes, and that it is not reasonable to expect him to fight two duels a week; secondly, that Captain Marrvatt is bound to shoot the Vice-Chancery, one of the Masters in Chancery, or one of the six Clerks, or any officer of the court of which sufficiently high to entitle him to be shot by a gentleman; thirdly, that Mr. Colburn cannot attend to anything honourable for many months; fourthly, that the dispute between Lord Londonderry and Colonel Sibthorp is of greater national importance than shooting Captain Marrvatt; fifthly, we universally agree that were two dead shots and desperate duellists to leave the ground unkilld, we, the seconds, would be accused of not having loaded the pistols, and should either of them be killed that we should be sent to hard labour in a jail, for twelve months, and we are unanimously of opinion, first, that the extremely weak state of our mental and bodily health would incapacitate us for such labour, and that we should both severally and individually be unable to support our several wives and numerous families during so long an incarceration.

"Given under our hands and seals, etc.

"We, the undersigned, seconds, unanimously agree, without any debate, division, or dissentient voice, that by our union of courage, prudence, and gentlemanly feeling, we have been the means of most happily preventing a FATAL DUEL.

FROM THE JOURNAL OF A BALLOONIST.

Passing a cloud, I put out my hand and took a piece of it, and squeezed it like a sponge, and the water ran out. The sun went north about, but never set. At the distance of about fifty leagues above the earth, we saw a white swan sitting on the corner of a cloud. If we had had a gun we could have shot it. Passing by the moon, we saw a fellow selling land at auction. He wished us to give a bid, but we told him we had come to buy lands in the moon. We came across a comet, but it was asleep. It looked like a terrapin, but had a tail like a fox. We came near a hail-bank, and filled a bat to bring down with us. The hailstones were about as large as a pigeon's egg. A thousand miles above the earth we passed through a field of turkey-buzzards. This would seem to be their region, and accounts for the circumstance, that no one has ever found a nest of one of these. These rookeries are out of sight in the atmosphere. As we approached one of the heavenly bodies it appeared like an island. We struck upon a planet, but Blanchard got out and pushed off the balloon. We supposed it to be Mercury, as we heard orators haranguing, and a multitude of tongues. There were marriages going on in Venus, and in Mars we heard the drums beat. We meant to have a pull at one of Saturn's rings, but we were blown off the coast, and found ourselves in the latitude of Herschel. Provisions failing, we thought proper to shape our course towards the earth again. The first thing we saw was the forest of Ardennes, which appeared like a shamrock. The Pyrenean mountains seemed like a bed of barley; and the Atlantic Ocean about as large as Loch Swilley. Within a furlong of the earth, Blanchard gave me the parachute, and I came down.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

HYMN.—BY EZEKIEL ELLIOTT.

Nurse of the Pilgrim Sires who sought,
Beyond th' Atlantic foam,
For fearless truth and honest thought,
A refuge and a home!
Who would not be of them or thee
A not unworthy son,
That bears, amid the chained or free,
The name of Washington?

Cradle of Shakespeare, Milton, Knox!
King-shaming Cromwell's throne!
Home of the Russells, Watts, and Lockes!
Earth's greatest are thine own;
And shall thy children forge base chains
For men that would be free?
No! by the Elliots, Hampdens, Vanes,
Pym, Sidney, yet to be!

No!—for the blood which kings have gorged
Hath made their victims wise,
While every lie that Fraud hath forged,
Veils wisdom from his eyes.
But time shall change the despot's mood;
And Mind is mightiest then,
When turning evil into good,
And monsters into men.

If round the soul the chains are bound
That hold the world in thrall—
If tyrants laugh when men are found
In brutal fray to fall—
Lord! let not Britain arm her hands,
Her sister states to ban;
But bless through her all other lands,
The family of Man.

For freedom if thy Hampden fought,
For peace if Falkland fell;
For peace and love if Bentham wrote,
And Burns sang wildly well—
Let knowledge, strongest of the strong,
Bid hate and discord cease;
Be this the burden of her song—
"Love, Liberty, and Peace!"

Then, Father, will the nations all,
As with the sound of seas,
In universal festival,
Sing words of joy like these:
Let each love all, and all be free,
Receiving as they give;
Lord!—Jesus died for Love and Thee!
So let thy children live!

ONE'S MOTIVE.

Around the idea of one's mother the mind of man clings with fond affection. It is the first thought stamped upon our infant hearts, when yet soft and capable of receiving the most profound impressions, and all the after feelings are more or less light in comparison. Our passions and our wilfulness may lead us far from the object of our filial love; we may become wild, headstrong, and angry at her counsel or opposition; but when death has stilled her monitory voice, and nothing but calm memory remains to recapitulate her virtues and good deeds, affection, like a flower beaten to the ground by a rude storm, raises up her head and smiles amidst her tears. Round that idea, as we have said, the mind clings with fond affection; and even when the earlier period of our loss forces memory to tion; and even when the earlier period of our loss forces memory to the image of our departed parent with a garland of graces, and beauties, and virtues, which we doubt not that she possessed.

MOURNING FOR THE DEAD.

I saw a pale mourner stand bending over the tomb, and his tears fell fast and often. As he raised his humid eyes to heaven, he cried, "My brother!—oh! my brother!" A sage passed that way, and said "For whom dost thou mourn?" "One," replied he, "whom I did not sufficiently love while living; but whose inestimable worth I now feel." "What wouldst thou do, if he were restored to thee?" The mourner replied, that he would never offend him by an unkind word, but would take every occasion to show his friendship, if he could but come back to his fond embrace. "Then waste not thy time in useless grief," said the sage, "but if thou hast friends, go and cherish the living, remembering that they will, one day, be dead also?"

FAMILY EXPENSES.

Archdeacon Paley, in a familiar table discourse touching upon the expenses brought by original sin upon husbands and fathers in the way of cambric and satins, says "I never let my women, (be it understood he spoke of Mrs. Archdeacon Paley and the Misses Paley,) I never let my women, when they shop, take credit; I always make them pay ready money. Sir, ready money, is such a check upon the imagination!"

PERSUASION OF KNOWLEDGE.

Boccaccio was thirty-five years old when he commenced his studies in polite literature. Yet he became one of the three great masters of the Tuscan dialect, Dante and Petrarch being the other two. There are many among us ten years younger than Boccaccio, who are dying of ennui and regret that they are not educated to a taste for literature, supposing that they are too old.

When the heart is offered at the altar, a fire from heaven sometimes comes and consumes it, in token that it is accepted.

VERRES ON A PAINTING BY DANIEL MACNEE, R. S. A.

THE BURNSIDE.

A bright and joyous vision
Of summer leaves and skies!
Where lovely sights and sounds are met
In blended harmonies.

The birds that warble overhead,
In pure and sinless mirth,
Are pouring out a stream of song
Upon the happy earth.

The hidden water murmurs on—
A low and pleasant tone—
Refreshing with its breeze-like flow,
The silent air of June:

While o'er its bank the wild rose stoops,
And wears a deeper hue,
Blushing, within the crystal depth,
Her lovely face to view.

But sweeter than the red wild rose,
And brighter than the sky,
Are the graceful pair that stand beneath
That greenwood canopy.*

One with her locks of snowied jet
And gently downcast face,
Is bending to her humble task
With Nature's matchless grace.

But lovelier still that youthful form,
Above whose gentle head
Scarce fourteen summers blossoming,
The sportive wind hath shed.

Whose little fairy foot seems made
To press no ruder thing,
Than early bursting violets
That gem the fields in spring.

Oh, lovely one! while thus I look
Upon thy beauty rare,
Though mortal eye has seldom seen
A thing so pure and fair,

I cannot deem thee all unreal;
And half unconsciously,
A thousand wishes in my heart
Are rising up for thee.

If I could charm thy future path
Through life's untrodden way,
It should be strewn with roses bright,
And lit with sunbeams gay.

Softly should flow the winds on thee,
Softly should beam the sun,
And calm as yonder peaceful stream
Thy life's pure current run.

It may not be!—to mortal mind
No power like this is given;
Yet, sweet one, we may hope for thee
The sheltering care of heaven.

For there thy innocence will find,
Than charm or fairy spell,
A surer guard from every ill;
Young Naad, fare thee well!

ORIGINAL HISTORICAL SKETCHES.

A LEGEND OF GRANADA.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

"True revenge
Is patient as the watchful alchymist;
Sagacious as the bloodhound on the scent,
Secret as death!"—Yezzo.

THE last strongholds of Granada were yielding before the well-directed assaults of the Castilian forces. One after one the defences of the Moors had been prostrated, till at last that once haughty people had shut themselves up in the walls of their citadel, hopeless and inactive. But among them there was one unconquerable spirit, whose relentless defiance of his Christian enemies seemed to increase as his ability to cope with them diminished. In all the sallies, which were made from the gates of the besieged city, Almanzor distinguished himself by the fury and intrepidity with which he spurred to the encounter. Wherever the carnage was deadliest, there might he be seen, red with slaughter, flashing through the smoke of the combat, more like an invulnerable demon than a human being, whom steel could wound and exertion could weary.

It was whispered, even among his own companions, that his country's wrongs and danger did not alone impel him to this display of daring and inveterate hostility. At a time, when the prospects of the Moors were less desperate, Almanzor, in a successful incursion against one of the mountain fortresses of the Christians, had seized and borne away Maria de Quexada, a Spanish maiden of singular beauty and loveliness. However unworthy may have been the designs by which he was originally actuated in this deed of violence, yet the very influence of the charms which tempted him soon changed his relation of a tyrant to that of a slave. He sued for the love of his captive with humility and gentleness. A change seemed to come over his rugged nature when in her presence; and, for a time, the scorn with which she received his advances, elicited from him no demonstration of anger or rebuke. The fierce, camp-bred warrior, for the first moment in his life, knew what it was to love, and with him the passion absorbed every faculty of his soul.

* This is a most exquisite picture. It represents two lovely maidens under a tree; the older, in a Scottish shortgown, open at the neck, and showing a beautiful unstained skin, is washing very vigorously, while the younger (a portrait of the artist's eldest daughter) is pouring water into a tub. You can conceive nothing more admirable than the painting of the golden locks, fair shoulders, and small, delicate feet.

The patient forbearance with which he met the repulses of Maria de Quexada, of course was not destined to continue for ever. Finding that his persevering attentions, and his respectful attachment, awoke no corresponding emotion in the heart of his captive, he began to assume a stern and menacing demeanour. One evening, as the maiden was about retiring to rest in the small pavilion assigned to her in the Moorish camp, the curtain was withdrawn, and Almanzor entered. The precepts of the Koran had plainly been broken that day, for he was insolent with wine, and there was in his manner none of the martial dignity which usually distinguished him.

"Thy fears shrewdly interpret to thee my errand," he said, as he approached the shrinking and terrified maiden: "I have borne too long with thy coyness, my pretty infidel; but I will submit to it no longer."

Had there been a single weapon of destruction within reach, gladly would Maria have grasped it to defend her from the pollution of the Moslem's touch, even though to do it she were compelled to reddens the steel with her own life-blood. But Almanzor had been careful to deprive her of the jewelled dagger, which she had once aimed against his heart; and even the golden arrow, that was wont to adorn her black hair, had been removed.

"Flutter not, dove of Paradise," he exclaimed—"I love thee, and, by the Prophet, thou shalt be mine!"

"Not living, miscreant!" exclaimed the high-spirited maiden, and, seizing the small spice-lamp which burned at the foot of her couch, she boldly applied it to the light drapery around her. But before it could ignite, the clang of trumpets, the shrieks of surprised men, the shouts of combatants, burst in one mingled clamour, like the voice of an earthquake, upon the ear.

"To arms! the Spaniard!" cried Almanzor, dashing from the pavilion.

"Holy virgin! it may be a rescue!" said Maria, throwing off the loose flowing robe, from the foot of which the eager flame was rising, and threatening in another moment to scathe with fire her delicate limbs and beautiful proportions. But it caught the light muslin festoons of the pavilion, and the maiden had scarcely time to throw a light garment about her person, and a mantilla over her shoulders, before she was driven by a furious volume of smoke and flame into the open air. The first object she saw was a cavalier on horseback, riding impetuously toward the scene of the conflagration, while, on another side, a party of Moors and Christians were engaged in a sanguinary and tumultuous encounter. The steed was not checked in his impetuous career, until the maiden felt the breath of his nostrils upon her forehead, and then the rider drew up so suddenly as to bring the docile animal almost upon his haunches.

It was Juan d'Aguilar, the affianced lover of Maria de Quexada. The Spaniards, after a slight skirmish, retired to their own quarters, and Almanzor was left wild with rage and anguish at the loss of the maiden, to gain whose affections he would have considered no sacrifice too great. In all his subsequent encounters, he fought, as has already been mentioned, with an expectation that no danger could allay or oppose. But the foe, whom he chiefly sought to engage, among the young cavaliers of the army of Ferdinand and Isabella, was Juan d'Aguilar; but in this, circumstances did not chance to favour his wishes.

The Moors had retreated to their last rampart. There was no hope for Granada. Almanzor in vain tried to rally a band of heroes, with whom once more to brave the Christians. Despair was in the hearts of all the Moslem garrison—famine and sickness were in their looks. There was no hope for Granada.

It was a morning of sunshine and verdure. A detachment of the Spanish army, under the command of Juan d'Aguilar, lay encamped, a mile or two from the besieged city. Its minarets and groves glittered dazzlingly before them in the clear white atmosphere. In the rear rose the blue Alpujarras, lined in majestic beauty against the horizon. The encampment of Juan d'Aguilar was no unworthy feature in that scene of beauty. His various tents were sumptuously ornamented with the richest tapestry, and their pinacles streamed with pennons of every hue and device. The central pavilion, supported by columns of ivory and shining in purple and crimson silk, with golden trimmings and embroideries, was occupied by ladies, who had come to visit their husbands, their lovers, or their kinsmen, now that all danger from the attacks of the Moors was considered at an end. Maria de Quexada was there, the gayest of the gay, with song and jest, her heart buoyant with hope, and her eyes flashing with delight. The long protracted war was fast drawing to an assured conclusion; and soon were to be celebrated the nuptials of the maiden with one of the bravest and best of the young nobility of Spain. Juan was constantly by her side, and his devotion frequently called forth the good-natured raillery of the ladies, who, perchance, might not have been so enviably favoured in their suitors. There was music, and dancing, a d d feasting throughout the encampment, and many were tempted to exclaim, "Oh that life were all like this bright and beautiful summer day!"

The cry of a distant sentry was suddenly borne from mouth to mouth until it reached the ears of Juan. It announced that a deserter from the Moors brought intelligence of great importance, which he desired to communicate to the commander.

"Give orders for his admission to our presence, but first see that he bears no concealed weapon," said Juan; and he seated himself in front of his pavilion, while around him gathered the officers of his army, and at the back of his chair stood Maria de Quexada, with the ladies of her train.

The stranger entered with a quick, imperious step. He had discarded the Moorish turban and costume, and stood forth with his head bare; and a red mantle, more like a Roman toga than a cloak, wrapped around his vest of mail, and reaching below his knees.

"Holy virgin! it is Almanzor," gasped forth Maria, trembling violently as she spoke.

"There is no cause for alarm," said Juan; "he bears no weapon in his belt, and if he did, have I not my good sword to encounter it!" Then, turning to the Moor, he said:—"Tell us, Almanzor, the purpose of thy visit. Bringest thou terms of surrender? If so, thou mayest return; for, nothing but unconditional submission will we accept."

"I come on no such errand," replied Almanzor, in tones so deep and sepulchral, that all who heard them were startled. "I have been discarded by my people as the instigator of their misfortunes, and I have come here to abjure my nation and my faith. I acknowledge myself your vassal and a Christian."

The sneer which the speaker threw into the last word, passed unnoticed. Expressions of amazement and congratulation were heard on all sides. Lopez de Bovidilla, and many other young officers, with Alvaro de Belalzar and the friars who were present, crowded around the Moorish apostate, shook hands with him, and received his tenderest embraces in return.

As soon as silence was in a measure restored, Juan descended from the platform where he had been sitting, and said:—"We well know thy bravery, Almanzor, and thy high repute; but wert thou the lowest of Moorish subjects, we could not but hail thy conversion to the true faith. Accept my greeting, and may thy Christian piety equal thy Moslem courage."

Almanzor eagerly seized the proffered hand of Juan d'Aguilar, and raised it to his lips. But, as if not content with even this extraordinary demonstration of affection, he threw his arms around Juan's neck, and planted the most fervid kisses upon his cheek and mouth. Hardly could the Spaniard detach himself from the clinging embraces of the Moor. But, when he succeeded in freeing himself, he was struck with the change in the appearance of the latter. The Moslem's complexion had grown livid and horrible to behold; his blood-shot eyes glared like crimson meteors; his frame shook, and his lips, which twitched convulsively, gave forth a dreadful smile. A frantic laugh succeeded; and lifting his bare arms on high, Almanzor shrieked forth: "Detested infidels! ye are my victims! A mortal contagion is in my lips. Look, look on this burning brow, these starting eyeballs, these strained and distorted sinews! Ha, ha! thus, thus must ye die, even as I die now!"

He fell writhing upon the ground. A cry of horror rose from the Spaniards, for then were they made aware that it was the plague with which they had been contaminated.

Auber's new opera, "The Lake of the Fairies." The Duchess of Palmyra and her jewels.—Monument to Malibon.

THE new opera, entitled "Le Lac des Fées," by the celebrated Auber, continues to attract immense houses at the Académie Royale. Scribe and Mélière are the writers of the libretto. The story, in many of its incidents, bears a remarkable resemblance to Drake's "Culprit Pay." On the first night of the new opera, the theatre was crammed to the ceiling by the élite of Paris. The music is exceedingly good; more delightful, if possible, than that of "La Bayadère," and "Fia Diavolo," by the same composer. The scenery, machinery, dresses, and decorations, with which it is produced, are truly wonderful. What a speculation might be made by one of your New-York managers, if he were early in the field in bringing this piece before the American public.

"Le Lac des Fées" is of course a fairy tale, and this it is:—A party of German students wander about the margin of the fairy lake, in the middle of that classic ground for tales of magic and hobgoblinism, the Hartz mountains. One of them (Albert) is warned by a goatherd not to disturb the revels of the fairies, the goatherd being a fairy. Albert sets this request at defiance, and he does himself, and witnesses the revels of the fairies, who, in fact, are taking the luxury of the cold bath. Albert has had a dream of a female, of whose shadowy or imaginary form he is become enamoured. On the conclusion of the revels, the very subject of his dream appears as the fairy Zella, and in a scene with her he learns that the veil in which she is shrouded, is the secret of her immortality, as the hair of Sampson was that of his strength. Albert having a decided taste for mortal flesh and blood, in preference to a being composed of moonbeams and gossamer, steals the veil; and his immortal love, reversing the way of all flesh, puts off her immortality, and seeks for service in the house of a female innkeeper, named Marguerite, who is also in love with Albert. A certain night-hunter named Ro. dolphe is a lover of Marguerite's, and returning from his sports, calls at the Auberge, where he sees the cideant fairy, and falls in love with her also. Now plenty of embarrassments arise. Marguerite is jealous and dismisses Zeila, who is about to enter the service of Rodolphe, when Albert in some measure disentangles himself by borrowing money from a Jew at the price of his liberty and blood as the penalty, if the bond be not discharged at the day. Rodolphe purchases the bond of the Jew, and finding that Albert will be able to pay him, employs a thief to pick his pocket, and then consigns Albert to a dungeon, and is about to execute him, when his life is saved by Zeila's promising to marry his and her persecutor, Rodolphe. This consummation is avoided very cleverly. Marguerite has stolen the veil of immortality from Albert, and as the wedding procession is going to church, she places it upon Zeila, who again becomes immortal, and fairly and literally flies away in the sight of the audience.

But though Zeila has again become immortal, she has not lost her passion for Albert, neither has Albert forgotten his fairy-love; he is about to commit le de se when Zeila, who has obtained permission from the Queen of the Fairies to become once more mortal, descends and saves him, and the opera ends it should do.

Auber has decidedly made a hit; the music has more originality than most of his operas possess, and he has ventured in this really excellent piece to depend on his vocal more than his instrumental music. Having only heard the opera once, and being excited by the gorgeous scenery and the most wonderful and best got-up spectacle I ever beheld, I perhaps may judge too favorably of the music; but at present it strikes me that Auber in the Lac des Fées, has got into a new and superior style. There were both arias and concerted pieces, which bore such a stamp of originality about them, that they will not easily be forgotten. The singing of Duprez was glorious, and he received perpetual testimonies of the satisfaction of the audience. The performance lasted nearly five hours!

A clever imposition has been recently played off here by a female swindler. Some weeks since, the well-known jewellers, Morize and Vatar, were honoured with the visit of a new customer in the shape of a lady, about thirty years old, dressed with the utmost fashion, covered with trinkets, and who alighted from a splendid carriage, leaning on the arms of a huge chasseur and a lacquy of no less magnificence. The élégante was graciously pleased to say that she had heard of the beautiful combs à la Duchesse, of their invention, which were to figure so conspicuously in the approaching exhibition, and that she and her family wished to be the first to wear them at an impending ball; she was graciously added, that she would take six boxes with her, of which four should be selected, and the two others returned when she sent for a valuable ring which she wished to have cleaned. Upon this the great unknown deposited a ring worth forty-eight pounds, and left the shop with the six peignes à la Duchesse. In the evening a servant called with the two combs, and received the ring, telling Mr. Morize that his mistress, the Duchesse de Palmire, wished him to call next day at No. 102, Rue St. Lazare, as she had some trinkets to order of him. To Rue St. Lazare he duly repaired, when he was assured that no Duchesse de Palmire was known there, though a queen of that name had reigned many years ago in the vicinity of Arabia Deserta.

THE STAGE.

WHILE quietly seated in my Spanish easy-chair, sending up cloud after cloud of smoke from my consuming cigar, my thoughts strayed from one theme to another till they dwelt on matters theatrical. At a moment like the present, when the whole division of theatres is "in the full tide of successful experiment," and the caecothies scribendi tends to dramatic productions, it is to me, at least, a cause of deep sorrow, that your whomever correspondent Cox is not here to give us some of his keen and witty critiques; or that in the multitude of pens, no one is found every way worthy to be his successor.

I find myself somewhat mysteriously possessed of several epistles on this subject, which, with your leave, I will transcribe for your columns, surmising that the idea is by no means original. The first comes from the "scenery of the Park." How the scenery could induce any one to write its tale I know not, but will leave others to conjecture.

MR. COLLEY CIBBER, Jun. Park Theatre, two o'clock, a. m.

RESPECTED SIR—We, that is the scenery, have been for a long time desirous of finding some devotee of the Park, who would read, and transmit to the world, our tale of woe; and from a long personal acquaintance, we have selected you as the man. We have all been long in our present avocations, and seem now destined to wear out the term of our lives in the service of "old Drury." This, perhaps, we should not regret, but finding that some of us cannot bear another coat of paint, and must consequently soon depart to "that bourne whence no traveller returns," we cannot consent "to shuffle off this mortal coil" without freeing ourselves from several severe imputations under which we feel we must labour. Our first complaint is on a delicate subject—our age. We are most of us old, venerable scenes. Some of us caves and dungeons are coeval with the theatre, and will readily be pardoned for being sensitive when charged with adolescence. Such is the fact, and the unthinking prompter has us weekly placarded as new scenery, etc.; had this been done but once or twice, we would have remained silent, but the continued repetition is more than we can bear. True, Mr. Evers and assistants do occasionally give us a touch with a brush, and the flats and wings for rooms have a picture put up or taken down, and a chair represented balancing on one leg, is sometimes placed on two; so, too, the fairy scenes do get now and then a new sprinkling of tin foil, and the trees are made more green and summer-like, but this does not make us new.

Another ground of complaint is the multifarious characters we are made to assume; yet even Mr. Richings is surpassed in this particular. The flats and wings all do double duty, being on one side palaces, libraries, etc.; and on the other cottages, woods, etc.; this, too, we might endure, as any regard should show the state of health in the matter of acclimation—but no, the prompter blows his whistle, and away we go from Dan to Sheba; now in merry England, now the burning south; our nationality is gone, and we are subject to inspection by Moors, Turks, French, Spanish, Danes, Scotch, Irish, English, and the infernal regions. Look at our streets—they are represented as in all manner of climes; the miserable there wanders, homeless, condemned, rejected, amid the same scenes, where Shylock holds his way. Hamlet talks of our being "Eli-nore," and some cut-throat rascal calls us by some Italian name. The tale of Cyprus citizens in the play—the city of London in the face—in short, wherever, by direction of the prompter, the actor ambulates a street, we are that street; and by the way, Mr. Cibber, do we not come under the purview of the street-inspector?

Our dungeons are a much abused site of scenes, and are made the vehicles of most villainous anachronisms. In a prison wanted in Rome or Greece, we are the prison; time has effected very little change in prisons since the earliest periods, if our appearance is any authority; and we confess we cannot see why the philanthropist Howard should have made such an outcry about prisons, or why when some unfortunate wight is locked within our gloomy walls he does not quietly wait off, for though the jailer and others generally come on the stage through a door, fastened with chains, still they invariably show the most supreme contempt for stone walls by walking through them off at the wings.

But we weary you, perhaps, and so we will close, with the hope that if any thing can be done in our behalf, it will be done speedily. With esteem, etc. we remain your obedient servants,

THE SCENERY AT THE PARK.

I will withhold the other letters till next week, with the hope that the care of the unfortunate scenery will be duly considered. c. c. r.

MISCELLANEOUS REMINISCENCES.

THE MUSICIAN OF AUGSBURG.

THREE lived, at some former time, in the city of Augsburg, a musician whose name was Nieser. There was no kind of musical instrument that he could not fashion with his own hands, nor was there any upon which he could not perform indifferently well. He was also a composer; and, although none of his compositions are now extant, tradition informs us that his reputation in that, as well as in the other departments of the arts, not only filled the city, but extended throughout the whole circle of Suabia. Other causes contributed to swell his fame: he possessed great wealth—acquired, it was sometimes whispered, not in the most creditable way; and the only inheritor of it was a daughter, whose beauty and innocence might well have been deemed dowry sufficient, without the prospective charms of her father's possessions. Esther was indeed most celebrated for the softness of her blue eyes, and the sweetness of her smile, and her many kind actions, as old Nieser was for his wealth, and the excellence of his stringed instruments, and the paucity of his good deeds.

Now, in spite of the wealth of old Nieser, and the respect which he had obtained for him, and the misadventure which he enjoyed, one sore grievance pressed heavily upon him. Esther, his only child, the sole representative of a long line of musicians, could scarcely distinguish one tune from another; and it was a source of marvellous anguish to Nieser, that he should have behind him no heir to that talent which he held in almost equal estimation with his riches. But, as Esther grew up, he began to entertain a glimmer of hope, that if he could not be the father, he might live to be the grandfater, of a race of musicians. No sooner, therefore, was she of a marriageable age, than he formed the singular resolution of bestowing her, with a dowry of two hundred thousand florins, upon whomsoever should compose the best sonata, and perform the principal part in it. This determination he immediately published throughout the city, appointing a day for the competition; and he was heard to affirm, with a great oath, that he would keep his promise, though the sonata should be composed by the demon, and played by the fiend's own fingers.

No sooner was the determination of Nieser the musician known in Augsburg, than the whole city was in a ferment. Many who had never dared to raise their thoughts so high, now unexpectedly found themselves competitors for the hand of Esther; for, independently of Esther's charms and Nieser's fortunes, professional reputation was at stake; and where this was wanting, vanity supplied its place. In short, there was not a musician in Augsburg who was not urged, from one motive to another, to enter the lists for the prize of beauty. Morning, noon, and night, the streets of Augsburg were filled with melodious discord. From every open window proceeded the sound of embryo sonatas: nor was any other subject spoken of throughout the city than the approaching competition, and its probable issue.

But, amidst all this commotion, there was one who shared not in the general excitation. This was Franz Gortlingen, who, with little more musical talent than Esther possessed one of the best hearts and handsomest persons in Suabia. Franz loved the daughter of the musician; and she, on her part, would rather at any time have heard her own name, with some endearing word prefixed to it, whispered by Franz, than listened to the finest sonata that was ever composed between the Rhine and the Oder. Nieser's decree was therefore of sad import to both Esther and Franz.

It was now the day next to that upon which the event was to be decided, and Franz had taken no step towards the accomplishment of his wishes: and how was it possible that he should? He never composed a bar of music in his life: to play a simple air on the harpsichord exhausted all the talent he was master of. Late in the evening Franz walked out of his lodging, and descended into the street. The shops were all shut, and the streets entirely deserted; but lights were still visible in some of the open windows; and from these came sadly upon the ear of Gortlingen the sound of instruments in preparation for the event which was to deprive him of Esther. Sometimes he stopped and listened, and he could see the faces of the musicians lighted up with pleasure at the success of their endeavours, and in anticipation of their triumph.

Gortlingen walked on and on, until at length he found himself in a part of the city which, although he had lived in Augsburg all his life, he never recollected to have seen before. Behind him the sounds of music had all died away, before him he heard the low rush of the river, and mingled with it there came at times upon the ear faint tones of wondrous melody. One solitary and far distant glimmer showed that the reign of sleep was not yet universal; and Gortlingen conjectured, from the direction of the sound, that some anxious musician was still at his task, in preparation for the morrow. Gortlingen went onwards, and as he drew near to the light, such glorious bursts of harmony swelled upon the air, that, unskilled as he was in music, the tones had a spell in them which more and more awakened his curiosity as to who might be their author. Quickly and noiselessly he went forward until he reached the open window, whence the sound proceeded. Within, an old man sat at a harpsichord, with a manuscript before him; his back was towards the window, but an antique and tarnished mirror showed to Gortlingen the face and gestures of the musician.

Gortlingen could at first scarcely contain his indignation at the supposition that this little old man should dare to enter the lists as one of Esther's suitors; for he could not doubt that he, like the others he had seen, was preparing for the competition; but he looked and listened, gradually his anger was quelled in contemplating the strangely mild countenance of the musician, and his attention fixed by the beauty and uncommon character of the music; and at length, at the conclusion of a brilliant passage, the performer perceived that he had a sharer in his demonstrations of pleasure, for Gortlingen, in his unrestrained applause, quite drowned the gentler exclamations of the mild old man. Immediately the musician rose, and throwing open the door, "Good evening, master Franz," said he; "sit down, and tell me how you like my sonata, and if you think it likely to win Nieser's daughter." There was something so beauteous in the old man's expression, and so pleasing in his address, that Gortlingen felt no enmity, and he sat down and listened to the player. "You like the sonata, then?" said the old man, when he had concluded it.

"Alas!" replied Gortlingen, "would that I were able to compose such a one!" "Hearken to me," said the old man: "Nieser swore a sinful oath, that he would bestow his daughter upon whomsoever might compose the best sonata, even although it were composed by the demon, and played by the fiend's own fingers." These words were not spoken unheard: they were borne on the night winds, and whispered through the forests, and struck on the ear of them who sat in the dim valley; and the demon laugh and shout broke loud upon the calm of midnight, and were answered from the lone depths of a hundred hills; but the good heard also; and though they pined not, they pined Esther and Gortlingen. Take this roll; go to the hall of Nieser: a stranger will compete for the prize, and two others will seem to accompany him: the sonata which I have given to you is the same that he will play; but mine has a virtue of its own: watch an opportunity, and substitute mine for his!"

When the old man had concluded this extraordinary advice, he took Gortlingen by the hand, and led him by some unknown ways to one of the gates of the city, and there left him.

At sunset next evening Nieser's hall was to be thrown open to the competitors. As the hour approached, all the spectators of Augsburg were seen hurrying towards the house, with rolls of paper in their hands, and accompanied by others, carrying different musical instruments, while crowds were collected at Nieser's gate to see the competitors pass in. Gortlingen, when the hour arrived, taking his roll, soon found himself at Nieser's gate, where many who were standing knew him, and greeted him, because of the love he bore the musician's daughter; and they whispered one to another, "What does Franz Gortlingen with a roll in his hand: surely he means not to enter the lists with the musicians?" When Gortlingen entered the hall, he found it full of the competitors and amateurs, friends of Nieser's, who had been invited to be present. Nieser sat in his chair of judgment at the upper end of the room, flanked by his wife, and a young man, who was to act as a judge. Gortlingen made his way through the hall, with his roll of music in his hand, a smile passed over the faces of the musicians, who all knew each other, and who also knew that he could scarcely execute a march, much less a sonata, even if he could compose one. Nieser, when he saw him, smiled from the same cause; but when Esther's eye met his, if she smiled at all, it was a faint and sorrowful smile of recognition, and soon gave place to the tear that stole down her cheek.

"Let the trial begin," said Nieser: "I swear that I will bestow my daughter, who now sits by my side, with a dowry of two hundred thousand florins, upon whomsoever shall have composed the best sonata, and shall perform the principal part." "And you will keep your oath!" said the stranger, advancing in front of Nieser. "I will keep my oath," said the musician of Augsburg, "though the sonata should be composed by the demon, and played by the fiend's own fingers." There was a dead silence: a distant shout and faint laughter fell on the ear like an echo. The stranger alone smiled: every one else shuddered.

The first lot fell upon the stranger, who immediately took his place and unrolled his sonata. Two others, whom no one had observed before, took the r instruments in the hands, and placed themselves beside him, all waiting the signal to begin. Every eye was fixed upon the performers. The sign was given; and as the three musicians raised their heads to glance at the music, it was perceived with horror that the three faces were alike. A universal shudder swept through the assembly: all was silent confusion; no one spoke or whispered to his neighbour; but each wrapt himself up in his cloak and stole away; and soon there was none left except the three who still continued the sonata, and Gortlingen, who had not forgotten the injunction of the old man.

Gortlingen stood by the performers, and as they approached what he supposed to be the conclusion, he so subtly substituted his own sonata that lay before them. A dark scowl passed over the face of the three, and a distant wail fell upon the ear like an echo.

Some hours after midnight the benign old man was seen to lead Esther and Gortlingen out of the hall; but the sonata still proceeded. Years rolled on. Esther and Gortlingen were wedded, and in due course of time died; but the strange musicians still labour at their task, and old Nieser still sits in his judgment-chair, waiting time to the sonata. When it ends—if it ever shall end—Esther will be far beyond the reach of the wicked vow made by the musician of Augsburg.

NOURRI, THE CELEBRATED SINGER.

Adolph Nourrit was born at Montpellier, in March, 1802. He was still very young when he was brought to Paris. It was at St. Barthe that he received his literary education, and he acquired at the same time the elements of that art, of which he was one day to be the ornament. He did not, however, much occupy himself with music, but for his own recreation, as his father at that time wished him to devote himself to a commercial life.

On leaving college he was placed in the office of an assurance company. He discharged his punctuality and intelligence the duties of his situation, and made a very good clerk. The discovery of his dramatic powers did not produce the effect which might have been anticipated, of disgusting him with his official noviciate.

It was on the tenth of September, 1821, at the age of nineteen, that Adolph Nourrit made his debut on the boards of the Académie Royale de Musique, in the part of Phéas, in the Iphigénie en Tauris of Gluck.

The stock pieces of this theatre consisted at that period of the chef-d'œuvre of the great master just named, and of those of Sacchini, Piccini, Salieri, Castei, Grétry, and Spontini. Nourrit assumed successively all the principal characters.

From his father Nourrit had learned the traditions of the old lyric school, and by Garcia he was enabled to comprehend and to embody the inspirations of modern composers. Thus he was able, with like success, to appear as Abel, Cassandre, Néocles, Aménophis, Count Orly, and Arnald, and still more recently in La Muette, Gustave, Le Dru et la Bayadère, Le Philire, Robert, Don Juan, Le Juive, Les Huguenots et Sidrala.

With what prodigious intelligence—what versatility of talent, must have been endowed, who could successively embody so many traits of character, so striking and so opposite—who could pass from the simplicity of the peasant of the Philire to the chivalric Robert—from Masaniello, the man of the people—one moment sublime, and the next a madman, and intoxicated with power—and then to Eleanore, the Jew, that type of religious exaltation, united to habits the most sordid and sentiments the most hateful!

The impression made by Nourrit on those who witnessed his performances will not soon be forgotten. At present they are recalled with fond enthusiasm. He has made popular the melodies of Schubert, that music, so melancholy, was admirably in accordance with his meditative character. He was a poet, a literary man, a philosopher, and a man of taste. During ten years he was the presiding genius of the opera: nothing was done without consulting him. Each libretto writer, each composer, each chorus-master, each decorator, was anxious to have the benefit of his advice. It is known that he arranged the effects in La Sylphide for Mlle. Taglioni; and it is understood that this is not the only ballet which he assisted to produce. Poetry relieved his studies, and soothed his weary spirit.

Nourrit might have remained at the opera, but, after having by his sincere advice brought Duprez there, he thought fit to resign to the younger the scene which the latter had only aspired to share with him. What frightful injustice, what ingratitude, must he have experienced before he adopted this painful resolution! The evening on which he took his leave was as brilliant as it was sad; the separation was that of a much esteemed friend, or of a well-beloved son. To see him, so young, but in the full possession of matured talent, made every one shrink from the thought of a definitive separation; and each, in a low tone, instead of bidding him adieu, seemed to call on him to stay.

Duprez appeared as Wilhelm Tell. He obtained immense success. This was just; but the public and the critics did not support them. They indulged in comparisons as unfair as they were injurious towards Nourrit. They filled his heart with despair. The late idol was broken without pity and without regret. The unfortunate artist felt within himself, from that moment, the germ of the malady which has terminated his life. It was in vain he endeavored to shake off his sadness, amidst the plaudits which he gained in the principal theatres of France. His spirits failed him, and in the course of his journeyings he was seized with a severe illness at Toulouse.

Soon after he set off for Italy. It was to the theatre of Naples, still echoing with the triumph of his rival that he now went to claim that sympathy and those honours which were the necessary aliment of his life.

The censor there interdicted the performance of Polyuctus, an opera taken by him from the chef d'œuvre of Corneille, and in which Donizetti had composed the part intended for his debut. The overbearing conduct of Barbaga, the impresario of the theatre St. Carlos, wounded his pride, and offended his self-love. Accustomed to respect and deference from all who approached the opera, his wishes had been commands. He suffered, and suffered horribly from the different situation in which he found himself at this part of his career. Thus, all the letters from Naples agreed in saying, that a black melancholy had seized on him, which he never could shake off, and his situation caused the most intense uneasiness to his numerous friends, and to his family. The wanton and infamous wish which he was compelled to hear in the duet of Norma had the effect of hastening the execution of a resolution long since conceived, but delayed. Nourrit, a good husband, a tender father, has broken it, it is said, with his own hand, the bonds which attached him to his six children, and his wife, the most devoted of women. He, who was so awake to the importance of religion, could not await with resignation till it pleased God to call him hence. By his own act he is supposed to have died; though but a few days before he prayed, with as much earnestness as sorrow, for support from above, and for a continuance of life, as appears from verses which he has left behind, to the following effect:

"If thou thy image thou hast made,
O' mighty Author of my breath
Design to send courage to my aid,
Of grant—in mercy, grant me death.
My soul by force consuming fires,
Is on the terrifying brink
Of that abyss where hope expires,
Sustain—O do not let me sink!"

It is believed, that, tortured by want of sleep, to which he had felt late been subject, he had desired to breathe the fresh air of the morning, and for that purpose betook himself to the balcony, when, suddenly seized with a giddiness of the head, he threw himself into the court-yard, where his unfortunate wife, a woman of heroic courage, found him lifeless, and his skull beaten in. This was in March last.

If his death were not thus brought about, Nourrit had yielded to a horrible thought. His anxieties are believed to have produced the disease called atrophy of the heart, which affected his reason. He had lived so honorably, but suffered so much, and has now so mournfully closed his days, that all unite deeply to lament his fate.

The latest accounts from Naples represent Madame Nourrit to have displayed great fortitude, and to have occupied herself with the anxious duties of a mother. It is proposed to raise a subscription to transport the remains of the deceased vocalist to France.

A PEEP THROUGH MY OPERA-GLASS.

AN OVER TRUE TALE.

In spite of the cry against foreign singers and dancers, I have always had a predilection for the opera. Though strongly wrought on by music, and not insensible to the charms of a roulade or prossette, I do not ascribe the pleasure I take in this amusement to composer, prima donna, or dansusee. Gosh enough to resort to the Temple of Art for the purpose of beholding the real life assembled within its walls, I have often turned from the most striking scenes enacted on the area of the stage, to gaze on others not less replete with dramatic interest, performed by the unconscious spectators of the mimick scene.

On one of the most fashionable nights of the last season, when royally expressed attention of the salle, the occupants of a retired box attracted my notice—first, by the youth and beauty of the lady, and then by the renown of her companion. The gentleman was a literary eminence; and the lady beside him, his daughter. The features of Mr. — were remarkably handsome; and had received, in a very striking manner, the impress of his intellectual character. It surprised no one to learn that they belonged to the most metaphysical poet of the day. But the appearance of his companion was, to my mind, of greater interest than that of the poet. Never have I beheld a more delicate countenance; beautiful, fair, and exquisitely gentle, it seemed out of place in the glare of the opera, and better suited to the house of prayer, or the cell of the religious.

At the close of the first act my regards were again drawn to their box. It did not one's heart good to see with what animation the young lady gazed on the dazzling scene around her. I could have sworn it was her first visit to the opera. At times, however, her animation seemed too lively; resembling a violent emotion rather than a pleasing sensation of delight. There was also something of melancholy in the smile the father returned to the remark of his child that she was puzzled, until I remembered, that it was the poet's or writer's to emit by bodings, or similar awkward reflections, the pleasure of the moment. As I looked, they seemed to have recognized an acquaintance in the box of a noble duke, the marriage of whose daughter with the young earl of — had for some time been a subject of conversation. That nobleman was standing beside his betrothed; and towards him the eyes of father and daughter were turned. I had only time to observe that the parties bowed to each other, when the second act commenced.

Between the opera and ballet, the earl of — entered the box of the poet. The meeting of the gentlemen was most cordial; the young lady appeared embarrassed—her eyes were fixed constantly on the ground. The arrival of the nobleman proved no disparagement to the charming group. The handsome, the noble, the earl contrasted well with the feminine beauty of the lady and the thoughtful countenance of the parent. The earl soon returned to his party, and before the overture of the ballet was finished Mr. — and his daughter withdrew. The latter seemed to be surprised out of the box; and my fears that she was ill were, from what I afterwards learned, but too well founded. By the newspaper I heard the following week that Mr. — had suffered a heavy bereavement—his daughter was no more. I obtained from a friend the particulars of this melancholy event; and comparing the circumstances with my observations, I found I had seen at the opera the leading event of the most affecting drama that poet ever penned or the world witnessed.

Mr. — had been tutor to the earl of —. At the age of seventeen, and after a residence of three years, the young nobleman left the roof of his preceptor for the university. From the university he went abroad, paying but a brief visit to the scene of his earliest studies, and returned from travel to become the star of a brilliant circle, and the successful author to the most attractive heiress in St. James's. This interval of pleasure and success, had been passed very differently by Mr. — and his only child. The daughter pined and wasted—the father watched and mourned. In person Mary was the image of her mother, and it was a matter of no surprise to her friends that she inherited the fatal disease of her parent. Every effort was made to check the progress of consumption; at times she appeared to rally; but after the last visit of the earl to her father (his farewell visit previous to his departure for the continent), the disorder too plainly gained ground. A weary time, spent in fruitless exertions and torturing suspense, ensued; till the father called in the aid of a celebrated physician. This gentleman, well acquainted with the intimate connection between mind and body, thought he saw in the young invalid a deep and hopeless brooding on some object, prohibited or unattainable. Delirium prevented any inquiry; but real concern for his patient induced him to prescribe change of scene, and the frequent use of the amusements society afforded. The father brought her to London. Among other diversions, the opera promised to be one of the most attractive; the evening was fixed, a box taken, and the carriage arriving. Among all the equipages thronging the Haymarket, that lovely June evening, none contained so melancholy a party as that of Mr. — There is something repulsive in conveying disease to the haunt of pleasure for the purpose of obtaining a cure; in the attempt to retard the blow of death by the laughter and merriment of the living. They gained their box; the crowd, the light, the music, produced on nerves already weakened by illness an excitement amounting to ecstacy; and then followed, as if to complete the overthrow of the worn frame, the chilling remembrance of bright and faded hopes. There stood the earl of —, handsome, excellent as she had ever known him, and beside him his fair and betrothed lady. Then he moved tones in which he had been accustomed to address them, while her own heart was breaking, because it dared not, and it would not, tell his grief. That evening brought on a crisis. The sequel is already told.

On a day not very far distant from the evening we have been describing, a sumptuous wedding and simple funeral were solemnized in a church not far from her majesty's theatre.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

M. DAGUERRÉ.—In a letter to the New-York American, Mr. Walsh gives the following account:—"I was admitted to M. Daguerre's laboratory, and passed an hour in contemplating his drawings. It would be impossible for me to express the admiration which they produced. I can convey to you no idea of the exquisite perfection of the copies of objects and scenes, effected in ten minutes by the action of simple solar light upon his papiers sensibles. There is one view of the river Seine, bridges, quays, great edifices, etc., taken under a rainy sky, the graphic truth of which astonished and delighted me beyond measure. No human hand ever did or could trace such a copy. The time required for this work was nearly an hour—that is, proportionate to the difference of light. Daguerre is a gentleman of middle stature, robust frame, and highly expressive countenance. He explained the progress of his experiments, and vindicated his exclusive property in the development and successful application of the idea, with a volubility and clear detail of facts and arguments. To the suggestion, that the exhibition in the United States, of a collection of his drawings, might yield 'a handsome sum,' he answered that the French government would soon, probably, buy his secret from him, and thus gratify his wish, the unlimited diffusion and employment of his discovery. The sum which the Academy of Sciences ask for him, is two hundred thousand francs. He had already acquired great fame as the painter of the Dioramas."

A FEW FACTS ABOUT LONDON.—London is the largest and richest city in the world, occupying a surface of thirty-two square miles, thickly planted with houses, mostly three, four and five stories high; it contained in 1831 a population of one million four hundred and seventy-one thousand one hundred and forty-one. It consists of the City, Westminster city, Finsbury, Marylebone, Tower Hamlets, Southwark, and Lambeth districts. In 1834 there entered the port of London three thousand seven hundred and eighty-six British ships, one thousand two hundred and eighty foreign ships; two thousand six hundred and sixty-nine were registered as belonging to it in 1832, with thirty-two thousand seven hundred and eighty-six seamen. The London Dock covers twenty acres. The two West India Docks cover fifty-one acres; St. Katherine's Docks cover twenty-four acres. There are generally five thousand vessels and three thousand boats on the river, employing eight thousand watermen and four thousand labourers. London pays about one-third of the window duty in England. The number of the houses assessed are about one hundred and twenty thousand, rated at upwards of five millions sterling; about one-third are not assessed. The house rent is pro rata seven or eight millions, including taverns, hotels, and public-houses. The retailers of spirits and beer are upwards of ten thousand; while the dealers in the staff of life are some twelve thousand. The number of the being all the courts, alleys, streets, lanes, squares, places, and rows, they amount to upwards of ten thousand; and on account of their extreme point, no individual could pass through them in the space of one whole year.

NEW ITALIAN OPERAS.—Two new operas were performed in Italy in February last—one at Milan, the other at Rome. That of Milan was by M. Schöcherlechner, the husband of a countess of much note. The subject is taken from Racine's "Bajazet," and the libretto bears the title of Rossana. It was, including Hilla's Romilda, the second opera of German origin produced within a short time at the same theatre. It would appear that M. Schöcherlechner's music obtained but an indifferent reception. His work was much injured by the customary performance of a ballet between the second and third acts, which happened to be I Riti dell'Indostan, the music of which is made up of the sweetest melodies of Rossini and Bellini. The new opera played at Rome was another Medea, of Prospero Selvi, a young composer of Viterbe. It obtained a complete success, to which Eugenia Garcia, sister-in-law to the late Madame Malibran, much contributed. Last advices from Italy mention the death of Costamagno, the young composer of two operas of much merit—E Fazio and Don Garzia. We regret to say also, that, by last advices from Marselles, the health of the celebrated violinist Paganini is rapidly declining.

FROM THE PERSIAN OF ATTAR.

Wouldst thou inherit Paradise?
These maxims keep before thine eyes;
So thy heart's mirror shall appear
For ever shining bright and clear;
Give thanks, when Fortune smiles serene;
Be patient, when her frown is seen.
Id thou hast sinned, for pardon plead,
And help shall follow at thy need.
But shall he hope the prize to hold,
Who with new sins conceals the old?
Be patient, be watchful still,
Ann fly the vortices of ill;
Avoid the paths that lead to vice,
And win thy way to Paradise.

COLLOQUY.—The following colloquy took place, lately, between an inquisitive gentleman and his butcher boy:—"What are your politics?" said the gentleman, "The Queen's, sir." "What is the Queen's?" "Moin, sir." "What's your name?" "My name," replied the boy, "is the same as father's." "And what's his name?" said the gentleman, "It is the same as moim." "Then what are both your names?" "Who they are both alike," said the boy. The gentleman turned on his heel, and the boy shouted "Anything more, sir?"

THE MILLER AND THE POOL.—A miller, who attempted to be witty at the expense of a youth of weak intellect, accosted him with, "John, people say that you are a fool." On this John replied, "I don't know that I am, sir; I know some things, sir, and some things I don't know, sir." "Well, John, what do you know?" "I know that millers always have fat hogs, sir." "And what don't you know?" "I don't know whose corn they eat, sir."

TWO LITTLE MAMERS.—Sir Fletcher Norton, when pleading before Lord Mansfield on some question of manorial rights, chanced unfortunately to say, "My lord, I can illustrate the point by an instance in my own person; I myself have two little manors." The judge immediately interposed with one of his blindest smiles, "We all know it, Sir Fletcher."

COMPLIMENT ON THE WARD.—D'Orsay, in remarking on a beauty's speck on the cheek of Lady Southampton, compared it to a gem on a rose leaf. "The compliment is far-fetched," observed her ladyship. "How can that be," rejoined the count, "when it is made on the spot?"

LITERARY NOTICES.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We have laid aside the stanzas by "P." for insertion. The poetical translation by our new correspondent "H. S. L." shall, of course, have a place the first opportunity.—"F. O. T." writes very pretty verses for an amateur, and with practice may undoubtedly succeed.—Lola's stanzas to "W. B." were put on file for insertion some weeks since. They have been accidentally delayed, but shall, if practicable, appear soon.—Talia's address to Taglion, is a little too extravagant, but we agree with him in the eulogistic portion of his poem. They are artists of remarkable talent.—"P. P." is informed that the charges against the well-known actor in whom he alludes, but from the source in which these charges originate, we take it for granted they are as false as they are scurrilous.—"M. M." may obtain his manuscript by calling at the office.—We must decline the arrangement proposed by "J. Y. T."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1839.

Venus, Jupiter and Mars.—We meet with the following astronomical hints in a late number of the Literary Gazette, published in thirteity:—"Our readers may not be aware that the three planets, Venus, Jupiter, and Mars are visible every clear evening, and that they are seen with great brilliancy. Venus, immediately after sunset, appears in the path of the sun, at a considerable elevation above the western horizon. Jupiter now appears with a light inferior only to that of Venus, at a considerable elevation, at the same hour above the eastern horizon, in the quarter of the heavens opposite to Venus. Mars may be seen in the direction of a line from Jupiter, and a little to the southward of this line; this planet now presents to the earth an apparent size more than twenty times larger than when in the opposite part of its orbit, and may readily be distinguished from all other stars by its ruddy color. On the nineteenth of July, Jupiter and Mars will be in conjunction, at about ten o'clock in the evening, at a small elevation above the western horizon; Jupiter being about three diameters of the moon to the northward of Mars. The present is an exceedingly favorable opportunity for observing these planets, for soon the apparent magnitude of Mars will be diminished. These planets may easily be found by any one, however unacquainted with the heavens. Suppose a line from the sun to intersect the heavens, dividing it into equal portions; these planets will be the first stars observed after sunset in the direction of the line." While on this subject, our readers will thank us for quoting the beautiful passage on "starry influences" from Coleridge's "Wallenstein".

"O never rudely will I blame his faith
In the midst of stars and angels
The intelligible forms of ancient poets,
The fair humanities of old re-ign,
The Power, the Beauty, and the Majesty,
That had her haunts in dale, or piney mountain,
Or forest by a slow stream, or pebbly spring,
Or champaign and wat'ry depths: all these have vanished,
They live no longer in the faith of reason.
But still the heart doth need a language, still
Doth the old instinct brine seek the old names,
And to you starry world they now are gone,
Spirits or gods, who used to share this earth
With man as with their friend, and to the lover,
Yonder they move, from yonder vane or sky
Shoot influence down; and, even at this day,
'Tis Jupiter who brings what'er's great,
And Venus who brings every thing that's fair!"

Paintings in Boston.—A letter upon our table from Boston says:—"Of course you saw Catherwood's collection of water-coloured drawings now exhibiting here? If you didn't, you deserve to be compelled to pass an hour in the studio of —, with his horrid caricatures of humanity glowering upon you from their frames. They (the Catherwood collection) are magnificent. Did you ever conceive the force of water-colouring before! Those beautiful oriental scenes by Bartlett and Allan, and those capital views in Ireland! To-day our gallery at the Athenæum opened—the most interesting feature of which is the exhibition of Hayward's collection. Now I do not care too twentieth part of a straw whether Hayward's pictures be offered as original or as copies, but capital paintings by capital artists they certainly are. They strike you at once as something far superior to the unnumbered and yellow obscure daubs which in years gone by disgraced the walls of the Athenæum and insulted the taste of its visitors—which, unblushingly thrust forward as originals of Teniers, Raphael, Rubens, etc., probably emanated from the garret of some wretched tenth-rate sign-painter, who was dying of delirium tremens. Look at the St. Sebastian shot with arrows. How exquisite the blending of light and shade, the assistance afforded by the sombre back-ground, the chaste simplicity of its few colours! But the night wears—the steamboat is just starting—and I must wind off before the plank is taken up."

A royal box.—It would seem by the following from a Paris paper, that Victoria is not the only "youthful queen" about whom they tell "strange stories":—"A laughable bit of scandal has been going the rounds of the salons. It appears that the youthful queen detected her husband in the heinous act of kissing one of the maids of honour, and that, losing the dignity of the queen in the feelings of the woman, she boxed the ears of both parties very soundly. However, le mari has been forgiven."

The infernal regions.—Decidedly the most agreeable and convenient mode of visiting his Statank Majesty's dominions, is by walking into the City Saloon, next door to the American Museum, where for fifty cents a very lively impression may be obtained of the place "unmentionable to ears polite." The keeper of this Pandemonium will be found a very civil and intelligent sort of person, and quite unlike the ferocious, cloven-footed monster he has been represented by vulgar prejudice.

Washington Allston.—The paintings of this noble artist are exciting unusual attention at the present time in Boston, where there is a grand exhibition of nearly fifty now open to the public. They make the most remarkable collection ever witnessed by the good citizens of our sister city, where Allston is universally appreciated as the first of living artists. Allston is undoubtedly an extraordinary man, and not only paints but writes like a man of genius. Take, for instance, the following sonnet—never before published—from his pen, in which he pays a beautiful tribute to a kindred spirit of bygone days:

SONNET.

On a falling group in the Last Judgment of Michael Angelo in the Capella Sistina

How vast, how dread, o'erwhelming is the thought
Of space interminable! To the soul
A circling weight that crushes into naught
Her mighty faculties! a wondrous whole
Without or parts, beginning, or an end!
How fearful then on desperate wing to send
The fancy o'er the waste profound!
Yet born as if all daring to astound,
They giant hand, oh Angelo, hath hurled
Even human forms, with all their mortal weight,
Down the dread void—fall endless as their fate!
Already now they seem from world to world
For ages thrown; yet doomed, another past,
Another still to reach, nor e'er to reach the last!

These lines are beautiful; and so are the following, from the pen of a distinguished young clergyman, which also appear originally in the Mirror.

TO WASHINGTON ALLSTON.

True lover of thy art! Great heir of fame!
Giant among the giants of our time!
Ages to come will venerate thy name,
And gaze with wonder on thy works sublime.
As marvels of perfection.—Thou hast wrought
With a most cunning wisdom, making thought
And love and goodness stand before the eye
Like unveiled spirits from the upper sky.
Oh mighty artist! with a poet's heart,
With Christian faith, and philosophic mind,
Thou lovest thy God and next to Him thine art,
And with mute eloquence dost thrill mankind!—
Down through all time thy honoured name shall go,
Thy country's boast;—her Michael Angelo! R. C. W.

While on the subject of Allston, we may remark that his great masterpiece of "Belshazzar's Feast," on which his pencil has for so many years been engaged, is in such a state, that the public will, in all probability, have an opportunity of witnessing it before a very distant day—but that day will not be until the artist has thoroughly satisfied himself—a task more difficult, perhaps, than satisfying all the rest of the world.

"And ye shall walk in silk attire."—The attention of a very large portion of our agricultural community, appears to have been suddenly directed towards the cultivation of the mulberry tree, with a view to the raising of silk worms. In Washington, one company have planted four hundred acres, a few miles from the city. Several journals, devoted almost exclusively to the circulation of intelligence, relative to the culture of the silk-worm, have already been started throughout the United States, and if their anticipations prove true, we shall soon be independent of China and France for the supply of our silks and satins. In amusing contrast with the fact of the extensive cultivation of the morus multicaulis, may be mentioned the circumstance, that a cargo of potatoes was recently imported into Charleston from France, and sold at a cheaper rate than the native vegetable could be afforded. What a theme for the satirist or the moralist—for a Juvénal or a Franklin!

Pride of birth.—Of all the follies and follies to which frail humanity is subject, that which leads a man to pride himself less upon his own merit than that of his ancestors, is the most contemptible. In the best of families there must be some who are a disgrace, as well as others who are an honour. A Spanish proverb says, "he that has no fools, knows no beggars in his family," was got by a flash of lightning." Douglas Jerrold, in his new work, makes the following admirable remark, in ridicule of this preposterous pride of birth:—"It is with the tree of genealogy as with the oak of the forest; we boast of the timbers it has given to a state vessel, but we rarely talk of the three-legged stools, the broomssticks and tobacco-stoppers made from the chips and ends."

Inez.—Another original poem from the pen of our Edinburgh correspondent, Inez, enriches our columns to-day. When our readers are informed that the fair author has hardly seen seventeen summers, we think they will agree with us, that her productions are characterized by a graceful fluency of expression, a maturity of thought, and a richness and beauty of imagery, which indicate the possession of a remarkable poetical talent. We shall watch with interest the literary career of this youthful poetess. If she do not, before many years, attain the reputation of a Hemans, or a London, the promise will have been greatly inadequate to the fulfilment.

The Indian Tribes of North America.—The twelfth number of this excellent publication has just been issued, and admirably sustains the character of the previous numbers. The work may be seen at the bookstore of Messrs. Scofield and Voorhies, in Nassau-street. Mr. J. Irvin Hitchcock, the agent for the proprietors, is now in this city, with a view of soliciting an increase of subscribers to the work; and he has it in contemplation to make a visit, with similar views, through the eastern states. We indulge the hope, that a work so emphatically American will receive from our fellow-citizens generally the encouragement it so richly merits.

"Behemoth, a Legend of the Moored Islands." New-York: J. and H. Langley. One volume.

The great merit of this work is in the originality of the conception. It is a romance of the days when there were giants in the land, and the huge mastodon roamed through the immense forests that skirted our vast inland oceans. The author, whoever he may be, is a man of genius. His style is fresh and vigorous, and he displays much ingenuity in weaving an interesting narrative from the vague materials, furnished by our aboriginal traditions. The book is worthy of praise, if only for its truly American character, and the novelty of its descriptions.

"Arthur Lee and Tom Palmer; or, The Sailor Reclaimed." Second edition. Boston: James Munroe and Co. Pp. 78.

This is an excellent little work, and though humble in its pretensions, is marked by a greater effluence of thought and beauty of style than many a more ambitious volume. Its scope and tendency are indicated with sufficient precision in its title; and we trust that all persons interested in the moral improvement of young seamen, will bestow upon it the attention it deserves. The work may be found at Mr. Colman's, under the Astor House.

"The Dwarf, a Dramatic Poem." By James Keen, author of "The Wanderer," "Battle of Saratoga," etc. etc. New-York: F. Saunders, No. 357 Broadway. Pp. 62.

Such is the title of a spirited dramatic sketch, dedicated to Sergeant Tallford. We should not have needed this testimony to discover that the author was an admirer of "Ion." His blank verse and the tone of his thoughts and expressions frequently remind us of that noble dramatic production. The versification is, for the most part, free, graceful and melodious, and there are many poetical passages of rare beauty scattered through the work. Occasionally we find marks of haste and inattention, as for instance where Beatrice says—

"The broken fragments of my perished joys."

where the faultless is obvious. A careful revision would easily remove these slight defects. We think Mr. Keen has given ample evidence in this poem of a capacity for dramatic writing of the highest order, and should he ever turn his attention to writing for the stage, it would require no gift of vaticination to predict his triumphant success.

"First Greek Lessons, containing the most important parts of the Grammar of the Greek language, together with appropriate exercises in the translating and writing of Greek, for the use of beginners." By Charles Anthony, L. L. D. New-York: Harper and Brothers, No. 82 Cliff-Street. Pp. 92.

This work is adapted with great care to the wants of the classical student. The arrangement is excellent, and combines great simplicity with a thorough development of the whole texture of the Greek language. It should be an inseparable companion to the grammar of Mr. Anthon. We know of no work worthier of an immediate introduction into our schools and colleges. The rising generation should feel grateful to the Messrs. Harper for the clear and elegant typography of their elementary works. The binding also unites durability with neatness.

"Thoughts on Prison Discipline." Boston: James Munroe and Co.

We have read with much interest a brochure under this title from the pen of one ever active in all national projects for the purification and advancement of society. The suggestions are those of practical benevolence. The outrageous abuses recently practised with impunity at Sing Sing show but too clearly that many radical defects still exist in our system of prison discipline. Those of our legislators who require light upon the subject, will do well to peruse this little pamphlet, in which they will find many valuable facts and much admirable advice.

"Adam Buff, and other Men of Character." By Douglas Jerrold. In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

Two of the most amusing volumes we have perused this long time. We defy the most vinegar faced of mortals to read the story of "Job Pippins, the man who couldn't help it," without more than one hearty cackling. The outlines of character are extremely graphic and spirited. To all who have any taste for exhibitions of genial humour and wit, we cheerfully commend this lively and ingenious book.

"The Literary Examiner, and Western Monthly Review." Edited by E. Barker Fiske and William H. Burleigh. Vol. I. No. 1. Pittsburgh: Wm. H. Wintney and Co. Pp. 80.

Another new magazine from the West, and one of imposing pretensions, both from the exceeding neatness of its typography and the character of its contents! The articles are all valuable and interesting, and the names of the editors is a sufficient guaranty that the work will be conducted with spirit and ability. Success to the enterprise.

"Charles Tyrrell; or, The Bitter Blood." By G. F. R. James, Esq. author of "Mary of Burgundy," etc. In two volumes. New-York: Harper and Brothers.

James is so popular in this country as a novelist, that the simple announcement of a work from his pen is sufficient to create for it an extensive sale. "Charles Tyrrell" is a most interesting and highly-wrought tale, written at times with great power and beauty. We think it much superior to the author's last work, "The Huguenot." By the way, James appears to be the most prolific of bookwrights. The Messrs. Harper have another novel by him in press, entitled "The Gentleman of the Old School." We hope that this "easy writing" may not be "hard reading."

SHE WORE A WREATH OF ROSES.

A POPULAR BALLAD—THE POETRY BY T. HAYNES BAYLY—MUSICK BY JOSEPH P. KNIGHT.

Published at Atwill's Musical Saloon, 201 Broadway.

ANDANTE.

She wore a wreath of roses The night we met, Her love-ly face was wreath that first smiling Be-neath of joy; Her foot-step had the light-ness. Her voice (the joy-ous tone; The to-ken of a youth-ful heart Where sor-row is un-known; I saw her but a mo-ment—Yet, methinks, I see her now, With the wreath of sum-mer flow-ers Up-on her snow-y brow.

3d—A wreath of orange blossoms,
When next we met, she wore;
The expression of her features
Was more thoughtful than before;
And standing by her side was one
Who strove, and not in vain.

To soothe her, leaving that dear home
She never might view again.
I saw her but a moment—
Yet, methinks, I see her now,
With the wreath of orange blossoms
Upon her snowy brow.

3d—And once again I see that brow,
No bridal wreath is there.
The widow's sombre cap conceals
Her once luxuriant hair;
She weeps in silent solitude,
And there is no one near

To press her hand within his own,
And wipe away the tear.
I see her broken-hearted;
Yet, methinks, I see her now
In the pride of youth and beauty,
With a garland on her brow.

LINES TO —.

Vases must be the lover's language,
For the face can hardly tell
Half the timid thoughts that darkly
In the heart's recesses dwell;
And the voice of music trembleth
Vainly from the tuneful shell.

As a dying mother parting
From her babe with fond caress,
All her love in words of passion
Feebly struggles to express,
But can only with a tearful
Look her little darling bless.

Even so my bashful wishes
Often to my lips will rise,
As I strive to give my meaning
Other speech than that of eyes;
But the secret ere 'tis whispered—
In the mute revealing, dies.

Read, then—read the literary error
That it kills me to conceal;
'Tis a long disease I've cherished,
That thy smile alone can heal.
'Tis a fault—but oh forgive me!
For I am not framed of steel.

MISCELLANY.

CAUSE OF QUARREL.—"I wish I owned all the pasture land in the world," said Bob. "Well, I wish I owned all the cattle in the world," said Ned. "How could you feed them?" asked Bob. "I'd turn them into your pasture," said Ned. "No, you wouldn't." "Yes, I would." "No, you wouldn't." "Yes, I would." "You shan't." "I shall!" And then came the fist-cuffs—and oh! how they did fight!

A QUESTION.—What word is that in the English language, the first two letters of which signify a man—the three first a woman—the four first a great man—and the whole a great woman? Answer.—Heroine.

A GRAMMARIAN'S FANCY.—Dr. Willis, an old grammarian, who wrote upwards of a hundred years ago, in noticing the significant roots of the English language, gives various examples. These words formed upon it, always denote firmness and strength, analogous to the Latin ago, as stand, stay, stuff, stop, steady, stake, stamp, stately, etc. Words beginning with str, intimate violent force and energy, as strive, strength, strike, stripe, stress, struggle, stride, stretch, strip, etc. Thr implies forcible motion, as throw, throbb, thrust, through, threaten, thralldom, etc. Wr, obliquity or distortion, as wry, wrast, wrestle, wring, wrong, wrangle, wrath, wrack, etc. Sw, silent agitation or lateral motion, as sway, swung, swerve, sweep, swim, etc. Sl, a gentle fall or less observable motion, as slide, slip, sly, slit, slow, slack, slink. Sp, dissipation or expansion, as spread, sprout, sprinkle, split, spill, spring. Terminations in ash, indicate something acting nimbly and sharply, as crash, dash, gash, rash, lash, slash. Terminations in ush, something acting more obtusely and dully, as crush, brush, hush, gush, blash. The most that can be argued from some specimens we imagine is this, that the analogies of sound have had some influence on the formation of words.

AN AWEWARD ANNOUNCEMENT.—Lady A. and her daughter having been much annoyed by the gaucheries of a country booby of a servant, who would persevere in giving in their names as the Right Hon. Lady A. and the Hon. Miss A. at length took him seriously to task, and desired that, in future, he would mention them as simple Lady A. and plain Miss A. Their astonishment may be conceived when they found themselves obeyed to the letter, and Devonshire House was electrified by the intelligence that simple Lady A. and plain Miss A. were "coming up."

A WISE PARROT.—There is an Eastern story told of a person who taught his parrot to repeat only the words, "What doubt is there of that?" He carried it to the market for sale, fixing the price at one hundred rupees. A Mogul asked the parrot, "Are you worth one hundred rupees?" The parrot answered, "What doubt is there of that?" The Mogul was delighted, and bought the bird. He soon found out that this was all it could say. Ashamed now of his bargain, he said to himself, "I was a fool to buy this bird." The parrot exclaimed as usual, "What doubt is there of that?"

THE YOUNG IDEA.—Lord Brougham, in one of his works, delivers it as his deliberate opinion, that "we learn more in the first six years of our life than afterwards, though we may live to a hundred."

TREES.—In America there are one hundred and twenty different species of forest trees; whereas in the same latitude in Europe, only thirty-four are to be found.

EFFECT OF CLIMATE ON FEMALE BEAUTY IN ITALY.—A lady talking to me, a day or two ago, on the effect of the Italian climate on female beauty, remarked that it acted as a hot-house on rose-buds, but quickly withered full-blown roses. It certainly is true, that women of twenty-five in Italy look quite as passable as those of thirty-five in England; and after twenty, they lose that freshness of complexion on which constitutes so great a charm in our young women. I have seen here women quite as delicately fair—nay, perhaps still more so, than in England; but they are deficient in that transparency of skin, through which the blood speaks so eloquently in our climate, and look rather as if bleached by the sun into fairness, than born with it. In short, they want the appearance of youth, which is the greatest charm of every face, and the absence of which no beauty can compensate.

GRIEF.—The circumstance which Scott mentions, as having overcast the pleasure of an excursion he once made, was the death of his friend, the Duchess of Buccleuch. His letter to her widowed lord is a beautiful specimen of good sense and feeling. "Would to God," he writes, "I could say, Be comforted! but I feel every common topic of consolation must be, for the time at least, even an irritation to affliction. Grieve then, my dear lord, or I should say, my dear and much-honoured friend, for sorrow for the time levels the highest distinctions of rank, but do not grieve as those who have no hope."

ABRAHAM.—The life of the Bedouin, his appearance and habits, are precisely the same as those of the patriarchs of old. Abraham himself, the first of the patriarchs, was a Bedouin, and four thousand years have not made the slightest alteration in the character or habits of this extraordinary people. Read of the patriarchs in the Bible, and it is the best description you can have of pastoral life in the East at the present day.

THE BANKRUPT BANKER.—An extravagant bankrupt banker was asked by his vexed creditors how he could account for the disposal of his capital. His reply might be applicable to many others if they were as candid—"I have educated my sons and married my daughters."

MODERN FRENCH LITERATURE.

We translate for the Mirror the following from some very spirited and well-written sketches, which have just appeared in Paris.

MURAT.

In 1813, on returning from an excursion to the mountains, I was told that a distinguished personage had arrived at the hotel, accompanied by a numerous suite, and escorted by the authorities of the department. From the description, I recognized at once king Joachim, (Murat,) so I hurried on my uniform, and prepared to pay my respects to his majesty.

I was just of age, and thought I had self-confidence enough to harangue Napoleon himself; but I had scarcely entered the apartment before I recollected that I, a subaltern, was addressing a king, so that I could only bow profoundly, and stammer out, "Sire, your majesty!"—"Who told you so?" rejoined his majesty, with some ill-humour—but I was determined not to be put down, and proceeded with all the volubility I could, "I know that it is his majesty, the king of Naples, that I have the honour of addressing; and I have come to offer him an escort, which the bad condition of the roads render necessary."

"Thank you, I have no occasion for any; the prefect has assured me that the road is clear all the way to the Italian frontier."

"Sire, I have just passed over it; it is choked up with snow, and your majesty could not move a step without being stopped by the avalanches. An escort is indispensably necessary."

"I do not wish any," said the king, coldly.

This was getting serious, but seeing that his majesty was obstinate, or, nearly so, as myself, I determined to strike a decisive blow.

"Sire, I am commander of the National Guard, of the gendarmes and the custom-house force; within the limits of my command, I am sovereign. Your majesty is too well acquainted with the rules of military subordination to resist any longer; you will, therefore, accept my escort."

"What an original!" exclaimed the monarch, turning to his generals, who, as if they only waited for this indirect permission, broke out into peals of laughter so hearty, that I could not resist the contagion; Murat himself joined in our mirth, and kindly offered me his hand.

Having finished my embassy, I was at leisure to admire the monarch's person; his fine head crowned with a profusion of dark curling locks, his regular and delicate features, his cheeks, which still wore the rosy hue of youth, his quick and brilliant eyes, everything, even down to the little moustache that shaded his upper lip, and which, it was said, concealed a wound he had received in the mouth during the campaign in Egypt, combined to make him one of the most magnificent men that can be imagined. His appearance was still further improved by a sort of fancy costume, which he wore very gracefully; under his finely draped mantle was seen a close fitting green jacket, ornamented with silk braid, light pantaloons, boots with golden spurs, and a superb damascus blade, hanging by a silken cord decorated with gold scorns; in a word, he made a very pretty king.

Night was approaching, and I urged a speedy departure. The first sleigh, drawn by four horses, was occupied by the king and some great general, who was called, I believe, Count Carascosa; I was seated in front of them. After us came the suite, escorted by a dozen douaniers. On the road, Murat talked much with the general in the Neapolitan dialect, which I happen to be familiar with, and spoke in such bold terms of the emperor, that I was fairly frightened. Napoleon was at that time the idol, the deity of us youth, so I hastened to cut short a conversation to which I did not wish to listen.

"Sire, I understand Italian!"

The king thanked me by an expressive glance. At that very moment our sleigh rolled over a slight descent, and left the king in a position from which he could scarcely have been released without the aid of our escort. The sleigh had turned fairly upside down, and Murat and the general were imprisoned under it; the postillion lay under his horse, and could not move; fortunately I had leapt out of the sleigh at the very instant it went over, and was able to raise the horses and deliver the king, who was suffocating under the weight of the general's huge carcass. No one was hurt, so we could laugh our fill over our mishap. Thus, in some sense, I saved the king's life—a bad action, for which I have always reproached myself. Why did not Murat find his grave among the anovs of the Simplon? The conferences he had had at Berne with the envoys of the allied powers, would not have been known to history, the monstrous ingratitude of his defection would not have stained the heroic life of one of the bravest of the brave men of the empire; the emperor himself might yet reign, and a hero would not have met a wretched death at Pizzo, beneath Ferdinand's bullets. On such threads hang the fates of empires!

On the frontier, at a league from Gondo, we found a post of Italian soldiers, whom I had previously notified, waiting for us, torch in hand, to overwhelm us with bows and geneflexions; I say us, for I had my share too; the halo of royalty shedding its brightness even around me. Here I quitted the king; afterwards, I was invited to enter the service of his Neapolitan majesty, but fortunately my good genius, in the shape of a battalion of Austrians, that drove us out of the Valais, preserved me from this honour; but before this happened a terrible accident was destined to mark the last days of my stay on the Simplon.

THE AVALANCHE.

A few days after Murat passed through, on the seventh December, 1813, a deluge of snow covered our mountains; there were more than ten feet on a level; we had to cut passages from house to house; and to add to our difficulties, a detachment of two hundred men, the wreck of one of those fine Italian regiments that were cut up at the battle of Hanau, had been detained on the Simplon for two days; provisions were scarce, and the municipality, whose patriotic zeal had been surprisingly cooled by the reverses of our army, seemed little anxious to relieve our embarrassments; however, I had recourse to requisitions, and got through the day tolerably. Every one was full of the dread of avalanches, whether from presentiment of the future, or the result of the experience of the old shepherds, who had long been regretting the stripping of the trees from our mountains, I cannot say. But I remember perfectly well the urgent entreaties of the gendarmes that I would not abandon them in case they should be buried under the avalanche; and more especially, the prophetic words of the brigadier, who at nine in the evening said sorrowfully, pointing to the snow, "There is our grave, we shall never see the light of day again!" And in fact, two hours afterwards, he was no more.

At eleven o'clock the officers, with whom the hotel was crowded, had retired to their rooms; when I entered a lower chamber in which the family of the postmaster was collected, preparing for their evening prayer.

"What do you think of the avalanche?" said the mistress of the house, anxiously.

"Don't be afraid," answered I, laughing. "I am here, and my time is not come yet; I will pray along with you that the ava—"

A tremendous noise cut the word short; it seemed as though the mountains were coming down on us; the outer walls of the room were in began to crack and split, and I saw with deadly terror the trunk of an enormous larch, with some of its branches on, enter the room on the top of a mass of snow, which had carried every thing before it, walls, doors and partitions. At the same instant, I fancied I saw a bluish flame traverse the room, but this was perhaps a hallucination produced by fear. My terror, however, did not last long; the fainting of the women, the cries of the children, the alarm of the officers, who came to seek a shelter by us, half-naked, with haggard eyes, and more than all, the danger that threatened the girl of my heart, left me no time to think of my fears: I rushed to the window, and burst it open, and then saw that the stables, opposite the house, had been crushed, and that the Roman tower was the only thing left standing on that side. My first care was to carry off to the tower the mother of my beloved. The dear old dame weighed some hundreds, but I did not feel it, in my violent nervous excitement; in a few minutes, I made a second trip with a second load, a lighter and a sweeter one, my Fanny. She had fainted; I left her with her mother, and hastened to where duty called me.

Meantime, all the inhabitants who had escaped from the wreck of their houses, had assembled, the curate in the midst, in his surplice, holding up the image of our Divine Redeemer; all kneeling in the snow, bare-headed, repeated in concert the terrible melody of the Dies irae, dies illa, which was accompanied by the far-off echoes of avalanches that were yet rolling through the valleys. The pale rava of the moon lighted up this scene, the most impressive I have ever witnessed, and one well calculated to touch every heart. For my own part, I freely confess that my tears mingled freely with those of the good pastor, as he embraced me warmly.

"To the tocsin!" cried the hoarse voices of some hardy mountaineers.

"No, no, we are not safe," I answered; "do you want to bring down new avalanches by the sound of your bells?"

All understood me, and in spite of my extreme youth, came, with tools in hand, to obey my orders. My first object was to disengage the brigade of douaniers, who had passed the night at the corps-de-garde, as I had ordered. The doors and windows were covered under more than ten feet of snow. It was less from esprit-de-corps that I began with them, than from the idea of the efficient aid I should obtain from these hardy fellows. As soon as the first duty was over, I looked round for the barrack of the gendarmerie; it had disappeared, all except the corner farthest from the road; at that angle there was a window in which a light was still shining. It was the brigadier's quarters, and I began to feel a hope of saving him. Accompanied by one of my men, I crept on my hands and knees to the spot where we saw the light, and climbed with great labour up the remains of a staircase, which gave us access to the apartment. On entering by the half-opened door, to our great surprise, we saw nothing of the brigadier or his wife; we called them repeatedly, but in vain. No one answered, except that our shouts aroused two lovely little girls, who were sleeping in the same bed, and who, it seemed, had not been awakened either by the roar of the avalanche, nor the destruction of a part of the building. The innocent darlings, used to being caressed by me, stretched out their arms, calling for papa. We wrapped them up carefully, and with great labour succeeded in depositing them in the tower.

What was the fate of their parents? We did not ascertain until the next day, when we found their bodies, horribly mutilated, under the ruins of the barrack.

During our absence, a road had been opened to the stables of the post-office, where were heard the groans of postillions, and the violent efforts of their horses, struggling against their fate. After some hours labour, we succeeded in disintering a young postillion, named Seiler. It was high time, for his eyes were filled with blood, and he was on the very point of suffocation. One of his fellows, who slept in the same bed, was less fortunate. He had hardly time to cry out, "Oh God, what is this?" before he was a corpse. Three or four others perished in the stable.

Day overtook us in the midst of our arduous task; we were fairly worn out with fatigue, and the barracks seemed so completely destroyed, that we had almost given up the idea of further search in that quarter, when a loud shout informed us that some fellow-creature required our aid. The signal came from one of my brave fellows, Rambaud, who had laid his ear to the snow, and thus been able to hear a faint moaning. As soon as his discovery was made known, the workmen laboured with new zeal, but at every stroke they ran a risk of crushing the sufferers under the ruins that fell around us. This forced us to proceed with great caution; but Rambaud had the presence of mind to open with the spade a kind of narrow shaft, and was let down by a rope at the risk of being crushed to death among the ruins.

We did not succeed in communicating with the victims till eleven in the morning; my name uttered by one of them was the first sound that reached us. Two of the gendarmes, Curtz and Laroo, who had been squeezed in between the wreck of the walls, were the only ones left alive, and even they were not yet in safety. Rambaud made them swallow a few drops of liquor, and remained by them, both to encourage them by his presence, and to shield them, as well as he could, from the fragments that fell all around them as we worked on. We had already dragged from under the ruins the horribly mangled corpses of the brigadier and his wife, and one of his men; after tremendous exertions we succeeded in disengaging Curtz and Laroo. Both were severely wounded, Curtz in particular had his head compressed by a heavy brick stone, and survived his deliverance only twenty-four hours. It seemed that the brigadier and his wife, in their terror, had repaired to the quarters of their men, and there met a fate which did not visit the apartments they left.

The unhappy sufferers had been buried under the snow twenty-six hours, yet when we questioned them they said they did not think it was three; hope is so ready at self-deception! "We trusted so much to you!" said poor Curtz, grasping my hand.

But let us leave these scenes of horror. The avalanche came down from the Palaoz mountains, and forced a way through the forest that bears the same name; huge larches such as four men could not span, were crushed down by it, like straws. It destroyed the gendarmes' barracks, the forge, the public buildings, then seemed to diverge, and after shaking and partly overthrowing the post station had broken at the base of the Roman tower, after shoving the stables clean off to the ground.

I imagined that the storm might have done injury in other places, and after sending off the detachment of the Italians, made for Brigg, with a force of ten douaniers. I will not speak of the unexampled fatigue and cold we had to endure, these were the least part; we were lucky in being so many, for if one of us, worn out with toil and watching, threw himself on the snow, whence he would have waked only in eternity, the rest would rub his limbs, even beat him, and force him to keep on. How many poor straggling soldiers we saw, who had perished in that way! they were generally seated holding their firelocks; on their ruddy countenances we could still trace the smile that accompanies death by cold. When we reached the convent a still more melancholy spectacle awaited us; Colonel Pesta, of the first Italian regiment, and part of his staff, had perished in an avalanche, and their bodies had just been brought in. Poor colonel! his aged mother was waiting for him at the foot of the Simlip; she fancied that she was soon to clasp in her arms the darling son, whom the snows of Russia had spared; he knew it, and in spite of the advice of the mountaineers, determined to push on. His filial piety was the cause of his death at twenty-five.

The next day we arrived at Brigg, and I went on to Slou, to make my report to the prefect. I did not imagine, however, that I would appear in the character of a visitor from the other world; but so it proved. I was introduced at midnight, and my haggard features, which the sufferings I had undergone had rendered livid, and on which my guide's lantern shed a dim light, made the good people take me for a spectre. They seemed fairly panic-struck, and it was some time before I could explain that the report of my death which had reached them was decidedly premature. The prefect, was pleased to award us very high praise; but it can be easily imagined that the great events which happened soon after, caused our humble services to be forgotten. Not that I would complain of this, the only adequate reward of such labours is in the consciousness of having done our duty.

INCIDENTS OF REAL LIFE.

THE LOST LORD.

I HAVE sojourned in many of the maritime, as well as the inland districts of England, but I have never visited a spot more abounding in the picturesque and beautiful than the banks of the Tees. It was in the vicinity of that romantic river, that the earl of * * *, about the period at which our story begins, had added to his already extensive landed property, a princely domain. He had been married about seven years to a lady of high birth and rare beauty; and they had one child—a son—born in the second year of their union.

The earl was a proud, reserved, and apparently cold man; but matrimony had greatly softened the natural sternness of his character; and when to his title of husband was added that of father, it was discovered that, under a somewhat repelling frigidity of manner, there was a well of deep and exhaustless affection, which made him the idol of his wife, and greatly raised him in the regard of all around him. It is scarcely necessary to state, that in their little, smug, and very lovely boy, was centered all their solicitude; and Lord Henry, notwithstanding the somewhat injudicious indulgence of which he was the object, was an amiable and interesting child.

The reader will more readily conceive than we can hope to describe, the anguish experienced by the earl and his countess, and the consternation and confusion which prevailed in his establishment, when their son, who had strayed out, one evening, by himself, into the park, was nowhere to be found; while the only intelligence that could be gleaned of him, was of a character rather to aggravate than allay their fears—namely, that he had been seen in a lane which skirted the domain, in the vicinity of a camp of gipsies. The earl had been somewhat severe upon the tribe, who had been heard to threaten revenge, which there was too much reason to fear they had gratified by the abduction of the young lord; and the apprehension received a horrible confirmation in the fact, that, when the spot was examined, no other vestige of their camp than the embers of their fires was to be found.

Every endeavour was then made to ascertain the direction in which they had fled, and this discovered, the whole party joined in the pursuit. But the cunning of the gang had provided against detection, by committing the boy to the charge of a young gipsy, about eighteen years old, with directions to convey him in a different direction, and, by a circuitous route, to join them at a place fixed upon as the rendezvous. In order to stifle the cries of the young lord, they had forced a gag into his mouth; and his conductor was dragging him by the arm along a by-path, about two miles from the residence of the earl, when a shrill voice, from the top of a precipice above him, called upon him to stop. The gipsy looked up, witnessing nothing but the slight figure of a boy about sixteen years old, he uttered some expression of contempt and defiance, and proceeded at a still quicker pace. A turn in the road, however, somewhat to the surprise of the gipsy, brought him in front of the boy, who demanded what he was doing with the child.

"Mind your own business," was the gruff reply; "and stand out of my path, or you shall feel the weight of my staff!" and, as he spoke, he raised his weapon.

"You shall not pass," said the other, resolutely, "until you tell me who the child is, and whether you are hurrying him."

The gipsy eyed the boy for a moment; and observing that, though his junior by two or three years, and both shorter and slighter, there was a determination in his look which made a civil reply the better policy—"He is the son of one of our gang," said the gipsy; "but, having committed a theft, he absconded; and I am taking him back to the camp."

"Do you think I don't know a gentleman's son from a gipsy's?" said the other. "Let the child go, I say!" and he approached a few paces nearer to the gipsy, whose reply was a blow with his stick.

What the younger boy wanted in strength, he made up in agility; for, dexterously avoiding the intended mischief, he rushed in upon the other, whose left hand was on the child, and planted a blow on the gipsy's temple, with such precision and force, that the latter measured his length upon the heath; and before he could regain his feet, his antagonist wrested the weapon from his hand.

The relative positions of the combatants were now changed; for, the young lord having been released in the scuffle, his champion stood between him and the gipsy, and made the villain touch the child at his peril. The gipsy, however, did not care to renew the struggle, but, applying his fingers to his money-belt, he blew a whistle as loud and shrill as the note of the curlew. The victor knew too well the object of the signal, and, drawing the young Lord Henry a few paces, pointed out to him a cottage about three furlongs distant, and bade him run towards it with all his speed. The little fellow obeyed; but, almost at the same instant, his rescuer perceived two or three dark forms advancing from an adjoining wood at a quick pace—whom the gipsy also perceived, and prepared to renew the contest, in the hope of maintaining it until his comrades could come up. The sound of horses' feet, however, altered his determination, as well as those who were hastening to his aid; for they instantly turned about, and were speedily followed by the young gipsy, leaving the peasant-hero master of the field.

In the meantime, the earl had returned from his unsuccessful pursuit, in order to concert with the magistrates—who, on hearing of the event, had hastened to offer their assistance—further measures for the recovery of his lost treasure, as well as to offer such consolation as he could to his almost frantic countess. There is no anguish so bitter as that inflicted by the loss of a child under such circumstances. To be deprived of it by death is comparatively a light calamity, for then we know where it is. And thus did the bereaved parents, in this case, feel that it would have been better for their darling "to fall into the hands of the Lord, than into the hands of man." What a change had passed over that princely dwelling! Those gilded chambers, which, on the celebration of the young heir's birth-day, had so lately echoed the sounds of festivity and joy, were now filled with mourning—the mourning as of the childless Rachel who would not be comforted. On a sudden, there was a hum of voices without; then a shout of joy; and the next moment, the door of the apartment in which the noble pair were sitting in their sorrow, was burst open, and a peasant-boy advanced, leading the young lord by the hand. The revolution was too much for the agitated frame of the countess; she fainted, and it was long ere she recovered. By degrees, however, the emotions of both the parents subsided into the calmer but deep feeling of thankfulness to the Being who had restored their child; and their next duty was to express their gratitude to the humble instrument of his preservation, whom, after having heard his story, which was modestly but clearly told, the earl dismissed with a handsome present, and promises of future patronage.

Edmund Danson returned, that night, to his humble dwelling, rejoicing, for he carried with him a peace which would increase the comforts of his widowed mother; and he lay down on his pillow with a heart overflowing with gratitude to Him, who giveth not "the race to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." Edmund had been brought up in poverty, but not in ignorance; he was naturally quick, and of a docile temper; and, while his mother had instructed him in those truths which had been her own best solace in the hour of her distress, a kind and intelligent neighbour had given him a few rough lessons in penmanship, and other rudimentary matters; and thus he was, in point of acquirement, greatly in advance of youths in his humble station.

None will wonder, and few will blame, if the readiness with which he listened to the instructions of this good neighbor was somewhat increased by the fact of his reading in the same book with his preceptor's daughter, Mary Pearson, who was two years younger than himself, and had been his playfellow from her infancy. Oh, what a pure and holy thing is the love of children! how free from the worldliness and vanity which taint the affections of our maturer years! As their studies were pursued together, so were they companions in their amusements. Together they sought the laurel nuts in the copse, or the ground nuts in the meadow, or the wild raspberries that grew in the chasms of the cliffs which overhung the Tees; or searched the shallow bed of that river or its tributaries, for the many coloured pebbles which there abounded, particularly those which, simple geologists! they were wont to call yellow ochre and red lead.

But promotion, if it always brings grief, sometimes brings pain; and thus it was when the earl, with a liberality which could not be availed of, offered to take the charge of Edmund's fortune, and, as a preliminary step, to place him at school at Durham. Mary, and very bitter, were the tears which this simple-minded and affectionate pair shed, at the breaking up of that companionship which has never been interrupted for a day! Let us not dwell upon the misery of their separation, which, however, was not without its balm to each—the assurance of the other's constancy. For Mary's affection, absence was the only trial to which it was likely to be subjected; but it was far otherwiser with Edmund. He was about to enter upon another and more elevated scene, where temptations would assail him on every side, and in every form. The protégé of a rich and powerful nobleman, he found that his humble birth and simple manners were no safeguard against the flattery of those around him; and ambition would point to many a high path, in which the humble maiden whom he had left in his native valley could not walk by his side.

Weeks passed away, and Mary heard no tidings of her beloved one, except indirectly, that he was well, and was drawing near to himself as an adept and persevering scholar. But she did not doubt his truth; true, she knew not of the temptations which beset him—but if she had, she would have trusted still; for woman is confiding, and, if she ever learns to distrust, it is to man that she owes the bitter lesson.

But the temptations against which he prayed when he left his pillow, and when he sought it again, was not permitted to prevail. He had learned to walk by a holier light than the flickering flame of human passion, and his feet swerved not from the right way. One morning, while Mary was busied in her household occupations, a groom from the earl of * * * rode up to the door, and put a letter into her hand. The writing was different from any she had ever seen, but she knew it was Edmund's, for her heart told her so. And what did that letter say? Oh! it was full of feeling, and therefore full of poetry—the poetry not of romance, but of the heart. It told her of all his hopes—and his plans; but in every little picture which he drew of the future, she saw herself in the foreground. It told her he was happy—happy in the love of his schoolfellows and the respect of his preceptors, but, above all, most happy in the blessed conviction, that, though absent in body, there was between them that communion of mind and thought which defied distance to sever. And oh! how often did Mary read that letter, dwelling upon every word, as a blessing and a source of affection which it breathed! How often has she read it by the mountain spring, her Edmund's favourite spot, till tears of joy and gratitude gushed into her eyes from a fountain as pure as that which was welling by her side!

And how did that letter come! Edmund had transmitted it in a cover to the earl, and he felt an honest pride in showing his noble patron that he had not forgotten his village maid. Nor did the feeling by which Edmund was thus influenced pass unappreciated by the earl, who held it to be honorable to the maiden, as well as to the youth; and when, in the course of a year or two, Mary was left an orphan, his lordship placed her under his housekeeper, where, without being employed in any of the menial offices, she was perfected in the duties of housewifery, while her education was not neglected.

Time passed away, and Edmund was nearly one and twenty. In the interval he had seen Mary but once; the earl having usually employed him, during his vacations, in little missions to his various estates. It happened that, about three months before the time appointed for Edmund's quitting Durham, he was suddenly sent for by the earl, and accordingly repaired to the hall without delay. His lordship received him in his study; and, after a few commonplace inquiries, said, "Edmund, you may probably have conjectured my intentions with regard to you, from the course of education which I have prescribed to you, as well as from the nature of the business upon which, during the vacations, I have employed you." Edmund professed his ignorance on the subject, with a sincerity which the nobleman could not doubt; and he continued—"My land-steward has long been an aged man, and is now so infirm, that he has requested leave to retire, upon a very handsome fortune, which, I am happy to say, he has honourably made, in my service. Now, the appointment is yours, if you like to accept of it; you are young, it is true, but you have made good use of your time, and I have the most implicit reliance in your steadiness and integrity."

Edmund, who was not prepared for such an offer, was so much overcome that he could with difficulty express his gratitude, which, however, when he had done, the earl replied, "Well, I am glad that it meets your views, inasmuch as I think it will be advantageous both to you and to me. The lodge in the lower park shall be fitted up for you without delay; when," added his lordship, with a smile which he rarely indulged an inferior, "you will not be long, if I am rightly informed, without a housekeeper;" which, as well as a lovely and affectionate wife, Edmund soon found in his own faithful Mary. His aged mother left her cottage to reside with the youthful pair, and brought a blessing with her; for, "whatsoever he did, it prospered in his hand."

SELECTED POETRY.

THE SEA SHELL.

'Tis the hot noon, and pillow'd clouds are stooping
Their burnish'd summits from the soft blue sky;
The leaves upon the far-off trees are drooping,
And not a breath of fresh'n'g air waves by.

For me, no forest twines its shady bowers,
Barring the sunshine from the view of earth;
No stream makes music, and no perfumed flowers
Open their bright leaves, and waken into birth.

O Fancy, aid me with thy dreams of splendour!
Unto mine ears, I lift this ocean shell,
And with shut eyes my useless soul surrender,
Creative Power! to thy triumphant spell

Hark! the glad noise of distant waters booming,
Sounds through the quiet of the summer air;
And, see! above the dim horizon looming,
What cloud-like sails gleam silver and fair!

The ocean billows sparkle bright before me,
On the wide shelving beach entranced I stand;
The screaming sea-bird scents his pinions o'er me,
Or runs with eager haste along the sand!

The rustling waves upon the smooth shore dashing,
Fall back in broad and glassy sheets of light;
Whose golden surface in the sunbeams flashing,
Shines like a mirror to the dazzled sight

The sky is clear, the dallying wind is throwing
Upon my cheek the cool and feathery spray;
O'er the tall pines, a purple haze is glowing,
As though their bending tops he bends his way.

Ah, stay, bright vision! do not thus forsake me;
Spread thy close shadow o'er my heated brain;
Alas, that dull reality should wake me,
From dreams like these to weariness and pain!

SONG OF THE ANGLER.

O waken, waken, waken; the waters are still,
And silence and sunlight recline on the hill;
The angler is watching beside the green springs
For the low welcome sound of your wandering wings!

His rod is unwielded, his tackle unfurled,
And the withe-woven panier lies flung on the mead;
He looks to the lake, through its fane of green trees,
And sighs for the curl of the cool summer breeze.

Calm-bound is the form of the water bird fair,
And the spear of the rush stands erect in the air,
And the dragon-fly roams o'er the lily-bede gay,
Where bask the bold pike in a sun-smitten bay.

O waken, waken, waken! wherever asleep,
On cloud or dark mountain, or down in the deep;
The angler is watching, beside the green springs,
For the low welcome sound of your wandering wings!

WOMAN.

Child of the erring woman's desire,
To man in blissful Eden given,
When you bright orbs of mystic fire
First hymn'd the echoing fountains of heaven.
Oh! hadst thou mock'd the tempter's powers,
The skies had been beneath thy towers,
And man's immortal sire,
Of thee and Paradise possess'd,
Had been beyond the angels' bliss'd!

But this was not ordained to be,
Child of the sorrow and suffering men!
And keenly has the stern decrees
Been felt through ages lapsed between.
High-gifted man thy trespass shared,
And death with this bleak world preferred
To Eden's bowers unblest by thee.
Then waded the sword o'er Eden's gate,
And Paradise was desolate!

Frail, erring child, of birth divine!
Weak, wandering, yet beloved of heaven,
Repentant, low, at mercy's shrine,
Thou heard'st, and art forgiven,
O who, with darkened mind still trace
To thee the ruin of his race,
Nor own that faith is thine,
Which, still omnipotent to save,
Survives and triumphs o'er the grave!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE BIRTH-DAY OF SHAKESPEARE.

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, April 22.

"Great Homer's birth seven rival cries claim—
—But happier, Stratford, thou,
With incontestable laurels deck thy brow
Thy bard was thine, unchoic'd—and from thee brought
More than all Egypt, Greece, or Asia taught.
Not Homer's self such matrics laurels won—
The Greek his rivals, but thy Shakespeare none."—Scot.

SUCH and similar are the impressions which you may feel in entering the pleasant town of Stratford-upon-Avon, in Warwickshire, a county which has not only been distinguished by the birth of Shakespeare within its confines, but also been honoured by those who were once the natives or residents in it, and the ornaments and benefactors of their country—a Rous, a Dogdale, an Addison, a Wati, a Prestly, and a Parr.

Preparations are making for the annual festive celebration of the birth-day of Shakespeare, by the committee of members of the Royal Shakespearean Club. The committee met this day, at the Falcon tavern, to make arrangements for the usual banquet in the great room of the hall. There will not be any procession as in 1827 and 1830, the inclemency of the weather deterring the club from presenting any pageant. It was the same cause that prevented Garrick, in 1769, from carrying out his plan of a public representation of the more prominent characters of Shakespeare's plays.

THE BANQUETING HALL.

The town-hall is now being fitted up for the dinner and concert room. It is a very handsome room, sixty feet long and thirty wide. It is enriched by four large paintings. Over the chairman's seat is a full-length painting of "The" Post, by Wilson, presented by Garrick in 1769. The bard is represented in his study, with pen in hand, intensely looking upwards—the painter, no doubt, bearing in mind the following lines from the play of the Midsummer Night's Dream:

"The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And as imagination catches forth
The form of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothings
A local habitation and a name."

At the opposite end of the room is the fine whole-length of Garrick, placed here in compliment to that celebrated actor at the expense of the corporation. There is also a portrait of Queen Anne, and another of the Duke of Dorset, who was Lord of the Manor and High Steward of the borough at the time of Garrick's jubilee.

The tables of to-morrow's festival are arranged for two hundred guests. The tickets are disposed of under the superintendence of the committee, and bear the appropriate inscription—"You are welcome—take your place." It is expected the attendance will be at least equal to that of last year.

The chancel of the church of the Holy Trinity, and the birth-place of Shakespeare, in Henley-street, are, of course, the great objects of interest to visitors. The former was new roofed, renovated, and restored, two years ago, by a public subscription, (limited to one guinea), and collected throughout Europe and America. It is a beautiful fabric, of the religious style of architecture of the fifteenth century. The particulars of the monument of Shakespeare may be new to many of our readers.

The effigy of Shakespeare was originally coloured, to resemble life, and its appearance, before touched by innovation, is thus described in an old work on the church: "The eyes were of a light hazel, and the hair and beard auburn. The dress consisted of a scarlet doublet, over which was a loose black gown, without sleeves. The cushion before him was of crimson velvet and the upper part green, with gold tassels." The arms are in a position for writing, and this day some votary to the shrine had placed a pen in the hollow between the thumb and forefinger of the right hand. It is generally supposed that an iron pen was originally so placed.

In the year 1748 this monument was carefully repaired, and the original colours preserved as nearly as possible. Mr. John Ward, grandfather to Mrs. Siddons, and the owner of a theatrical company, gave the receipts arising from the representation of Othello (September 9, 1748,) to defray the expenses thus incurred. In 1793 the bust and figure above, together with the figure of "John a Combe," were, at the request of Malone, the commentator, painted a stone colour with white lead. This instance of bad taste was satirized in one of the books in which visitors enter their names:

"Stranger, to whom this monument is shown,
Invoke the poet's curse upon Malone,
Whose meddling zeal his barbarous taste displays,
And ousts his tomb-stone as he marks his plays."

It is remarkable there are no monumental inscriptions to other persons of the name of Shakespeare, except his wife, who it is recorded died on the sixth of August, 1623, at the age of sixty-seven years.

The monuments and inscriptions in the chancel and in the church are numerous, but the attention is directed to the spot sacred to the ashes of Shakespeare. All that is earthly of this incomparable writer is on the north side of the chancel under a flat stone, which is never walked upon by the visitors, who generally insert their names, address, &c. in books kept by the vestry woman. There are many beautiful poetical effusions in the handwriting of princes, poets, historians, statesmen, and warriors. One by Lucien Bonaparte is very fine, but we have no room for extracts. Similar books are kept in the room the bard was born in, and here the walls and ceiling are so completely covered that it is difficult to find an inch to pencil your name. Indeed, many great names the writer saw there in former years are quite illegible from being written over.

THE COUNT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

The Count Rostopchine was the favourite minister of Paul the First of Russia. He was a man of considerable real wit, and might have been a man of great fortune. He came to Paris towards the close of his career, and was exceedingly popular in the highest circles. They expected to see some "ferocious tartar" or "political incendiary," as the Duchesse d'Abrantes calls him in her memoirs, and they found a cheerful, lively, and agreeable person. He had seen much of the world. His collection of anecdotes was varied and piquant. One day he said that he ought to write his memoirs. The next morning the Count brought her a little roll of paper, which he placed in her hands with great gravity. "What is it?" said the lady, looking at the little packet with some degree of awe, as it lay in the palm of her hand. "Madame," said the Count, "I have yielded to your suggestions—I have written my memoirs. There they are." The lady was not a little surprised at the promptitude of this literary work, and not in the least expected such an account of the Count's life as that which follows. In its wit and piquancy, it reminds one of Voltaire:

"My Memoirs, or myself laid open to the world, written in ten minutes."

TABLE OF CHAPTERS.

"1. My birth—2. My education—3. My sufferings—4. My privations—5. Memorable periods—6. Picture of my moral character—7. Important resolutions—8. What I was, and what I should have been—9. Respectable principles—10. What I liked—11. What I disliked—12. Analysis of my life—13. Rewards from on high—14. My epitaph."

CHAP. I.—My birth.

"In 1765, on the twelfth of March, I came from darkness into the full light. I was measured, I was weighed, and I was baptized. I was born, I know not why, and my parents thanked heaven without knowing for what."

CHAP. II.—My education.

"I was made to learn all kinds of things, and every sort of language. By dint of impudence and charlatanism, I sometimes passed for being learned. My head became a badly-arranged bookcase, of which I kept the key."

CHAP. III.—My sufferings.

"I was put in torment by masters who taught me; by tailors, who made me tight clothes; by women who had designs on me; by ambition; by vanity; by useless regrets; by sovereigns, and by souvenirs."

CHAP. IV.—My privations.

"I have been always deprived of these great enjoyments of the human race—stealing, gluttony, and pride."

CHAP. V.—Memorable periods.

"At thirty I gave up dancing; at forty, all idea of pleasing the fair sex; at fifty, all subservience to public opinion; at sixty, all attempts at thinking; and I have become a true sage, or an egotist, which is synonymous with it."

CHAP. VI.—Picture of my moral character.

"I was stubborn as a mule; capricious as a coquette; giddy as a child; lazy as a young girl; active as a Buonaparte; and the whole—as much as you please."

CHAP. VII.—Important resolution.

"Never having been able to make myself master of my physiognomy, I gave full reins to my tongue, and contracted the habit of thinking aloud; that procured me some fun, and plenty of enemies."

CHAP. VIII.—What I was, and what I should have been.

"I was exceedingly alive to friendship—to confidence; and if I had been born in the golden age, I might have been quite an excellent person."

CHAP. IX.—Respectable principles.

"I was never implicated in a marriage nor a calumny; I never recommended a cook nor a physician; and consequently I never attempted any man's life."

CHAP. X.—What I liked.

"I was fond of small parties, and a walk in the woods. I had an involuntary veneration for the sun, and his setting often made me sad. In colours, I loved the blue; and in eating, roast beef and horse-radish; in drink, pure water; in amusement, comedies and farces; in men and women, open and expressive countenances. Hump-backed persons of both sexes always have had for me a certain charm, which I cannot define."

CHAP. XI.—What I disliked.

"I kept away from fools and scoundrels, and from women who pretend to be over-virtuous. I hated affectation. I pitied men who were effeminate, and women who rouged. I had an antipathy to rats, liquors, metaphysics, and rhubarb. I had a dread of law and mad dogs."

CHAP. XII.—Analysis of my life.

"I wait for death without fear, without impatience. My life has been a poor melo-drama, with grand dresses and scenery, in which I played the heroes, the tyrants, the lovers, the old men—but never the servants."

CHAP. XIII.—Rewards from on high.

"My great happiness is to be independent of the three individuals who reign in Europe. As I am tolerably rich, I never meddle in affairs of state, and care not for music. I have nothing to do with Rothschild, Metternich, or Rossini."

CHAP. XIV.—My epitaph.

"Here is placed, to take his final rest, with a worn body and a tired soul, a poor, old, dead devil—gents and ladies! pass on."

Such was the autobiography of the Count, of whom the following bon mot was often spoken by Talleyrand, as cutting: "I come," said he, "to France, to judge for myself of the merits of three great men—the Duc d'Orleans, Prince Talleyrand, and Potier. The last one alone appears to me equal to his reputation." One day that the Emperor Paul was surrounded by a crowd of Russian princes, he suddenly turned to the Count, and said: "Why are you not a prince?" After a moment's hesitation at this singular question, the Count replied: "It is because my ancestors arrived in Russia in winter." "In winter? how could that hinder you from being a prince?" "Why, when the Tartar first appeared at court, the Czar asked him whether he would have a pelisse or the title of prince. The winter was cold, and he chose the latter." Paul laughed heartily at this reply, and, turning to the courtiers, said: "An, gentlemen, you ought to congratulate yourselves on having ancestors who did not arrive in winter."

ANCIENT SIMPLICITY.—Paufling, in his life of Washington, gives the following little anecdote of the mother of this great man:—"She was once present and occupied the seat of honour, at a ball given to Washington at Fredericksburg, while in the full measure of his well-earned glory, and when nine o'clock came, said to him with perfect simplicity, 'Come, George, it is time to go home.'"

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

THE DAY WAS DARK.

The day was dark, save when the beam
Of noon through darkness broke,
In gloomy state, as in a dream,
Beneath my orchard oak;
Lo, splendour, like a spirit came,
A shadow, like a tree;

While there I sat, and named her name,
Who once sat there with me.

I started from the seat in fear;
I look'd around in awe;
But saw no beauteous spirit near,
Though all that was I saw;
The seat, the tree, where oft in tears
She mourned her hopes o'erthrown,
Her joy cut off in early years
Like gather'd flowers half blown.

Again the bod and breeze were met,
But Mary did not come;
And e'en the rose, which she had set,
Was faded ne'er to bloom!
The thrush proclaimed in accents sweet,
That winter's reign was o'er;
The bluebells throng'd around my feet,
But Mary came no more.

I think, I feel—but when will she
Awake to thought again;
No voice of comfort answers me;
But God does nought in vain:
He wastes no flower, nor bud, nor leaf,
Nor wind, nor cloud, nor wave;
And will be waste the hope which grief
Hath placed in the grave!

SINGLE LIFE.

I would by no means persuade you or no woman to prefer a single life. It is not the "primrose-path." Nothing less than a spirit of meekness, or self-renunciation and of benevolence, can make a woman who has once been first, happy in a subordinate and second best position. And this, under ordinary circumstances, is the highest place of a single woman. Depend upon it, my dear young friends, it is safer for the most of us to secure all the helps to our virtues that attend a favourable position; besides, married life is the destiny heaven has allotted to us, and therefore best fitted to awaken all our powers, to exercise all our virtues, and call forth all our sympathies. I would persuade you that you may be the cause of happiness to others, and of course happy yourself—for when was the fountain dry when the stream continued to flow? If a single life, according to the worst view of it, is a moral desert, the faithful in their passage through it, are refreshed with bread from heaven, and water from the rock.—Miss Sedgwick.

DOUBT.

Doubt, when radiant smiles are shining,
Doubt, when clasping hands are twining,
Doubt, when honied words are flowing,
Doubt, when blushes warm are glowing,
But never doubt that truth exists
That glens in a woman's tear.
Doubt, when mirthful tones invite thee,
Doubt, when gayest hopes delight thee,
Doubt, what'er is fondest, fairest,
Doubt, what'er is brightest, rarest,
But oh, believe that truth can live,
In hearts that suffer and forgive.

TOPICS FOR THOUGHT.

Give no quarter unto those voices which are of thine inward family, and having a root in thy temper plead a right and propriety in thee. Examine well thy complexional inclinations. Raise early batteries against those strongholds built upon the rock of nature, and make this a great part of the militia of thy life. The political nature of vice must be opposed by policy, and therefore wiser hominists project and plot against sin; wherein, notwithstanding, we are not to rest in generals, or the trite stratagems of art. That may succeed with one temper which may prove unsuccessful with another. There is no community or commonwealth of virtue, every man must study his own economy and erect these rules unto the figure of himself.—Sir Thomas Brown.

Guilt, though it may attain temporal splendour, can never confer real happiness; the evil consequences of our crimes long survive their commissions, and, like the ghost of the murdered, forever haunt the steps of the malefactor; while the paths of virtue, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of pleasantness and peace.—Sir Walter Scott.

Man is designed for an active being, and his spirit, ever restless, if not employed upon worthy and dignified objects, will often rather engage in mean and low pursuits, than suffer the tedious and listless feelings connected with indolence; and knowledge is no less necessary in strengthening the mind, than in preserving the purity of the affections and the heart.—Sir Humphrey Davy.

How quick is the succession of human events! The cares of to-day are seldom the cares of to-morrow; and when we lie down at night, we may safely say to most of our troubles, "Ye have done your worst, and we shall meet no more."—Coppee.

The great essential to our happiness is the resolution to perform our duty to God as well as we are able; and when this resolution is deeply infix'd, every action and every pursuit brings satisfaction to the mind.

The most important truth cannot be too early learned, nor the journey that leads heavenward too soon begun. The enemy is awake while we slumber, and if we neglect to cultivate the good seed, his tares will cover all the surface.

ORIGINAL PAPERS FROM ABROAD.

THE GRACEFUL MAN,
AND MISERIES AND MORALITIES OF GRACEFULNESS.

BY WILLIAM COX.

I AM exceedingly sorry for my friend George Pumpkin. He is a worthy, kind-hearted fellow, and deserved a better fate. In the very prime of life, in the flush and vigour of his faculties, animal and intellectual—in the possession of health, wealth, and leisure—yet has a cloud gathered over his young existence—a fatal idea, a hopeless hope, taken possession of his mind, driving from thence peace, happiness, serenity, and calm content.

He has taken it into his head to become a Graceful Man! I talked to him like a father—I reasoned with him as a friend. I showed him the utter impossibility of the thing coming to pass. I pointed out to him that his hands were large, his feet still larger; I dwelt with force and unctious upon the angularity and unevenness of his shoulders, the general incoherence and unsymmetrical character of his limbs, the height of his cheek bones, the partial obliquity of vision with which it had pleased nature to endow him, (his left eye, in particular, being especially rebellious, always looking the way he does not want it), and showed plainly and perspicuously the utter incompatibility of those matters with gracefulness.

And what was the result of my honest zeal? How was I repaid? He almost doubted my friendship!

But I had a duty to perform, and I nerved myself for its performance. I took a retrospective view of the case. I avowed my belief that even in the dark abyss of the Past—before Time was so far as he (Pumpkin) was concerned, it had been pre-ordained that he should not be graceful; that Fate must have taken a vow to that effect, and in order to make good her words, had given him a raw-boned Vermont farmer for a father, and a woman only one degree removed from pure Dutch descent for a mother.

The perspiration started from his forehead as dark fears of the truth of this forced themselves unwillingly upon his mind.

"When you talk of a graceful Greek or a graceful Italian," said I, "people recognise the propriety of what you say as readily as the term had been applied to a greyhound, an antelope, a blood-horse, or a swallow upon the wing; when you say a graceful Persian, a graceful Georgian, or a graceful savage, they demur not; a graceful Turk, or a graceful Pole, they consider, and then assent; a graceful Spaniard, or a graceful Frenchman, they consider again, and then dissent, for incongruous ideas of stiffness and pomposity on the one hand, and violent gesticulation and misplaced flexibility on the other, force themselves on the mind; but when you come to the Teutonic family, and mention such anomalies as graceful Englishmen, graceful Germans, or graceful Americans, (leaving, of course, in all three cases, the ladies out of the question,) sensible people smile incontinently; and when you go so far as to talk of a graceful Scotchman, (the Celtic race excepted,) or a graceful Dutchman, they laugh outright at the intense absurdity of the thing."

This made an impression, but "oh truth! disguise thyself as thou wilt, still art thou a bitter draught!"

Pumpkin's face assumed that peculiar appearance which is characteristic of those whose owners have just swallowed physic.

I then, as delicately as the subject would allow, drew his attention to the construction of his revered parents, neither of which, he was obliged to admit, would have been selected as models by a statuary—alluded slightly to the hippopotamus formation of his grandmother, and then appealed to both zoology and physiology if anything like grace could be expected from such a descent—such a rare concatenation of unfavourable circumstances.

He gathered strength from despair. "There are exceptions to every rule," said he, "why may not I be the exception?"

Had we been in a room, I would have led him to the glass for an answer. We were in the street, so I contented myself with telling him that if he persisted in the pursuit of the graces, and even partially succeeded, he would, under all the circumstances of the case, make himself a marvel—a show—an everlasting curiosity—a perpetual subject of speculation.

He said he did not care suppose he did!

We shook hands coolly for the first time and parted; Pumpkin to dress for an evening concert, and I to reflect upon the agreeable results of good advice.

Yet was he my friend, and I could not but turn to look after him. Wrapt in thought—doubtless pondering on what had just passed between us—in attempting to cross the street, he stepped right into the middle of a pool, ran bump against a cart, upset an old woman, and went through a series of the most curious evolutions imaginable, in order to avoid being run over by two omnibuses driving in different directions.

Graceful, thought I, to the last degree.

Pumpkin and I have since renewed our intimacy, for he is of a pliable disposition, and I have had ample opportunities of appreciating the miseries of gracefulness as cultivated by my misguided and unhappy friend. All men know what a bore it is daily to go through the disagreeable but certainly necessary operation of putting on their clothes. But what is the simple putting on of garments to the fret, the anxiety, the torture of body and mind endured twice or thrice daily by poor Pumpkin, in order to ensure what he aims especially at—a "graceful negligence"! And yet, after all, he generally appears, as all must who are not "native and to the manner born," stiff, constrained, and uncomfortable. Even

I, his gothic friend, succeed better than he does, for though I make no sort of progress in "grace," yet, on all hands, my attainments, as far as negligence is concerned, are undisputed.

The man, too, has the self-sacrificing spirit of a martyr. In a better cause, and in more barbarous times, he would assuredly have enjoyed the honour of being put to death. An anecdote, by the way, in part, illustrate this. Pumpkin has a discriminating palate; as a natural consequence, he is particularly partial to oysters. We were at the theatre together one evening. Mrs. —, who is so fond of playing fine ladies instead of fine ladies' maids, was on the stage at the time with a fan in her hand, which she was using, or rather misusing, most vilely. I carelessly remarked that "she was about as graceful in the use of it, as a man was in the eating of an oyster."

Pumpkin started as if a pistol had been discharged at his ear. The remark sank deep into his mind, and like a barbed and poisoned arrow in the flesh, it lodged and rankled there.

Poor fellow! I never saw him eat an oyster more! From that evil hour he eschewed not only that delicious animal in particular, but bade a long, a last adieu to the whole crustaceous tribe!

It has been said that the Americans abstaining from drinking taxed tea, was the greatest sacrifice to liberty ever made by a nation. The cause was nobler, doubtless, and as a long-continued national sacrifice, it was wonderful. But regarding the nation as a congregation of individuals, was there any single case equal in merit and intensity to that of Pumpkin's. Oh, ye to whom oysters are dear exceedingly, and who rejoice in shrimps, prawns and lobsters, speak!

About this time, too, he brought on a severe illness by swallowing the stones of some cherries after dinner, from the dislike to the usual manner of getting them out of the mouth. His mind, also, became afflicted with having doubts as to the gracefulfulness of sucking peaches and oranges.

He told me one day he had serious thoughts of leaving his native land for ever—of quitting for aye the scenes of his childhood, endeared to him by a thousand recollections, etc. etc., and of passing the remainder of his existence beneath a far, foreign sky.

I inquired his reason.

He said the chewing of tobacco had got to such a pitch!

He was prevented from carrying his design into execution by seeing two he foreigners kiss and embrace each other in the street. He thought it worse than expectorating.

Poor Pumpkin! What will become of him is rather difficult to say. If he goes on in this fashion, he will certainly refine himself to death. But perhaps he may take a wife. 'Tis a desperate remedy, doubtless, but his case is desperate. Should such an event take place, it is not impossible but he may yet be met with his hat unbrushed, his shoes untied, his coat white at elbows, and all that careless desolation about him which formerly marked the lover, but now betrays the married man.

In truth, Pumpkin was altogether in the wrong. Those graceful fancies do not sit well on the industrious, bustling, strong, active men of the North and West, who do everything at full speed, and have their energies engaged in a constant match against time. Their bones and sinews are not constructed for elegant, trifling, or voluptuous indolence. Constantly occupied in struggles with the elements and in overcoming the niggardliness of nature, or the obstacles she has placed in their way, they have contracted and inherited habits and manners which pretty well set all attempts at high polish at defiance. The English and Americans, as nations, are very decidedly ungraceful. Exceptions may, doubtless, be found, principally among the aristocracy of the former country and the southern planters of the latter, but not to any overwhelming amount. Neither are their minds of the alternately soft and fervent, languid and fiery nature, which characterises the temperament of the graceful Southern and Oriental people, but are as angular and untractable as their bodies. Bold, resolved, persevering, headstrong and obstinate, when they determine that a thing shall be done, they will have it done at all hazards; and so long that it be done to the purpose, the manner of doing it, whether graceful or otherwise, concerns them but little; but as for stopping them, right or wrong, or turning them from the career of their humour, you might as well attempt to stop or turn a steamboat with a pair of gloves.

It is, perhaps, as well that it is so. Those qualities render the John Bulls and Jonathans often uncouth and sometimes unamiable in small matters, but they answer admirably in the carrying on and completion of enterprises of "pith and moment." The "native hue" of their resolution is not often "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." They have uncommon faith in their own energies. They think they can perform great things, and they do perform them, but as for elegant trifling and the minor graces of manner—good lack! Bears have danced sarabands, certainly—in what style is a different question.

Had the Italians settled these United States, both manners and morals, doubtless, would have been a great deal more easy and unconstrained than at present, grapes would have grown where tobacco grows, and there would have been an opera-house in all the Atlantic cities—but there would have been no Cincinnati! The bears, wolves and Indians, would have had a lease of the western wilderness for a few generations to come; and the Mississippi, unvexed by steamboats, would yet have rolled its waters in silence to the ocean.

Or had the French bent the royalists and provincials in the old time, and overspread the country, what would have been the result? It is to be doubted whether manners, even, would have been materially improved, and other matters would have been a great deal worse. The French have a vanity and vivacity about them which keep them continuously in motion, and sometimes assume the appearance of energy, but they really effect very little. They make and unmake, pull down and set up, revolutionize and constitutionize at a rapid rate, but, after all their labour, they leave off pretty much as they began. Like a blind horse in a mill, they go over a great deal of ground without getting any farther forward. With all their many amiable qualities, their gallantry, intelligence and natural quickness, as colonists they have been signally unsuccessful. And yet they possess a quality apparently admirably suited to a new country or fresh state of things in which the Americans, and more particularly the English, are singularly deficient—namely, the easy and facile manner in which they yield to circumstances, and adapt themselves to suit the contingencies of any given case. The Anglo-Saxon race cannot do this: habit with them is a strong second nature. They are mightily intolerant; they must have their own way; so, instead of yielding to circumstances, they make the circumstances yield to them, and leave the impress of their minds, manners, habits, whims, laws and customs wherever they set their foot. This, though attended with a good deal more trouble, seems to be the most lasting and effectual way of doing business.

But because they have done much they are not to pride themselves on their deficiencies, which they are rather apt to do. Pumpkin's theory was good, only his practice was ridiculous. Roughness is no virtue, and awkwardness far from being desirable; and they ought, therefore, to yet rid of their uncouthness in the best way they can devise; only, when answered at, and answered for, in mere manner, they may console themselves with the reflection that they are the pioneers of liberty and civilization all over the world.

ORIGINAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

The following letter, from the pen of a highly intellectual lady of this city, will be read with interest. It discusses the theory of dreams in a manner peculiar to herself. The facts adduced are certainly ingeniously interwoven with her own fancies, and well worthy the consideration of all persons curious in such matters. We commend the communication to the attention of the reader.

THE THEORY OF DREAMS.

TO JUDGE HOPKINSON ON READING HIS LECTURE ON DREAMING.

MY DEAR FRIEND—I return the manuscript lecture with many thanks. I like it very much, and I should be surprised if any sensible person thought differently of it—as far as it goes, it is excellent.

I have been, as the Quakers say, very much exercised on the subject of dreaming, and of late years have carefully watched the whole process. That is—my attention has been directed to the period when dreaming commences, and when it ends. This investigation has resulted in an entire belief that we never dream in the common sense of the word, but that there is a twilight consciousness, tapering off from vivid thought to complete oblivion.

During a protracted convalescence, I had ample time to investigate this curious phenomenon, and I became so morbidly acute, that I could recall the last thought of consciousness ere judgment ceased to act. I perceived that the slightest noise in the middle of the night aroused me to consciousness again, and during the period of my first arousing, to complete awakening, a period of not more than twenty seconds, I have dreamed strange and often affecting incidents.

I know, from various circumstances, that the period of dreaming these fancies did not exceed the time specified, and we know likewise that there are many cases on record where the events of years have passed before the mind in the space of a few seconds. I would adduce the beautiful illustrative story in the Arabian Nights' Entertainment, as a proof that this fact was not unknown to the Orientalists, did I not fear to be told that the whole work was marvellous and meant so to be.

One of my sisters in her early married life used to compare chancery bills with her husband—was then clerk in chancery. It became at length quite mechanical, and she could read aloud without much mental effort. One morning, while reading a very long bill, and, of course, very much fatigued, she dropped asleep and dreamed that she prepared a large supper and invited many guests to meet a friend of theirs who had just come from abroad. She attended personally to every part of the business, saw the table laid, the supper paraded on, and the guests waiting around, but the one for whom it was intended did not come. At length, after much fretting and fears of the supper getting cold, and the guests impatient, the door at length opened and their friend appeared. "Oh Mr. D.," said she, "how long you have kept us waiting!" "What do you say?" said her husband—"Oh, bless me," said she, "I have been dreaming; I really have been asleep."—"That could not be," said he, "for you have gone on reading correctly and never stopped till you made that exclamation!"

Now all this dreaming could only have occupied a second or two, and yet it appeared to her of several hours' duration. Only consider that in our waking moments what a vast deal of ground we can travel over, and how many incidents can be crowded in the space of a few seconds. We can cross the Atlantic, with many glimpses of the terrors of the sea—go through London—the tower—the palace—see numberless strange people, and actually feel all the emotion that we should feel in reality, were those things present. If judgment did not stand at the portals and keep us from wandering too far—that is—if judgment slumbered at its post, we should still go across the Atlantic and see strange and curious things, but they would be all jumbled together, topsy turvy—and this would be what is called dreaming.

Having therefore satisfied myself that to dream is merely to think without the supervision of the regulating faculty of the mind—judgment—all that is mysterious and perplexing in this strange state of our being, has ceased to be a cause of such intense wonder to me.

Judgment—for I shall not enter into the question of its collateral aids, the reflective or retrospective powers—is the guardian and perpetual adviser of all the faculties of the mind. It watches over them in this grave and playful mood, and conducts them to the definite if not to safe conclusions. It occupies the central point of the sanctum sanctorum, and with its single eye it regulates the whole mental machinery, keeping up the unities and proprieties.

Any one of the least observation must be aware of the continual demands upon the organs of comparison, and upon that faculty which is called judgment. Quickly as our thoughts are formed into opinions and resolutions—eventuating in immediate action—such as the turning of the eye, the lifting of the finger—we perceive that they have undergone a rigorous examination; we feel within us that there has been a debate among the faculties, and that one of them has influenced us to act.

We do not, to be sure, always decide according to the dictates of our reasoning powers, but that is not the question at present.—I am merely speaking of judgment; and it may be either good or bad according to the received opinions of the society in which an individual moves. Whatever we decide to do or to omit, it is this faculty which directs us, be it right or wrong. It is incorrect to say that a man acts contrary to his judgment when he commits arson, or murder; he certainly deemed it convenient to commit crime; he therefore did it, but it was his judgment that decided the question. When a man commits himself actually to the dictates of mere judgment, if his purpose is murder, it is not to decide whether he shall commit murder, but what is the safest way of doing it. If he consults his judgment as to the right or wrong of the act, judgment will decide for him that it is wrong, for judgment is dependent on the progress of civilization and conventional rules.

As this faculty is so vigilant and is always exercising its powers during consciousness, it follows that the muscles, nerves, and membranes of the brain, where it is especially located, must sometimes want repose, relief from tension. Nature therefore has provided a scheme by which this relief can be obtained, and a few hours suspension from its arduous labours—I mean the labours of the locals—will renew the gasses and fluids, and thus refresh the organ which was exhausted by incessant action.

But though the judgment, including its material adjuncts—for we must speak of spirit and matter conjointly—requires this suspension of labour, this renewal of the secretions, in order that the equilibrium may be restored; the imaginative faculties, not having any responsibility either of thought or action, are not in such a complete state of exhaustion, and can therefore exert their powers for a much longer period. Like children and weak inefficient persons, they run riot and commit a thousand extravagances, throwing everything into utter confusion and into incongruous heaps, the instant their guide leaves them to their own fancies.

The moment that judgment succumbs to the wants of nature—the moment she falls asleep—the irresponsible faculties then make crooked excursion and perform acts, or rather suggest fancies, which the method of judgment would condemn. For, notwithstanding that arson and murder, in the waking moments, and when the system is in perfect health, bear the evidence of insanity, yet judgment has exercised its power and has decided on the proper course to effect the purposes intended. Judgment is the slave of the lamp and must obey when called upon, but it is not responsible for the kind of action on which it is to decide.

When judgment is on the alert, all the unities are observed, but when it is compelled to relax by the examination of those material parts on which alone its acts are convertible to use, then we cannot depend on the various combinations which the will allows us to conjure up. In the variety of phantasmagoria which succeed each other, we find that there is no consecutive arrangement, no unity, no regular chain, not even association of ideas in its true sense. But when the judgment is broad awake, we may in a reverie, or bravado study, fancy things equally strange, and build castles in the air, but there is always philosophy at the bottom of these speculations.

This master slave of the mental powers only acts therefore when the materials by which means it operates is energetic and in a state of eucrocy. But when the unities are not preserved, we must infer that there is some morbid, preternatural excitement in the parts—such as produce insanity—or such as produce entire relaxation as when we are in the state of sleep. In the former case there is no regular work done, either mentally or bodily, being all random thoughts and actions for which the judgment is not responsible, for it is not present; and in the latter case, also, that faculty being at rest, there is no work done at all, either by the mental or bodily powers. There is in complete sleep a suspension of all but the mere vitality of being—a paralysis—total unconsciousness.

In what consists the difference between our day and night dreams? To be sure, we call the former thoughts and the latter dreams, but those are distinctions without a difference as to the complexion of both. Even in our day dreams, how difficult it is with the most resolute intentions to keep the thoughts in consecutive progression. We set ourselves to think of a house which we intend to build; we begin at the foundation, and most willingly would we pursue the subject, step by step, until in our mind's eye the whole is completed. But before we have finished with the vault, some unfortunate association of ideas carries us to the Black-hole of Calcutta—to a agony of respiration—to Harvey—to tumours on the skin—to George the fourth—to Dr. Johnson—Westminster Abbey—marble columns—Balbe—La Martine—Napoleon—Mama Antoinette—the horrors of La Vendée—Mary Queen of Scotland—her noble vindicators—the nonsense of trials by jury—and the incongruous anomaly of court-martials in a government like ours.—All this passes in rapid succession, at the moment when our thoughts should be condensed to the tame matter-of-fact business of house-planning.

In the above wide range, diversified as it has been, we still observe a connexion, each fact is of the same character and order as when it occurred, and we mingle our horror, our admiration, our wonder and our pity as each scene is conjured up before us, and we do all this in the right place as if they were in earnest individually occurring at the moment. We perceive, here, that judgment does not halt, or sleep, but that it hurries rapidly along with us, making prodigious leaps to meet us at every strange turn, so that the panorama shall be of just proportions and the perspective correct. But let judgment go by default—in other words, let judgment fall asleep, and we shall be one of the sufferers in the Black-hole, Dr. Harvey will be the head carpenter of the unbuilt house—George the fourth our President—Dr. Johnson, grinding a barrel-organ—the sad sufferers of La Vendée will be monkeys dancing to the tunes of the organ—and we shall be looking on without feeling the least surprise.

What are those splendid conceptions of Walter Scott—those delicate, faithful delineations of Miss Austen—that magnificent, nay, tremendous burst of intellect, Paradise Lost, but dreams with the preservation of the Unities? What is the Tempest, that wonderful and beautiful creation of Shakespeare, but a connected dream? Many a bright intellect, in his feverish moments of slumber, has seen a Caliban, a sinking ship, and fantastic spirits hovering in the air. Had the membranes, nerves and muscle of the brain been in a healthy, vigorous state, consciousness would have been on the alert, and judgment then would have enabled us to arrange all these vivid pictures into certainty and fitness, though it might never have equalled the conceptions of Shakespeare.

When the mental faculties rest, or sink into complete sleep, there is, therefore, entire exemption of thought and consequently of action—utter oblivion, as in death. The only difference is, that in the latter case the vital spirit can only be reanimated by the hand of heaven, and in the former, the slightest mechanical effort of sound, or touch, can restore consciousness and judgment.

Many circumstances must combine to secure undisturbed sleep; darkness is the first circumstance, for light is an excitant of a very irritating nature. Even in those regions where for a term there is no night, artificial darkness is procured for repose. Perfect health—quiet—a mind exempt from care—are all essential requisites to peaceful sleep. With all these aids, still we cannot sink into utter forgetfulness if we have used too much, or too little exercise, for, as I observed, consciousness does not entirely leave us as long as any of the faculties are in action.

There are some phenomena incapable of proof; by reasoning a priori we take some for granted and philosophy rests contented. Of this fact entire exemption from dreams is one—for the general belief is, that though we imagine we have not dreamed, yet we may have dreamed and forgotten. This we know to a certainty, that the faculties of the brain require rest, that if one requires it the whole may, that they may rest one at a time, or simultaneously. This being granted, we must infer, if all are in a state of complete repose, there can be no dreaming—no thought—either consecutive or disjointed.

The internal termination of the optic nerve is attached to certain portions of the mental machinery. If we press the finger tightly against the inner corner of the eye—one eye is sufficient, for they move, or stop, simultaneously—we shall perceive that the pieces of thinking cannot be preserved. The slightest motion of the eye enables thought to go on again, but when the eye is perfectly still, not even moving the millionth part of an inch, there can neither be a pictorial representation in the mind, nor a regular series of thought. Those who are able—and it requires a nice perception of motion—to keep their eye steady for a few moments, will find that this assertion is correct.

If, therefore, the mere suspension of motion in the extremity of the optic nerve causes a suspension of day thought, we may philosophically infer that complete rest in all the mental functions will prevent night thoughts, or dreaming; for what are day and night thoughts but dreams carried on with and without consciousness and judgment?

The will—a distinct faculty from the judgment—is quite as ready to grant permission to the somnambulist to jump out of the window, and to the insane man to cut his own throat, as it is to allow you, the sanest of mortals, and always wide awake in the day time, to follow a chain of thought consecutively, which shall carry conviction to court and jury. In your case there is euphonic agreement, and your reasoning powers and your judgment go hand in hand; whereas, in the other cases, the imaginative faculties alone are active and still under the influence of the will.

I am sure of one thing—which is, that when I began this letter I never intended to say so much on this little understood question. I shall conclude now, however, by repeating what I have said throughout—that we are for ever dreaming unless we have a day-light, or a twilight consciousness, and that there is this difference between the two states, in the former we have judgment for the master of the ceremonies, who leads us regularly down the contra dance, and in the latter we have an ignis-fatuus which whirls us around an odious waltz, sometimes leading us to the tops of glorious mountains, yet often descending us into quagmires, or into a ball-room without shoes or stockings and sometimes half naked.

You will say—"then you wish to prove that there is no such thing as dreams." I certainly do, in the common acceptance of the terms dreams. People think it a great marvel to find that crude, wild, fantastick unconnected fancies, are chasing each other through their brain, and they wonder why it is so. They puzzle themselves to get a clue to some frightfully distracted phantasma, and if in the course of the preceding day they can recollect the most minute circumstance which bears the slightest resemblance to any part of the dream they are perfectly satisfied. They never stop to inquire how it happens that in our day dreams we so often connect remote impossibilities, and fancy ourselves present with the character of those about whom we are reading. Our faculties are all awake in the latter case and are slumbering in the former.

It may be said that we awaken in a state of much greater terror from a painful dream, than if the same dream were passing through our mind during the day. This is true, but we do not recollect that at this period we have consciousness, and that our judgment is deciding for us at every step. But trifling scenes do pass through the mind, and so vividly, too, that the soul recoils from them as if they were scenes of reality.

Every nerve and muscle in the body requires rest, and it is not at all wonderful that those particularly belonging to the brain should require it as much as those that are more remote. In fact, as volition—or the will—judgment—comparison—and all the reasoning powers, are lodged in the brain, that organ whence all motion emanates, requires more complete rest than those denominated bodily organs; and surely when a thing is at rest it cannot act—for action implies motion.

The mere lying in bed all night, even when the body is in perfect health, does not satisfy the wants of nature. It requires that the mental powers shall lie down too. We may lie ever so still, not moving a single muscle of the body, and yet not feel refreshed, if the mind is active. It is a sure sign of functional disturbance if the dreams are prolonged, and continued through the night it proves that there is still consciousness and that there is but one faculty dormant, that of judgment, therefore those who dream through the night complain of being unrefreshed by sleep.

I could say still more on this curious subject but I shall exhaust your patience. Yours truly, etc. M. G.

DOMESTICK CORRESPONDENCE.

FLORIDA AND THE FLORIDIANS.

Tampa, Florida—Matrimony in the Army—Ladies in the Semnole country—Sentry at Tampa—John Randolph's anathema against Florida—Tallahassee—Hospitality of the Floridians.

You have ever been aware, my dear sir, of the mortal and unconquerable antipathy the Bivins family have ever exhibited towards the mysteries of Hymen; and particularly when those mysteries are pyred into by young and inexperienced people. In a word, my dear sir, you have long known how perfectly hostile I have ever been towards the female sex, by some denominated "God's first and fairest gift;" "the soother of life's weary way;" "the comforter in sickness and in health, in prosperity and adversity, in life and death." Farther than this we cannot go. Being aware, as by this time you must be, of my entire, absolute, incontrovertible and essential opposition to anything wearing at all the semblance of our good mother Eve, (hence the word eyes-dropper), you will naturally follow the path I am about to open for you, and I hope before I shall have left, to conduct you to a spot where you may read in large, long, and conspicuous letters, like the writing at Belshazzar's banquet, "Let no officer of the army marry!"

I do conceive a marriage with a poor officer of Uncle Samuel's service—whose sword and commission constitute his entire estate—"wedlock forced" beyond all "proportion of subjection." Pourquoi? I have journeyed and voyaged over a goodly portion of these United States; I have seen and studied men and things, morals and manners; I have seen life, from the most insolent summit of exulting plenty to the most abject want, between the extremes of joy and grief—yet I have not seen, nor have I read of, anything so peculiarly painful to the feelings of a merciful man as was a trifling occurrence of this morning. You know, my dear sir, that, for many years, a business has been going forward in this land of sun, sand, and flowers, called a Semnole war—that, in its prosecution, many officers have fought and died—that many officers are yet engaged in the contest against an unseen enemy. By some luckless mischance, some, and indeed a majority of these officers, have managed to connect themselves with beautiful and accomplished women. These ladies, animated by a spirit of heroism unsprinkled in our history, have come with, or followed their husbands to the ensanguined and dreaded soil of Florida. This would be all well enough could they remain at Tampa, or on the sea-coast—but think of an accomplished woman living without society at Micapo, Tuscawilla, or any of the thousand and one small posts of the interior, where nothing is seen but the same waste of pine trees, sand and glorious sunshine! This morning I witnessed the departure of some four or five ladies, on a mission of love to the interior God grant such devotion may meet its reward!

As for Tampa, it is another Tempe. From the beach one of the most exquisite sea-views presents itself before you; while your temples are fanned by a delightful breeze. Here everything which can please the eye, ear or palate is at your disposal. Randolph of Roanoke, the most eccentric, bright and satirical genius of Virginia, took occasion once to say upon the floor of Congress—"Florida is a land covered with pools of stagnant water, abounding in tadpoles, alligators, serpents and all manner of noxious and creeping things; 'tis a land of disease and death; a land to which a man would not emigrate from purgatory, no, not even from hell itself." Howsoever true and applicable this chaste eulogy may be with regard to certain parts of the country, it is not so to Florida as Florida! Some portions of the country are unsurpassed, unequalled, unapproached by any in the known world, whether for beauty of scenery, richness of soil or salubrity of climate. I have traversed the entire peninsula, and surely I ought to know. In my opinion, the most delightful part of Florida is found within a circuit of thirty miles around the capital, Tallahassee. This, however, may arise from the association of ideas. Within this circuit of country many of "nature's noblemen" reside, whose hospitable mansions and broad acres evince that they know at least where they live. Governor C—, Colonel G—, Mr. S—, Colonel B—, Mrs. N—, Mrs. W—, are some of those who live after the style of the feudal times. Open hand, open heart, open house, is their motto. It would afford me unspeakable pleasure to see you there—I know you would appreciate such princely attentions. So different is their way from that cold, formal, calculating mode of the "out and outers," that one almost desires the whole world to be constituted of such materials. They possess genuine hospitality ripened by a Florida sun.

Be charitable enough, my dear sir, to believe that all this praise does not come from having eaten a bon vivant dinner, or from an overabundance of good wine—but take it as it is meant, a just and heartfelt tribute. Heaven send more such unto this beggarly world of ours! I think New-York would e'en be vastly improved by an importation of some thousands. People in Gotham, however, do not plant trees, and an old adage says, he that does so loves his kind.

What think you of an investment in this land of sun and flowers, of starry skies, of bright looks and raven locks, of plenty and profit, of generosity and hospitality? C'est le premier pas qui coûte. Suppose you come and look at Florida! Yours inveterately, BIVINS.

THE DRAMA.

A LETTER FROM THE PROPERTIES.

LETTERS innumerable have poured in upon me since last week from every part of the theatre, and from things animate and inanimate, complaints, groans and praise have been thrown together into a strange conglomeration. Do not, for a moment, suppose that in editing and being godfather to these bantlings, I have the slightest idea of assuming to be a critic, for my regard for quiet is too great to place the chances of its loss even in proximity with danger, which would certainly encompass it if any but sugared criticism should fall from the pen. My first letter is from—but no, I'll let it speak for itself.

Mr C. C.

Park Theatre, May.

We would respectfully claim a portion of yours and the public's attention whilst we "a tale unfold." We are separately small matters, and our griefs and rights may by some be considered mere moonshine, but the sequel will explain. We have known a star of the first magnitude ruin his best "point" because we were absent or in bad condition. On such occasions the prompter receives more kicks than coppers, and the placidity of the stage-manager is ruffled, and even Mr. Autocrat Simpson is aroused from his otium cum dignitate, unless, perchance, we do, by invective, what actors do verbally. "gag." Our patronick is "the properties," and from the extended circle of our family connexion, our individual appellations are almost legion. To those who are ignorant of the parts behind the scenes we are like a man's virtues, never acknowledged or regarded till we "are found missing," and we remember a most appropriate anecdote which, though old, we will repeat.

The Thane of Cawdor stood at the wing impatiently awaiting his cue to enter, which should have been—

"A drum, a drum!
Macbeth doth come."

but no cue came, because no drum was sounded. The player raved, the audience hissed, and the life of the property-man could have been purchased for a trifle, when suddenly a blast long and loud was blown on a keyless bugle, which was followed by—

"A trumpet, a trumpet!
Macbeth doth stomp it."

Had our family arrangements been complete, and our brother, the kettle-drum, not been loaned to a militia company, Shakespeare's admirers and the Thane's feelings had not been so severely tried.

Did it ever occur to you that there was a most astonishing unity in the article of chairs, as used on the stage by all people, nations and ages? I assure you several of us have felt, and most keenly, too, this total want of propriety. We hold alike the king, queen, prince and princess, ay, and all the royal family, and the good Martin Haywood and his family; we ornament the palace and the cottage, and are occasionally covered with a kind of red eack, and made to flourish at a ball. We are merely good, plain, three-and-sixpenny wooden chairs, and we know, if our employers do not, that in real life we never grace anything above the kitchen, an ale-house, or an attorney's office. We ought not to be embarrassed, we know, being among old and long-tried friends, but some small allowance should be made for the weakness of chair nature. One of our old-uns, a venerable high-back, arm-chair, painted to look like oak, assures us it has always been so, that since his connexion with the concern, he has held more crowned heads than all the thrones in Christendom, and he is so deucedly conceited on this account, that he always turns up his legs when anything beneath royal blood is seated in him.

Our arms, too, have an unenviable time, especially the guns. An aged musket says he has lied, by construction, so many times, that he is afraid to look a man in the face; and he pledges his word as a musket, that he was used by people who flourished long before the miserable invention of gunpowder, and that he always appeared at the period of match-locks. Another gun made quite a row a few weeks since, because he could not go off in Renzi, for he urged that he had always been on in Coriolanus and other Roman plays, and he could not see that Renzi was any better off than they were. We do not profess any knowledge of history, but we would like to know, if when muskets were first invented, they were as well proportioned and symmetrical as we are!

The spears, say some of them, have been in museums, and they have seen a great variety of spears, and they respectfully ask if all nations used tin spears with red handles, because, if they did not, they (the spears in the Park) must object, though we tell them such small matters are beneath notice, for ladies, when walking in the woods at night, always go without hats, and wear white satin shoes and dresses and silk hose.

The real and imitation daggers, knives and hatchets, have little to say, though they are sometimes most unnecessarily flourished in the air; the swords would respectfully but firmly ask, that foot soldiers will not be permitted to wear four-foot sabres, and that gentlemen will not handle their weapons as though they were hot pokers.

The phial, that always contains such a villainous compound of poisonous drugs, and sends so many people to perdition, wishes, like the lion in Pyramus and Thisbe, to inform the ladies that they need not be alarmed, that it only holds molasses and water, and that it has been used for the same murderous purpose without injury to any one these twenty years.

The "papers," generally called the deed, and which is sometimes so necessary, and forms the matter in controversy during the whole play, must ask a new seal, and that if convenient, the boy will buy a couple of old deeds or mortgages given in '36 and now grown useless.

We have much more to say, but that confounded property-boy has just made his appearance in our room, and is busy taking down the canvass hams and fish, and ducks, and is giving us a nudge in the ribs, so that we have only time to add that we are very respectfully yours,

THE PROPERTIES.

I certainly cannot enter into, and sympathise with, all the feelings of the "properties," but it appears to me, from their ex-parte statement, that they are a much-injured race. I have noticed many discrepancies, and have thought that at times far too little regard was paid to the details of the play. Every play-goer has smiled at the evident discrepancies between the things spoken of by the actors and the things themselves, especially is this true in the matter of jewelry and miniatures. Notwithstanding these letters are dated from the Park, I presume the complaints are about equally applicable to the other establishments.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A BIT OF LIFE'S ROMANCE.

BY JOHN HOWARD WILLIS.

"I tell thee, man, 'tis true—
True, as I hold this dagger by the hilt:
Or, if thou doubtest, straight, with point and edge,
Rid me of eyes and ears for playing false—
I say 'tis true, and I'll sin' balads on't!" New play.

'Tis midnight's lone and silent hour—the moonlight softly falls
On bastion gray and battlement, and olden rampart walls;
In shadow sleep the streets below, while, glittering on high,
Each steepie spire shoots brightly up into the clear blue sky.

'Tis midnight's silence—save, at times, one hears a far-off sound,
Where ringing steel and dashing hooves tell of the vigil round;
By armed men who swiftly ride—and, while we listening stand,
In distance dies the tramping of that watchful soldier band.

And yet, not all is still to rest—for where the flick'ring beam
On yonder turret tower denotes the bay-net's flashing gleam,
The wakeful sentry paces slow, while dreamy memories roam
Across the broad Atlantic to his boyhood's gladsome home.

But hark!—'tis music's witchery which swells upon mine ear,
A lute and voice—a seraph-song from some celestial sphere!
A moment more, and both are hush'd—yet, note their spell-fraught
A warrior form is seen before the lady's latticed bower. [Power,

No snowy plume floats o'er his brow, but well I mark beneath
The watch-cloak's simple folds the shining spurs and sabre sheath;
His charger madly champs the bit, impatient of delay,
Till waving hands and scarf above forbid a longer stay.

A gauntlet white is to his lip, a pray'r is in his heart
For blessings upon her—to him of life and light a part;
An instant, then a clashing leap—the sparkles glimmer round
The hoof-strokes of that noble horse in each receding bound.

Ah! gallant lord, 'twas idly deem'd that mantle's guise would hide
A form whose youthful mien befits high lineage in its pride;
Thy golden belt, that upward gazed, and soul-breath'd sigh—all prove
The fact that captains in "the Guards" do sometimes "fall in love!"

Once more the street is lone and still—the night air's growing cold,
And closed and dark that lady's bower, and gone that "guardman" bold;
Yet, as I turn my homeward steps, I somehow bless the chance
Which gave me proof that life still opens some scenes of sweet romance.

LITERARY ODDS AND ENDS.

A DEFENCE.

Written by Sir Astor Cockayne, about the year 1661

I WONDER why, by foul-mouthed men,
Women so slandered be,
Since it doth easily appear
They're better far than we?

Why are the Graces every one
Pictured as women be,
If not to show that they in grace
Do more excel than we?

Why are the liberal Sciences
Pictured as women be,
If not to show that they in them
Do more excel than we?

Since women are so full of worth,
Let them all praised be,
For commendation they deserve
In ampler wise than we!

EULOGY ON GENERAL WASHINGTON.—In contemplating the revolution of this country, the mind naturally recurs to the means by which so great an object was accomplished, and its eye at once rests upon Washington! A man, a soldier, and a patriot—I take him for all in all, "we shall not look upon his like again." Between Cincinnatus and him, many characteristic features of resemblance may be distinctly traced;—that admirable Roman, after having successfully fought his country's battles, turned the sword of death, into the life-providing ploughshare, and laying down all dignity, save that of human nature, retired to the cultivation of his fields. So did the great, the more than great, the good Washington. Cincinnatus possessed the amor patriæ in no less a degree; but his merit in the possession was certainly less, for, with the first breath he drew, he inhaled the air of freedom, and the first drop of milk that sustained him, was strongly impregnated with the love of liberty! In him, not to have been a republican had been criminal. Not so was it with Columbus's hero. Although born, fostered, and educated under a monarchy, yet, when the great, the paramount call of country, aroused him to the assertion of her rights, he arose a colossal pillar to perpetuate to future ages the glory of the emancipation of America! But why should such a feeble pen as mine attempt an eulogy! His memory is embalmed with the tears of a grateful people, and his immortal part has met that immortality which is the sure reward of the just and good.

DEATH OF MR. T. HAYNES BAYLY.—It is with deep regret we have to announce the death of Thomas Haynes Bayly, Esq., which took place at Cheltenham, in April last, after a lingering illness. He was a man of great taste, of a lively and playful imagination. His poetical talents have been long known to the public, for whom his every ready pen was continually supplying a fund of amusement. He has written the last few years produced a vast number of very clever dramatic pieces, in which style of composition he particularly excelled. His loss will be long and severely felt by his family and friends, to whom he was endeared by his amiable manners and private virtues. His sufferings for the last six months were very great, and he was removed from Bologne about two months since, in the hope that the Cheltenham waters might restore him to health, as he was then apparently improving; but the violence of the remedies he had previously used had shattered his constitution beyond all power of restoration. He expressed himself perfectly resigned to the Divine will, and bore with the calmness and tranquillity of a christian the approach of death. He was watched over with the most earnest solicitude during all this season of trial by her who now mourns the loss of a beloved husband. He has left two daughters.

CLARET.—The wine drunk under this denomination has no more right to be called by that name than Madeira has to be called Serry, or sparkling Perry to be called Champagne. It is neither more or less than a mixture of sundry Bordeaux wines, with hermitage, a wine that grows at Tain, a distance of upwards of 300 miles from Bordeaux, and of Benicarlo, a wine from Spain. How is it that the English (and they are the only nation) can show such want of taste as to drink a fabricated mixture instead of importing the genuine Chateau Lafite and Chateau Margaux Clarets, as they come from the vineyards? The wines of Chateau Margaux and Chateau Lafite are allowed by all true connoisseurs to be the modern nectar of the gods: they invigorate the system without heating it; and as for saying that they do not possess sufficient body to keep in our climate, it is really too absurd to merit even an answer. There is at present in this country some of the genuine Chateau Margaux wine of the vintage of 1811, which was imported into England in 1815. It is now as sound as the day it arrived, and considerably improved in quality by having been so long here in bottle. It possesses more real body and genuine high flavour than any of the made-up stuff sold in London; no mixture would keep and improve like it. This of itself is quite sufficient proof of the absurdity of buying made-up Clarets in London.

A QUEER CASE FOR MIRTH.—The Roman consuls were one day dining with the emperor Caligula, when that monster, or lunatick—for there are doubts as to which he should be termed—was graciously pleased to burst into a loud laugh. Upon the consuls courteously inquiring what witty and admirable conceit had given rise to the imperial mirth, he said he could not tell—and here he laughed louder than ever—when he thought how easily he could have both their heads cut off, and how they would look if he were to have them decapitated! It is not to be supposed that the frank disclosure of the imperial thoughts had a tendency to increase the appetites of the guests.

A SHARP REPLY.—Some years ago, as the late Rev. Dr. Pringle, of Perth, was taking a walk one summer afternoon upon the Inch, two young beaux took it into their heads to break a jest upon the old parson. Walking bravely up to him, and making their bow politely, they asked him if he could tell them the colour of the devil's wig! The worthy clergyman surveying them attentively a few seconds, made the following reply:—"Truly, here is a most surprising case! Two men have served a master all the days of their lives, and don't know the colour of his wig!"

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Isabel; or, Sicily. A pilgrimage." By Henry T. Tuckerman, author of "L'italian Sketch Book." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard. Pp. 200.

The author informs us, in his preface, that the form in which these descriptions and thoughts, suggested by a tour in Sicily, are presented, was adopted for the purpose of avoiding that egotistical tone from which it is almost impossible to escape in a formal journal, as well as to obviate the necessity of dwelling upon those unimportant details and circumstances which are common to every tour in Europe, and therefore too familiar to be interesting. Mr. Tuckerman has succeeded admirably in forming a most agreeable and instructive volume out of his materials. We know of no recent work upon Sicily of one half the merit and interest. Some of the descriptions are exceedingly beautiful, particularly the account of the "journey to Catania," of the ride from "Sciacca to Girgenti," and the sketches of Palermo and Syracuse. There are also some remarks in relation to Bellini, the young and lamented composer of "La Sonnambula," which will be admired by all the lovers of music for their pathos and truth.

"Phantasmion, Prince of Paimland." Two volumes. New-York: Samuel

This constitutes the first number of "Colman's Library of Romance," edited by Grenville Mellen. "Phantasmion" is written by a daughter of the late Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Mr. Mellen, in his preface, with great justice: "There is certainly much to be discovered in this work, of which that great poet might well have been proud to claim the parentage. In strength and originality it seems to be equalled only by the Undine of Fouqué. In the gorgeousness and exuberance of its pictures it is unsurpassed. As a specimen of the supernatural, mingled with its opposite, it has been pointed to with enthusiasm." No one can read "Phantasmion" without admitting the truth of this eulogy. The style, though simple and lucid, is extremely beautiful; and the metrical pieces, which here and there occur, are remarkable for the harmony of their construction, and the high poetical genius they display. The following song we select rather for its brevity than as the most favourable specimen of the author's talent:

The winds were whispering, the waters glistering,
A bay-tree shaded a sunlit stream;
Blasts came blighting, the bay-tree smiting,
When leaf and flower, like a morning dream,
Vanished suddenly.
The winds yet whisper, the waters glister,
And softly below the bay-tree glide;
Vain is their cherishing, for slowly perishing,
It doth but cumber the river side—
Leafless in summer-time.

"John Smith's Letters, with pictures to match." New-York: Samuel Colman. Pp. 120.

The amusing letters from John Smith, relative to the late doings in our disputed territory, which appeared originally in the Mirror, are here published in a neat volume, with "pictures to match." The illustrations are really very well executed, and do much towards enlivening the work. Those who are desirous of possessing the "only authentic history extant" of the disturbances on the frontier, will do well to obtain a copy of these epistles before the present edition is exhausted.

"Means and Ends; or, Self-training." By the author of "Redwood," "Hopes Leslie," etc. etc. Boston: Marsh, Capen, Lyon, and Webb. Pp. 278.

Miss Sedgwick has dedicated this little work to her young countrywomen, and most worthy it is of their cordial acceptance. It is full of excellent and judicious advice upon education, the preservation of health, housewifery, manners, dress, conversation, books, and a variety of other topics immediately interesting to young ladies in their teens, and adapted to the state of living and manners in the United States. The following is a brief specimen of the style.

The most prevailing fault of conversation in our country, and I believe in all social communities, is gossiping. As weeds most infest the richest soils, so gossiping most abounds amidst the social virtues; in small towns, where there is the most extended mutual acquaintance—where persons live in the closest relations, resembling an enlarged family circle. To disturb the sweet uses of these little communities by gossiping is surely to forfeit the benefit of one of the kindest arrangements of Providence. We have heard such talk as follows, between ladies, wives, and mothers, wives of educated men, and persons who were called educated women: "Have you heard that Emma Eliza is going to Washington?" "To Washington! how on earth can the Ellises afford a winter in Washington?" "Oh, you know they are not particular about their debts, and they have six girls to dispose of, and find rather a dull market here." "Two Newtons are going to the country to live." "Bless me! no—what's that for?" "They say to educate their children; but my dress-maker, Sally Smith, who works for Mrs. Newton, says she is worn out with dinner-parties—she runs the house down with company." "Oh, I suspect they are obliged to go to economise. You know she dresses her children so extravagantly! I saw Mary Newton at the theatre—she is not older than my Grace—with a diamond Peronette." "Diamond! was it?" Julia told me it was an agate-marine—the extravagance of some people is shocking! I do not wonder the men are out of patience. Do not tell it again, because Ned Miller told me in confidence: he actually has locked up all his wife's worked pocket-handkerchiefs. Well, whatever else my husband complains of, he can not find fault with my extravagance." Perhaps not; but faults far more heinous than extravagance this poor woman had to account for—the pernicious words for which we must be brought into judgment.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The remarks of "B. B." on "Late Ministerial Changes" are hardly suited to our columns. We must declare them, or also the communications of "T. T.," "Walter," "P. P. C.," "L. N.," "Yeto," "X.," "Pyra," and "T. U. T.,"—In reply to the inquiry of "P. P.," we are not at liberty to disclose the real name of the writer to whom he alludes.—The incubations of the "Hermitt at Saratoga," will, doubtless, be quite acceptable. Send them on.—"C.," on the "Personality of the Press," is scurrilous, but somewhat too gray. Our own opinion is, that people attach an undue importance to such personalities. It is the sensitiveness of the assailed party, which, in nine cases out of ten, provokes a renewal of the attack.—"A. B.," is informed that we have not seen the parallel to which he alludes as appearing in the Philadelphia Gazette. We thought our correspondent's translation very pretty, but do not doubt there might be a better and more original one.—The tomahawk structures of "K." are not at all suited to our taste. He must send them elsewhere.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1839.

The British Queen.—This new and elegant steam-ship is advertised to sail from Portsmouth the first of July. She will accommodate upwards of two hundred passengers. Her model is of the American order, and extremely beautiful. Capt. Roberts, who visited us in the Sirius, is to be her commander. The following is an extract from a letter from a gentleman in Glasgow:—"I yesterday went down to see the British Queen. They are completing the ladies' cabin, and next week put in oil-cloths, carpets, beds, and begin to paint her from stem to stern, outside and in. You will, as well as everybody else, be surprised at her massive machinery. All round the engine-room there is a wide walk (on a level with the saloon floor) protected by a brass railing, so that visitors and passengers may have a fine view of the machinery without interfering with the men. There is a separate entrance to it from the deck; the ceiling of it is panelled, and is to be painted oak and varnished. They are cutting port holes for putting in coals under the deck, and Roberts declares she shall be kept clean. You will be highly gratified with her arrangements throughout. Her 'funnel' was lying on deck, and I took a promenade of sixty feet through, hat on and all standing."

The Alston Gallery.—We have already mentioned that a collection of the works of Washington Allston are now exhibiting in Boston with signal success. There is, probably, no living artist whose combined paintings would form so attractive an exhibition. The favourite pupil of Benjamin West, he has long since excelled his master in the sublimity and matured excellence of his productions. It has been suggested, and we take pleasure in seconding and urging the suggestion, that the Allston gallery after it closes in Boston, should be opened in this city. The owners of the paintings might place them under such care as would ensure their safe-keeping, and an opportunity would be afforded not only of gratifying the friends of the fine arts in New-York, but of doing something towards remunerating an artist who has reflected such lasting honour on the land of his birth. We hope the managers of the exhibition will take this matter into consideration. There is much curiosity here to witness it, and we have no doubt the result would be successful beyond anticipation.

Leggett's Literary Remains.—It was but a week or two since that we announced the appointment of William Leggett as a special envoy to Guatemala. The news of his untimely death, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, much long ere this be familiar to our readers. We learn from the Evening Post, that a collection of his writings is about to be made for the benefit of his family. Some works of his are said to have been left a manuscript, nearly or quite prepared for the press. Though chiefly distinguished as a political writer of signal skill and vigour of style, the mere literary productions of Mr. Leggett would form an interesting and valuable collection. The pages of the New-York Mirror will bear honourable testimony to the power and fertility of his pen. Two handsome duodecimo volumes might be compiled from this journal alone.

Niblo's Saloon and Gardens.—Niblo's new saloon was opened to crowds of visitors on the sixth. Of course, every one will look in there these warm evenings. The entertainments are of the highest and most unexceptionable order, and we are glad to learn they are appreciated by the public. The operatic corps is very strong, and the Ravelis are as attractive as ever.

History made visible.—This is the title of a valuable historical chart, arranged, redrawn and published by J. Irvine Hitchcock, of Philadelphia. It is on the basis of Professor Strass's "Stream of History," which has been improved by the addition of American history on the same plan. We should think the work one of great value to schools, as well as to all interests in historical pursuits.

Asior-House.—We have recently conveyed with many friends from various countries respecting the manner in which this house is managed, and it gives us pleasure to record the general opinion, that there are few hotels in the world so well conducted. Under the direction of Messrs. Boyden, Stetson and Colman, it continues to maintain an enviable reputation.

Power of pantomime.—It is related of Garrick, that a gentleman at the theatre, wholly unacquainted with the English language, fell horror-stricken and senseless on the floor, when the great actor was clutching the "air drawn dagger of the mind," in the well-known soliloquy of Macbeth.

Which is right?—A protracted discussion is going on in some of the eastern papers as to whether a gentleman, in accompanying a lady on horseback, should take the right or the left side. Can any of our fair readers determine the question satisfactorily and conclusively?

Captain Marryatt and the copyright question.—Our gallant friend, the author of Peter Simple, appears to be continually getting into hot water. What with his challenges, his toasts, and his prosecutions, he is never out of trouble of some sort. His late work, "The Phantom Ship," has not only given rise to a difficulty between the author and the publisher, Mr. Colburn, in London, but has been the ground of a lawsuit between two of our own publishers. It appears that an application was made at the United States Circuit Court early in the present term, on behalf of Captain Marryatt, for an injunction to restrain William H. Collier, a bookseller of this city, from publishing and vending a novel called "The Phantom Ship," of which he is the well-known author. We learn from the "Times," that the following was the decision pronounced by Judge Betts:—

"An injunction having been moved for in behalf of the complainant to restrain the defendant from publishing and vending 'The Phantom Ship,' a book composed by the complainant, and the proofs and allegations of the parties in the premises having been heard and duly considered by the court, and it appearing to the court that the complainant is a subject of the queen of Great Britain, and a captain in the British navy, and that his family are domiciled in that kingdom, and the said complainant, after a temporary visit to the United States, left this country for England, and there being no evidence of his intention to return to the United States, animo mandandi, therefore it is to be considered by the court, that on the sixth of November, 1838, when the complainant deposited the title of the said Phantom Ship, in the Clerk's office of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, as charged in his bill of complaint, he was not a resident of the United States, within the intention and meaning of the act of Congress respecting Copyrights, and is not therefore entitled to secure to himself the exclusive right to publish and vend the said book as claimed by his said bill. Whereupon it is ordered and decreed that the motion for an injunction in this behalf be denied." As the law at present stands, we have no doubt this decision was correct, but that the law is a most unrighteous one, and one extremely prejudicial to American literature, we have ever maintained and shall continue to maintain. In the present case the injustice is the more flagrant, inasmuch as Captain Marryatt was in the country at the time he disposed of the copyright of "The Phantom Ship."

Theatrical.—The farewell engagement of Miss Tyeo at the Park has been quite successful. She will carry with her, on her departure from this country, the best wishes of thousands, who have admired her histrionic talents. Although the London stage can poorly spare her at this time, we trust that her return to this country is not without the bounds of probability. The next campaign at the Park promises to be a brilliant one. In addition to the engagements already announced, Mr. Price has secured the services of Mr. Templeton, Miss Inverarity, and Mr. Gindelei, celebrated vocalists; Madame Gindelei, a first-rate dancer; Mrs. Fitzwilliam, one of the most popular actresses of the age; and, though less, not least, our old favourite, Power. Other distinguished actors are also engaged. These, with the talent already in the country, the Taglionis, Miss Clifton, Lecompte, Caradori, etc. promise that there will be no deficiency of attraction at the Park. Mr. Wallace has been active in making arrangements to compete with this starry array, at the National. Charles Kean, Forrest, Vandenhoff and daughter, Miss Shirreff, Wilson, and Seguin, are certainly sufficient of themselves to give brilliancy to the season at that theatre. At the Bowers, Mr. Hamblin seems to be still active in the production of novelties. Maseppa, Nick of the Woods, and Ernest Maltravers have drawn capital houses, and a new drama, founded on "Rookwood," is now announced. It is said to be full of interest.

Rooske's new opera.—A new opera by the composer of "Amilie," entitled "Henrique, or the Love Pilgrim," was produced at Covent Garden theatre in London, the second of May. It was withdrawn after one or two representations, for improvements. The journals speak in high terms of its merits. The Court Journal says, "It abounds in melody, and contains many exquisite bits of beauty, which, although they may not be of that striking character as to command attention, steal the senses by their exquisite sweetness and their delicious melody. Of this character was almost every air in the opera; and, we feel convinced that, if it be somewhat curtailed, so as to bring the performance within moderate limits of time, it cannot fail to become as decided a favourite as its predecessor. At the fall of the curtain upon Henrique, the applause was tremendous—the who's pit rising in a mass."

Tales and Sketches of the Queen City; by Benjamin Drake.—We received from Cincinnati, a week or two since, a book with this title, but as it has been removed by some person or persons unknown from our table, and as we have inquired in vain for it at the bookstores, we have been unable to do the author the ordinary justice of noticing his production. From a very casual glance through the volume, we remember, however, that we were strongly impressed in its favour. The book seemed to us thoroughly American and original, and this alone was, with us, a great recommendation. Every effort towards enfranchising us from our dependency upon English fashionable literature, we shall hail with sincere good-will.

Practice against profession.—A good story is told of a demagogue somewhere at the South, who, recently inveighing at a political canvass against the "silk-stocking aristocracy," was seized by the leg by one of his hearers, who, lifting up the orator's foot to the popular view, showed that he himself had on silk stockings.

The Apollo Gallery.—The second exhibition at the Apollo closes on the fifth of July. Look in, at all events, if you would see the finest collection of paintings in the city.

DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S WALTZ.

AS PERFORMED AT THE BALL GIVEN IN HONOUR OF QUEEN VICTORIA'S CORONATION—COMPOSED BY J. STRAUSS.

MISCELLANY.

STANZAS WRITTEN ON A VERNAL DAY.

Bateaux shone the sun, blue was the day,
The noontide air was very clear;
The highland mountains round our bay,
And all far things seem'd near:
I rested on a primrose bank;
An April softness bathed the breeze,
As 'twere new life my spirit drank
From out the budding trees.

The sportive seagull voyaged by,
Turning his white sails to the sun;
The little birds sang merrily
That spring was now begun:
The snowdrops all had 'en farwell,
But yet some crocus-flowers were bright;
The hyacinth, to nurse its bell,
Drank in the purple light.

Methought to childhood's bloomy track
Life's vagrant footsteps were restored;
And blessings manifold came back,
Long lost, and deep deplored:
The perish'd and the past arose—
I saw the sunny tresses wave,
And heard the silver tongues of those
Cold, cold within the grave!

But yet for them no grief awoke—
They seem'd a part of nature still;
Smelt the young flowers, gazed from the rock,
And listened to the rill—
All was so silent, so serene,
So sweetly calm, so gently gay,
Methought even death no ill had been,
On that pure vernal day.

A HORSE CHAUNTER.—A loafer being brought up before one of the London courts, the judge demanded, "what is your trade?" "A horse chaunter, my lord." "A what? a horse chaunter, why, what's that?" "Yy, my lord, ain't you up to that ere trade?" "I require you to explain yourself." "Vel, my lord," said he, "I goes round among the livery stables, they all on 'em knows me, and ven I sees a gen'man bargaining for an 'orse, I just steps up like a tea-total stranger, and sees I, vel, that's a rare 'un, I'll be bound, sees I, he's got the beautifullest end and neck as I ever seed, sees I, only look at iz open nostrils, he's got vind like a no-go-native, I'll be bound, he'll travel a hundred miles a day and never nounce think on't; them's the kind of legs vat never fails. Vel, this tickles the gen'man, and he sees to 'imself, that 'ere 'onest countryman's a rare judge of a 'orse, so please you my lord, he buys stable, and I axes 'im, vel vat are you going to stand for that 'ere chaunt, and he gives me a sovereign; vel, that's vat I call 'one chaunting, my lord, there's rare little 'arm in't—there's a good many sorts on us, some chaunts canals, and some chaunts railroads.

LETTER WRITTEN BY A POET TO HIS TAILOR.—"Sir—As my coat is doomed to run through a third edition, I hope you will add a strip to the skirt by way of appendix."

TAKE THE HINT.—As well might a mill go without wind, water, or steam, as a press without oil or money.

INNOCENCE MADE MANIFEST.—Among the persons who emigrated to Texas, in the early part of the contest of that country with Mexico, was a young gentleman of the name of Laurens, formerly assistant editor to the New-York Star. He became acquainted with several gentlemen of his own age, also emigrants, in company with a number of whom he one night visited the house of a Dr. Goodrich, where the party remained till morning, Laurens sleeping with his host. In the morning, Goodrich missed his wallet, with a large sum of money, and he accused Laurens of the theft. It was in vain that the latter denied the charge—he was compelled to challenge his accuser, by whom he was shot dead. It is now ascertained that the money was stolen by another of the party, and who was actually Mr. Laurens's second in the duel. Goodrich suffered much from remorse, and came to a violent death at San Antonio. The whole affair forms an admirable commentary on the folly of duelling.

CHIVEL HOAX.—The Lincoln Gazette (an English paper) states that a young lady in that place having a pique against one of her acquaintance, a Miss Barry, procured a suit of men's clothes, and an introduction—and, under pretence of love, induced Miss B. to receive her as a lover. She carried on this hoax successfully for nearly three months, the two lovers wandering round the banks by moonlight every fair evening; and the time was actually set forth for their nuptials. At last a mutin' friend discovered the cheat by accident, and acquainted Miss B with the hoax.

QUACKERY.—"Ma'am," said a juck to a nervous old lady, "your case is a salutary complaint."—"Pray, doctor, what is that?"—"It is a dropping of the nerves, ma'am, the nerves having fallen into the puzantum, the chest becomes moribund, and the head goes tizzizen, tizzizen."—"Ah! doctor," exclaimed the old lady, "you have described my feelings exactly."

KIT KORTH.—What will theadsmirers of the arts say to the following, which is the assertion of no less a man than old Kit North? "One moral saying in article speech, one heaven-descended precept, whether in prose or rhyme, is worth, in sterling value, all that either music, painting, or sculptor, has ever contributed to the advantage of mankind."

RAU DE COLOGNE.—This is the most agreeable, as well as the most useful, of all the perfumes required for the toilet. Persons desirous of obtaining a very superior quality, from the celebrated manufactory of Jean Marin Farina's, will do well to make trial of that now on sale at the German Repository in Wigmore-street; which for delicacy, and fine aromatic fragrance, is unequalled by any that we have made trial of.

A HEAVY FIRE.—A British writer says that no troops that ever took the field could have stood before the fire that was poured from the American lines at the battle of New-Orleans—that it was heavier than any experienced by the British throughout the whole Peninsula contest, and by far more terrible than that which was directed against the ore that stormed St. Sebastian.

KEEPING THE FIELD.—A dispute once occurred between an English officer and a French one, as to which of the armies they respectively belonged to won a certain battle. "I think the victory remained with us," said the Englishman, "for a very large portion of our force kept the field." "A very large portion indeed," replied the Frenchman, drily—"the killed and wounded."

THEATRICAL POFF.—It is stated in the Sunderland Herald, that at the benefit of the stage-manager of that town, "the house was so densely crowded, that the audience were compelled to laugh perpendicularly, there being no possible medium for a lateral cachinmation."

GIVE IT UP.—What kind of juries are most dangerous to our liberties?—Vhy, perjuries.—Philadelphia Times.

RETURNING CONFIDENCE.—The editor of the Maumee Express has a wit that bites shrewdly. Some of the keenest and most original sketches of the time are from his pen. He hits off the effects of an absurd credit system, as follows:—"Trade in Detroit goes on something after this fashion:—'I'll give you seventy-five dollars for that pony!'—'Done—but stop, what kind of funds?'—"Black cat."—"Can't take."—"Green cat."—"Twent do! Blue cat—no! Grey cat—Don't like it! Yellow cat—won't have it; give me White cat and you shall have him."—"No."—"Then we won't trade."—"What's the news this morning?"—"Oh, not much; only seventeen banks failed yesterday."—"Quite a falling off, eh?"—"Yes; the times must be growing better."—"Think so, for I hav'n't been sued but six times this morning."—"That shows a return of confidence, certainly."

MAPLE SUGAR.—According to a Sandusky, Ohio, paper, one hundred tons of maple sugar, of a purity and beauty equal to the finest Havana, have been made in that county the past season.

The following scraps are copied from the Sun, an ably-conducted and interesting journal, with a circulation, we understand, of more than thirty thousand impressions daily, which is, of itself, high and substantial praise.

A mechanic in Russia is said to have succeeded in making a steam man. It is, probably, one of the keenest and most original inventions ever offered to the public. It is a large colossal statue, the feet of which are placed upon wheels on a railroad, and as he goes thundering over the course, the steam comes puffing out of his nostrils in a manner to give the appearance of Satan as pictured in Revelation.

There is a gentleman in London who visits Drury Lane theatre every night, in the firm belief that Van Amburgh will be some time or other devoured by his beasts; and he fears that, by being absent a single night, he may miss the interesting exhibition. A pamphlet has been published in London, purporting to be a life of Van Amburgh, and detailing many wonderful scenes and "hairbreadth escapes" which he has gone through.

Two gentlemen, noted for their fondness of exaggeration, were discussing the fare at the different hotels. One observed that at his hotel he had tea so strong it was necessary to confine it in an iron vessel. "At mine," said the other, "it is made so weak it has not strength to run out of the tea pot."

Bob went into several book-shops to get a copy of Lady Bulwer's "Cheveley," but being unable to find one, on coming out he saw a man with lobsters. "Tom, who was with him, as usual, said, 'let us get a lobster instead.' " "Very well," said Bob, "it will do, as it is pretty extensively red."

A western doctor wishes to know whether the laws recently enacted against the carrying deadly weapons, apply to doctors who carry pills in their pockets?

A captain of a privateer, who had been in an engagement, wrote to the owners, acquainting them that he had received but little damage, having only one of his hands wounded in the nose.

SPIRIT OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

THE COAL-CARRIER.

BY W. H. HARRISON.

"I give you just twenty-four hours to write me a tale. A tale of some kind I must have. I must school you into authorship, for by that you are to live. If you do not, therefore, accomplish this task in the time specified, you may seek another home." Such was the unfeeling speech of Lord Arley, a nobleman of capricious temper, to his humble dependent, Charles Sevenetti. The youth, on hearing the mandate, was left alone in his little study, to consider of the better words which had just been uttered. He took up a quill, made it slowly into a pen, wrote his name on a sheet of paper, read it a dozen times, threw down his pen, and equipping himself for a walk, suddenly left the house.

Lord Arley was a man of great wealth, although, when he entered into life, he had scarcely an income adequate to the most narrow support of his hereditary baronial dignity, and had he died at the age of twenty-one, he would have left behind him such a character as many an untutored youth has bequeathed to posterity. Economical, without meanness; generous, without prodigality; gay, without licentiousness; mild, without cowardice, with perhaps a lurking ambition which would probably have boded forth into great deeds. Such, and far more, might have been the eulogy of Lord Arley, had he made his final exit from the stage of life, thirty-two years before the time at which our narrative commences.

But time, the great developer of humanity, rendered a somewhat different epitaph necessary. Lord Arley had been brought up in the country, with such habits of moderation as suited his income; but, on mingling with the world, and having his eyes opened to the luxuries of life, he was smitten with an insatiable love of splendour. This at length seemed to tire him, and he sought new pursuits. All, however, did not bring him happiness. Something apparently had occurred to distract him; but of this there were only mysterious rumours. When all had wearied him, he one day, about two years before the date of our story, read a little story which Charles Sevenetti, an inmate of his own house, and a dependent of his family, had written for the amusement of Lady Clara. From that moment he might be said to seize upon the mind of the youth with a strange and novel voracity, seeking to explore its inner recesses, and continually taxing his own invention for subjects whereupon the unfortunate had should exercise his talents.

Lord Arley, when, very young, fixed his affections on a lady of singular beauty; she preferred another, and matrimony seemed, like all the other chances of his life, destined to enrich him. A wealthy, though perhaps less lovely and less beloved dame, sought him; he married her; she presented him with Lady Clara, and in three or four years afterwards he became a widower, in which state he remained. The fair sex, after his first attachment, never seemed to form a part of his passions; his parental love, however, was intense, which, with a wandering life, and his freaks upon Charles Sevenetti, had for the two last years in some measure occupied his mind. He had now got from the extreme south of England to almost its extreme north, and there we shall leave him, in order that the unfortunate Charles may tell his tale.

At ten next night, exactly thirty-six hours after the mandate had been issued, Charles Sevenetti descended to the library of Lord Arley. He entered; his lordship raised his head from a volume which, perhaps, he was not reading; Lady Clara had the flushed look of hope fulfilled, and the happy protégé, as the world termed him, cast down his eyes lest their expression should be remarked. His lordship tried to look benign, and beckoned to a seat. Charles continued standing, and said, "My lord, here is the tale; and such as it is, I have little share in it, excepting in the character of a mere narrator. Shall I have the honour of reading it, my lord?" "Assuredly; you know I never take the trouble to drag myself through manuscript." "I shall continue standing, if you please." "As you like," said Lord Arley. "Clara, my love, it is time for you to withdraw." "May I not, my lord, pause?" "I had rather not," was uttered imperatively. Charles was not sorry, for he felt that the story which chance had thrown in his way, and which, under the pressure of circumstances, he had been forced to avail himself of, was not suited for her ear. "Your eyes seem in the door," said Lord Arley. Charles started, and instantly began.

A student was one day labouring under a severe depression of spirits. His reason told him that his mind ought to be equal to various ways to remove the load which lay upon him, but reason urged him in vain. After struggling against many contending passions, perhaps I should rather say emotions, he darted into the open air, and bent his steps to one of the town suburbs. It was rather a genteel place, but yet its inhabitants were humane enough to permit a poor apple woman to erect her little stand in their close vicinity, and a few wretched coal-porters to find a sort of shelter from the blast, by placing themselves at the end of the last house of the row. When he reached these poor creatures, he stooped to examine the eight or nine grained faces which were before him. A little black woman man two or three steps in advance, as if expecting his orders. A dark girl followed her, and in their close vicinity, and a few females both started up, for some were sitting on the cold stones, and said, "We gaw'd together, and carry in a load for three pence." "For three pence?" he said emphatically; what will that do for two persons?" "Get us our breakfast, and something over." Out of seven or eight men and women, all accosted him by word or movement, excepting an old man. This individual stood with his eyes fixed on the ground, his whole air bespeaking dejection, but no anxiety. He was of the short, middle size, seemed to have been well formed, though perhaps never robust, and his features had in them a regularity and delicacy, which, even in his present condition might be termed elegant. Broken down as he appeared to be, it was impossible to guess at his age; he looked fifty-five, but he might be only fifty.

"The young man felt himself drawn towards this person as if by a magnet; his feet moved unbidden to the spot where he was not a stranger. He imagined him a man whose feelings might be as nice and acute as his own, between whose former and present situation there was, perhaps, as great a disparity as if he should one day be in the same state. Almost unconsciously he addressed him with, 'And so, my poor old man, you are still carrying coals?' The construction of the sentence implied a former acquaintance, and the man looked up as if he expected to see some one to whom he was not a stranger."

"The man answered, 'Yes, I carry coals, sir, when any one asks me.' 'You are not fortunate, then, in the way of life?' 'Fortunate!' said he, as if surprised at the term being in any way applied to him, and he added nothing more excepting a kind of laugh, which seemed to say, 'It is long since good fortune and I parted.' 'Come along with me,' said the student, and he led the way to what is called the town moor." Lord Arley here looked up as if the story were disagreeable to him, and appeared inclined to interrupt it, but presently cast his eyes again on the volume which still lay before him. Charles proceeded. "'And what do you get for carrying in a load of coals?' 'Any thing you like,' replied the poor man, fixing his eyes on the face of the querist; 'but it seems strange that such as you should come on an errand like this.' 'Such as me?' said the youth, and he surveyed his dress, which changed to be very plain. 'You may always know a gentleman by his voice,' said the poor man."

"The student did not decline the compliment, but, being still under the influence of a depressed spirit, he said, 'God knows, I may one day be as you are.' 'Impossible,' said the coal-carrier, 'for equally until you find out for better labours, would you carry coals?' 'And why, my poor man, are you in this situation?' 'Your mind seems far more fitted for labour than your body.' The man sighed, looked hard in the face of the student, and said, 'May I ask you really require my services in my poor calling?'

"No, I do not; but the fact is, I have this morning left my home, and if such I may call my place of abode, in quest of maintenance for a tale.' 'You are an author, then?' 'I have no occupation—no profession—no trade—and, I fear, no capacity for the only resource which seems destined for me. I depend upon one (here the voice of Charles grew husky, and he almost repented of his boldness in introducing the sentiments which followed) who, in the language of the world, has been unexpressedly kind to me; for the orphan of a domestic had no claims beyond sustenance—and a mere trade. I certainly have been brought up—as yes, I must say it—as a gentleman. But I had rather have been the free брат of a gipsy, than the sport of fit-and-start kindness. The student here checked himself all of a sudden, as if surprised at his own unwonted and uncalculated openness, and to men an auditor. 'I will not,' said the man, 'profess to be honored by your confidence, for you cannot intend to place any, in such as I, but—and he fixed his sunken though still fine eyes on the youth's face—it is remarkable that there is betwixt my early condition and yours a certain similarity; and although I have never told the cause of my misery to any other than a priest, I shall in all but names tell you why I am thus. I am the son,' said the old coal-carrier, 'of a man who, thirty years ago, kept a respectable inn in the town of—I shall call it Bristol, but we lived more to the south. It was my misfortune to be endowed with a most singular beauty of countenance; no one—I speak of the immediate period at which my short history commences—no one ever saw me without stopping to inquire who and what I was. When in my fifth year, chance sent to our house—for it was not a hotel—Mr. C—, my lady, and little son, then about my own age. I unfortunately attracted the notice of this group; the boy declared he could not live without this pretty playfellow; and, finally, as he was an only child, heir to an immense property, and not much troubled, my father was prevailed upon to part with me, under the promise, which was solemnly kept, that I should be well cared for. I was educated with, and like, my young master, until he went to Oxford, when it was deemed proper to separate us, and have me taught the routine of law business, so that I might be fit for the office of confidential secretary in the family. Just when young Mr. C— came of age, his father died, leaving him sole heir to one of the first properties in England. His lady mother, though handsomely dowered, remained with us. I say us, for though I never ate with the family upon any occasion, yet in all else I was like one of themselves. In his twenty-third year, my master became attached to a young lady; she had no fortune, but as she had recently refused an early suitor, and languished in part with me, he was interested in her choice. Indeed, who could look upon her as I suppose that she had a quality in common with ordinary clay. So was'—he described her at your pen!," said Lord Arley, breaking in on the relation, and flashing a look at Charles Sevenetti, which was not to be parried. He therefore cast his eyes to the next paragraph, and Lord Arley bent his forehead upon his extended palm, as they lay before him on the table; nor did he again raise it until the coal-carrier's narrative ended. "Within a year after their marriage, she presented him with a lovely boy, having the fair delicate skin of his mother, with the dark hair, black eyes, and high features, of his father. In six months after this happy event, which was celebrated as if joy were immutable, I saw that my lovely mistress was somewhat altered. She seemed languid; her eyes were dull; her dimples were less frequently in play, and the slight peach-like bloom of her cheek had disappeared. I have always observed that, in cases of alarm, excessive love runs into either of two extremes. His was the extreme of blindness; but when at last the paleness of her cheek was occasionally varied by the mark of consumption, the fatal red spot, and the lately dull eye shone forth with a new and alarming brightness, his solicitude was of the most agonizing sort. I need not dwell on what I can never forget; she sank by degrees; and before her head was laid in the grave, I had the misfortune to observe, that anxiety and unceasing vigilance had shaken the constitution of my master."

"I urged change of scene, and accompanied by the young heir, and a suitable train of attendants, we set sail for a climate more adapted to a sinking frame. Mr. C— lingered for some months, while he seemed completely divided between indifference to life on account of his irreparable loss, and an intense desire to protect his son. With a broken heart, he saw that his doom was fixed, and, committing his boy to my care, a charge which I never doubted to fulfill, he departed this life. We sailed for England. My charge was two years and a half old; I never lost sight of him for a moment; could he be otherwise than dear to me? Oh, human nature, thou frail thing! When almost touching our native shore, we were overtaken by a dreadful tempest; destruction at last became inevitable, and the vessel literally went to pieces. On the instant of certain danger, I had wrapped my unfortunate charge in a large sheet of silk oil-cloth, which had been used for some of the fine packages. As I stood upon the last raft, I could discern a portion of his own domains, and the abode of his next heir. For some time I was true to my trust. How shall I tell you the rest? The moment of mortal and of moral trial came. Had I encumbered myself with the boy, I must have perished. One only could be saved; at least I thought so, and in that I am now afraid I was in error." Here the poor man's agony choked him. At last he went on with, 'I quitted my charge, and saved my own worthless life.' Again he paused, and then continued, 'I do not know why I have told you all this, or how it is that I am more than usually affected for time spent in some measure the worst sort, and I abhor myself most when my anguish is least acute. I reached the shore, stunned, worn out, and, far worse, conscience-smitten. I abandoned myself to want and beggary, and sought, in all that was most foreign to my former delicate and famous habits, to find a kind of punishment for my great sin. I had seen in a newspaper an account of the shipwreck of the Ann, and a statement that every soul on board had perished. At last I became Catholic, and sought comfort in a rigid discharge of church discipline. But I thought the good priests I met with too nothing, when in general they sought to console me on the plea that at such a moment human nature could scarcely be expected to call its more noble qualities into action. Their leniency disappointed me, and I longed for some severe infliction. I wandered from place to place, and at last reached this town, where I understood that a stern priest exacted the last tribute to remorse."

"I laid my heart open to him. He said that my crime was of the deepest dye; that the weakness of human nature formed no excuse; that I had been actuated by the mere paltry love of life; and that, in the stimulant of some active passion, he could have beheld a better apology. I had forgotten the long, long debt of gratitude, the brotherly kindness, I had experienced from a superior, and the very peculiar sacredness of my trust. 'To such a culprit,' said he, 'beggary is luxury. To want you must add labour of the meanest order, eat no bread but what you work for, and take no labour that is not offered.' The mandate suited the nature of my compunction; and hence, after a lapse of twenty long years, you see me in the most revolting employment I could devise." Here, continued Charles, the coal-carrier's narrative ended. The curiosity of the student was whetted, and he resolved to quit his present abode next morning, and travel to the coast of —. "The coast of what?" said Lord Arley, starting up and fixing on his protégé a look of ferocity. "The coast of what?" he repeated. "Poor Charles had been strangely excited by the unexpected emotions aroused by his tale in Lord Arley. The youth had only sought to make the story the vehicle for expressing his weariness of the life he led. But Lord Arley's last and most fierce exclamations fairly overcame the spirit of the unhappy youth; his knees smote against each other, and he returned the desperate gaze of his patron with that unsteady wavering eye which bespeaks doubt and apprehension."

"They stood thus for some moments, perhaps minutes, during which time a rapid revolution seemed to take place in Lord Arley's mind. 'Young man,' said he, with something like calmness, 'I cannot be blind to the conflict which you are enduring. I am not blind to it; but while I perceive a conflict, I cannot pass at what I see is actually passing through your mind. Go to rest. Come to me at eight to-morrow morning, and in the meantime, while something good predominates in my heart, receive and follow an advice. Never be smitten by a love for the toys of life; you will find them as unsatisfactory, as unequal to satisfy all that is rational in man, as are to a mountebank the bells which he rings round his customers for the sake of mankind—for the credit of human nature—would that I stood alone! but a toy-loving rascal must, unless re-converted, come to that destruction which is now ready to overwhelm me.'"

Charles retired to his room, and threw himself, dressed as he was, upon his bed. His mind was disturbed to agony. His story, such as it was, had, from some unknown cause, mysteriously come upon the father of Clara some painful emotions. "Was it not ungrateful," thought he, "to have alluded to Lord Arley's sinful conduct towards himself? But, on the other hand, was an involuntary dependence to crush him all that was manly? Is it a fear," said he, "that I shall be dismissed on the morrow, which thus shakes every nerve of my frame? Such a fear shall no longer have any power over me. Have I, the son of a foreign domestick, picked up in a foreign land, any right even to look at Lady Clara, far less to think of her, and make her the lodestone which perpetually draws me back, after my foot is on the very threshold to depart? This shall be no longer. To-morrow at nine I leave this house for ever." He accordingly wrote a letter of thanks to Lord Arley for the support he had afforded him, with a brief and somewhat haughty apology for any occasional want of respect or appearance of ingratitude. This letter he resolved to deliver personally at a last short interview. After this he packed up his moveables, and then sought, though still dressed, a little repose. At eight next morning, which was exactly an hour sooner than his lordship's valet generally waited upon him, Charles entered Lord Arley's room with the agitation of the evening before considerably augmented. He held in his hand what he deemed his last letter to the man who, though dispensing his bounty painfully, had yet given him a seat at his own board, with education, food and raiment. It was the depth of winter, and in a room well curtained with the deepest green, Charles could not fail to feel himself in almost utter darkness. There was a relief in this: he paused—listened for a word of recognition, next for a breathing—he heard nothing. "He talked of open," thought Charles; "it has produced, as is common, a late effect." He sat down by a window, glad of even a short respite from the fulfilment of his intention. Dark as it was, he imagined that, after a space, he might be able to see where Lady Clara's picture hung. He knew it was opposite to Lord Arley's bed. "Surely," thought he, "I might discern the shining frame, and the white dress." No, all was black. At last he rose from his seat, walked on tiptoe, and put his hand upon the picture. It was covered with a piece of cloth. The circumstance was but a trifle, yet at that particular moment it seemed portentous.

Surprised at the silence and darkness, he opened a small part of a window-shutter, and saw that a table-cover had been thrown over the picture. Letting in more light, he saw upon a table by the bedside a large envelope labelled "laudation," and a letter sealed with black. It was directed to "George Clithorne, Esq., hitherto known by the name of Charles Sevenetti." He tore it open, and read as follows:—*I am more guilty than the feeble-minded old man whom you met last night, and whose narrative related to your parents, and your supposed death. I was your mother's rejected lover; I was your father's heir. I hated him, and that hate, with my thirst for luxurious toys, led me to crime and misery. I have long led a life of suspicion and dread, and you have been its main object. Strange to say, I feared, from the very commencement of your story last night, that you had met the old man, the unfaithful servant who had left you to the waves, and the only person who could reveal your history, if he had known you. That old man I know well. I watched him long from fear; but at last I lost all dread on his account. But this is yet mysterious to you; it may soon be explained. By a most wonderful chance I picked you up on that fatal morning of your shipwreck. I had a retainer in Italy, who told me of all your father's movements, of his death, and of your sailing in the Arcturion. An anxious restlessness seized upon me; I was never distant from the shore. I had seen a vessel in the offing the night previous to the wreck, and, viewing her through my telescope, persuaded myself it was the same which bore the little person that stood betwixt myself and wealth to my heart's utmost desire. A tempest came on in the twilight; wrapped in a large cloak, I watched its progress through the night; the brig went to pieces, and—good God!—you were rolled to my very feet. Something told me—assured me—it was the child whose death I had almost half-wished. The temptation was too strong. I walked some miles along the coast. I arrived at a miserable hut, examined your clothes, and found that I was right. You had revived during the walk, smiled in my face, but I had nothing worse in me than to conceal you, and I resolved to care for your life. I easily imposed a tale on the peasant, left you in her care until I procured a horse, and, wrapping you up in my cloak, galloped to London. By a series of stratagems I contrived to bring you from Italy as the child of a servant who had previous to this death rendered me an essential service. This is all I need say—the subject of your present resentment stands before me which will place me beyond your just resentment. Lady Clara is before you love each other. Be happy, but conceal from her the guilt of her father; and let her think, as all but you will be inclined to do, that from the seeming happiness of my earthly fortunes, that my death was accidental. I have left her my injunction, as if of old date, to give her hand to you; and I know, for I have long read her eyes, that she will be but too happy to obey. Farewell."*

Within a year after this event, the old coal-carrier was comfortably situated in a cottage near A—— hall, and tasted happiness which he had long ceased to hope for in life. We shall say no more, for from this the reader may guess the happiness that fell to the share of the other personages of our story.

THE FATHER OF PETER THE GREAT.

THE Czar Alexei Michailovitch, father of Peter the Great, was so much attached to the nobleman Artemin Matfœf, that, contrary to the etiquette of the Russian court, which forbids the czar to visit a subject, he would often go to his house in a friendly and familiar way. One evening, coming in unexpectedly, and seeing the table set for supper with great neatness, he said to Matfœf: "The table seems so neatly and prettily covered, I feel a strong desire to sit down to it with you. Yes, I will follow the suggestions of my appetite, and place myself at table by thee, upon this condition, however, that I disturb nobody, and that none get up from table till they have supped." "Whatever your majesty pleases, and commands must be to the honour of my house," returned Matfœf. The supper was served up, and the czar sat down to table. The mistress of the house enters, with their only son, and a young lady, who, after making their profoundest reverences, obey the czar's commands, and take their places at the table. During the supper, the czar looked frequently round upon the little company, and seemed to take particular notice of the young lady that sat next against him, as not recollecting that he had ever seen her before as one of Matfœf's children. "I always thought," said his majesty, "that thou hadst no other child than that boy; but now I see, for the first time, that thou hast a daughter likewise—how earnest thou never to mention her to me?"

"Your majesty thought perfectly right," answered Matfœf: "I have but that one son. But the young lady that sits opposite is the daughter of my friend and relation, the nobleman Kynila Narishkin, who lives in the country on his estate, whom my wife has taken into the house, to show her the city, and, in heaven's good time, to get her well provided for."

The czar said nothing more, than that "he had done a good deed, which therefore must be agreeable to God." After supper, when Matfœf's family were risen from table, and gone to their own apartment, the czar chose to continue sitting with his host. His majesty resumed the subject of the young lady, Natalia Kynilovna, and said: "The maiden has a handsome appearance; she seems to have a good heart, and is not too young to be married. Thou art endeavoring to get her a fit husband?" "Yes," answered Matfœf: "your majesty judges rightly of her; she possesses an excellent understanding, with the greatest modesty, and the best of hearts. My wife and the whole family are uncommonly fond of her, and consider her as if she were our darling daughter. But as to a suitor for her, that is what we are not soon likely to expect. She has indeed numerous good qualities, but little or no wealth; and if I should meet with an opportunity to settle her, the portion I could afford her out of my narrow fortune would be but small."

The czar upon this replied: "She must find a sweetheart that has so much property himself as to stand in need of nothing from her, but consider her good qualities as the greatest and best of portions, and make it his endeavour to render her happy." "That is just what I could wish," said Matfœf; "but where shall I find such a lover, who looks more for excellent qualities in his bride than for a splendid fortune?" "Oh, yes," said the czar, "they are still to be found very frequently; do thou think occasionally thereupon, and I myself will likewise look out for some such match. The maiden is deserving of all the pains we can take to make her happy." Matfœf thanked his majesty for so gracious an intimation of his kindness, and there the matter remained. The czar wished him a good night, and took himself away. A few days afterwards his majesty came again to Matfœf, discoursed with him for a couple of hours on state affairs, and, after getting up, seemingly with a design to take leave and go away, on a sudden took his chair, and sat down afresh. "Now, tell me," said he to Matfœf, "hast thou not forgot our late conversation about providing a lover for Natalia Kynilovna?"

"No, most gracious sir," answered Matfœf; "I bear it continually in mind, and only wish it were to some effect. I have found nothing suitable for her yet, and I much doubt that a proper offer will soon be made; for though a number of our young noblemen come to visit me, and consequently often see my charming foster-daughter, they none of them give any intimation about marriage."

"Well," said the czar, "perhaps it may not be necessary. I told thee that I would myself use some endeavours to provide a bridegroom for her. I have had the good fortune to find one, with whom she will probably be contented and happy. I know the man; he is an honourable and worthy person, has merit, and wealth enough not to be under the necessity of asking an estate or portion with her. He loves her, and will marry and make her happy. Thou knowest him too, though probably he hath not hitherto discovered his intention to marry. I think, likewise, that, when he applies to thee, thou wilt not give him a denial." Matfœf here interrupted the czar, by saying, "As I just told your majesty, that would be a most desirable thing; it would free me from a great concern I have continually at heart about this poor girl. Dare I now beseech your majesty to tell me the man's name?" Perhaps I know him likewise, and can inform your majesty something of his circumstances."

"I have told thee that I know the man," returned the czar; "that he is a worthy, honest fellow, and capable of rendering his wife happy: this thou mayest take my word for. I can say no more of him, till we know whether Natalia Kynilovna will be willing to have him."

"There is no doubt of that," returned Matfœf, "when she hears that your majesty has provided her a spouse. In the meantime, she must know who the person is, that she may give her answer. This I think is but reasonable."

"Well, then," said the czar, "I give thee to know that I myself am the man that hath resolved to marry her, if she is inclined to it. Do thou tell her this, and ask her whether she can approve of it."

At this unexpected declaration of the czar, Matfœf was filled with astonishment, threw himself at his feet and said, "I beseech your majesty, for the love of heaven, that you will change your resolution, or at least that you will not order me to acquiesce in the young lady with it. Most gracious sovereign, you know full well that I have already given up all my heart, and all my hopes, to the principal families of the empire, who are jealous of the favour and confidence your majesty is pleased to allow me. What an outcry will there be among them when they find your majesty has preferred a marriage with a poor maiden of my family to a connexion with one of the principal ladies at court! Doubtless their hatred and malice against me will cover all the land; and every one will think that I have abused your majesty's favour, and unworthily contrived to bring about the match, for the sake of raising myself still higher in your majesty's regard, and for elevating my family to a connexion with that of the czar's."

"All that will nothing signify," replied the czar: "the affair is mine, and thou hast no business with it. My resolution is taken, and thereby I shall remain."

"Well, be it according to your majesty's pleasure," said Matfœf; "and may heaven bless your majesty with every kind of prosperity! Since it is to be so, let me beg only one favour for myself and for Natalia Kynilovna, which is, that your majesty will proceed in the matter according to the custom of the empire, and with as little noise as possible, by ordering a number of the marriageable young ladies of the principal families, and among them Natalia Kynilovna, to appear together at court, with the design of choosing one of them for a bride; and, in the meantime, that no person besides your majesty and myself, not even Natalia Kynilovna, have the slightest intimation of your purpose and resolution."

The czar found this procedure highly proper, and accordingly bade Matfœf be prepared for the event, and to discover his intention to no one. A few weeks afterwards, he declared his design of marrying again to the heads of the church and his chief ministers in a private council, and further told them that on such a court day all the marriageable daughters of the chief nobles were to be commanded to appear at court, that his majesty might consider them, and choose a bride.

This was accordingly done on a certain day in September, 1670, in the Kremlin palace at Moscow, when sixty noble ladies presented themselves in their most superb attire, and among them Natalia Kynilovna. Natalia was dressed in a neat and pretty apparel. They were all sumptuously entertained by the czar; but Natalia was declared to be the monarch's bride.

INVOCATION OF THE EARTH TO MORNING.

WAKE from thy azure ocean-bed,
Oh! beautiful sister, Day!
Uplift thy gem-tint'd head,
And, in thy vernal robes arrayed,
Bid twilight's gloom give way!
Wake, dearest sister! the dark-brow'd night
Delayeth too long her drowsy flight.

Most glorious art thou, sister Day,
Upon thy chariot throne,
While, sitting supreme in regal sway,
Thou holdest the high effulgent way,
In majesty alone;
Till into thy cloud-pavilion'd home
In the burning west thy footsteps come.

When last thy parting look I caught,
Which turn'd to smile good night,
With all a lover's fondness fraught—
There seemed not in the universe aught
So precious in thy sight,
As thy own dear earth, while to her breast,
She folded her slumbering babes to rest.

I hear the sparkling midnight spheres
Rehearse the choral hymn,
Which yet, ere earth was stained with tears,
Burst on the joy-entranced ears
Of holy seraphim:

While the lofty blue empyrean rang,
As the morning stars together sang.

Oh, many a joyous mountain hill,
And many a rustling stream,
Calm lake and gushing fountain still,
Tall grove and silent mist-enclosed hill,
Look for thy coming here!
Uprouse thee, then, fairest sister dear!
For all are pining thy voice to hear.

With trembling and impatient wing,
My birds on every spray
Await, thy welcome here to sing
With many a melting lay:
Then wherefore, beautiful, linger so long?
Earth sighs to greet thee with shout and song.

The sun-flower's thrill long hath kept,
With love's entrancing carol,

Though round her pinks and violets slept,
She wakefully hath watch'd and wept.

Unto the dewy air;
And like a desolate bride she waits,
For the opening of her lover's gates.

Oh! then arise, fair sister, dear!
Awake, beloved Day!

For many a silent trembling tear,
Falls on my breast like diamond clear,
In grief for thy delay.
From the rosy bowers of the orient skies,
Then up, sweetest sister, arise, arise!

ROMANCE IN DEATH.

The last Natchez Free Trader tells the following story:—"On the seventh of the present month, Mrs Mary Ann L. Barber, aged seventeen, and L. B. Young, aged twenty-three, both of Tuscaloosa, Alabama, were buried in one grave, after having departed this life under the following circumstances: Mr. Young was a high-minded, honorable young gentleman, most ardently and devotedly attached to Miss Barber, between whom and himself those promises and attentions had been interchanged which pledged them to the marriage union at no distant day. Once in every sentiment, as well as in sympathy, they both, a few months since, made a profession of religion at the same altar and at the same time. On the day of their death, they had gone on a water excursion, with uncommon buoyancy and animation of spirits, along with four others, in a skiff, which suddenly overset and plunged them all in the water. The lover seized the one whom, of all others, he would save, and they both perished! They were found at the bottom, locked fast in each other's arms. With a solemn propriety, that embrace was never broken, and their bodies thus rest in one grave together, even as their spirits together passed into one heaven."

RENEE BORDEAUX.

Among many heroines produced by the civil war of La Vendee, Renee Bordeaux, commonly called Langevin, holds a foremost place. She was born at a village near Angiers, of humble parents. Forty-two individuals of her family lost their lives in the revolution, and her father was butchered before her eyes. This determined her to take up arms herself. During the course of six years, she fought on foot and on horseback in more than two hundred battles, with the most determined intrepidity. Her uncle was at the head of a party of republicans. Instigated by rage and a zeal for royalty, she beheld him. The republicans in the Vendean war were called the Blues. Langevin killed four Blues at St. Lambert, with her own hands. In the battle of Ponts de Ge, when she acted the part of a dragoon, she killed twenty-one of the enemy. Soon afterwards she liberated fifty priests at one time, and eight hundred at another, whose death had been determined on. A price of forty thousand francs was set on her head. She was thrown into prison for a crime, for which she could only prove her innocence by a discovery of her sex; she remained, however, five years in prison, where she was treated in the most shameful manner, and only obtained her freedom on the accession of Louis XVIII. to the throne. She has since had conferred on her the order of the Lily.

ONION.—Some of the obliging folks at Lafayette steal their neighbours' crows, kill them, and sell the beef to the owners!

PERCUCIOTUS TALENTA.—The effects of study vary according to the age at which it is commenced; long-continued application kills the youthful energies. I have seen children full of spirit stricken by this literary mania beyond their years, and have foreseen with grief the lot that awaited them—they commenced by being prodigies, and they ended by being stupid. The season of youth is consecrated to the exercise of the body, which strengthens it, and not to study, which debilitates and prevents its growth. Nature has wisely suggested the necessity of exercise, and of it to be at the same time. When the growth of intellect is too prompt, its faculties are too early developed, and mental application is permitted proportioned to this development; the body receives no part of it, because the nerves cease to contribute to its energies; the victim becomes exhausted, and eventually dies of some insidious malady. The parents and guardians who require and encourage this forced application, treat their pupils as gardeners do their plants, who, in order to make them grow, and to make them flourish, sacrifice some plants to force others to put forth fruit and downward growth. These of a shorter duration, and are inferior in every respect to those which come to their maturity at a proper season.—Tissot.

AMUSEMENT VERSUS DRINKING.—A singing and dancing people is certainly higher in the scale of morality than a sporting people. The national ballad and the national dance open the way to every department of poetry and of music; when people have reached this point, it is easy to awaken the feeling for every kind and degree of artistic culture. The museum is a place to which the people come at a certain time to surrender to an alcoholic influence, and when they go away they will soon come to feel the boundless cupidity that exists between men whom art raises into demi-gods, and animals in human shape degraded by drunkenness below the level of brutes. It is an error to suppose that christianity forbids the education of the people in the arts, and the cultivation of art; it forbids only those perversions and misapplications of art, which are the unpurged and uncorrected among the Greeks equally recondite. Kanner

DUTIFUL CHILDREN.—"Our children are certainly the most dutiful in this town, Mrs. Frimble, though I say it myself," said Mrs. Compacency, one morning, to a neighbour. "Where are the little dears?" said Mrs. Frimble. "They are in the back-yard, and I will call them," replied Mrs. Compacency, opening the door at the same time. "John, William, Samuel, dears, come here this n. n. ute." "Go to thunder, you old fool; we guess we've a right to cite this ere apple tree for all you."

SCENE AT A HOTEL BREAKFAST-TABLE.—Enter waiter, with a large shad. V. Z., representative from C., helps himself to one half. "Mr. C." says my next neighbour to his friend, "have you heard any cause assigned why all the shad taken in the Connecticut this season are poison?" "No, I haven't, although I was aware of the fact." V. Z.—shoving away the untouched shad—"Here, waiter, bring me a clean plate."

TRADITION OF ANCIENT SHIP BUILDING.—There is a Portuguese tradition that all East-Indi-a ships were formerly built without any iron used in their construction, for this reason : On the sea-coast of India there is a loadstone mountain ; and when ships approach it, so strong is the attraction, that all iron substances fly like so many birds to the loadstone. Thus it became necessary to construct all India vessels without using even an iron spike.

TURKISH JEST.—One of his neighbours once went to Nassereddin, and solicited the loan of a rope. The Khodjah went into his house, and after a delay of several minutes returned, and told the borrower that the rope was in use tying up flour. "What do you mean?" said the neighbour: "how can a rope be used to bind up flour?" "A rope may be applied to any use," replied the Khodjah, "when I do not wish to lend it."

WALKING UPON WATER—A Swedish fisherman has made several experiments, with complete success, of walking upon the water, which he does with as much ease as upon land, by means of slight tin shoes. These shoes are made in the shape of a small canoe, and are attached together, so that they can only be separated so far as to ensure the power of walking with ease.

WELLERISMS.—“Don't rob yourself,” as the farmer said to the lawyer, ven he called him hard names. “Terrible pressure in the money market,” as the mouse said ven the keg of specie rolled over him. “Running a great risk for nothing,” as the loafer said ven he picked the editor's pocket and found an iron tooth comb, and a piece of Tennessee poetry.

ADVICE.—The advice of a sagacious mother to her daughter, in some old novel, is said to have been—"Ann, my dear, you can never be pretty, so you had better be odd; and the editor of the Gazette thinks that a considerable portion of the modern belles have acted upon this advice."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—"Isaac, can you describe a bat?" "Yes, sir: he's a flying insect, about the size of a stopple: has india rubber wings, and a shoestring tail; he sees best with his eyes shut, and bites like the O d Harry."

AND WHAT A MONSTER. —The Chicago (Illinois) Democrat says:—
 "A plaintiff in a divorce case, complains loudly of the tardiness in the arrival of the late law altering the terms of the courts, as it has subjected him to the extreme cruelty of living six months longer with his wife than he intended."

SPIRIT.—Spirit is now a very fashionable word ; to act with spirit, to speak with spirit, means only to act rashly, and to talk indiscreetly. An able man shows his spirit by gentle words and resolute actions ; he is neither hot nor timid.

RETORT.—A celebrated barrister one day examining a witness who foiled all his attempt at ridicule, by her ready and shrewd answers, at last exclaimed—"There is brass enough in your head, madam, to make a five-pail kettle." "And sap enough in yours, sir, to fill it," quickly retorted the untimidated witness.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.—“I didn't like our minister's sermon last Sunday, said a deacon who had slept all sermon time, to a brother deacon. “Didn't like it, brother A.? Why, I saw you nodding assent to every proposition of the parson.”

A STUBBORN AUTHOR.—Bishop Berkley wrote a book proving the non-existence of matter. One night, when returning home from the printing-office with a proof-sheet, he broke his shins against some matter—but, alas, it could not break him of his theory.

OLD PROVERBS.—A Spanish proverb says, that the Jews ruin themselves at their passover, the Moors at their marriages, and the Christians in their lawsuits.

PRIDE OR PRIDE?—Catharine, Duchess of Buckingham, natural daughter of James the Second, by the Countess of Dorchester, was so proud of her birth, that she would never go to Versailles, because they would not give her the rank of princess of the blood. At Rome, whether she went two or three times to see her brother, she had a box at the opera distinguished by those of crown and scepter. When she was in the country, her new coronation dress was dressed up the waxen figure of herself for Westminster Abbey, but had shown the same insensible pride on the death of her only son, dressing his figure, and sending messages to her friends, that if they had a mind to see him lie in state, she would carry them in her coach. She was so proud of her husband, that when Marlborough brought the triumphal car that had carried the Duke's body. Serah, as mad and as proud as herself, sent her word, that "it had carried my Lord Marlborough, and should never be profaned by any other corpse." The Duchess of Buckingham, to show her contempt of the Duke's death, sent him a diamond ring, and he agreed to make a finer for twenty pounds." When very ill, she sent for Mr. Anstis, and settled all the ceremonial of her funeral, and, fearing she should die before all the pomp was sent home, said, "Why won't they send the canopy for me to see! let me see it, it is my right, and I am not to be envious!" and made her attendant vow that, if she should recover, she would not sit down in the room before she was dead.

MR. GARDINER AND BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.—Mr. William Gardiner, the author of "Music of Nature," whose lately published work, "Music and Friends," was quite warmly reviewed in the Blackwood of last month, has come out with rather sensitive replies to that article in the Leicester and London papers. He, in conclusion of one of his letters, quotes from the advertisement of the American re-publishers of the Music of Nature, these words:—
 "It would be difficult to name a work in the language, combining in so high a degree acute observation, philosophical analyses, and scientific conclusions," and says:—"I feel that the above commendation, or rather compliment, of my translation-eulogist, to be an abundant compensation for the spleenetic effusion of a Scotch Tory Reviewer."

SPECIAL VERDICTS.—The verdicts rendered by jurors are sometimes rather queer documents, as most lawyers have had means of knowing, but there was one returned by a Cattaraugus county (N. Y.) jury, recently, more laughable than any other that we ever heard or read of. It appears that three young men were tried in that county for shooting and mortally wounding a dog, and the written verdict of the "twelve good men and true," was in the following words, to wit:—"All three guilty; plaintiff's damages assessed at sixpence; and each of the defendants to have another shot at the dog!" Go it, Jerry. Damn the consequences.

THE HUMAN VOICE.—The French papers have a good deal to say of M. Tabaria, who has discovered a process of reviving extinct human voices, by making their owners breathe condensed air. He is busily employed in restoring to the stage some celebrated singers, whose voices have absconded!

TEA.—An English paper says—"It has been discovered that some of the best black tea imported into this country from China, is grown in a climate much colder than that of England, and experiments are in consequence now making near Birmingham to introduce the cultivation in this country."

ELEGANT EXTRACTS.—“What, sir, have my client did? Nothing, sir—nothing. But there stand the man what have did the mischief. Him it were, s.r, that with all the ferocity of a bloodhound, seized a shingle, and pursued his victim.”

Ye are stars of the night—ye are gems of the morn,
Ye are dew drops, whose lustre illumines the thorn;
And rayless that night is, that morning unblest,
When no beam in your eye lights up peace in the breast;
And the sharp thorn of sorrow sinks deep in the heart,
Till the sweet lip of woman assuages the smart.
'Tis hers o'er the couch of misfortune to bend,
In fondness a lover, in firmness a friend,
And prosperity's hour, be it ever concast,
From woman receives both refinement and zest;
And adorn'd by the bays, or enwreath'd with the willow,
Her smiles to our mood, and her bosom our pillow.

A NOBLEMAN IN RETIREMENT.—One of the dukedoms of Germany, containing an area of about ten miles, is held by the second son of the late duke. The eldest son and heir is a farmer in Warren county, Missouri, and refuses to leave a farm for a ducal crown with ten square miles full of subjects to maintain its dignity.

How TO GET UP A FIGHT.—"I say," said one urchin to another in the street the other day, "you'er the fellow what stole my marbles." "No I 'aint." "Then I am a liar, am I!" and without more ado he pitched right into him.

CHEAP WAY OF DRESSING WELL.—Brush your hat and boots well every morning, and never mind the holes in your elbows or inexpressibles. The ends justify the means.

G. T. T.—This is a return frequently made in the south-western states, on the writs in the hands of the sheriff, and is an abbreviation for "gone to Texas."

A lady, piqued by Johnson's scrupulous advocacy of truth, once asserted that little variations in narrative must happen a thousand times a day, if one is not perpetually watching. "Well, madam," said Johnson, "and you ought to be perpetually watching. It is more from carelessness about truth than from intentional lying that there is so much falsehood in the world."

George the Second, being informed that an impudent printer was to be punished for having published a spurious (king's) speech, replied that he hoped the punishment would be of the mildest sort, because he had read both, and, as far as he understood either of them, he liked the spurious speech better than his own.

"I say Mister, what do you ask for them keards what takes a chap to the upper gallery," said a shrewd yankee to the man who sold tickets at the theatre. "Fifty cents, sir." "Well, I guess that is giving rather a high price to get into low company, 'aint it?" "No, sir, it is a low price for such high company, I should think!" said he of the tickets.

If one train of thinking be more desirable than another, it is that which regards the phenomena of nature with a constant reference to a Supreme intelligent Author. To have made this the ruling, the habitual sentiment of our minds, is to have laid the foundation of everything that is religious. The world from thenceforth becomes a temple, and life itself one continued act of adoration.

The London Literary Gazette says:—"We cannot insert this pathetic lament for a lost child, in which nature and poetry are so finely combined, without expressing our deep personal regret that ever such an effusion was called forth—an effusion which will wring many a tear from the hearts of parents who have suffered a similar affliction."

BY W. D. MOIR, ESQ. (DEPUTY)

Vainly for you the sunbeams shine;
Dinn'd is our joyous heart;
Oh, Casa! dearer dust than thine
Ne'er mix'd with mother earth:
Thou wert our corner-stone of love,
The keystone of our fate;
Thou art not!—hence scowls dark above,
And earth is desolate.

Ocean may rave with billows curl'd,
And moons may wax and wane,
And fresh flowers blossom, but this world
Shall never claim the same.

Closed are the eyes, which bade rejoice
Our hearts, all love ran o'er;
Thy smiles are vanish'd, and thy voice
Is hushed for evermore!

Yes, thou art gone! our hearth's delight,
Our boy so fond and dear,
No more to smile and cheer our sight,
No more thy songs to hear;
No more thy presence like the sun
To fill our home with joy;
Lest his light and smiles once been run,
As swift, as bright, thy boy!

Now winter with its snow departs,
The green leaves clothe the tree,
But summer gladdens not the hearts
That bleed and break for thee.
The young May flowers, the lowly crown,
Her boughs in beauty wave;
They only shake their blossoms down
Upon thy silent grave!

Dear to our souls is every spot
Where thy small feet have trod;
Where eddies of life's foam float
And sainted is the sod;
The wild bee, with its bugle fine,
The blackbird singing free,
Melt both thy mother's heart and mine—
They speak to us of thee!

Only in dreams thou comest now
From heaven's immortal shore,
A glory that that infant brow,
Which Death's pale signet bore;
Twas thy fond looks, 'twas thy fond lips,
That lent our joys their tone;
And life is shaded with eclipse,
Since thou from earth art gone!

Were thine the fond endearing ways,
That tenderest feelings prove;
A thousand wiles to win our praise,
To claim and keep our love.
Fondness for us thrilled all thy veins;
And, Casa, can it be,
That naught of all the past remains,
Except these tears for thee?

Idly we watch thy form to trace,
In children in the street;
Vainly, in each familiar place,
We list thy pattering feet:
Then sudden o'er these fancies crush'd
Despair's black pinions wave;
We know that sound for ever hush'd—
We look upon thy grave!

Oh, heavenly child of mortal birth !
Our thoughts of thee arise,
Not as a demizen of earth,
But inmate of the skies :
To feel that life renewed is thine,
A soothing balm imparts ;
We quaff as from Faith's cups divine,
And Sabbath fills our hearts.

Thou leanest where the fadeless wands
Of amaranth bend o'er;
Thy white wings brush the golden sands
Of heaven's refulgent shore.
Thy home is where the psalm and song
Of angels choir abroad,
And blessed spirits, all day long,
Bask in the eves of God.

There chance and change are not; the soul
Quaffs bliss as from a sea,
And years, through endless ages, roll,
From sin and sorrow free;
There gush for aye fresh founts of joy,
New raptures to impart;
Oh! dare we call thee still our boy,
Who now a seraph art?

A little while—a little while—
Ah! long it cannot be!
And thou again on us will smile,
Where angels smile on thee.
How selfish is the worldly heart,
How sinful to deplore!
Oh! that we were where now thou art,
Not lost, but gone before!

He who thinks no man above him but for his virtue, none below him but for his vice, can never be obsequious or assuming in the wrong place, but will frequently emulate men in stations below him, and pity those nominally over his head.

Many of the empty pots of an apothecary's shop are as gaudily decorated and neatly marked as those that are full, and the bottles that make the greatest show in the street are filled with a coloured useless fluid.

Some desire is necessary to keep life in motion ; and he whose real wants are supplied must admit of fancy.

LINES,

Written under a portrait of a lady leaning on a balustrade by moonlight.

She stands beneath the evening skies,
Too fair to gaze on, save by night;
And thought is resting in those eyes,
That else were all too bright.

Her pale brow leans upon her hand,
White as a wreath of snow on snow;
And, casting off their silken band,
Her dark curls loosely flow.

O, lady! has the past so soon
Begun to claim thy secret tears;
Ere yet thy life has reach'd its noon
Is thine the grief of years!

Thy dreams are of the silent dead.
Of forms no longer by thy side,
Of looks and tones for ever fled,
Too joyous to abide!

And memory fondly seeks to trace—
Throwing on all a light divine—
The lines of each familiar face,
That once beamed love on thine.

She hopes that wither'd in their prime,
The fears that proved, alas, too true,
The shadows of departed time,
Are crowding on thy view.

The evening air is damp and chill,
The crescent moon has brighter grown,
Yet there, beloved, thou lingerest still,
Unconscious and alone.

Forgive the thought so idly vain,
But now I would not shrink to be
A follower in death's airy train,
So I were mourned by thee!

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

THOUGHTS ON CONTEMPORANEOUS CRITICISM.

BY HENRY STANHOPE LEE.

"Were a great literary genius to set out early in life, and listen only to the voice of nature, what mighty things he might do! But every one is in youth shackled by the technical tyranny of those who have taken on themselves to dictate in the literary world."—Sir Egerton Brydges.

In this age of humbug, there is no system of imposture more successful than that practised by the reviews and critical journals of the day. In the republic of letters, as in all other republics, it must be the voice of the majority which will eventually prevail—and yet, how often do we see a solemn prig of a critic launching about him his puny thunderbolts with the affected dignity and power of a Jupiter Tonans! As if he alone could dispose of authors their passports to immortality! As if his decisions were final and irrevocable!

Taste is a quality so volatile, impalpable and indefinable, that even in cases where criticism proceeds from minds the purest, the most impartial, discriminating, and eloquent—where he, who "censures freely," has himself "written well,"—the sentence, in nine cases out of ten, will be set aside by that only verdict to which an author should be amenable, popular opinion.

But modern criticism, especially that of Great Britain, appears to be biased wholly by personal or political considerations. The leading reviews of England and Scotland have, during the present century, been practising a most iniquitous system of deception upon the "reading public." Controlled by cliques, literary or political, they have puffed their friends and punished their enemies, without the remotest view to critical honesty and independence. Look at the dashing extravagance, the splendid but unprincipled bombast of Blackwood, which is read and admired in spite of its ruffianism and rhyddly. Who, of its readers, look for critical impartiality in its pages—a journal which denounced Coleridge as a dunce, Sir Humphrey Davy as a fool, Hazlitt as a blockhead, Barry Cornwall as an imbecile, Leigh Hunt as a stupid cockney, while in the same breath it would laud to the skies such writers as Pollock and Gault, Trollope and Kenyon! What influence upon the public have they had—those fierce denunciations launched against Coleridge and Davy! None whatever. The public have decided, and posterity will confirm the decision, that the one was a great poet and the other a great philosopher. And what has become of the tribe of "Little Unknowns," which the pious Christopher North would have foisted upon the public as great men—"immortals?" Sunk, wailed, dwindled back into the obscurity from which they sprung. So much for the ex-cathedra judgments of pompous critics, in contrast with the unthought, unprejudiced, and invariable decisions of popular estimation!

The Edinburgh Review, the Westminster, the London Quarterly, and Fraser's Magazine, are all quite as corrupt and venal as Blackwood in their critical ipse dixit. Their own geese are in their eyes much whiter and more beautiful than other people's swans. The Edinburgh praises Mr. Snooks as the best and greatest of men, and reviles Mr. Sniggs as the silliest and basest, because forsooth the one is a whig and the other a Tory. The Westminster denounces Mr. Croker and apotheosizes Miss Marneau, because the one is an ultra monarchist and the other an Utopian radical. And so with the other journals we have named. Instead of being independent tribunals, they are merely the sordid and interested organs of coteries and factions. In politics this partisanship is in a measure justifiable, but in literature it is unnecessary, dishonourable, and immeasurably disgusting.

"A man must serve his time to every trade
Save censure—criticks all are ready made;
The hackney'd jokes from Miller, got by rote,
With just enough of learning to misquote;
A mind well skilled to forge or find a fault;
A turn for punning, call it wit or wit's salt;
To Jeffrey go, be silent and discreet,
His pay is just ten sterling pounds per sheet—
Fear not to lie, 'twill seem a sharper hit,
Shrink not from blasphemy, 'twill pass for wit;
Care not for feeling—pass your proper jest,
And stand a crutch, 'hind yet carcase's best."

Criticism in our own country is at a sufficiently low ebb; but, bad as it is, it is not quite so corrupt as in England. Here it is indiscriminate puffery—with the English and Scotch reviewers it is discriminate puffery and denunciation—and in either case the bias is dishonest. And here I will go back to the opinion with which I started; that a literary sentence, proceeding even from a person the most conscientious, unprejudiced, and competent, should be received with distrust. How much more so then when we know the critic to be partial or unprincipled!

One of the most striking proofs and instances of the fallacy and frailty of critical opinions may be found in the case of young Ireland, the celebrated forger of the "Shakespeare papers." It appears that Ireland's father was a devout and almost fanatical admirer of the great dramatist. But I will let the young man tell his own story—"I will not," he says, "take upon myself to determine whether nature ever gifted me with a dawning of talent for poetry, or whether I possessed a more facile aptitude; but the reiterated eulogies rung in my ears respecting Shakespeare—my father's enthusiasm—and, above all, the incessant remark upon his part, that to possess even a signature of the bard, would make him the happiest of human beings—irrevocably sealed my destiny."

"Being in a conveyancer's office, and environed by old deeds, the silly idea struck me of investigating numerous bundles of law documents, in the hope that I might find some instrument signed by Shakespeare; which labour, of course, proving abortive, I had recourse to a dealer in old parchments, whose shop I frequented for weeks, under the same fallacious impression; when, finding all to no purpose, then it was, (as a German amalgamator of the horrid world assert,) that the demon seized his opportunity to place temptation in my way. In fine, wearied by the fruitless toil, in an evil moment the idea first seized me of producing a spurious imitation of Shakespeare's autograph; when, without reflection, having supplied myself with a tracing of the poet's signature, I wrote a mortgage deed, imitating the law-hand of James the first, and affixed thereto the sign-manual of Shakespeare. The instrument in question was shown, accredited in all directions, and my father rendered happy; when, without a thought of anything further, I conceived myself amply recompensed in having been the instrument of producing so much felicity."

But it appears that the crowd of antiquaries and Shakespearian enthusiasts who surrounded young Ireland (he was only seventeen years old at the time) would not permit him to rest in peace. They insisted upon it that more of Shakespeare's writings could be discovered where the deed was found; and ultimately the poor boy was so beset and harassed, that, in self-defence, he announced the existence of a newly-discovered drama from the pen of Shakespeare! Prior to this announcement, he had, literally, never essayed his pen at poetical composition, and had not penned one line of the play which he purposed producing. Finally, on the second of April, 1796, (it should have been the first,) the tragedy of Vortigern, written by a boy of seventeen, was produced at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, as a newly-discovered drama of Shakespeare. Shortly afterwards it was published; whereupon some of the most redoubtable critics and literary men of the day, including Dr. Parr, Mr. Boaden, and others of considerable account in their day, admitted at once that the internal evidence was sufficient to stamp it as the composition of the immortal Shakespeare! Boaden said the reading of the precious manuscript produced "a tremour of the purest delight;" such persuasion of their excellence being retained for months, "making all scepticism ridiculous." Old Parr was equally enthusiastic in his admiration.

Now, the play of Vortigern is about as much like Shakespeare as the drone of a bagpipe is like the music of the spheres. It is precisely such a work as we should think a clever lad, with good imitative talents, might produce. Take the following song—a capital specimen of what are called "nonsense verses," where the sound deceives an inattentive observer with the idea that the sense is all correct.

Flavia sings.

She sang, while from her eye ran down
The silvery drop of sorrow;
From grief she stoic saw the crown,
Sweet patience, too, did borrow.
Pensive she sat while fortune from'd,
And smiling woe'd sad melancholy.

Keen anguish fain would turn her heart,
And sour her gentle mind;
But charity still kept her bare,
And meekness to her soul d.d. bind.

She bow'd content,
Heard forth one sigh,
Sang, wept, then turned to melancholy.

Careless her looks around her hung,
And strove to catch each dewy tear;
The plaintive bird in pity sang,
And breathed his sorrow in her ear.

Amazed she look'd,
And thank'd his care,
Then sunk once more to melancholy.

Could there be anything more innocent of meaning or of poetry! Take another extract. The following is from the opening scene of the first act of Vortigern. Imagine, if you can, that any one in his senses ever believed it to be Shakespeare's:

Constantius—Good Vortigern! as peace doth bless our isle,
And the loud din of war no more affrights us,
And as my soul has placed thee next herself,
'Tis our desire that thou deny't us not
That which anon we crave thee to accept;
For though most weighty be the proffer'd task,
We trust thy goodness will the toil accept;
Since we have always found thee kind by nature;
And, as the pelican, e'en with thy blood,
Ready to succour and relieve.

Vortigern—Most gracious so'reign! to command is thine;
And, as a subject, mine is to obey.

Con.—Such was the answer we did here expect,
And farther now we shall explain our meaning.
As frozen age we find doth fast approach,
And state affairs lie heavy with ourself,
To thee one half our power we here res.gn.
That due reward may pace with thy great labour.
To this our proposition what reply!

Vor.—Oh! my most noble, good and bounteous lord,
These honours are indeed so great, so weighty,
I fear, least, like a garment too confined,
They awkwardly should press upon the wearer;
Therefore, my gracious lord, let one more worth,
I do beseech thee, hear them.

Con.—Nay, nay! thy excuse will not suffice—
E'en now we do await thy full consent;
And, that more speedily we may conclude,
We do require of thee, thou here shouldst sign
This deed prepar'd, by which thou wilt become,
Ourself cojoin'd, so'veign of this our realm.

Vor.—I shall, my lord, obey your high command.

And so forth, through five insupportably tedious acts! What bigotry or hallucination could have induced Parr and his fellow dupes to fall in raptures with such stuff as coming from Shakespeare! And yet Parr and Boaden were men of erudition, and great critics in their day! They both lived, however, to persecute and denounce young Ireland with savage violence after he had confessed the hoax. So much for contemporaneous criticism!

Imagine "Hamlet" to have been produced for the first time immediately after the appearance of this "newly-discovered play of Shakespeare," and imagine it to have been put forth as the production of Mr. Timothy Tibbs. What a parallel, to the disparagement of Hamlet and the glorification of Vortigern, should we have had from our sapient critics! What senseless balderdash would the scene between the young prince and the "old boy in the cellarage" have been! What drawing nonsense compared with the fire and spirit of the opening dialogue between Constantius and Vortigern! Alas for the fallibility of our poor human judgments! If I ever write a book, (and I mean to, one of these days,) I am resolved I will snap my fingers in the faces of Messieurs the critics, and write, write, egad! to please myself and the publick telling the snarleyows of the press to bark till their throats are sore; and bawling in mind the consoling reflection of Swift, that, "when a true genius appears in the world, you may know him by this sign—the duncees are all in confederacy against him."

LETTERS FROM THE SOUTH.

South Carolina, May 25th, 1839.

MY DEAR SIR—We are packing up for the city, and will leave our woodland home, our dense forests and broad fields, now green with every variety of vine, fruit and foliage, on Monday next. The season is approaching when the rank vegetation of our swamps becomes fatal to European and Atlantic life; and we natives of the seaboard find it a timely precaution to depart before the middle of June. I have remained in our swamps till the middle of July, without apprehension and without suffering harm; but where we have the lives of women and children depending upon us, such a delay might prove dangerous if not fatal, and would certainly be wanton. Both of our plantations, which lie in different but parallel districts of the state, are on rivers. The two Edistoos, or rather the two forks or branches of the parent trunk, run along beside our lands, at a distance of twelve miles—an easy ride of three hours—apart. This stream is one of the boldest and deepest, though narrow, in our state. We receive from it abundant supplies of fish in the proper season; trout, rock, perch, beam and cat; the latter is accounted among us one of the most exquisite. The meat is whiter than snow, remarkably delicate and tender, without bones, and of superior flavour; one of them, more than two feet in length, graced our table a few days ago; they are chiefly caught in traps. At this time our woods present an appearance—the most lovely and inviting. Of their density, depth, darkness and variety of green—their odours, which reach you at the distance of miles and envelop you, as it were, in clouds of perfume—you can form no idea. The wild grape, of every sort and flavour, hangs around us at every step we take, growing without care or cultivation in every swamp and thicket, rising to the tops of the loftiest trees, and linking them together by festoons of the most glowing and velvety green. Plums, peaches, pears and apples; strawberries, blackberries, raspberries and cherries; many apples, etc.; all these we are about to leave to our negroes. Those poor devils, whom you northern abolitionists so greatly pity, will have, for the gathering, constantly within their reach, dainties which you and I would purchase with difficulty and at a great price in New-York and Charleston markets. Add to this the fish which they get from the streams, the game which they encounter in the fields—and, par parenthese, there are five negroes on our woodland plantations—slaves—who each keep their guns in their own possession—and in their walks the opossums, which are taken nightly by the dogs by the dozen, and which a negro prefers to any pigs; the racoons, the squirrels, the wild turkeys, duck and deer; and you may form some idea of what we leave behind us. Nor do the cruel owners of the slave defer him to the natural produce of the woods for his support. Mr. —, a near friend, plants about four hundred acres of corn, about ten of rice, ten of wheat, ten of potatoes, ten of rye, etc., none of which are sold, and all kept for plantation consumption. To these add the slaughter of about sixty head of hogs and ten steers annually, and you will have some idea of the lean providence of that grinding southern cultivator, who is so great a monster of cupidity in the estimation of modern anti-slave philanthropy.

PARISIAN NOVELTIES.

Paris, May 6.

The king's fête was commencing when I wrote last. The weather was fine, and the crowd exceeded greatly. The day passed off with the utmost tranquillity; with the exception of two or three accidents, nothing occurred to mar the festivity of the occasion. Yet I must declare that I could perceive a vast difference between the demeanour of the people this year and on preceding birth-days. There was a lack of that heart-inspiring gaiety which prompts the Parisian population to fling care to the winds, and be happy at least for one day in the year. The general appearance of the crowd was heavy, and they seemed to care but little for the amusements prepared for them. At the palace, too, the visits were sad affairs, every one appearing out of spirits. In the evening at the concert before the Tuileries, the Marseillaise was encored. The illuminations were altogether official—I did not perceive a single private house with a lamp. The exhibition of the products of French industry was the great circumstance of the day. I have already spoken of the king's private visit there. Everything appeared exactly in the same position when the crowd were permitted to enter. There are four large rooms, and two small ones, each appropriated to its own peculiar articles. The building is marked by considerable grandeur of appearance, but the whole is not yet completed externally and some of the scaffolding still remains up. As to the character of the articles exhibited, it is complained that there are too many useless matters in the collection, even mere playthings. The whole number of articles exposed to view amounts to forty-three thousand.

The ministry still remains in status quo. Bets are now made that none will be formed within the month. The Dukes of Orleans and Nemours are held at present. They were both this week at the races in the Champ-de-Mars. Lord H. Seymour has again been unsuccessful this year. Not one of his horses have won. Margaria and Francesca, both entered in the name of the Comte de Cambis, won the two great prizes with great ease.

Next to the formation of the ministry, the chief subject of discussion here is the suicide of Soufflard, one of the men lately convicted of a dreadful murder in the Rue du Temple. This man had, for the ten days the trial lasted, preserved great firmness and presence of mind; it was when brought up to hear his fate that he swallowed a dose of arsenic, sufficient, it is said, to kill a hundred men. He was observed, whilst standing at the bar, to keep his handkerchief to his mouth, and when the judgment was declared, he seemed anxious to speak. He was apparently unable to do so, and he was led away without having uttered any remark. In passing through the court of the prison, he asked for a glass of water, which he swallowed at a draught. This hastened the effects of the poison, and in a few minutes he fell down in dreadful agony. Medical assistance was sent for, and emetics administered, but all in vain; he died next morning in violent convulsions. The most extraordinary part of this strange affair is the concealment of the poison for so many days, as the prisoners are subjected to most minute examination. It is said that the poison was curiously fixed in the folds of his cravat.

The great subject of conversation during the week has been Mlle. Rachel's appearance in comedy. She played Hermione in the first piece, and Dorine in Tartuffe in the second. The Odéon was the theatre chosen for this representation, as being the largest in Paris, and it must be acknowledged that the crowd filled it still too small. The receipts amounted to twenty-two thousand francs, and the actress received presents to the amount of twenty-four thousand francs more. I have remarked already, in a former letter, on her performance of the first part. It is full of beauties, though occasionally marked by some roughness. Dorine has a certain resemblance to the other part, in point of satirical expression, and a certain haughtiness of spirit, which distinguishes Dorine from other waiting-maids. Mlle. Rachel was amusing, at all events, though she showed that comedy does not suit her so well as tragedy. The general opinion here is that she failed; but so does that judgment too severe. It is said that this young actress's income now amounts to two thousand five hundred francs a year. Lucky she must be accounted, when it is remembered that ten months ago she was almost in the streets. I venture to assert, that if any one had then offered her fifteen hundred francs a year, she would gladly have accepted the offer.

Pigeon shooting is all the fashion here: large wagers are decided daily at the Tuileries Gardens in this way. Great improvements are to be effected recently in the capital. After the resignation of the Molé ministry, the public works were suspended, and great distress arose among the working population: one hundred thousand names were down to receive relief last week. A colossal image of Liberty, which now lies near the plaster elephants in the place of the Bastille, will be inaugurated to-day. The theatres are not open to-day to the public gratuitously, as they were on the king's fête after the revolution. Louis Philippe lost part of his popularity by departing from his original practice in this respect.

A piece called Léo Barchat has been produced at the Porte St. Martin. It turns on the secret league established among the German students, to sacrifice any one who may please them. Léo is a young political writer, who, though an ardent lover of liberty, excites their suspicion for having accepted the place of councillor of state. He discovers their intention to assassinate him, and enters their secret assembly in disguise, through the assistance of one of the members. The scene which then takes place is a most striking one, and produced a great effect. A young man is proposed as member; he answers satisfactorily to all the questions proposed, and is about to be accepted, when suddenly the officers of the crown appear, and seize on all as secret plotters. The neophyte, in order to save himself, proves that he is a spy, sent by the state to discover the mysteries of the tribunal, and demands exemption from punishment. He is then sternly informed, that all that he had seen, the guards, the officers, forcible entrance, and arrest, are all pretended! It was the last proof; and the parts were filled by the members themselves! He is a traitor, and must die! He is pointed on the spot, and the meeting resumes its sittings. Léo is present at the subsequent proceeding, and hears who is to assassinate him. This person is in love with Léo's wife, and when he comes to assassinate him, he boasts of the favour shown him by the lady. Léo is about to attack him, when the wife enters and denies the truth of what he had just said. He is overcome with shame, and kills himself! The dénouement is a very lame affair; but some scenes in the piece are admirable. At the Opera Comique, Les Treize, a piece of Scribe's, with music by Halévy, has been brought out with good success. Les Treize are a society of Neapolitan rôtis, who are joined together for the purpose of making conquests among the fair sex as frequently as they can, and thus sowing, as widely as possible, the seeds of disunion between lovers. The adventures of some of them with a young working-girl forms the plot of the piece. The music is pleasing, but no more. Scribe has exhibited as much true humour in this piece as he has displayed polished wit in his other works. Le Sauvage de La Méduse has been produced at the Ambigu-Comique. It is the work of M. Desnoyers, and the story is interesting enough. Of course the famous scene from the picture of the Louvre is introduced, and always with applause. The shipwreck is most cleverly managed.

For want of other matter, shall I tell you how Lamartine, the poet, writes his verses. He walks forth in his park, with pencil and paper; whatever ideas strike him he puts down on these. He throws them all into a box, and his secretary afterwards arranges them as he thinks best. They are then taken to a book-seller, and sold for one thousand five hundred or one thousand six hundred pounds a work. Lamartine declares that he never read Le Chute d'un Ange until it had been printed many months, and then only at the instance of his wife. Some say that he intends to read it this summer.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTES OF DOGS.

These anecdotes given of dogs saving the lives of persons in danger of drowning, are so numerous as to be familiar to every person. "One cannot reflect on the innumerable instances of the love and usefulness of this animal, without being grateful to providence for having given to man a creature capable of many of those noble and disinterested feelings, which we are accustomed to appreciate so highly in our fellow-creatures, and almost to look upon as constituting the perfection of the human character." I will leave to introduce to my readers an anecdote of a dog belonging to a friend of mine, but shall first, however, mention a story somewhat similar, related by an author of great respectability, regarding a dog belonging to a religious house in France. "At a convent in France twenty paupers were served with a dinner at a certain hour every day. A dog belonging to the convent did not fail to be present at this regale, to receive the odds and ends which were now and then thrown to him. The guests, however, were poor and hungry, and of course not very wasteful; so that their pensioner did little more than scent the feast of which he would fain have partaken. The portions were served by a person at the ringing of the bell, and delivered out by means of what, in religious houses, is called a tour; which is a machine like the section of a cask, that, by turning round upon a pivot, exhibits whatever is placed on the concave side, without discovering the person who moves it. One day, this dog, who had only received a few scraps, waited till the paupers were all gone, took the rope in his mouth, and rang the bell. His stratagem succeeded. He repeated it next day with the same good fortune. At length the cook, finding that twenty-one portions were given out instead of twenty, was determined to discover the trick in doing which he had no great difficulty; for, lying perdu, and waiting the paupers as they came for their different portions, and that there was no intruder except the dog, he began to suspect the truth; which he was confirmed in when he saw the animal wait with great deliberation till the visitors were all gone, and then pull the bell. The matter was related to the community; and, to reward him for his ingenuity, he was permitted to ring the bell every day for his dinner, on which a mess of broken victuals was always afterwards served out to him."

The following is the anecdote I refer to. A friend of mine, Captain W. Aug. Thomson, R. N., residing near Edinburgh, has a dog, both the parents of which were natives of Newfoundland. At the time I refer to (1836) he was, I believe, only two years old, but exhibited all the indications of great muscular power, and singular sagacity. He was considerably larger at that time than many full-grown animals of the same breed, and I always imagined his eye possessed a very peculiar degree of intelligence. One day my friend walked down to the sea-beach to observe the military, whose barracks are in his neighbourhood, performing their evolutions, and took the dog with him. All went on very well till the cavalry commenced firing, but such a sound was too much for the astonished Bounce, as the dog is called. Being quite a puppy, like many other puppies, he was not very willing to stand fire, and he therefore considered the best thing he could do was to sound a retreat. Accordingly, without casting a single glance towards his master, he bounded away homeward at full gallop, with his tail depressed, and in evident terror. His master's reluctance is about a mile from the beach, and it appeared the dog ran the whole way at full speed. But as the house is in a garden, and surrounded by a lofty wall, having a gate which is always shut, and which communicates with the house only by a bell, it became a problem to our canine reasoner, how to get within the walls so as to be in safety. The gate he could not open, the wall was too high to leap; how then could he enter? He perceived at once his predicament, and no doubt thought of the bell he had so often seen his master pull, and the sounds of which were so often followed by the opening of the gate. Crossing the road, he ran up to a labouring man who was passing, and with all the gentleness he could assume, seized him by the wrist and held him, at the same time wagging his tail, and endeavouring to direct the man's attention to his situation. The man was at first, naturally enough, much terrified; but the perfectly gentle appearance of the animal prevented his fears from increasing. He therefore accompanied the dog across the road, and was led close up to the bell, which he at once perceived the animal required him to pull; this having done, he was no longer detained a prisoner, and the gate being opened, he related in astonishment to the servant, the singular conduct of the dog. This little story is entitled to the highest credit, not only on account of the source I derived it from, but because I myself have seen the dog, when desirous of leaving the room, take his master by the wrist and lead him to the door in order to open it. All this I have been assured is solely the result of the dog's instinct, or rather, reason, as he never received any instruction. I trust that, although this anecdote has little direct reference to humanity in animals, I may be excused taking this opportunity of mentioning it.

DOMESTICK GREENHOUSES.

A plan has lately been discovered for keeping green plants in a fresh and lively growing state, in all seasons and climates, with a very small degree of trouble. As it must be quite new to many of our readers, though well known to professional horticulturists and men of science, I shall try to describe it, from a recollection of seeing it in operation in London in the autumn of last year. It is, I suppose, generally understood that greenhouse plants, among which may be numbered many flowering tender herbs, will not grow in the open air in a town, or even in a carefully-kept room. The smoky or otherwise impure atmosphere either kills them outright or causes them to languish, so that at the best they are poor stunted things. But, besides being deprived of pure air, plants are not properly and regularly watered. Watering only now and then does not suit all kinds of plants; many require to live in an atmosphere from which moisture can be at all times drawn. In short, by the common artificial methods, it is often impossible to imitate the processes of nature so effectually as to keep a number of yet flowers and shrubs about our dwellings in a state of health and beauty.

The new and improved method consists simply in the use of a glass case for the plants. The case may be the size of a room, or of a box—it is all one. The top and sides of the case are of glass panes; the bottom contains earth in which the plants grow; the whole is kept closed, except at short intervals, when a small door is opened for any necessary purpose. The case may be placed in a room at a window full in the sun's light, or if the enclosure be large, like a greenhouse, it may be situated out of doors. The plants being set in the usual manner, the earth is saturated to a certain extent with water, and the case closed. Nature now takes upon itself the entire management of the process. When the sun shines on the case, the moisture rises in a natural evaporation from the earth, and hangs in condensed globules on the inside of the glass. When the cold of evening ensues, the moisture descends, and is absorbed by the plants and by the earth. Thus alternately rising and descending, the moisture in the case keeps up a proper and regular system of irrigation, whereby the plants are sustained in a state of great freshness and beauty. I am not aware that there is any precise method followed for admitting fresh air into the case, and am inclined to believe that this is accomplished only by the casual opening of the small door, or by slight crevices in the frame-work. A gentleman, residing in the eastern and most confined part of London, has brought the growth of plants by this very simple means to an extraordinary degree of perfection. In one of his front rooms he has a case, about the size of a bird cage, in which there grow a variety of plants, native and exotic, in the most lively state of health and freshness; and in a small back court he has erected a series of sheds, enclosed, and framed with glass on top and front, in which a prodigious variety of plants are seen growing in an equally healthy condition. On being conducted into one of these enclosed out-houses, I was struck with admiration of the freshness and greenness of the vegetation. From the ground grew tall euphorbia, and from jutting stones, resembling rock-work, there depended mosses and creeping plants of divers kinds in a state of as luxuriant vegetation as if they had sprung amongst the cliffs which overhang a Highland lake. Yet all this was in one of the smokeiest parts of London, in a confined back court, where a breath of fresh air could not at any season be reasonably expected, and where certainly the same plants could not grow in the open air, notwithstanding every care which might be bestowed upon them. What a triumph is this over local circumstances! Here is a gentleman of taste, who, though placed in a situation the most unfavourable, has it in his power, at the mere trifling of expense, to cultivate at least one of the branches of the delightful science of botany, and at all times enjoy the contemplation of some of nature's most beautiful works.

A special advantage of this mode of plant-culture consists in its applicability to the transportation of certain growing vegetables to distant countries. It has hitherto been difficult to keep plants alive on ship-board, in consequence of the great quantity of fresh water which they require. The expenditure of water, for instance, in taking plants from Great Britain to New South Wales, is so considerable as to be a complete bar to their exportation. This obstacle to the diffusion of plants no longer exists. By the above described method, growing plants are carried safely round the world, without requiring a drop of additional water during the voyage.

The woman that has not touched the heart of a man before he leads her to the altar, has scarcely a chance to charm it when possession and security turn their powerful arms against her.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Concealment." A novel, in two vols. Philadelphia. Lea and Blanchard.

Two interesting and well-written volumes vividly portraying the unhappiness and misery which invariably follow any departure from the perfect confidence and truth so necessary to the happiness of married life. Several passages struck us as very beautiful; we will give one or two, and then commend the work to our readers as much superior to the usual class of novels daily issued from the press. How true is the following, which might have served as the motto to the whole—

"Many people can make great sacrifices for those they love, but few have the moral courage to love truth better than the object of their affection."

And again—

"How rarely does it happen, that the intellect improves the heart; but how often that the affections enlighten and elevate the understanding! How blessed is the union, when both 'work together for good,' and scatter over this life of sorrow the flowers and fruits of intellect and goodness!"

We shrewdly suspect the author of being a lady, from the following—

"There is, perhaps, nothing so engaging to some women as the capability in superior men of enjoying their society as rational beings; and in nothing do the lords of creation make a greater mistake with regard to the ladies hereof, than in supposing that it is necessary to put off rationally to please the weaker sex."

"Piccola. The Prisoner of Fenestrelle; or, Captivity Captive. By M. De Saintant. Second edition. Philadelphia. Lea and Blanchard.

We are glad to see this new and handsome edition of one of the most extraordinary works of the age. The English editor justly remarks:—"The very soul of poetry breathes through this little romance. But the author of Piccola is a visionary whose dreams are manifestly the result of a happy and wholesome frame of mind, not frantick slumbers haunted by nightmare and diabolism. Lowly and unpresuming as is the heroism of the tale, she has a claim to the protection of the wise and good; and we defy the most hard-hearted of critics to set his foot upon the humble neck of 'Piccola.'"

"Poems by Mrs. Pollen," author of "Married Life," "Skeptic," "Walls of Silence," etc. Boston. William Crosby and Co., Pp. 182.

This is a collection of some of the most graceful and beautiful lyrics that have ever been contributed to the poetical literature of the country. No one can read "Sachem's Hill," "Her Voyage is at an end," the exquisite translations from Unland, and the devotional pieces, which enrich the volume, without admitting that the author has displayed rare poetical talent. We mean, hereafter, to give our readers some liberal extracts from the work, but must at present content ourselves with the following gem, from the German of Ramlar—

TO A FOUNTAIN.

Lo! this font is flowing ever;
But the fountain prattles never:
Traveler! at this fountain stay;
Learn of it, with pure endeavour,
Good to do, and nothing say.

"Lady Cleveley, the Woman of Honour."

This is the title of a satire by some friend of Bulwer's, on Lady Bulwer and her late novel—tolerably written and severe. It commences with an appeal to the "Daughters of England" to spurn the author of Cleveley—

"With one acclaim,

Or share her matchless sin—her deathless shame."

It ridicules Cleveley as a literary production, lauds Bulwer, and inveighs against his spouse in a manner not more caustic than just. The following is a specimen:

One evening to his lonely home he bore
A wreath, like that immortal Shakespeare wore!
And o'er his solitude the echo came,
Of shouts of triumph, mingled with his name!
And we may deem, his eyes were full of tears—
How cold the triumph which no loved one shares!
Too proud to mourn, he sought his mind to engage
With the cold woes of a fictitious page;
He turns the leaves—ah! has a viper stung!
His cheek grows pale, his noble brow is wrung!
Oh, monstrous! see, the mother of his child,
With blackest slander has his name defiled!
And o'er his noble heart a sickness came,
Not for his own, but for her deathless shame.
The coarse allusion, the indecent jest,
The falsehood half revealed and half suppressed,
And vilest calumnies profusely poured
On the fond mother whose heart he adored,
His sacred anguish is no theme for song—
But heaven is merciful and truth is strong!

The following are the concluding lines:

See, from thy waning charms base flatterers fly!
Read! read! thy shame in each averted eye.
Behold th' inevitable hour is come!
When woman's scene of happiness is home!
Crushed 'neath the mount of curses, thou hast piled,
Weep for the home thy falsehood has defiled!
Yet list! the muse shall teach thee where to find
The only solace of the guilty mind!
Glad tidings greet the trembling heirs of Sin;
Ah, who has said, "compel them to come in!"
Oh, seek, thou false one! through long after years,
To wash this stain in penitential tears!
Then to thy husband's feet; if there forgiven,
May prying angels plead for thee in heaven!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged to "T." for the goodwill displayed in his communication, but as we select only such things as are of a controversial character from our pages, must decline it.—The remarks of "Sebastian" upon the comparative merits of Miss Sharrett and Mrs. Seguin, are not at all to our taste. Both ladies, in their peculiar spheres, are undoubtedly far above mediocrity. What satisfaction can it be to our correspondents to decry the merits of either?—Here he goes, there he goes," is the exclamation employed by one of our contributors on hearing that Mr. Wallace had again sailed for England in the Great Western.—The allusion to the mustache is too personal.—"A Fireman" should be heard, if his remarks were not as terribly unpalatable. He is down upon the city authorities like—like, "a house on fire."—We have never met with the caricatures described by "X," but if he has been a true account of them, the vendors should, undoubtedly, be subjected to a prosecution.—We fear that we must postpone since die, the communications of "Hotspur," "Zeta," "L. Y.," "A. B.," "Selwyn," and "Lotitia Hardy."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1839.

THE MIRROR AND ITS PROSPECTS.

We are sure that the numerous friends and subscribers to the Mirror will not be displeased to learn that its prospects never were more cheering nor its support more liberal than at present. Our circulation, during the last year, has experienced a rapid and steady increase, so that we shall be enabled to render the next volume still more entitled to public favour, both in the improved character of its contents and of its embellishments and typographical appearance. Owing to some delay in the execution of the last of the four costly steel engravings promised for the present volume, we shall be compelled to make up the deficiency by presenting our readers with five, the coming year; but, in order that our engagements may be fulfilled to those whose intention it was to subscribe solely for the closing volume, we would state that all such may obtain a copy of the forthcoming plate gratuitously, by making their wishes known at the office.

Ladies of a certain age.—A lady of Marseilles lately brought an action against a gentleman for unbandsome usage on his part. The day of trial came: the court was crowded, and a very fair portion consisted of the sex justly immortalized by Milton as "heaven's last, best work." The usual question was proposed by the judgment: "Quel age avez vous?"—"Dix-neuf ans, Monsieur."—"You mistake, mademoiselle," interrupted her counsel, "you are of age." The lady, however, persisted that she was a minor, and in spite of the earnest appeals of her advocate, still adhered to "dix-neuf ans." Nothing could induce the fascinating descendant of Eve to pass the Rubicon of nineteen; and there being no proof before the court to the contrary, the complaint was dismissed, and the young lady in her teens was compelled to pay the costs. And how old do you think she was? Why, there are two eventful periods in the life of woman—one, when she wonders whom she will have; the other, when she wonders who will have her. She had attained the last.

The Moon-hoax eclipsed.—Mons. de Waldeck, who some time prior to 1836 spent three years in the province of Yucatan, and who has devoted much of his life to the study of American antiquities, has published the result of his researches. Many important and interesting facts are therein developed. He claims to have discovered the ruins of five large cities in Central America, which are almost unknown to the inhabitants, and the position of which are illustrated by twenty-two large plates. He has likewise a poem, which is supposed to have been written before the conquest of Mexico, when it was a great and powerful empire, in which the christian faith was preached by the high priest Chilam Ballam at least a century before the Spanish invasion, and in a language, the vocabulary of which is still in existence. This Mr. Chilam Ballam must be some relation, we suspect, to the illustrious Hum-ha-hi, who lectured at Pekin on steam-engines and railroads some twenty-five centuries before the discovery of America.

Sully's Victoria.—The full-length portrait of Victoria, executed by the distinguished Philadelphia artist, may now be seen at No. 155 Broadway. It is truly an exquisite work of art, and, from universal testimony, is the most faithful likeness of the British queen that has yet been painted. The engraving of this portrait, though admirably executed, does not convey an idea of the rare merits of the original. The colouring of Mr. Sully's picture is very beautiful and true—the proportions of the figure are exact, and the expression of the face combines energy with sweetness. An autograph of Victoria, presented to the successful artist, may be seen in the room of the exhibition. It is quite a characteristic scribble.

Belles Lettres.—The Courier says that a gentleman was called upon a few days since, to decipher some inscriptions on a lot of bells, recently imported, and supposed to be of Spanish manufacture. On examination, he found that these inscriptions looked as little like Spanish as anything else, being apparently some very ill-used members of the alphabet, turned topsy turvy. He excused himself, therefore, from the task of deciphering, on the ground that though he read the Spanish language, he had not made much progress in the Spanish Belles Lettres.

Inductive reasoning.—A New-Orleans paper says that two individuals got into a political dispute on the Levee recently, when one knocked the other into the river. This is called a specimen of inductive reasoning.

Sidney Clifton.—One of the New-York correspondents of the National Intelligencer, a weekly chronicle of literary births, marriages and deaths, has the following:

"Mr. Fay, (secretary of our legation at Berlin,) is nearly out of press with a novel called Sidney Clifton, the scenes of which are laid, mainly, in this city. I have read a few chapters in this work, and think myself safe in pronouncing a favourable opinion of it, in advance of its appearance."

On this the Madisonian remarks—

"The 'gossiper' is wide of the mark. Mr. Fay is not the author of the forthcoming 'Sidney Clifton.'"

To this the Commercial Advertiser adds:

"So much any one might guess, who knew that the title of Mr. Fay's forthcoming novel is the 'The Countess Ida.' But who is the author of 'Sidney Clifton?' Tell us that, Mr. Madisonian, and we will give you credit for knowing something."

Next comes the Star:

"We could tell the Commercial who wrote Sidney Clifton, but we won't. We think, however, we may venture to say, without violating a stipulated cognomen, that it is from the pen of a gentleman of this city, well-known in Wall-street; who, notwithstanding his numerous avocations as a man of business, has found time sufficient to write a work of fiction, of which those who have read it, speak in the highest terms. We have long known the author as a graceful and flowing writer and a poet of the first order. We do not mean, however, to tell his name, nor to insinuate that 'Sidney Clifton' is by either Prosper M. Wetmore, Gosman A. Worth, Fitz-Greene Halleck, Edward S. Gould, or Jacob Harvey. The reader is at liberty to name any other clever man about town he may think proper."

The Star is facetious upon the subject of 'Sidney Clifton'—a work which has recently made quite a sensation in the literary circles. We, too, could say who wrote it; but the Star should not "insinuate" that either of the above-named lady gentlemen had found time to write a book. One rumour, however, we take upon ourselves to contradict: 'Sidney Clifton' is not the production of our worthy district attorney, J. R. Whiting.—But who did write it?—Ah, that's the question.

Painting and criticism on paintings.—A recent writer judiciously remarks:—"It is a general complaint, on the opening of every exhibition, how few works there are worthy of notice; and the cry always raised is, 'What trash! what horrors!' The truth is, criticism is much easier than execution; it is much easier, also, to discover faults than to appreciate beauties; and many take a pleasure in looking out for the bad, while they pass by the good in silence. Those who are acquainted with the various and gigantic difficulties to be contended with, the almost universality of knowledge, the poetick and exalted genius necessary for a successful prosecution of this wondrous art, painting, will rather be inclined to astonishment that so many great masters have been, and still should be found, than to complain there have been and are so few."

Jeremy Taylor on calumny.—"There is no worse devil," said Jeremy Taylor, "than a devilish tongue. Were I a legislator I would enact a law, that every one who spoke evil of his fellow-creature, should be condemned to a fine, could he not fully substantiate his charge; and that the author of every slander and falsehood should lose his tongue." Then, perchance, there might be peace in Israel. But in the present blessed state of society, it is really fearful and heart-sickening to think how entirely one is in the power of these said tongues, what may not be propagated to one's disadvantage during a sence, and how many reputations have been victimized during the babbling moments of a morning visit."

The Merchants' Magazine and Commercial Review.—This work of Mr. Hunt is in press, and will make its appearance on the first of July. We have seen several of the proof-sheets, and we do not hesitate to say, that its typographical appearance will not be surpassed by any magazine or review in the country. Mr. Hunt has secured able and talented assistance, and altogether the work will, we are confident, prove every way worthy of the class of our fellow-citizens for whose especial benefit it is designed.

Cullen's Indian Gallery.—Cullen, the artist, who has devoted much time to the study of Indian character, costume, and physiognomy, has opened a large collection of Indian portraits, views of Indian villages, Indian dances, ball plays, religious ceremonies, buffalo hunts, etc., all tastefully arranged for exhibition in the saloon of the Stuyvesant Institute. The collection is a most interesting one, and worthy the examination of the publick.

A voice from Texas.—A moral lesson from Texas to the United States is really something new and amusing. The editor of the Houston Telegraph reads a long lecture to the citizens of the southwestern part of the Union, who engage so frequently in furious and desperate brawls. This will remind every one of the sneer addressed by the pot to the kettle.

Origin of the word Texas.—The Cincinnati Republican has furnished an ingenious clue to the derivation of the word Texas. It is said to have originated in a couplet used by the earlier emigrants to that land of promise, Texas being a corruption of the phrase in the last line:

"When every other land rejects us,
This is the soil just freely taken us."

The Characters of Schiller.—We learn from the newspapers, that a work with this title has been published by Messrs. Otis and Broaders, of Boston, from the pen of our esteemed correspondent, Mrs. Elliot. We have received no intimation of the fact from the publishers, but will take an early opportunity to give our readers a specimen of its contents.
